chairman of executive committee of Southern Pacific Co., $76,500; president of same company, $90,000; general counsel of same company, $45,000; general counsel of Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co., $41,220; president of Texas & Pacific Railroad Co., $50,000; vice chairman of executive committee of Union Pacific System, $54,000; president of same railroad, $90,000; receiver of Wabash Railroad, $45,000; vice president and general manager of the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railway Co., $40,000.

ROOSEVELT GETS $63,750

To set forth the salaries ranging from $20,000 to $40,000 that are paid to railroad executives would require more space than could reasonably be devoted to that purpose, and there is another enormous group ranging from $9,000 to $20,000.

The salary of the President of the United States, after deducting the salary cut, is $63,750. The Vice President, the Speaker of the House, and members of the Cabinet receive $12,750, and it goes without saying that the financial drains on these officials are much greater than on railroad executives. When we see railroad officials drawing twice as much salary as the President of the United States, the conclusion is almost inescapable that there is something wrong with this picture. When the manager of a railroad dining service receives a larger salary than the leading men of the United States Senate, the eternal fitness of things gets a jolt in the solar plexus.

When a stenographer employed by the United States Government, supporting dependents on a salary of $1,560 a year, and not knowing how he will ever get by, receives a cut of 15 percent, reducing his pay to $1,326 a year, it would seem that if justice still abides in the world those responsible for high railroad salaries would reduce them to a reasonable extent, and furthermore it would seem that if the Congress of the United States is alert to its responsibilities it will not permit the money of the taxpayers to be loaned through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the railroads until at least the most exorbitant of these fancy salaries are brought down to earth.

RECIPROCAL TARIFFS

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, during the past few months there has been a great deal spoken and written about reciprocal tariffs. Our Democratic opponents believe they have found in the reciprocal tariff a means by which they can deliver a successful flank attack upon our protective-tariff system. They are giving wide circulation to the historical fact that reciprocal tariffs are of Republican origin, the creation of such outstanding Republican statesmen as James G. Blaine and William McKinley, both distinguished as protectionists. Admitting the compliment our Democratic contemporaries pay the Republican Party by citing Republican leaders and policies as their exemplars, there is just cause for suspicion that much of this Democratic praise of the Republican reciprocity policy of 40 years ago is designed as a smoke screen to cover their flank attack. This suspicion is aroused because there are a great many facts in connection with the reciprocity movement of 1897 that the Democratic propaganda is studiously concealing.

What our Democratic opponents do not tell regarding the reciprocity negotiations growing out of the Dingley tariff reciprocity provisions is that we were deliberately double crossed by those countries which had been most voluble in their professions of a desire to have an all-around reduction of tariff rates. When the test came, they resorted to the most indefensible trickery to nullify any benefits we might obtain out of any reciprocity treaties. As soon as they knew the United States was going to request reciprocal negotiations they hastened to raise all their tariff rates against the United States to still higher levels, so that after the negotiations were completed the concessions which they made would, in point of fact, be no concessions at all. American goods entering their markets would still be paying as high tariffs as the goods from other countries. On the other hand, due to our system of tariff rates, any concessions we made would be very real and would give those countries obtaining such concessions a distinct advantage in our markets.

How strikingly the conditions today parallel the conditions existing then! During the past 2 years we have had a veritable flood of propaganda from other countries and a great flood of propaganda in this country inspired by other countries, demanding that we lower our tariff barriers, and holding out the promise that if we did, we would then find other nations eager to reciprocate. The present Democratic administration, through the Secretary of State, took the world at its word and made the proposition, prior to the London Economic Conference, that the 66 nations which were to participate in that conference declare a tariff truce during the period prior to the conference and for the duration of the conference.

That proposition, made April 29, was promptly rejected by a group of the leading European nations under the leadership of Great Britain. The cause of its rejection was the fact that Great Britain was at that time negotiating long-term trade and tariff agreements with Argentina, Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, the Netherlands, Poland, Japan, Estonia, Finland, Latvia, Lithuania, and Iceland. France, too, was negotiating similar tariff agreements with Canada and a number of European countries. They did not propose to enter into any tariff truce with the United States until after they had secured for themselves all the possible advantages from agreements which they entered into to the exclusion of the United States.

England completed a tariff agreement with the Argentine May 3, whereby she gave special concessions to the agricultural products of the Argentine and in return secured from Argentina special concessions for her industrial exports. She entered into a similar agreement with Denmark and the other countries mentioned. The net result of these agreements was to close the markets of the United Kingdom to the exports of the American farmer (which meant eliminating not only the markets of the United Kingdom but much of Europe, because the markets of Liverpool and London serve as the clearing house not only of the British Empire but of practically every country in Europe) and, on the other hand, the closing of the markets of Argentina, Denmark, Sweden, and the other countries listed to the industrial products and exports of the United States.

After those agreements had been completed, the British Government on May 12 receded from her former position and announced her willingness to enter into a tariff truce with the United States and the rest of the world. In other words, the British Government proceeded to fence off for herself all the choice trade territory of the world before she entered into any agreement with the United States to establish reciprocal tariffs. Under present conditions, any reciprocal tariff agreements would be of little or no value to this country, because they would not be effective in those countries and upon those commodities which have been bound up by the international agreements made between the British Empire and the countries named.

But even then, only 19 countries of the 66 participating in the London Economic Conference agreed to a tariff truce, and those which did agree, agreed, as did France, only in principle.

So we have exposed the ugly fact that all this European talk about lowering trade barriers in order to revive the world's commerce means one thing and only one thing—lowering American tariff rates so that Europe could take possession of our markets.

Europe is not altogether to blame for assuming this attitude. It has been encouraged in the belief that at the first opportunity the Democratic Party, if it should come into control of the administration of this Government, would swing open our customhouse doors and invite Europe to come in and help herself to the American markets. Particularly has this been the case since the World War. President Woodrow Wilson first made that proposition in his annual message to the Congress, December 2, 1919. Outlining the vast amount of money European nations had borrowed of the United States, President Wilson made the proposition that they be permitted to repay us not in money, but in goods. In fact he laid down the premise at that time which Europe is today taking advantage of, namely, that they could not pay us at all unless they were permitted to pay us in goods. In this connection he said:

Anything, therefore, which would tend to prevent foreign countries from settling for our exports by shipments of goods into this country could only have the effect of preventing them from paying for our exports, and, therefore, of preventing the exports from being made.

The only logical conclusion which could be drawn from that expression was that we should lower our tariff rates so as to permit practically the free importation into this country of goods produced by the debtor nations of Europe. And that was the conclusion which Europe drew and has stubbornly maintained to this day.

From that time down to the present moment Democratic leaders have been more solicitous about Europe's prosperity than about our own, more concerned in finding a market for the output of Europe's industries than in finding a market for the products of the American manufacturer.

President Roosevelt during his campaign for election reiterated this doctrine. In his Sioux City, Iowa, speech he attributed all of Europe's ills to the fact that our tariff had deprived Europe of her American markets and that it was our duty to Europe to put her on her feet by removing the barriers erected to protect our home markets.

The method? It is set forth in the Democratic platform, which pledged "reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations", with the additional proviso that our tariff should be merely a competitive tariff.

Governor Roosevelt elaborated upon this platform. In his Topeka, Kans., speech he said:

The Democratic tariff plan consists in large measure of negotiating agreements with individual countries permitting them to sell goods to us, in return for which they will let us sell to them goods and crops which we produce.

And again he said:

I propose an invitation to them (other nations) to forget the past, to sit at the table with us, and to plan with us for the restoration of the trade of the world.

And what is a "competitive tariff" pledged in the platform? Again let the Democratic Presidential candidate of 1932 define it. In his Seattle, Wash., speech, September 20, he said:

The Democratic platform declares in favor of a competitive tariff, which means one that will put the American producers on a market equality with their foreign competitors.

That is also Vice President Garner's idea of an ideal tariff. On the floor of the House of Representatives January 27, 1921, he said:

The ideal tariff would be a competitive tariff, levying that rate in the customhouse which would result in giving the foreigner an equal opportunity with the American producer.

There can be no escape from this Democratic conception of what constitutes a proper tariff. The Republican Party does not stand for any such tariff. The Republican Party does not believe in giving the foreign producer equal opportunity in the American market with the American producer, as advocated by both the present Democratic President and Vice President. The Republican Party holds that any such tariff, whether it be clothed with the pleasing title of a "reciprocal tariff" or the appellation of a "competitive tariff", means the same thing—a Democratic tariff, which has always been and always will be destructive of American markets without any corresponding benefit to American consumers.

WHAT IS REAL PROTECTION?

In the national Republican platform of 1908 you will find the following:

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

This last sentence in this statement is the meat in the coconut, and just so long as we base the allocation of rates or their change by the Tariff Commission on a basis of the difference in production costs here and abroad, with no consideration of the "reasonable profit to American industries", then we are departing from our fundamental policy of a protective tariff and subscribing to the doctrine of a competitive tariff.

All Democratic tariffs have the same purpose, namely, to break down our tariff walls and permit a flood of foreign imports, to turn America's markets over to the lowest foreign bidders, in the delusion that if we permit foreign producers to flood our markets foreign buyers and consumers will, out of sheer gratitude, reciprocate by increasing their purchases of us, and that they will do so in spite of the fact that they can buy like goods more cheaply from some other country.

Nevertheless at the present London Conference we are witnessing the attempt of the representatives of the Democratic administration to carry out the pledges of the platform and the promises of the candidate. We have witnessed the formal introduction by our Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, in his capacity as chairman of the American delegation at the London Conference, of a proposal that the United States sit at a table and negotiate reciprocal tariffs. The spokesmen and the press of the Democratic administration—at least, those spokesmen and the press which believe in a low tariff—describe this program as a method to extend our foreign markets, open our factories, increase the prosperity of the farmer, and give labor to the unemployed. That is an alluring prospect on paper—a beautiful policy in theory—but when you get down to the cold realities of the case it does not work out as portrayed. Reciprocity is not a jug-handled affair. A reciprocal tariff does something more than open foreign markets to our producers. In a corresponding degree it opens our markets to foreign producers. Otherwise there is no reciprocity.

What is more to the point, it opens our markets to foreign producers of major commodities; that is, the commodities that are in general demand in tremendous quantity. If and when our representatives sit around the council table of this International Economic Conference to arrange reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations, let no one be deceived that those foreign nations are going to ask only such concessions upon our part that will open our markets to beeswax, ostrich feathers, nux vomica, spunk, and seaweed. Quite the contrary. Those nations are going to demand that we open our markets to major manufactured products such as shoes, leather goods, textiles, metal manufactures, and especially to imports of all kinds of food products without limit.

Now, the very practical question thrusts itself into the foreground, Just what American industries and what American producers is the Democratic Party going to "trade off" to foreign countries in these reciprocity negotiations in return for foreign countries promising to open their markets to American producers? Will it be the boot and shoe industry? Will it be the electrical industry? Will it be the chemical industry? Will it be the cotton textile industry? Will it be the glass industry? Will it be the china and tableware industry? Will it be the cutlery industry?

Bitter protests have been filed by foreign countries against our protective rates on commodities made by all these industries, and if they protest the rates, it is inevitable that in any dickering we had with them they will demand a lowering of the very rates against which they have already registered a protest.

Finally, in this game of proposed reciprocal tariffs what guaranty has the American producer, be he manufacturer or farmer, dairyman or gardener, of adding one jot to his foreign markets unless he cuts the price of his products to meet in the open foreign markets of Europe the prices of cheaply produced outputs of the farm and factory of other nations?

The American producer may be given access to foreign markets under a reciprocal tariff, but he will not be given orders for goods. Any expansion of his sales in those foreign countries will have to be won by meeting the competitive prices of Czechoslovakia, Germany, Hungary, Austria, Japan,

Italy, and France in industrial products and of Soviet Russia, the Argentine, New Zealand, Australia in food products.

And if he meets their prices in order to extend his sales, wherein does he profit? The plain truth is, that under such tariff arrangements for every dollar increase in foreign sales of American products, whether of the farm or factory, there will be a loss in this country of $25 in the sale of American farm and factory products. We will be trading a good market for a bad one, a profitable market for a bankrupt one, consumers accustomed to high living standards for consumers living always on the verge of poverty and spending as little as possible. For every factory that will be started or stimulated in this country, in order to take care of these imaginary foreign markets which the Democratic reciprocal tariff plan proposes to develop, there will be a hundred factories in this country that will shut down because of the inundation of foreign goods.

Like the dog in the fable, who, seeing his reflection in the water, dropped the bone he had in order to grab the bone he thought he saw, we will merely be trading the substance for the shadow.

Years ago that eminent statesman, Henry Clay, described a protective tariff as "the American policy." Never was that more in evidence than in the present hour of Democratic attempt to substitute for that American policy a tariff policy of foreigners, for foreigners, and by foreigners, dictated, written, and sealed around an international council table.

Instead of talking about lowering our tariffs by any method we should be considering increasing our rates on hundreds of commodities. The United States is acknowledged to be the largest, best, and most profitable market in the world. Opportunity to exploit this market is the greatest desire of every producer and merchandiser of goods the world over. It should be perfectly evident to every student of international commerce that there is a concerted drive upon the part of European nations to capture the American market. It should be perfectly plain that we are on the threshold of what will probably be the most intense and ruthless international trade war the world has ever seen, and instead of throwing away our strongest weapon of defense, or by dickering blunt its edge, we should be strengthening our hold upon it and increasing its effectiveness.

Call this what you will—provincialism, isolation, economic nationalism—it nevertheless is a sound economic policy, an outstanding American policy, which has been primarily responsible for the upbuilding and the development of America, not only in a material way, but in those things which minister to the finer things of life. For without our material progress we could not have progressed in the field of art or science, we could not have administered even to our spiritual needs in the manner we have, for, by and large, practically all of our spiritual institutions, as well as our educational institutions, have been made possible and have been maintained by reason of the material wealth we have acquired because of our growth and development as a nation.

RECIPROCAL PROVISIONS OF THE DINGLEY TARIFF LAW—1897

When President Roosevelt was intending to ask the Congress to abdicate both its treaty-ratifying and its revenue-raising powers by conferring upon him the autocratic right to conclude reciprocal tariff treaties with other nations, without their being referred to Congress for ratification and review, the Democratic press was filled with preliminary propaganda to the effect that the contemplated action of President Roosevelt was predicated upon and buttressed by good Republican precedent. It was stated that such a procedure had marked the tariff policy of the McKinley administration and was inaugurated by provisions of the Dingley Tariff Act of July 24, 1897.

The most effective answer to this misleading propaganda is the text of the reciprocity sections of the Dingley Tariff Act and a brief summary of the same, pointing out wherein they differ materially and fundamentally from the policy contemplated by President Roosevelt—but abandoned at the last moment—of asking for autocratic power to negotiate tariff treaties with various nations.

The reciprocity sections of the Dingley Tariff Act are attached herewith. Briefly, those sections set up three distinct processes of tariff negotiation with other countries, as follows:

First. The first part of section 3 delegated limited authority to the President to proclaim certain specified rates on a limited and specified list of articles, when the countries from which those articles came made such concessions on products of the United States as the President regarded as reciprocal and equivalent.

In other words, Congress specified the particular commodities upon which concessions might be made. It specified the exact rate on those commodities which the President might make as a concession, such rate being lower than the rates carried in the bill.

It further mandated the President that whenever, in his opinion, the countries to whom he had made these specific concessions were not carrying out their part of the agreement in good faith he should revoke the lower rates on their products.

Second. The second part of section 3 was largely an embodiment of the so-called "reciprocal clause" of the McKinley Law of 1890—although there was nothing reciprocal about it. It simply provided that if and when certain countries whose exports to this country were admitted free, imposed duties or other exactions upon imports from the United States which the President deemed to be unfair and unreasonable, it should be his duty to remove such imports from the free list and place them upon the dutiable list. But, here again, the Congress did not leave it to the discretion of the President to fix the duty. It specified the duty which such commodities should pay in event they were removed from the free list.

Incidentally, if the Democratic administration is looking for a Republican precedent, this provision of the Dingley Act affords them a splendid one. If a resolution were put through now, mandating the President as those sections of the McKinley and Dingley laws, respectively, mandated the President, to increase the tariff rates on any commodity from any country which imposed unreasonable tariff rates or other exactions upon our imports, we would have placed in the hands of the President a weapon which would stop in a large measure the discriminations which are now being made against American exports to other countries.

Third. Section 4 of the Dingley Act, which is the one the Democrats claim furnishes the precedent for the President's contemplated proposal to grant him power to negotiate tariff treaties, falls far short of what the President and his Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, had in mind. It provided, first, that any commercial treaties negotiated by the President should be negotiated according to the United States Constitution "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate", and to make doubly sure there would be no usurpation of legislative prerogatives by the Executive, the section further provided that, before any such treaty became effective, it should be duly ratified by the Senate and approved by the Congress. It is very interesting to briefly review the legislative history of that section of the Dingley Act. The House bill did not contain section 4, although it did contain section 3. Section 4 was introduced in the Senate by Senator Allison, Republican, of Iowa. Incidentally, it gave rise at that time to a prolonged debate as to its constitutional features. There were some very forceful and learned speeches made questioning the right of Congress, in view of the United States Constitution, to delegate any such power to the President. However, the Senate finally accepted the amendment and the bill was sent to conference.

The amendment, as introduced by Senator Allison and adopted by the Senate, did not contain any provision for the approval of such treaties by Congress; it only provided that they should be ratified by the Senate. The House conferees insisted upon amending that section so as to require the approval of both branches of Congress before treaties became binding. They did this upon the ground that such a treaty was different from other treaties in that it affected the revenues; that, in point of fact, it was simply a tariff bill, negotiated by the executive branch of the Government, and that the Constitution conferred only upon the Congress the right to levy revenue taxes and had conferred only upon the House of Representatives the right to initiate such revenue taxes. In presenting the conference report to the House, Representative Dingley gave the following account of the insertion of this amendment to the amendment:

In substance, the agreement of the conferees combines the reciprccity clause of the House and that incorporated in the bill by the Senate, with certain amendments, which substantially united the two plans, so that both may be made available if desired. One of the amendments which has been adopted is vital in its effect. The Senate provided that the President might enter into commercial treaties with foreign countries, and when ratified by the Senate they should become binding on the country. The House conferees insisted upon an amendment that they should not become binding until ratified by Congress. In other words, the House conferees maintained that the House should approve as well as the Senate before any such commercial treaties should take effect, and the Senate conferees conceded the point.

In addition, it will be noted that section 4 limited the power of the President very much. It provided that no duties should be reduced more than 20 percent, and that no treaty negotiated by him should be for a longer term than 5 years.

Under the power vested in the Executive by this section, the President appointed John K. Kasson to negotiate treaties with other countries. A great many were negotiated, but none of them was ratified. The principal reasons for their failure of ratification were found in the plan itself. Instantly the bill became a law, foreign countries anticipating the opening of negotiations for reduction of their duties on American imports in return for a reduction of American duties on their goods, began raising their tariff rates, purely for trading purposes. This, in itself, was evidence of bad faith. Had the treaties been ratified, the American exporter would not have been on any better terms in those countries than his foreign competitors, for he would have been given merely a 20-percent reduction from an abnormally high rate fixed in anticipation of the reciprocal agreement. Moreover, bad feeling was created in many countries because they felt they were being discriminated against by the United States because of terms we offered other countries in our reciprocity negotiations. The net result of the efforts to carry out the reciprocity provisions of the Dingley Act was that it made a bad situation worse, insofar as our exporting interests were concerned, and injured rather than aided our foreign trade.

RECIPROCITY SECTIONS OF THE DINGLEY TARIFF ACT, EFFECTIVE JULY 24, 1897

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies producing and exporting to this country the following articles: Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials; champagne and all other sparkling wines; still wines and vermuth; paintings and statuary; or any of them, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter, to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States; and whenever the government of any country or colony producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States, or make concessions in favor of the products or manufactures thereof, which, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend, during the time of collection of the duties mentioned in this act, on such article or articles so exported to the United States from such country or colony, and thereupon and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such article or articles shall be as follows, namely:

Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude, 5 percent ad valorem.

Brandies or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials, $1.75 per proof gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines, in bottles containing not more than 1 quart and more than 1 pint, $6 per dozen; containing not more than 1 pint each and more than one half pint, $3 per dozen; containing one half pint each or less, $1.50 per dozen; in bottles or other vessels containing more than 1 quart each, in addition to $6 per dozen bottles on the quantities in excess of 1 quart, at the rate of $1.90 per gallon.

Still wines and vermuth, in casks, 35 cents per gallon; in bottles or jugs, per case of 1 dozen bottles or jugs containing each not more than 1 quart and more than 1 pint, or 24 bottles or jugs containing each not more than 1 pint, $1.25 per case, and any excess beyond these quantities found in such bottles or jugs shall be subject to a duty of 4 cents per pint or fractional part thereof, but no separate or additional duty shall be assessed upon the bottles or jugs.

Paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen-and-ink drawings, and statuary, 15 percent ad valorem.

The President shall have power, and it shall be his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that any such agreement in this section mentioned is not being fully executed by the government with which it shall have been made, to revoke such suspension and notify such government thereof.

And it is further provided that with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country, or colony of such government, producing and exporting directly or indirectly to the United States, coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, or any such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States, which, in view of the introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans into the United States as in this act hereinbefore provided for, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to suspend by proclamation to that effect the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans of the products of such country or colony for such time as he shall deem just; and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, the products or exports, direct or indirect, from such designated country, as follows:

On coffee, 3 cents per pound.

On tea, 10 cents per pound.

On tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, 50 cents per pound; vanilla beans, $2 per pound; vanilla beans, commercially known as "cuts", $1 per pound.

SEC. 4. That whenever the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with foreign countries, shall, within the period of 2 years from and after the passage of this act, enter into commercial treaty or treaties with any other country or countries concerning the admission into any such country or countries of the goods, wares, and merchandise of the United States and their use and disposition therein, deemed to be for the interests of the United States, and in such treaty or treaties, in consideration of the advantages accruing to the United States therefrom shall provide for the reduction during a specified period, not exceeding 5 years, of the duties imposed by this act, to the extent of not more than 20 percent thereof, upon such goods, wares, or merchandise as may be designated therein of the country or countries with which such treaty or treaties shall be made as in this section provided for; or shall provide for the transfer during such period from the dutiable list of this act to the free list thereof of such goods, wares, and merchandise, being the natural products of such foreign country or countries and not of the United States; or shall provide for the retention upon the free list of this act during a specified period, not exceeding 5 years, of such goods, wares, and merchandise not included in said free list as may be designated therein, and when any such treaty shall have been duly ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress, and public proclamation made accordingly, then and thereafter the duties which shall be collected by the United States upon any of the designated goods, wares, and merchandise from the foreign country with which such treaty has been made shall, during the period provided for, be the duties specified and provided for in such treaty and none other.

"RECIPROCITY" CLAUSE IN THE TARIFF ACT OF 1890

A great deal of misleading information is being printed regarding the so-called "reciprocity features" of the McKinley Act of 1890.

The truth is, there was no reciprocity clause in that act. The clause which is often referred to in such a manner was a clause authorizing the President to impose penalty under certain conditions upon certain countries whose products were admitted free into this country. The clause was section 3, and read as follows:

SEC. 3. That, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January 1892, whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in the view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molases, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country, as follows, namely.

Sugar: Sugar of or below no. 13 Dutch standard in color, to pay duty according to polariscope tests: If not above 75 degrees, seven tenths of 1 cent per pound; for every additional degree, two hundredths of 1 cent per pound. Sugar above no. 13 Dutch standard in color, classified by the Dutch standard of color: Between no. 13 and no. 16, to pay 1⅜ cents per pound; between no. 17 and no. 20, to pay 1⅝ cents per pound; above no. 20, to pay 2 cents per pound;

Molasses: If testing above 56 degrees, to pay 4 cents per gallon.

Coffee: To pay 3 cents per pound.

Tea: To pay 10 cents per pound.

Hides and skins of various types, but excepting Angora goatskins and sheepskins with the wool on: To pay 1½ cents per pound.

In other words, the clause provided that when countries whose imports above mentioned were being admitted free imposed duties upon our products imported into their country, which in the opinion of the President were "unequal and unreasonable", he had the power to remove the products above named from the free list and levy the tariff rates above named against them.

THE HUNDRED DAYS

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, Congress has vindicated itself. Had the question been submitted to the country 4 months ago to adjourn Congress and turn the Government over to the President, it would have carried hands down. Congress was on trial. Its answer to the charge of incapacity and indisposition to cooperate is the greatest peace-time legislative program in American history enacted in the short space of 100 days.

Our form of government has been vindicated. The question into which all other questions could be readily resolved was whether through the orderly process of a national election and time-old legislative methods a supreme emergency, wholly new, could be met and mastered. The answer is "Yes."

The program involved nothing less than the overhaul of the whole economic structure of the Nation—finance, industry, agriculture, transportation—tending toward greater socialization of the life of a people traditionally individual, and under a leadership appointed for the task the legislative program has been completed. The laws are on the book and the Executive has the power. What form of government could accomplish more, or in less time, or so peaceably?

VOX POPULI

It is true "dictatorship" has been hurled at the President and "rubber stamp" at Congress, but the action of both merely registered the will of the people. If ever the voice of the people was heard unmistakably at Washington, it was during the hundred days. This voice was largely not partisan. The people, without regard to politics, said follow the leader, and he was followed. They said give him the power, and it was given. There was no partisan obstruction in Congress on the part of the minority. They registered their objections to this measure or that and preserved their record, but that was all. On nearly every major measure half or more of the Republican Membership voted aye, and on some of them there was not sufficient opposition for a roll call.

In summing up the gains of the dire experience through which we are passing these successful tests of government are not to be left out of the account. A President can lead. The Congress can cooperate and function. The people can express themselves through government. These are of greater import than even the merits of the legislation itself. The chief need was the restoration of confidence in government, and for the time being this has been achieved.

I am glad to have had ever so small a part in the great drama which has been enacted at Washington. I came to Washington with the expressed purpose of wanting to see the President's program go through from A to Z without interruption. I had determined to give him the benefit of every doubt. I did this. I answered every roll call, and on only one cast a vote against his wishes, and on this vote I accord the President the larger vision. I know the President himself is big enough to say that this is a pretty fair batting average. Representatives in Congress and Senators are limited by local and sectional considerations. The President represents the whole. If he gave ear to some groups or sections as against other groups or sections, nothing would be accomplished.

THE PART OF THE PRESIDENT

The performance of the President might well be characterized as superhuman. He displayed incredible initiative and energy. He was inspired by a true vision of what must be done to establish a new deal. He knew these great measures, not only in outline but had mastered them in detail. Interwoven with this stupendous domestic program was an international program of no less magnitude. No President was ever confronted with a greater emergency and none ever handled an emergency more masterfully. His place in history is secure.

It is too early to boast of staying with the President. It will be time enough for that when the tide turns, as tides will. The big bridge is yet to be crossed. I hope then still to be found in the "aye" column.

THE VETERANS

The single vote to which I refer was cast for the Senate amendment to veterans' legislation. I voted for the Economy Act. I voted for the compromise amendments worked out between a House Democratic committee, controlled by friends of the veterans, and the administration. Had the compromise been approved by the Senate, with its greater independence of action, I would have felt that my vote for it was sufficiently justified; but when the Senate, after the outstanding debate of the session, voted more liberal terms for the veterans, and the Senate amendment came back to the House, I cast my vote for it, notwithstanding the attitude of the administration.

My main reaction to the one controversy which marred the special session was not related to dollars and cents or to patronage or votes. The whole sordid mess sickened my soul. It impaired my morale. I felt it when I looked at the flag or saw the uniform. I felt that the man who wore the uniform had fallen from his high estate. Among all the forces which have contributed to the making and the preservation of this great Nation, he holds incontestably the first place. He received neither big profits nor high wages, and he offered his all. Now his wants have become a national issue and dragged in the mire of party politics.

We can look to no one place to assess the blame. Everybody is to blame, including the veteran. In recent years the veterans' organizations, carrying on manifold beneficial and civic activities, have become overburdened with the relief load of the sick and disabled, the widows and orphans, the unemployed; and rivalries have sprung up between the organizations as to which of them would do most for the veterans. Ill-advised legislation was placed on the statute books which even the veterans did not ask. Although an active legionnaire, I never heard of the Disability Pension Act of 1930 until I read in the papers of its passage in the House of Representatives and over the protest of the American Legion. It has all borne its legitimate fruit, and the harvest has come. It is a bitter harvest for hundreds of thousands of veterans.

Much will depend upon the administration of the new law; the exercise of the powers under it. Its administrators should take notice that while Congress voted this restricted liberalization of the Economy Act by a small majority, the sympathies of Congress were for more liberal provisions by a large majority. Much will depend upon wisdom and moderation in the national conventions of veterans' organizations. They should counsel and cooperate, and not compete. Some things have gone out of the law not to return for many days. Proven injustices must and will be corrected.

SPEAKING OF CLASSES

It cannot be assumed that the President will not do justice by the veterans. It must not be overlooked that he has other classes to consider: 30,000,000 farmers under an indebtedness of $12,000,000,000 looking to his program for succor; the small-home owners of the country buried under a like indebtedness; an army of wholly unemployed workers nearly three times as great in number as that which wore the uniform in the World War; one third of the banks still closed; and all of them going to make up the roll of taxpayers, for whose relief the greater part of this program is designed.

Speaking of classes, the following is characteristic: I got a telegram from a manufacturer urging me, to use his exact words, "to stick to the President to the limit in cutting $400,000,000 from veterans' compensation." At that very moment the National Association of Manufacturers was in session in Washington for the express purpose of hamstringing the President's Industrial Recovery Act, which he considers the outstanding achievement of his administration, an act which he says, "Is the most important attempt of this kind in history." The special session was a post-graduate course in human nature. It was all a case of whose ox is gored. We speak of classes, but there is only one kind of human nature.

THE "PARTNERSHIP"

The President has issued powerful appeals against wage cutting and has urged wage raising as a necessary factor in his program for recovery, and has had written into the law powers with which he may assure fair wages. The answer of the railway companies was a proposal for a drastic cut in wages. Finance, transportation, and industry favor those features of the new legislation which would enable them to run their business as they see fit, but are opposed to all the restrictions.

If the President is an idealist in his objectives, it must be said that he is eminently practicable in his methods. His idea of a "partnership" between government and business is to head the copartnership agreement with an enacting clause, and with suitable penalties just above the dotted line. That he has the will and courage if necessary to invoke these penalties I have not the slightest doubt.

THE BIG THING

Opinions differ as to what was the outstanding achievement of the hundred days. Some think it was the Industrial Recovery Act; others, the Banking Act; still others, the inflation amendment to the farm bill. Many of us, and I among them, got the biggest roll-call kick of the session in voting to knock out the gold clause. It was repeatedly predicted on the floor of both Houses that this act would destroy the credit of the Government. Then within 2 weeks after its passage the Treasury put out $900,000,000 in short-term, low-interest securities, and got offers of more than $5,000,000,000. Events have a curious way of confounding prophets.

To my mind the big thing that went on down here was not on the floors of Congress. It was before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. If the Government cannot crush that thing, then all the rest of the program will be an idle gesture. This money power was investigated by Congress when I was here 20 years ago and nothing came of it. It has grown to be the overshadowing issue.

THE ONLY UGLY RUMOR

Great as was the opposition of affected interests to certain features of the industrial, the securities, the farm, and the railroad acts, as they involved wages, hours, production, price fixing, and taxes, the only ugly rumor floating about the Capitol Building during the session was in relation to the bank reform bill. As the days passed, with no action after the bill got into conference, a sullen mood was noticeable in the House. When a Member mentioned the banking bill he got a strong hand. The word went around that the banking bill was dead. Then 100 Members, I among them, signed an agreement to vote against adjournment until the banking bill was passed with the insurance of bank deposits. This got action, and when the conferees reported an agreement to the House, only 6 votes out of 435 were cast against it. The ovation given first to Mr. HENRY B. STEAGALL, of Alabama, Democratic Chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, then to Mr. ROBERT LUCE, of Massachusetts, Republican ranking member of the committee, was something to stir the blood of every Member. Yet this is the bill that was reported dead! This is probably the most radical Congress in American history, and all concerned will do well to bear this in mind.

THE VIEWPOINT

This morning I have been looking over a little campaign pamphlet in the nature of a direct talk to the voters of my congressional district. No issues were discussed in it. I simply sought to give my viewpoint, stating that "this being fixed, everything else fits into it."

My viewpoint was that of the schools of thought with which I have always been associated and which have been reflected politically in successive progressive movements. I held that we did not need a change in our form of government, that under this form the election of a President and a Congress sympathetic to the needs of the people and responsive to these needs would be a revolution. I believe that revolution has occurred.

The roll call on completed measures does not always reflect the attitude of a Representative toward vital items embodied in its general make-up. The completed act may not reflect the viewpoint of the man who votes for it. That may be better determined when controversial items, drawing the line sharply between the interests of the people generally and special interests, are singled out. The response to the roll call on these items is the acid test. Little though it meant in the sum total, I have the satisfaction of being able to review both the pamphlet and the roll calls and find that I can stand on both of them.

VETERANS' RELIEF

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am supporting this Senate amendment, for a modification of the so-called "economy act" as it affects disabled veterans, for the reason that it is far more liberal than the House provision.

Especially is that true with reference to the Spanish-American War veterans. Those men are now growing old. Their best days are gone. It is utterly impossible for them to go back 35 years and prove that their disabilities are service connected. They volunteered to defend this country at one of the most critical periods in the Nation's history, when it looked as if we would be plunged into a world conflict. They volunteered to go into the plague-infested Tropics, where many thousands of them suffered from malaria, typhoid, yellow fever, and other infectious and contagious diseases prevalent in the Tropics at that time. Their rations were poor and their accommodations were inadequate. Many of them came out with lingering disabilities that have steadily increased with the passing years until today they find themselves broken in health and beyond the age of their earning capacity.

At the very least, we should put these men on a parity with the veterans of the Civil War, and pay them the same compensations or pensions paid Civil War veterans of similar ages and disabilities.

I am supporting the Senate amendment also because it is more liberal toward the presumptive service-connected veteran of the World War. I have fought for 10 years to get those men properly taken care of. They were among the best soldiers we had, and many thousands of them are just as much entitled to compensation as if their disabilities had been caused from bullet wounds upon the battlefield.

Many of these men came out of the war with incipient ailments, such as tuberculosis, cancer, neuropsychiatric diseases, that were so mild and insidious at the time that they did not fully develop until the time for making proof under the old law had expired. Many of these men did not know that they were entitled to compensation and were not apprised of that fact until it was too late. Many of them could not make their proofs for the reason that invariably no record of their diseases was kept. Every man could not have a doctor at his side during all the vicissitudes of war.

Invariably they did not know of these insidious troubles because they were slow in developing. Many men declined to make application, saying that they were not fighting for compensation. Later, when they completely broke down and found themselves unable to earn a livelihood for themselves, their wives and children, they found that the time for making application had gone by.

Thus, thousands of men whose disabilities originated in or grew out of their services to their country in time of war are now deprived of compensation which was granted them under the World War Veterans' Act of 1924; and when they die their widows and orphans are left without a penny.

For my part I will never be satisfied till these presumptive cases are restored to the roll and their widows and orphans cared for when they pass away.

But the opposition attempts to make you believe that the House provision is more liberal than the Senate amendment. That contention is too ridiculous to answer, as everyone who is familiar with veterans' legislation well knows.

And the opposition tells you that the President will veto this bill if this Senate amendment to take care of these old Spanish-American War veterans and these World War presumptive cases is adopted. That is the same old stock argument that we have heard for the last 10 years. I know the President as well as any man in this House, and I do not believe for one moment that he would veto this bill on that account.

What the President did say was that if we increased these expenditures he wanted us to levy taxes to cover them. In other words, he wanted to keep the Budget balanced if possible. I am ready, willing, and anxious to do that very thing.

If you will let me write one provision of a tax bill I will raise sufficient revenue to take care of every one of these old Spanish War veterans and every one of these presumptively connected World War veterans and their widows and orphans without injuring a single human being or increasing the burdens of the already overburdened taxpayers of America. I will increase the inheritance taxes on large fortunes sufficiently to pay every dollar of this added expenditure and have more than a hundred million dollars left.

Oh, what a spectacle it is to see these unfortunate men and their helpless dependents, victims of the World War, left penniless in this depression while J. P. Morgan a-n-d C-o-m-p-a-n-y, who made more money out of the war than any other man or set of men on the face of the earth, entirely escaping the payment of income taxes. The wealth of this Nation has concentrated into the hands of a few people. We are told that less than 5 percent of our people own more than 90 percent of our wealth. They have placed their fortunes beyond the pale of taxation by investing them in tax-exempt securities. The only way left in which to reach them is through the inheritance taxes.

Yet men stand on the floor of the House and talk about taxing the profits of the next war. I am in favor of taxing the profits of the last war to get money with which to take care of these unfortunate men whom that war virtually destroyed. If we will adequately tax the profits of the last war and take care of these men there will not be any next war—at least not in your day and mine.

In order to show you how ridiculously low our inheritance-tax rates are as compared with those of other countries I just want to quote you some of the rates of the three principal allied countries that were involved in the World War. If a man dies in the United States and leaves an estate of $100,000 net after all his expenses and debts are paid, his estate will pay a tax of $1,500; in England his estate would pay $9,000 and in France it would pay $36,997.78.

If he died in the United States leaving a net estate of $300,000 it would pay $19,500; in England it would pay $51,000; and in France it would pay $130,789.78.

If he died in the United States leaving a net estate of $500,000 it would pay a tax of $42,500; in England it would pay $105,000; in France, $234,373.78.

In the United States, if a man left a net inheritance of a million dollars it would pay $117,500; in England it would pay $270,000; and in France $504,373.78.

If we will levy the English tax rates on inheritances alone, we will raise $500,000,000 more a year revenue than we are now raising. That would be sufficient to take care of all the disabled veterans of both the Spanish-American War and the World War and their widows and orphans.

Besides, it would have the wholesome effect of breaking up these large fortunes, turning them back through the channels of our economic life, and insuring a greater opportunity in the battle of life for the growing generation and the children that are yet to come.

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.
> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade—
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd, can never be supplied.

I agree with the young German soldier who wrote that much-controverted volume called "All Quiet on the Western Front" when he said the war destroyed a generation of young men. While it was doing that it concentrated the wealth of this Nation into the hands of a few men.

If Congress will "screw its courage to the sticking point" and tax these large fortunes as they should be taxed and as they are taxed in other countries, we can adequately meet our responsibilities to these men and their dependents. Nothing we can do, nothing that can ever be done, will go farther toward insuring the safety and protection of this Republic in the years to come than to adequately care for these disabled veterans who offered their lives in defense of their country in time of war and who now sustain its institutions in times of peace.

THE NEW DEAL

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, on November 8, 1932, the people of the United States voted for a new deal. Without doubt this huge vote was born and cast out of the hope and yearnings of a prolonged era of deprivation, suffering, distress, and desperation. The people knew that the old order of government and of economics had failed. They knew their condition was steadily growing worse. They knew they were sinking deeper, day by day, into the slough of despond—deeper into that most frightful of all Gehennas—the hell of want.

Satisfactory explanation of these unaccustomed and unwanted economic phenomena was not to be found. The so-called "best minds" of the day were unable to understand it. The well-known economists could not solve it. The then President of the United States, Herbert C. Hoover, who, through many years spent abroad, had accumulated a rather comprehensive outlook upon big business and monopoly, searched for the remedy and failed, because having been a single-tracker all his life, he became obsessed with the necessity of bolstering up a groggy and tottering big business by continual blood transfusions in the way of huge loans and doles from the Federal Treasury. The blood was siphoned from the hardening veins and arteries of stricken farmers, pauperized wage earners, salaried workers, and nearly bankrupt small-business men and independent producers.

Like all individuals whose life activities come in contact only with big business and the knights of the golden money bags, Mr. Hoover failed to perceive an age-old truism, namely, when the money kings reach the inevitable peak of lust and plunder that transforms them into human vampires who suck the veins of the producing classes dry, then comes the final collapse always followed by economic chaos. These modern Captain Kidds, selfish to the end, took advantage of Mr. Hoover's benign spirit and generosity to big business by using these Government doles, not to hasten recovery but to reimburse their own institutions, many of them crooked to the *n*th degree, for losses incurred through speculation and gambling. For every national or international figure there is an historic counterpart in fact or fiction, and the complement here harks back to Shakespeare's immortal Tragedy of Julius Caesar—And you, too, Brutus, that was the unkindest cut of all.

So it must have been with Herbert C. Hoover when he discovered, too late, that the big bankers—led by the erstwhile honorable "Hell-and-Maria Dawes", but now just a super bank racketeer—had used the millions provided for them not to save the people but to save their own rotten institutions from the collapse that was denied the less fortunate bankers. The President must have writhed in agony when it was revealed that the railroads which had received doles amounting to a quarter of a billion were merely transferring the money to the house of ill fame, Morgan & Co.

Historians of the future in all fairness, when recording the tragedy and pathos of the ill-fated Hoover regime and debacle, must state that the thirty-first President of the United States was betrayed by the Wall Street buccaneers whom he tried to save. Mr. Hoover, in the closing days of the famous 1932 campaign, like Belshazzar of old read aright the "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin" traced upon the walls of national political trend, and in panic and fear made his celebrated "grass in the streets" speech. The voters, however, were undeceived. They knew that this stuffed prophecy like the fabled sea serpent was "often reported to have been seen, but never proved to exist." They knew that when a man is already lying on the floor he cannot be thrown out. So they voted for a change.

Admit it you must, that thousands and hundreds of thousands voted for a change, secure in the belief that a change could not be worse and that it should be immeasurably better. The old arguments of the Republican stand-pat leaders, the tariff, the Hamiltonian theory of prosperity for the rich, more wealth for the wealthy, greater special privileges for the aristocracy of wealth would result in prosperity for all, had been blown to the four winds of Heaven.

The full dinner pail had been transformed as if by black magic into the back alley garbage can. The American standard of living and the boasted American wage levels had produced 12,000,000 unemployed. Able-bodied pauperism was a hideous fact. Men were starving in a land of plenty. Children were crying for bread and milk on the one hand, while on the other, farmers' granaries were bursting with foodstuffs; he was dumping his milk into roadside ditches because of the absence of markets. People were freezing while wool and cotton were sold at a nickel a pound. Thousands and tens of thousands of honest, upright workingmen and farmers were having their homes confiscated by piratical money lenders, 36-percent loan sharks, fossilized and mildewed judges, and crooked State and county officials.

Revolution was in the air. Immense throngs of outraged farmers gathered in Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, Minnesota, and Ohio. The calamity howlers of the stand-pat Republican Party chieftains could not explain away 30-cent wheat, 10-cent corn, and 5-cent wool. As Edwin Markham said:

> Bowed by the weight of centuries, he leans
> Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
> The emptiness of ages in his face,
> And on his back, the burden of the world.
> Who made him dead to rapture and despair,
> A thing that grieves not and that never hopes.

Why, the international bankers, the money lenders, the 36-percent loan sharks, the superindustrialists, probanker Governors, and predatory heartless State bank superintendents?

These famished and crazed people cried out in their misery and woe, "What is wrong, what in the name of God is right?" Here we have the most fertile country in all the world blessed with all the necessities of life; abounding in the riches of untold and undiscovered natural resources, the most intelligent and least illiterate people in the world, endowed with all the benefits and luxuries of the most beneficent country the sun ever shone upon. Our laboring men and salaried workers are the most aggressive, possess the keenest intellects, the greatest inventive genius. Take them man for man and the world never contained their equal. Yet the more labor-saving machinery they invented the tighter they riveted their shackles; the more wealth they created for the capitalists the poorer they became.

Soup houses and bread lines were the rule and not the exception. Millions were borrowed by village, town, city, and State to feed and clothe the hungry and the shivering. No longer did a happy populace rally round the flag and sing the praises of a bountiful and just Nation while the flames of patriotism mounted to manhood's cheek red as the fires of Troy. Instead riots and hunger marches were so numerous as to receive only passing notice in the subsidized press. The national anthem became, "Brother, can you spare a dime?"

Bank failures became as common as flies on a hot summer's day. The day that brought forth no new saturnalia of bank suspensions was a day lost to local chroniclers of the passing news. One half of the banks were closed and the other half were about to be closed.

Such was the astounding condition of the richest Nation in the world on March 4, 1933, when Franklin Delano Roosevelt was inaugurated as the thirty-second President of the United States of America. To those of us who occupied the Senate Chamber on this memorable occasion there should have been no doubt as to the future. Mr. Hoover, the retiring President—nervous, worried, visibly depressed, ill at ease—and Mr. Roosevelt, his successor, robust, buoyant, broad of face and inspiring of countenance, beaming with hope, and radiating confidence in his own masterful ability to rescue a fallen Nation from economic depression, financial panic, and armed revolution.

CONGRESS CALLED

His first act was the calling into extraordinary session the Seventy-third Congress of the United States. Overwhelmingly Democratic in political complexion, nevertheless it proved to be the greatest all-American Congress ever assembled under the historic dome of the Nation's Capitol.

THE FORGOTTEN MAN

The President who called the Seventy-third Congress into special session was the same standard bearer of the Democratic Party who in the primary campaign before he was nominated in that never-to-be-forgotten Chicago Convention had talked freely about the "forgotten man" and had promised a "new deal" for the masses of the people. His campaign for the Presidency of the greatest Republic ever known, whose noble deeds are forever graven on the immortal tablets of time, was no desultory motion, let me assure you. Nor did he by word or act wander into the bypaths of old-time political platitudes and bromides. Instead, like the good sailor he is, he charted his course straight for the truth, guided by the pole star of common honesty and justice for all. With dynamic personality and straight-from-the-shoulder thrusts, he charged all the embattled hosts of special privilege and won.

INDUSTRIAL SLAVERY AND FARM PEASANTRY MUST GO

In the recalcitrant industrial centers he stated that industrial slavery should cease; he bearded the money kings in their lairs of reactionary Wall Street; from the fertile plains of the Middle West the warning of farm peasantry reverberated; from the last promontory on the Pacific his promised clipping of the claws of the Power Trust reverberated; seeing afar the towering citadels of fallen finance and ruined depositors, his reassuring but impellent voice rang with an exposé of banks, bankers, and banking methods; without diversion or digression from city and from hamlet, there resounded his pledge for a restoration of government of, by, and for all the people. Voters listened, they read, they believed. With the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt the masses instead of the classes would become the chief concern of government, said they.

INAUGURAL SPEECH REASSURING

Excerpts from the President's inaugural address reassured those who had elected him and inspired confidence in those who had not contributed to that victory:

> The only thing we have to fear is fear itself * * * values have shrunken to fantastic levels; taxes have risen; our ability to pay has fallen; the means of exchange are frozen in the currents of trade; farmers find no markets for their products; the savings of many years in thousands of families are gone. Only a foolish optimist can deny the dark realities of the moment. Plenty is at our doorstep, but a generous use of it languishes in the sight of supply * * * the rulers of mankind's supply of goods have failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence. * * * Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men. * * * Faced by the failure of credit, they have proposed only the lending of more money. * * * They have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish. * * * The Nation asks for action, and action now. * * * Our greatest primary task is to put people to work. * * * We require two safeguards against a return of the evils of the old order—there must be a strict supervision of all banking and credits and investments; there must be an end to speculation with other people's money, and there must be adequate provision for an adequate but sound money. * * * I assume unhesitatingly the leadership of this great army of our people dedicated to a disciplined attack upon our common problems. * * * It is to be hoped that a normal balance of executive and legislative authority may be wholly adequate to meet the unprecedented task before us. But it may be that an unprecedented demand and need for undelayed action may call for temporary departure from the normal balance of public procedure. * * * I shall ask the Congress for the one remaining instrument to meet the crisis—broad Executive power to wage a war against the emergency, as great a power as would be given to me if we were in fact invaded by a foreign foe. * * * We aim at the assurance of a rounded and permanent national life.

BANKS RESCUED FOR DEPOSITORS

How have those pledges been fulfilled? On March 3 banking operations in the United States ceased. On the 9th of March the President asked Congress for and received the immediate enactment of legislation giving him complete control over all banks for the protection of depositors, to open sound closed banks, and authority to reorganize and reopen such banks as could be placed on a sound basis. The Federal Reserve Act was amended to provide additional currency as needed. Thus overnight the financial chaos was changed to orderly conservation of remaining resources and capital and orderly liquidation of defunct institutions.

ECONOMY ACT

The second major legislative measure to be enacted was the so-called "Economy Act." The introduction and passage of this act precipitated the most bitter contest witnessed upon the floor of the House during the entire session. Party lines were broken, and only by the adoption of the strongest gag rule possible was this measure, destined to spill the economic lifeblood of the Nation's war veterans, enacted. To many Members it represented the supreme test—the test of following their own convictions or of subordinating those convictions to the desire and will of the most popular President the country had ever known. My own convictions are: War is always costly. Costly in human life and blood. Costly in national funds, and vastly more costly in the inevitable aftermath that follows all wars since the day of written history. Those who fight the battles must be compensated in later days. The capitalistic classes are always profiteers to the extent of millions and billions of dollars—the wage earners and working classes the sufferers, the victims. In the World War farm hands left $75-a-month jobs and city workers resigned $40-a-week jobs to fight for the honor and glory of their country and to make America safe for plutocracy—at $30 a month. Upon their return their jobs were gone, the ghastly business of human butchery had rather unfitted them for a new vocation or new business. The ravages of war leaves its invisible mark as well as the visible brand. The tension of waiting for the zero hour, the roar and shriek of the bursting shell, the yells and cries of the dying and wounded, the closing of sightless, staring eyes of a comrade in that eternal sleep that knows no awakening, 3,000 miles away from home, from mother, father, wife, sweetheart, and little children is not conducive to longevity, normal blood pressure, and a perfect set of nerves.

Moreover, an aggregation of rich income taxpayers had banded themselves together under the catchy title of the National Economy League. Their purpose was to slander and malign the soldier, debauch his widow, and pauperize his dependents so that they, these predatory vultures of the Nation's wealth, might continue to escape paying their just share of the tax burden.

To the large majority of Members who supported the Economy Act I concede the same honesty of purpose, the same sincerity of conviction that I want them to concede to me in my opposition to the bill. As for the President of the United States, my faith in him, my admiration for him, my belief in his high-minded purpose, his untiring devotion to the herculean task for rescuing this Nation from economic chaos and bloody revolution, has diminished not one whit. It is not for me to criticize my chief, to question or interpret his action. He performs his duty as he sees it. I have mine to perform as I see it. I was not elected to be a rubber stamp. He has his responsibilities; I have mine. He had his campaign pledges to fulfill; I had mine. A campaign pledge is a promissory note to be paid in full. Early in the primary campaign, foreseeing that the payment of the soldiers' bonus and reduction in veterans' compensation would be vital questions to be dealt with by the Seventy-third Congress, I declared myself unreservedly in favor of paying the soldiers' bonus with new currency and unalterably opposed to reduction in service-connected disability compensation. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show those pledges were kept.

Certainly no Member of Congress, facing the cold truth of a huge national deficit, would advocate a continuance of unwarranted, undeserved non-service-connected compensatory awards. There was a happy medium between the two extremes—a line of demarcation, on the one hand, that meant justice for all, and, on the other, gross injustice and cruel suffering to battle-scarred veterans, their widows, and orphans. This first and more humane course was preferred by a majority of Democrats who supported the Browning amendment, which limited the maximum reduction to 25 percent. The melancholy note that arises from the harp of time will without doubt chant the mournful despair of those national defenders who suffered the torments of the damned because of the heartless manner in which this act was first administered, but in fairness it must also record the humanitarianism, the unswerving patriotism, and sympathetic heart of Franklin D. Roosevelt, when he, by Executive decree, modified the first regulations and ameliorated the agony of crucified World War veterans.

In the closing days of the session the President accepted amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill which further liberalized the regulations of the Economy Act, particularly in the interests of World War veterans. The bill as passed did not go far enough, in my judgment, in the restoration of unjust cuts already made. This applied especially to Spanish War veterans, who in the great majority of cases are emasculated, drawn, and quartered. I favored the Connally amendment, adopted in the Senate, which limited all reductions in service-connected cases to 25 percent. Not being given an opportunity to vote for this humane amendment, I voted for the so-called "Steiwer-Cutting amendment", which would have been acceptable to veterans generally. Whereas proponents of the House compromise claimed this measure would add $100,000,000 to disability allowances, it was shown in the Senate that the measure actually added only $50,000,000, and that the annual, actual monetary difference between the House compromise and the Steiwer-Cutting amendment was $38,000,000, or slightly more than 1 percent of the huge appropriation of $3,300,000,000 passed by the House.

BEER LEGALIZED

The Democratic Congress and its leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, made good their convention pledge to legalize beer. The bill was passed on March 14. The hypocrisy and sham of 12 years ended, beer racketeering is almost extinct, while State and Federal treasuries are deriving needed revenue, which in the past has gone to beer barons, bootleggers, crooked officials, and law-enforcement officers.

STATE BANKS HELPED

March 23 legislation was enacted by the House authorizing loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to State banks. This policy is a distinct improvement over that of the Hoover regime, when approximately $90,000,000 was loaned to a former Vice President of the United States and chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Charles W. Dawes, and his Chicago bank.

FARM RELIEF A REALITY

The Jones-Smith farm relief bill was passed on March 22. Beyond the shadow of a doubt this legislation is the most forward-facing, far-reaching, and commendable ever enacted by a legislative body. Since time immemorial historians have recounted the decline of agriculture. When agriculture fails the Nation fails. Five thousand years ago an old Chinese philosopher observed:

The well-being of a nation is like a tree. Agriculture is its root. Manufactures, commerce, and labor its branches and its life. When its root is injured the leaves begin to fall, the branches break away, and the tree dies.

Solon, wise old Greek statesman, 2,600 years ago said:

Agricultural pauperism is a cancerous growth in Greece.

Many American statesmen, including George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Daniel Webster, Abraham Lincoln, William Jennings Bryan, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson, warned of the menace of an impoverished agriculture. In 1921 farm pauperism became a stark reality and in 1923 the first bill to check declining prices of farm commodities was introduced in Congress. It was in that year, as a member of the resolutions committee in the National Wheat Convention, held in Chicago, that I first met George N. Peek, administrator of the Farm Act, and Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, administrator of the Industrial Recovery Act. In 1925 the first McNary-Haugen bill was defeated in the House of Representatives. In 1926 and 1927 the bill was enacted into law, but twice vetoed by President Coolidge. Mr. Peek was chairman of the committee of 22, of which I was vice chairman. Charles J. Brand and Chester Davis, coadministrators with Mr. Peek of the Jones-Smith Act, were close associates and advisers in the drafting and passage of the ill-fated McNary-Haugen bill.

The provisions, authority, and powers of this act are broad and sweeping and practically unlimited in scope. The basic fundamentals are:

First. The farmer shall receive cost of production plus a reasonable profit.

Second. Seasons cannot be controlled. Acreage can through a rental basis.

Third. Price levels for portions of crop consumed domestically shall be elevated and maintained at 1909–10 levels.

Fourth. The processing tax is a price-elevation device. If passed on to consumer it will be so slight as to be unnoticeable.

Fifth. All wealth and prosperity emanates from the soil. When farmers are bankrupt the Nation is bankrupt, and progress ceases.

Anticipating the absolute effectiveness of the measure, millers, exporters, processors, and speculators have entered the markets to buy with a feverish activity unknown since the World War. This, coupled with a dry and disastrous crop season, has advanced the prices of all grains from 50 to 100 percent. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, so here is proof conclusive that the farm bill is a success. One dollar and 50 cents wheat within the next 6 months should not occasion surprise.

The emancipation of farmers from economic slavery by President Roosevelt and the Seventy-third Congress will be recorded by contemporary historians of the future, as comparable to the freeing of the slaves by Lincoln.

REFORESTATION ACT

On March 29 the reforestation bill was passed by the House and the President was given the authority to employ 250,000 men and to construct and maintain works of a public nature applying particularly to the forestation on lands belonging to the United States and the various States. To carry out the provisions of the act the President was further authorized to enter into contracts with States, counties, municipalities, and other public bodies.

FARM MORTGAGE ACT

Following close upon the heels of the Reforestation Act came the passage of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933. This act was necessary to preserve the perpetuity of that great institution, the American farm home. For 3 years the farmers of the country have been strangled to an economic death by the money lenders and Shylocks. The total farm mortgage indebtedness is $12,000,000,000. True it is that this bill only makes available $2,000,000,000, but coupled with the bill I introduced to halt all foreclosures this sum would be ample to protect all those unfortunates now within the deadly clutches of the money lenders.

My preference was for the Frazier bill which proposed to refinance all farm mortgages with an issue of new currency based on the mortgages as security. The interest rate under this bill is 3 percent, including amortization, as compared to 4½ percent under the act passed. I was one of the few Members of Congress who signed the petition to relieve the committee of the Frazier bill so as to pass it.

HOME MORTGAGE ACT

The companion measure to the Farm Loan Act is the Emergency Home Mortgage Act of 1933, passed April 28, which provides $2,000,000,000 for the refinancing of home owners also within the clutches of the money lenders. When the House originally passed the bill $10,000 was the maximum amount that could be loaned, thus making more money available for small-home owners. This amount was increased in the Senate to $20,000. During debate and enactment of both of these bills I offered amendments which if adopted would have established an absolute moratorium against foreclosure of all mortgages.

MUSCLE SHOALS

The Muscle Shoals bill as passed in the House April 29, was a clear-cut victory for the consumers of electric energy over the Power Trust, and the users of fertilizer over the fertilizer trusts. When it passed the Senate, however, the provision whereby the Government was authorized to manufacture fertilizer for commercial purposes and to sell same to farmers for cost, plus 4 percent profit, was stricken out. This was a body blow at the farming interests, when it was shown in a table of statistics, introduced by me in the RECORD, that 1,416,000 tons of 16 percent phosphoric acid fertilizer could have been produced by the surplus power that went to waste over the Wilson Dam in the year 1932.

$500,000,000 FOR RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYED

April 21 witnessed the enactment into law of the President's unemployment relief measure, the Wagner bill, providing $500,000,000 with which to enable the Federal Government to cooperate more effectively with the various State, Territorial, and District government agencies in furnishing relief to their needy and distressed people. The bill makes available the use of the National Treasury for relief of the starving and destitute resulting from wide-spread unemployment; $250,000,000 is for the use of States on the basis of one third aid from this bill and two thirds aid from other sources; $250,000,000, or one half of the entire amount, is to be used by States in the form of grants to meet the "cost of relief work, furnishing relief, and in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, in the form of money, service, materials, commodities, to provide the necessities of life to persons in need, as a result of the present emergency, and to their dependents." The bill was passed by a vote of 331 yeas, 42 nays, and 58 not voting.

INFLATION OF THE CURRENCY

May 2 was another historic day for the common people. It was on that day that the House adopted the Resolution 124 that concurred with Senate amendment 85, empowering the President of the United States to coin additional money and regulate the value thereof, and provide for an expansion of the currency to the extent of $3,000,000,000, to be used to pay Government obligations and retire a part, at least, of outstanding bonds. This action, for the first time in half a century, struck off the shackles placed upon the debtor class by the Money Trust. The right to issue money now vested in the national banks should be restored to the people, through their Government and through their duly elected representatives, the Congress of the United States, the only body authorized by the Constitution to issue and regulate the supply of money.

NATIONAL SECURITIES ACT

A milestone of progress was recorded for investors in securities and bonds on May 5, when the House passed H.R. 5480, to provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes. Incidentally another of Franklin D. Roosevelt's campaign pledges was redeemed. This law should put a stop to the legalized burglary and thievery of unscrupulous brokers and bankers who have robbed the people of millions.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

May 26 marked the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, a bill endorsed by the American Federation of Labor. Some of us objected to the drastic gag rule under which the bill was considered to prevent any amendments from being offered except those approved by the committee. Personally I look with fear into the virtual scrapping of the Sherman antitrust law. However, since we had already gone far, with legislation beneficial to the farmer, home owner, banker, transportation, building and loan associations, and labor, industry certainly could not be left out of the circle. What an amazing change has taken place. Following the close of the World War industrialists were given special privileges, one after the other. The farmers time and again appealed to be taken into the protective circle, which, as Abraham Lincoln said, "Shall be continued after this poor tongue of my own shall be silent", but were always denied and left to sink or swim. Now, under this history-making Democratic administration, under the masterful leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt and his "new deal", the industrialists were the last to be taken into the "new" circle—another proof that the masses, instead of the classes, are now the chief concern of government.

The responsibility rests upon the President. He requested and gladly accepted that responsibility. It makes of him a virtual dictator; but is that not what the country needs? Industry has shown itself unable to weather the storm. Past Congresses have been impotent to deal with the problem. The President's dictatorship is dedicated not to predatory and selfish interests but to the rehabilitation and recovery of all the American people. He has selected a most competent and capable administrator in the person of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson.

ABANDONS GOLD STANDARD

The official abandonment of the gold standard by Congress and the eleventh-hour enactment of the Steagall-Glass banking bill are the concluding chapters in the most illustrious record of achievement ever written by a Congress of the United States. The first meant the demolition of the golden shrine of the followers of mammon—the Morgans, Mellons, Rockefellers, and other pirates of Wall Street. It presaged the casting out of the temple the money changers who have oppressed the debtor classes since the dawn of civilization. It envisioned a new day for farmers, laborers, small business men, and independent producers, since it is the forerunner of prosperity and good times for the common people.

BANK DEPOSITS INSURED

The bank bill means the dawn of a new era for depositors. No longer need they spend their days and nights in fear, afraid the bank will close with their savings gone forever. The Wall Street wolves and the international bankers fought the bill to the last ditch, but in the end the people won.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE

In concluding I would be but a rank ingrate did I not mention the splendid ability, leadership, courage, tolerance, patience, and fairness of the Speaker of the House, the Honorable HENRY T. RAINEY, from Illinois, whom I first was privileged to meet in Marion, Ohio, in 1922, when the gentleman delivered a masterful Jackson Day address. Time and service to his country have only intensified his brilliant leadership and enhanced his noble, admirable, lovable character and magnetic personality. When clouds of dissension hovered and storms of revolt threatened to break, HENRY T. RAINEY was always calm, unperturbed, serene, as true to his convictions, to his President, and his party as the stars to their appointed courses. May his ennobling influence be ever dominant in the Speaker's chair for many years to come.

MAJORITY FLOOR LEADER

As a new Member, I am likewise moved to pay my respects to that battling majority floor leader, the Honorable JOSEPH W. BYRNS, of Tennessee, possessing the courage of Andrew Jackson himself, in fighting for the legislative program of President Roosevelt, the Democratic Party, and the common people. I shall always regard it as one of the rare privileges of my life to have served in Congress under the leadership of that battling warrior, JOE BYRNS.

FLOWERS FOR THE LIVING

Would that time, space, and the reader's patience permitted of eulogies of the committee chairmen and the many valuable and pleasant fellowships formed with Members on both sides of the aisle. Fellowship teaches us that we are of common origin; that we have common duties, common responsibilities, and a common destiny. Like the great seas, the bonds of human fellowship have linked mankind inseparably together since the beginning of time, beating their countless waves of hope and joy against the shores of time and the sands of eternity.

SORROW AND SYMPATHY FOR THE DEAD

Regrets? Yes; a deep and lasting one—the failure of the President and Congress to rescue the farmers and home owners from the money lenders' strangling cord by a moratorium against foreclosure. These stricken people are the casualties of the economic war that we are now winning. These people, marching in the vast army of the dispossessed, forming the parade of the living dead, can see no rift in the black clouds of despair; for them the sun does not shine. Middle-aged men, old men who have passed their threescore and ten, their wives, their dependents—they march on to the poorhouse, to charity, to more fortunate relatives, to suicide. They could have been saved, but we did not save them. The way was shown; the trail was blazed; but, perhaps, because the great majority had never faced the stark, grim, naked reality of being sold out by the sheriff, they failed to realize the necessity for complete and speedy action. May God will it, that never again will honest and hard-working property owners be so wantonly and ruthlessly destroyed and devoured by the financial wolves and twentieth-century Shylocks. For those who have gone, whose bleaching bones lay scattered along the broadening highways of resumption of business, incomes, and prosperity for others, let us hope these casualties of the economic war will not fulfill the prophecy of Edwin Markham—

> O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands,
> How will the Future reckon with this Man?
> How answer his brute question in that hour
> When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world?
> How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—
> With those who shaped him to the thing he is—
> When this dumb Terror shall reply to God,
> After the silence of the centuries?

LIFE AND CHARACTER OF CLINTON GILBERT, JOURNALIST, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, at his home in the city of Washington, D.C., Clinton Gilbert passed from the scenes of his earthly usefulness into the beatitudes of the just. Amongst those who admired him I was glad to be numbered, and was proud to claim him as my friend. Availing myself of the permission granted to extend my remarks, I find some consolation in the great personal loss which his death brought to me in having the permanent record of the Congress of the United States bear witness to the high esteem and affectionate regard in which this great journalist was held by countless thousands of his fellow Americans. I deem it a privilege to pay tribute in this small way to his outstanding ability and patriotism which he possessed in so large a degree.

The Honorable Joseph Tumulty, an intimate and devoted friend of Mr. Gilbert, very appropriately said:

When Clinton Gilbert passed from the great stage of life, something fine, virile, and charming, that had about it the "grandeur of the old-fashioned", left the ranks of American journalism.

A lonely, aloof, modest person, never a great mixer, his analysis of men and things wore the impress of one who could walk with kings and not lose the common touch.

Knowing life, with a thorough understanding of public affairs, Clinton Gilbert tolerantly appraised the follies and foibles of public life in America. He wove into his stories a bigness and pettiness which made his portrayal of politics thrilling and always interesting.

Big, generous-natured man that he was, he suffered keenly himself when he knew his thrust at public men had hurt them. He had the ability to soften the blow he aimed by a literary turn or "fling" that brought into his cold analysis of public men something warm that made one love the political "villain" whose weakness he sought to describe.

His criticisms of public men were without cruelty, coarseness, or the slightest self-vindictiveness, and his bitterest attacks always carried a certain sweetness of reason. No one ever found in Clinton Gilbert's writings impetuous pugnacity or truculency. One always found in his "cameo writings" that calmness and serenity which characterized his own nature.

Possessing the incomparable ability to compress into one line a poisonous dart or a blessed halo, at heart he was a most kindly man, one of nature's noblemen, a loyal friend, and a great lover of his country, whose institutions he always sought to preserve and perpetuate. The entire country, as well as his chosen profession, will miss his facile pen, which had few equals in American journalism.

I commend to his friends and loved ones the consoling lines of the Hoosier poet:

I cannot say, and I will not say,
That he is dead. He is just away!
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand
He has wandered into an unknown land.

And left us dreaming, how very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there
And you—O you, who the wildest yearn
For the old time step and the glad return.

Think of him faring on, as dear
In the love of There, as the love of Here,
Think of him still and the same, I say
He is not dead. He is just away.

ABOLISHING THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, on the 13th of June the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress made a favorable report on House Joint Resolution 136, introduced by me, proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of the President and Vice President.

With the exception of some details this is the same as resolutions on which hearings were conducted in each of the three preceding Congresses, and on which this committee made a favorable report in the closing days of the last Congress.

DEFECTS OF ELECTORAL COLLEGE SYSTEM

The broad purposes of this amendment are to remove the objectionable electoral-college system and provide a certain and just method of electing the President.

The most obvious though not the most important objection to the electoral college is its indirect-voting system. We elect Presidential electors as our agents to vote for us in the selection of the President. We establish this cumbersome, intermediate agency to elect the President where no such agency is needed. We can better and more happily vote directly for the candidate we prefer.

It is surprising to what extent the man on the street is unacquainted with the more serious and important objections to our method of electing the President. He is ordinarily unconscious of the fact that through the unit State vote all minority voters in every State are, in effect, disfranchised; their votes are discarded and are not counted in computing the ultimate result of the election. In each of the last two Presidential elections the votes of over 38 percent of all the voters of the country were thus disfranchised through the unit voting system.

In no other case in the election system of this country do we elect candidates indirectly through intermediate agencies. In the case of no other office do we discard minority votes in a political subdivision of the election territory before computing the final result.

In three instances candidates receiving the plurality vote of the Nation for President have been defeated by candidates with less popular votes. Doubtless such instances will be repeated in the future unless the system is changed.

The defeat of the candidate shown at the polls to be the choice of the people of the Nation is a political injustice of a major character. A system that makes such results possible is not only undesirable but a menace to the welfare of popular government.

The election of a President is a great contest, a national game that should be conducted with good sportsmanship. The rules of the game are now unfair and tricky. The purpose of this amendment is to provide fair rules for the contest, for a just decision, respected because it is fair and just.

The electoral-college system, under some circumstances needlessly creates deadlocks and provides uncertain and inept methods for breaking them.

If the election is thrown into the House of Representatives, each State, regardless of its population, is the equal of every other State in selecting a President. Each State has 1 vote, no more, no less. A majority of the Representatives from each State cast the vote of that State for President. The State with 1 Representative is as powerful as the State of New York with her 45 Representatives in determining who shall be President.

Each of the two elections that have occurred in the House of Representatives has been accompanied by national scandals and bitterness.

PLAN OF ELECTION PROPOSED

House Joint Resolution 136, if adopted, would accomplish the following results:

First. It would abolish the electoral-college system and substitute therefor a direct vote for the election of the President and Vice President.

Second. Each State would retain electoral votes as at present equal to the whole number of its Senators and Representatives.

In this way the relative strength of the States would be preserved as at present. The electoral vote based primarily upon population would remain as the common unit for expressing popular will as between the States in the election of a President. This would prevent what would otherwise be a violent change in the relative strength of the States in the election of a President.

Third. Each candidate for President would receive such proportion of the electoral votes of the State as he received of the popular vote therein.

Fourth. The candidate having the greatest number of electoral votes would be elected.

PRACTICAL EFFECT OF PLAN

In other words, the Presidential electors would be eliminated, the people would vote directly for President, there would be no unit State vote, and the electoral vote of the State would be divided among the candidates in exact proportion to their popular vote in the State.

There would be no deadlocks. The resolution provides a certain method of election and of avoidance of deadlocks.

There would be no election in the House of Representatives. None would be necessary.

There would be no disfranchisement of minority votes. A vote cast any place in the Nation would count toward the election of the President and be given its relative weight for that purpose.

The contest, instead of being confined to a few "doubtful States", would be Nation-wide.

No candidate would receive electoral votes beyond those earned by his popular vote.

The question of "carrying" any particular State would be of relative unimportance. A shift of several thousand votes in any one State would amount to a difference of no more than a fraction of one electoral vote. Fraud or pressure to carry a "doubtful State" would largely lose its temptation, because it would be without the unearned reward of votes that now go to the plurality candidate because of the disfranchisement of the minority.

The people would be given a separate vote for President and Vice President.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

The report of the committee favoring the adoption of this resolution is no. 262, Seventy-third Congress, first session. Hearings were held on February 16, 1933. The main features of this problem, as well as the details of the proposed plan, are discussed at length in the hearing and report.

During this session Senator NORRIS introduced a resolution in the Senate which likewise provided for the elimination of Presidential electors, a direct vote for President, a division of the State votes among the candidates in proportion to their popular votes, and for the plurality selection of the President. That resolution was referred to a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, which have reported it favorably to the main committee.

It is hoped before the next session adjourns this plan of electing the President will be sent on its way to ratification by the legislatures of the various States. It would correct gross defects in our method of electing the President that have been recognized by all students of our Government for the last 100 years. It would establish a method of election consistent with our general American scheme of Government and, I believe, contribute materially to the betterment of the political life of the country.

SHALL OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS BE MAINTAINED?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the recommendations of our President relative to the reorganization of our Government departments are another manifestation of his courageous determination for action which is based on sound social economy.

Our President has the courage to tackle the new. He is trying to find the best ways to solve our grave national problems. He is honestly trying to find a proper means of helping people. I am delighted with the social vision which characterizes his program.

I wish to refer here specifically to his recommendations relative to the reorganization of the Government departments. Many of these recommendations are excellent. They mean not only economy but economy through efficiency.

As one who has long advocated the coordination of all the educational facilities of our Federal Government, I subscribe to the principle expressed in these recommendations.

However, I do not feel that the proposed drastic curtailment in vocational education made necessary by the President's plan for reorganizing of the departments is entirely desirable. The plan as submitted calls for a 25-percent reduction in Federal money paid to the States for:

First. Cooperative vocational education and rehabilitation.
Second. Payments for agricultural experiment stations.
Third. Cooperative agricultural extension work.
Fourth. Endowment and maintenance of colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

This proposal involves a consideration of a number of fundamental principles as well as of the actual facts themselves. Tersely said, it means that the people are to receive less direct benefit from the increased funds which they pay into the Federal Treasury. The explanation given is that the Government cannot afford it.

I am still a firm enough believer in representative Democratic Government that we, the people, are the Government; that such instrumentalities and media as may be set up to carry out our wishes are not in themselves nor of themselves an end.

That a government must expend only funds of the amount the people themselves can raise is an undisputable axiomatic fact. However, I have no patience with that oft-heard statement, "The Government cannot afford to conduct activities in the interest of the people." Such a philosophy belies the very function of government.

Governments are instituted among civilized men solely for the purpose of serving those who institute and constitute them. Certainly one of the first functions of government is to see to it that those who constitute it are properly informed and properly trained to assume their responsibilities for the common good. I am a Jeffersonian Democrat, and as such I subscribe unqualifiedly to his statement:

> Above all things, I hope the education of the common people will be attended to, convinced that on their good sense we may rely with the most security for the preservation of a new degree of liberty.

In keeping with my political philosophy I hold further that education is distinctly a State function. Hence I should oppose vigorously any attempt on the part of the Federal Government to control public education in any of the several States. However, I do not admit that Federal aid and Federal control are synonymous.

Federal control of education would be the direction of educational administration for the several States from Washington; it would mean that the Federal bureau, office, or department of education would determine the course of study, the qualification of teachers, the standard of proficiency of the pupils, the textbooks to be used, the method of instruction—the general set-up of the educational machinery by and for the States. This I oppose, and oppose vigorously.

Federal aid to the States for educational work, however, is simply the granting to the States for absolute and unrestrained administration by the States of Federal money for the maintenance of the public schools of each State by State machinery.

There are those who would say that this practice is contrary to the principles of our Government; that it breaks down our system of local and State government. But does it? Does the giving to States of the money taken directly from the people of the States deny those people any rights? Or is this plan merely a practical expression of the theory that ours is a Federal Union of 48 sovereign States?

I think the latter is the case. In order to approach this question a little more intelligently let us for a moment review the question of Federal aid to the States. Since our Government was established the Federal Government has given money and lands to the States. More than 70,000 acres of national lands were turned over to the newly created State of Ohio by the act of 1802, and since that time every State of the United States has benefited by Federal generosity, or, more properly speaking, shared in the full benefits of a Federal Government. In 1837, $2,000,000 which had accumulated in the United States Treasury were distributed among the States.

FEDERAL LAND GRANTS

Most of the early land grants were made unconditionally. In other cases Congress stipulated that the funds should be used for schools or roads. Since 1912 the growth of a Federal subsidy for the development of work by our States has been vast. There are a number of possible explanations of this trend. I prefer to believe the one which holds that it represented practical expression of the growing power of popular—of people's government. Due to the rapid growth of large-scale business in this country, money and material wealth became more and more concentrated in a few urban centers and the benefits thereof became less available to the people themselves and to the States. In recognition of this fact, in 1913 the amendment to the Federal Constitution enabling Congress to enact the Federal income tax law was ratified. But this meant that not only would more money be taken from individuals having it, but, in general, it meant that more money would come from the States to the Federal Government. Then came the war, demanding in the various revenue taxes still more money from the States. And so there grew quite logically within the States a demand that some of the good from the concentrated wealth of a few of our citizens and some of the returns from the money which the Federal Government had obtained from the States be returned to the States for useful work by the States. This was not a move on the part of the States to give up State rights. Quite to the contrary. It was a new manifestation of a new kind of State right. The States sought to have a say in how their money should be spent for their people. They never yielded their power; they increased it. Yes; the amount of Federal subsidy has grown, but an analysis of the figures shows that proportionately as there grew a demand from the Federal Government for a direct tax on the people of the States so grew the amount of Federal money which in turn the States demanded should be paid them.

At the present moment the people of our States are actually confronted with the grave threat, the collapse of their public schools. Of course, the people, believing themselves citizens of a sovereign State of the Union and citizens of the United States, turn to the Federal Government for aid, not only because many of the States themselves cannot meet this problem, but because the problem in itself is national, and our Federal Government is concerned intimately with it. Ignorance knows no State lines. Children denied schooling in one State today become citizens of a low caliber in another tomorrow.

The principle of Federal aid to the needy States for educational work is closely akin to the principle of State equalization funds for educational work, a principle now generally observed by practically all of the States of the Union. Just as a State equalization fund in education seeks to provide that the children in even the poorest rural districts may have good schooling under competent teachers for a term of suitable length, so Federal aid asked for us by the States would help the children in our poor farm areas to have a decent start in life by getting at least a minimum of schooling. The fact that three fourths of our States have established equalization funds shows that there is a growing sentiment for a more equitable distribution, if not of wealth, then, certainly, of the opportunity to procure wealth. One of the finest analyses of the theory, philosophy, and the practice of a State equalization fund was made a few years ago by one of our Southern newspapers, the Richmond News Leader. This newspaper, after very thorough and complete scientific investigation of the subject, devoted its full effort to the establishment of the principle of a State equalization fund.

The seriousness of this situation incidental to the threatened collapse of our free public schools is generally recognized. Nine large national organizations of women are actively interesting themselves in this question. I have learned that the national representatives of these organizations, on the instruction of their respective groups, are all pooling their efforts in a campaign to maintain the American free public school. An article in The Woman's Press, the official magazine of the Y.W.C.A., one of the organizations actively interested in this question, was published in its April issue setting out in concise form the gravity of this situation as it then existed. And nothing has happened since then to put the schools in better shape. This article I submit here to give this picture to you.

THE FREE SCHOOL IS PASSING

(By Selma M. Borchardt, vice president American Federation of Teachers)

One of the most devastating effects of the depression is the breakdown of the American free public school system. As a result our children are being denied the right to a free public education. The collapse of our public-school systems is not limited to any one State, nor even to any one section of the country. In Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Kentucky hundreds of the rural schools have closed for this year. In North Dakota, Texas, Idaho, Tennessee, Michigan, Wyoming, and Arizona the school officials report that unless relief comes to them, many of their schools will be forced to close soon. From Iowa, Connecticut, Oregon, Maine, and Minnesota come the authentic State reports saying that next year many of their schools, if they are kept open at all, will be kept open with private funds.

Some localities are now trying to "muddle through" by charging tuition. Under such a system those children who can't pay can't come to school. Essential parts of the school system are being eliminated everywhere. Kindergartens, night schools, vocational training classes, medical and dental clinics, now more needed than ever, have been either eliminated entirely or seriously curtailed in practically every State in the Union.

The number of teachers has been reduced, while the number of pupils enrolled has increased rapidly, almost half a million in the last year alone. As a result, the size of classes has increased enormously everywhere, creating a sort of mass-production form of education.

Teachers' salaries have been drastically cut, in some places as much as 50 percent, in a few places 75 percent. Worse still, many cities and counties have paid them in depreciated, nonmarketable commercial paper; others have not paid them at all. In a few States teachers are "boarded around" among the parents of the pupils who can afford this form of tuition, as the community cannot pay their salaries. In four States teachers have volunteered to teach for nothing in order to keep open the schools.

The school year is being shortened in most States. The United States Office of Education has estimated, on the basis of a survey just completed, that 4,400 rural schools will have to be closed early this year, as will all the schools in 170 cities.

School-building programs are, of course, seriously curtailed. Consequently schools are dreadfully overcrowded everywhere. Over 35,000 schools are on a part-time schedule, running two or more shifts. Thousands of pupils are being housed in dilapidated portable buildings.

Tax delinquency is the principal cause of the break-down of the State and local school system. Banks either cannot or will not lend to local communities to maintain their schools. In 1930, 1,345 banks suspended operation; in 1931, 2,298 banks suspended operation. State and municipal paper now is generally nonmarketable; taxes are unpaid. It is an indisputable fact that the local communities throughout the country are absolutely unable to raise the money to enable them to meet their legal and social obligations.

Something must be done and done quickly to save the schools until local and State agencies become self-supporting again. A call has come from all States to the Federal Government to aid in preserving our American State-owned, State-controlled public-school system.

Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia, in a bill introduced early in this session, seeks to make it possible for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend money on suitable collateral for the maintenance of public schools as it is now authorized to lend for the maintenance and promotion of private enterprise. The question which immediately presents itself is whether this is a proper function of the Federal Government.

Should the Federal Government interfere with State control of education? Certainly not. But a State would not yield one iota more of its absolute autonomy to the National Government when it contracts for a loan on good collateral than any bank or railroad did when it borrowed heavily from the Federal Government.

Will this be a step to place further burdens on future generations? Yes; most assuredly, yes. But the burdens created by the assumption of a financial indebtedness are burdens which the future generations, and perhaps the present generation, can liquidate. A failure on the part of the State of today to maintain its public schools places a very heavy social, economic, and moral burden on the citizens of today and of tomorrow; a burden that they cannot liquidate. Closed schools means deteriorated children of today; perhaps potential criminals of tomorrow.

Should we insist on the States doing more for themselves? Yes. But while the citizens are striving to secure a means to obtain State aid should we allow the children of our Nation to suffer? The break-down of the educational system and the disastrous effect on the children of any one State today is a potential problem for the citizens of all States for tomorrow. And it should not be forgotten that ours is a Federal Union, composed of 48 States.

While it is certainly true that the method and form of relief administration is exceedingly important, it is equally true that the purpose for which the relief is given is even more important. During this emergency many of our finest citizens in a desire to develop a nicety and precision in the machinery for relief work seem to have lost sight of the immediate need for which this machinery is to be set up.

The blunt truth, so far as our public schools are concerned, is that, if the schools of the Nation are to be maintained, the Federal Government must be allowed to lend money to the States for this purpose.

It cannot be denied that education has fared badly during the recent years, and particularly during the past 6 months. The action taken is in direct opposition to the declared policy of many executives and legislators. In this respect the President is no exception. His policy, as stated from Albany, is certainly not in accord with recent action on this all-important problem. This may be clearly seen from the following statements:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, July 29, 1932.

Mr. C. A. COBB,
Editor, The Progressive Farmer and Southern Ruralist,
Atlanta, Ga.

MY DEAR MR. COBB: I have received your letter of July 19 inquiring about my attitude toward the support of agricultural education.

I have spoken often on this subject in this State, so that our people here have no doubt whatever about where I stand. I believe thoroughly in agricultural education. I regard it as one of the most important and essential branches of the whole educational effort that is being carried on in the United States. I am a firm believer also in the value of the cooperative research and experimental work and the extension service which State institutions, in cooperation with the Federal Government, are rendering.

I think it would be nothing short of a disaster if any of this work were seriously curtailed. Particularly in these times when farmers are having such a desperate struggle to maintain themselves, I think it supremely important that they should have the benefit of the expert advice that colleges, experiment stations, and extension services are able to give them, and it is equally important that we should continue to hold out to their children opportunities for an education that will make them something more than field drudges.

What I have said with respect to the agricultural colleges and their allied services applies with equal force to the lesser schools of agriculture and to the agricultural education now being carried on with such excellent promise in consolidated high schools in the rural communities.

I am glad that I have had the opportunity of expressing myself on this subject, on which I have very strong convictions.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

WHAT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT THINKS ABOUT VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

(Excerpt from recent Nation-wide radio address broadcast from Albany)

I cannot, of course, answer the hundreds of questions which come to me in every mail, but a letter signed by 10 of the leading social welfare workers permits me to use their questions as a text for the expression of certain great basic principles which are vital to us in this time of stress * * *.

The last question relates to keeping children in school to the age of 16. I am in favor of that. Furthermore, I go along with the thought that we must increase vocational education for those children who otherwise could not receive adequate training. That kind of vocational training will raise the standards of worthwhile employment, not only now but also in normal times.

My own observation leads me to believe that in many parts of the country we have tended to an educational system devised too greatly for academic training and professional careers. We know that already many of the professions are oversupplied and it is a fair guess that during the coming generation we shall devote more attention to educating our boys and girls for vocational pursuits which are just as honorable, just as respectable, and in many instances just as remunerative as are the professions themselves. The Federal Government, without in any way taking away the right and the duty of the several States to manage their own educational affairs, can act as a clearing house of information and as an incentive to higher standards.

The Nation's responsibility in this problem is clearly set out; for the boys and girls today denied an education in any one State may migrate into the communities which have expended much for education, and there become social burdens to the people who have spent much on educational opportunities.

No State is independent of other States so long as there is any movement of inhabitants between them, for low standards in one State tend to discount the efforts of other States in maintaining higher ideals. Each State is, therefore, interested in what other States are doing

Says the United States Office of Education.

Thus the Nation should, as a sound business proposition, be seriously concerned with the potential economic aspects of the threatened collapse of our schools. The expenditures properly applied to the maintenance of our State-owned school are a sound investment for the National Government. Prior to the depression the large life-insurance companies of America were spending thousands of dollars annually in order to raise the level of education among our people because they claimed, and rightly so, that the better educated people are longer lived, have better health, and a surer income than the uneducated. One of the life-insurance companies had a special division on illiteracy, for it recognized that its work could not be fully done as long as illiteracy exists. Both public and private statistics on accidents, both in industry and in noncommercial activities, show that the largest number occur among illiterate and uneducated persons. When we consider the amount of money entailed in these accidents, quite apart from the human side of the question, we can appreciate the need of spending further money to prevent them. Just sound business!

Millions of dollars wasted every year because of illiteracy; $825,000,000 a year, former Secretary Land said some time ago, and his figures did not include the additional cost for illness, accidents, and social maladjustment. When one adds to this vast economic loss the social degredation, the human suffering, the pain, the humility that goes with ignorance and pestilence, the absolute justness of the present demand of the States for these funds is recognizable.

And now when the public schools established on State funds are collapsing comes this additional blow—the devastating curtailment of the work in vocational education.

I recognize the fact that the President is merely outlining possible plans for the future, that no fixed plan is as yet before us. I therefore have gone into the entire question of the philosophy of Federal aid to the States for educational work in order that there may be some very practical advice come from the States—from the people—in this question.

I feel that the work in vocational education is of prime importance. I do not, in saying this, mean necessarily to imply that the work in all instances as now constituted is representative of the best educational theory and practice. But, after all, what is the best educational theory and practice on this question? I do know that in my own State there has been some extremely valuable and highly interesting work come from the funds which the Federal Government has appropriated for vocational education.

As I said at the opening of these remarks, I feel that the President wants the advice and active cooperation of the people in working out the problems of our Government. He is not looking for mere "yes" men. He is looking for men and women who will critically analyze his proposals in the interest of the general welfare, and who will, in keeping therewith, make constructive, practical recommendations; men and women who will work—work hard—with him on a common program seeking a more equitable social program.

Because of the vast importance which I attach to the educational work of the Nation, as conducted by the several States, and because particularly of the tremendous immediate significance of vocational education, I am asking for advice and suggestions on the questions involved in the proposed 25-percent cut in vocational education. To help me and some of those with whom I work approach this problem in the best prepared fashion, I am directing attention to a few questions concerning this subject.

First. What loss to the State, expressed in dollars and cents, will the proposed cut be to the State? (Not only the loss of the appropriation itself but the subsequent losses incident to the loss of the appropriation.)

Second. What will actually happen to the work in vocational education as the result of the proposed curtailment in Federal appropriations in this work?

Third. What substitutes or replacements for this Federal work are now available through State means?

Fourth. Is there a need for a definite coordinating plan between the work in vocational rehabilitation and the Federal employment agencies as set up under the new Wagner bill?

Fifth. What constructive changes can be offered in the interest of the work in vocational education, suggestions which can be made available to other States than your own for investigation and study?

Mr. Speaker, the importance of our free public-school systems is generally recognized and should be maintained.

CONTROLLED ECONOMY?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, after reviewing and reexamining much of the legislation which was speedily enacted in this momentous special session of Congress, the people of this country are seeking to gage its significance. Does the nature of this legislation indicate a new national economic policy? Are we abandoning an economy based on free markets or are we definitely committed to economic control? These questions are now uppermost in the minds of many of our citizens.

The necessity of dealing drastically with our national economy and mastering a definite problem is clear. The human mind has at least learned through science, technic, and methods of mass production to produce more than our people need. Civilization, after centuries of struggle, has attained this marvelous accomplishment. But it has blundered with the new problems of distribution. These problems of maldistribution must be solved. An economic system to accomplish that end must be established; otherwise the scientific and technical evolution, which we proudly call progress, is but a miserable human failure.

It is significant that the emergency legislation enacted at the behest of the present administration deals almost exclusively with economic problems. The nature of the functioning of our Government has undergone an extraordinary change in recent years. Heretofore government dealt largely with political matters. Now, if one thinks back on the past 3 months, it is difficult to recall any pronouncement by the President or legislation by the Congress that dealt with political problems. The concern of the Government has been almost entirely with economics. Government, either by design or by evolution, has assumed an economic instead of a political aspect. Our national economy has become its primary concern.

The stressing of the economic motif in governmental activities results logically from what seems to be a changed attitude toward government on the part of our people. There is a new psychology, a new point of view. Whatever the cause, there is no doubt that here in this land of "rugged individualism" there exists a feeling of dependence on government which is almost pathetic. The Federal Government is considered a sort of Santa Claus. People look to Government to cure all of their economic ills, to pay their debts, to save them from their mistakes. The guaranteeing of economic welfare to every citizen is now considered a proper function of Government. Government is now regarded as an instrument for economic control, rather than a political organization calculated to preserve the freedom and liberties of its people.

The big fact that stands out clearly is that our people, in their present mood, insist on economic control.

There are two viewpoints in relation to a national economy. One holds that free markets and economic competition are the best guaranties to the consumer and to the public. The other asserts that Government participation in and control of the economic organization is the most advantageous. The legislation sponsored by the administration portrays the second viewpoint, and its underlying theory is based on the proposition that "the laws of economics are man made."

An economy based on free markets and competitive prices is not a new thing. It is the result of centuries of economic activity. It is grounded in Anglo-Saxon tradition. It is man made but not entirely man planned. It is, like our common law, largely a result of evolution.

A newer thing is the theory of economic control. It is the result of a new economic organization, including division of labor, specialization, and mass production. Beyond a doubt, the theory that man can master the national economy, that man has sufficient intelligence to successfully plan a nation's economic future, has gained many adherents in the past few years.

The economic system of Soviet Russia is frequently cited as an example of successful economic planning. It is, of course, nothing of the sort. While Russia has just completed a 5-year plan, there has been no trial of efficient economic planning in Russia. Every factory in Russia has had only one plan—to produce as much as possible. Such plans require no planning skill. The test of the theory of economic planning comes when production in a nation reaches a level sufficient for the needs of the people. That stage we have reached in America. The task of the economic planners is to so nicely balance production and distribution in each industry and enterprise that the benefits of efficiency and of low cost of production, which have been developed under a competitive free market system, will not be lost to the people. Planned economy has for its purpose a balanced economy.

Much of the legislation enacted at this special session provides for a first step in economic planning and a controlled economy. Free markets and competition, which were fostered and protected by the antitrust laws and by the Clayton Act, are no longer considered the essentials of our economic planning. America, for the first time, treads a new path.

Those who do not believe that this legislation denotes a permanent change in our economic system point out the fact that, by its terms, the experiment is limited in time and calculated to meet an emergency. But, if successful, the theory of controlled economy will hardly be abandoned. No matter what the result, turning back would be difficult. Could the intricate pattern, once woven, be again unravelled?

At all events, "the die is cast." We face an unknown future. Shall our future national economy be based on free markets and economic competition, or shall it function through economic planning and control? The Roosevelt administration should go far in formulating an answer to that question.

If a reforming, a reconstruction of our national economy proves inevitable, the Democratic Party has a definite mission to perform. It must see to it that during this period of social and economic change, there shall be no sacrificing of our political liberties and free institutions. There must be no dictatorship, political or economic. American institutions must remain free.

AN ANALYSIS OF RULES AND REGULATIONS AFFECTING PAY OF VETERANS, PURSUANT TO THE ACTS OF THE SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, leave having been granted the Members to extend their remarks in the RECORD, I desire to place in the RECORD some information which I have compiled relative to rules and regulations affecting pay of veterans, their widows, or dependents, as follows:

Résumé of changes in Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, and veterans' regulations thereunder, effected by Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes", approved by the President June 16, 1933.

1. Authorization is given for the use of the sum not to exceed $500,000 for payments to State institutions caring for and maintaining veterans suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments, who were in such institutions on the date of enactment of the appropriation act, June 16, 1933.

2. The sum not to exceed $8,000,000 is made available for expenses and maintenance of regional offices of the Veterans' Administration.

3. Authorizes administrative expense incidental to securing employment for war veterans.

4. Authorizes expenditure of an amount not to exceed $5,000 for experimental purposes to determine the value of certain types of treatment.

5. Appropriations are made available for continuing aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888 (U.S.C., title 24, sec. 134), as amended, including all classes of veterans admissible to the Veterans' Administration homes.

6. Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized, with the concurrence of the Attorney General, to transfer to the Department of Justice such personnel and/or funds as may be deemed necessary in connection with defense of suits against the United States under section 19 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended.

7. Section 6 of title I of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, is amended to provide for domiciliary care and medical and hospital treatment to men discharged from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty. This amendment extends entitlement to this care to service-connected peace-time cases.

8. Authorizes expenditure of not more than $4,000,000 for repairs, alterations, improvements, or facilities in the several hospitals and homes under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration.

9. Authority is given the Attorney General of the United States to agree to a judgment to be rendered by the presiding judge of the United States court having jurisdiction of the case, pursuant to compromise approved by the Attorney General upon the recommendation of the United States attorney charged with the defense, in any suit on a contract of yearly renewable term insurance pending on March 20, 1933, and on the date of enactment of Public, No. 78, June 16, 1933.

10. Provides that $1,000,000 be made available until expended for carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1560), authorizing appropriation to provide additional hospital, domiciliary, and out-patient dispensary facilities. This is to permit of the completion of authorized construction.

11. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, pension payable under private relief act, not subject to provisions of sections 1 and 17 of title I of the "act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, is to be reduced by the same percentage as that prescribed for the reduction of compensation of officers and employees under section 3 of title II of the act of March 20, 1933. Under this provision the reduction at present is 15 percent, and the law provides that the reduction shall not exceed 15 percent.

12. The President is authorized to establish special boards (the majority of the members of which were not in the employ of the Veterans' Administration at the date of enactment of Public, No. 78, June 16, 1933) to review all claims (where the veteran entered service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disability is not the result of his own misconduct), in which presumptive service connection has heretofore been granted under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, wherein payments were being made on March 20, 1933, and which are held not service connected under the regulations issued pursuant to Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress. These special boards are to determine, on all available evidence, the question whether service connection shall be granted (notwithstanding the evidence may not clearly demonstrate the existence of the disease or any specific clinical findings within the terms of or period prescribed by Regulation No. 1, part I, subparagraph (c), or Instruction No. 2, Regulation No. 1, issued under Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress) and will in their decisions resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof in such cases being on the Government.

13. Notwithstanding the provisions of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, decisions of the special boards are to be final, subject to appellate procedure prescribed by the President, and, except for fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, 75 percent of the payment being made on March 20, 1933, shall continue until October 31, 1933, or the date of the special board's decision, whichever is the earlier date. Provision is made for extending the time of payment beyond October 31, 1933, until decision can be rendered.

14. (a) Provision is made for the adjudication of claims for yearly renewable term insurance on which premiums were paid to date of death of the insured and any claim for pension, compensation allowance, or emergency officers' retirement pay under the provisions of laws repealed by section 17 of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, wherein claim was duly filed prior to March 20, 1933. The adjudications are to be on proof and evidence received by the Veterans' Administration prior to March 20, 1933, and any person found entitled to the benefits claimed shall be paid such benefits in accordance with and in the amounts provided by such prior laws. There is a provision that the payments authorized by this amendment shall continue only to include June 30, 1933, and only one original adjudicatory action and one appeal may be had in such cases; (b) there is a further provision that where a veteran died prior to March 20, 1933, under conditions which warrant the payment of, or reimbursement for, burial expenses, such payment or reimbursement may be made in accordance with the laws in effect prior to March 20, 1933, provided that the claim for such payment or reimbursement must be filed within 3 months from the date of approval of Public, No. 78.

15. Provision is made that in no event shall the rates of compensation payable for direct service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of his own misconduct, where they were except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation in receipt of compensation on March 20, 1933, be reduced more than 25 percent, except where under the Presidential regulations pertaining to Federal employees, hospitalized cases, and cases of beneficiaries residing outside the continental limits of the United States, a greater reduction is authorized.

16. Provision is made that in no event shall death compensation, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, being paid to widows, children, and dependent parents of deceased World War veterans under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, on March 20, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, whether the death of the veteran on whose account compensation is being paid was directly or presumptively connected with service.

17. Provision is made for the payment of a pension of not less than $15 per month to any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and Philippine insurrection, who served 90 days or more, was honorably discharged from service, is 55 years of age or over, is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President.

SOME PROVISIONS AFFECTING SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

Where a veteran died prior to March 20, 1933, under conditions which warrant the payment of, or reimbursement for, burial expenses, such payment or reimbursement may be made in accordance with the laws in effect prior to March 20, 1933: Provided, That claim for such payment of reimbursement must be filed within 3 months from the date of passage of this act.

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the rates of compensation payable for directly service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, in receipt of compensation on March 20, 1933, be reduced more than 25 percent, except in accordance with the regulations issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to Federal employees, hospitalized cases, and cases of beneficiaries residing outside of the continental limits of the United States.

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who served 90 days or more, was honorably discharged from the service, is 55 years of age or over, is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President, shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 per month.

Regulations issued by the President June 6, 1933, change the basic rate for war-time service-connected disabilities of veterans of the Spanish-American War from $8 to $80 to $9 to $90; authorize an increase in rate for Spanish-American War veterans over 62 years of age from $6 to $15 per month; increase the rate for non-service-connected permanent and total disabilities for such veterans from $20 to $30 per month; also authorize the payment of a burial allowance of $75, including transportation, if the veterans' net assets at time of death are less than $1,000. In determining assets it is provided that there shall not be included accrued benefits, such as compensation, pension, and so forth. Widows of deceased veterans are excepted from the prohibition of payment of pension to Federal employees.

An important change in the rules and regulations as first announced is the extension of the age limit for death benefit for children from 16 to 18 years, and should the beneficiary be in school benefits will be paid until graduation, or up to 21 years of age.

Under the original act $100 was allowed for burial expenses, provided the estate of the deceased was not worth more than $1,000, but the new rule has reduced this to $75.

Any veteran deprived of the compensation by the act of March 20 can file his claim for reconsideration after July 1, but those suffering service-connected disabilities are advised to appeal their case to the Veterans' Administration with new evidence, thus avoiding the necessity of filing new claims and causing delay in securing an adjustment. If the Veterans' Administration decides that the veteran was wrongfully dropped from the rolls, he would be entitled to compensation since March.

Blanks for filing claims can be secured from all Legion posts or from my office probably after July 1.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF SHALL NOT BE AT THE EXPENSE OF BREAKING UP THE CONTINUITY OF FAMILY LIFE

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, the problem of unemployment has been acute in this country ever since the unfortunate conditions left to us as a result of the incompetent Hoover administration, which has now fortunately passed into oblivion.

The new administration, as one of its principal aims and by way of reconditioning things in the United States, was obliged to seriously attack the problem of unemployment and vigorously combat it.

Just before the closing of the session of this special session of Congress we passed the Recovery Act, which will undoubtedly rectify things in many fields of human endeavor.

It will put a large number of unemployed back to work and create a stimulus in the real-estate market, so that undoubtedly large numbers of our unemployed will be very materially helped.

The only constructive suggestions to alleviate unemployment ever since the great slump of 1928–29 were made by members of the Democratic Party. Several members of the House, as well as that stanch champion of unemployment relief, my colleague the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], placed constructive suggestions for relief before the administration during the Hoover regime, but at all times as long as the Republican Party was in power they were balked in their attempts to settle the unemployment problem on an intelligent basis; on the contrary, all of the suggestions for relief and all of the well-thought-out plans presented by my Democratic colleagues in both Houses fell by the wayside and did not receive any support or encouragement from the Hoover administration.

The principal aim and purposes of the unemployment relief bill, as they now were finally enacted into law, are a plan to coordinate the public employment agencies of the several States through an enlargement of the Federal Employment Service. The Federal Employment Service will be able, when properly managed, to so arrange things that if unemployment should be confined to a particular State or particular section of the United States, it will be possible to transport workers who are qualified from one section of the country to another so as to bring about an equalization of conditions and relieve unemployment sectional in its nature.

A great deal will depend on the manner in which our new Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, will undertake this part of the work allotted to her. It will be her duty to reorganize the Employment Service of the Federal Government and make it a real vehicle for the greatest good for the greatest number. The Employment Service will furnish the key to the entire economic-recovery situation and will be the arch of the stone on which the success of our national recovery will depend.

In this connection, the experience which our new Secretary of Labor has had in handling the unemployment situation in the State of New York, where she was commissioner of labor for over a decade, will be undoubtedly a great help to her and to the Nation.

The problem of unemployment, however, is not only an economic one but a social one as well. Where the breadwinner of a family is prevented from gainful employment, not only does it cause the family to suffer, but it reacts very unfavorably on the cohesion and continuity of family life. Members of the family begin to drift from one another, go to different parts of the country, perhaps, in search of employment, and eventually the morale of the family becomes disrupted, and as a result there is a relaxation in the social life of the community which it may take years to reestablish. One of the problems, therefore, which the administration of unemployment relief will have to consider and consider very thoroughly is the necessity of keeping families together; and if coordination of employment agencies is to be effected, it shall not be at the expense of breaking up the continuity of family life in any portion of the country, and care shall be taken in keeping families together and giving their members employment, if possible, within the same locality or within an area of easy communication.

These things particularly bring themselves to my mind because I am confronted with a somewhat similar situation as Chairman of the Immigration Committee in being obliged from time to time to foster legislation to prevent the disruption of families. I always have the problem of keeping families together, because I am, likewise, very much concerned with the morale and social relations which are the result of the families' becoming disunited.

While the problem which I am particularly concerned with as chairman of the Immigration Committee affects exclusively resident aliens or naturalized American citizens, the problem is the same insofar as the prospective solution of the unemployment problem will lend itself to. I feel that the continuity of family life is to be upheld at all hazards and should be made the principal aim and object of the new coordinated employment service.

The Industrial Recovery Act places a very substantial sum at the disposal of the Nation, which will enable an ambitious public-works program to get started on the way and will undoubtedly result in a very substantial reduction of unemployment throughout the United States.

It is estimated that some million or more of men will be put to work before the fall and others will most likely find employment soon thereafter.

Let us hope that with the able management of the forces at the disposal of the President we shall at last lay to rest the bugaboo of fear and uncertainty which now hovers over the homes of so many of our citizens and breadwinners. With industrial recovery in sight, with business conditions on the upgrade, and unemployment curtailed and put under control, let us face cheerfully the prospects of the next 6 months until Congress reassembles.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 2 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 14, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1933

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 6, 1933)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in order that the Senate may have an opportunity of taking up measures that have been reported during this legislative day I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a.m., this day.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 1 minute a.m.) the Senate adjourned until 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a.m., Wednesday, June 14, 1933.

(Calendar day of Wednesday, June 14, 1933)

The Senate met at 11:30 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God and Heavenly Father, in whom we live and move and have our being, who hast brought us to this, the beginning of another day; grant us that by the direction of Thy Holy Spirit we may plan and do all things that are in accord with Thy eternal counsel.

May Thy Holy Spirit abide in this sacred place, and bring to each Member of the Senate a spirit of calm, a clear and true vision, a more intensive purpose, and, above all, an absolute commitment to Thy blessed will.

May we feel that in all our endeavors we are not working alone, for Thou art with us. Though we pass through the waters, Thou wilt be with us; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow us; though we walk through the fire, we shall not be burned, for Thou art our God, the everlasting Father, the Holy One of Israel, our Savior.

Grant that now we may feel Thy presence and be secure in the knowledge that underneath are Thine everlasting arms; and we pray that the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, may keep our hearts and our minds in the knowledge and love of God, and of His Son Jesus Christ our Lord, and that the blessings of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit may be upon us and remain with us forever. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Joint resolution relating to cost of production for farmers

Whereas the Congress of the United States, it has been reported, struck out of the farm relief bill the so-called "Simpson amendment", which would have guaranteed prices to farmers equal to their actual and fair cost of production; and

Whereas this action makes the national farm strike inevitable, which will probably cause discontent and distress; and

Whereas the demand of the farmers for prices which will give them at least their cost of production is reasonable in all respects and is but plain justice: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to promptly enact legislation guaranteeing to farmers their reasonable cost of production; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to Hon. Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, and to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the convention of District Lodge No. 1, Scandinavian Fraternity of America, at Jamestown, N.Y., endorsing the policy of the President of the United States looking toward an enduring international peace, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Mount Neboh Men's Club, of New York City, N.Y., protesting against the persecution of, and alleged outrages committed against, the Jews in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N.Y., remonstrating against the persecution of, and alleged outrages committed against, the Jews in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions adopted by the Wyoming County committee of the American Legion, Silver Springs, N.Y., which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by Wyoming County committee, American Legion, Department of New York, in regular meeting at Silver Springs, N.Y., May 24, 1933

Whereas one of the basic reasons for the existence of the American Legion and one of its most sacred duties is the welfare of the disabled veterans of the World War; and

Whereas the American Legion through diligence and supreme effort since the World War secured enactment of legislation in the interests of the disabled veterans of the World War; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has enacted legislation by virtue of which Executive orders have been issued tearing down in its entirety this structure of legislation and in lieu thereof creating regulations defining a pension system for all veterans; and

Whereas this so-called "pension system" is, in its essence, arbitrary, without foundation in fact or medical science, contravenes all concepts of pure justice in its effects on the deserving disabled veterans; and is the result of false and malicious propaganda spread with the object of besmirching the character of the veterans of the World War and other wars, and was intended to destroy the high reputation which the veterans and their organizations have previously built up in their respective communities; and

Whereas this so-called "pension system" divests the deserving disabled veterans of their vested rights, tends to pauperize these veterans, shifts the burden of care of these veterans from the back of the Federal income-tax payers to the already overloaded back of the home owner and the owner of other real estate, and is a vicious assault on patriotism because of its tendency to create a belief that the reward of the deserving disabled veteran, whose life and happiness were impaired in the service of his country, is a trip over the hill to the poorhouse, and that his widow and children will share likewise: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Wyoming County committee, Department of New York, American Legion, places itself on record as opposed to the legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States and the orders and regulations issued thereunder by the Executive, and whole-heartedly demands that the American Legion institute a vigorous campaign for the repeal or modification of them with a view to securing plain and pure justice for the deserving disabled veterans; and be it further

Resolved, That we dedicate ourselves to this task; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent through proper channels to the local Member of the House of Representatives and to the United States Senators from the State of New York.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN SPOTTED FEVER

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I have here a telegram from Hon. Leslie A. Miller, Governor of Wyoming, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the telegram, as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., June 1, 1933.

Senator JOHN B. KENDRICK,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Understand there is proposal to cut 50 percent in Public Health Service appropriation on Rocky Mountain spotted fever and that such a cut would be serious blow to production of vaccine and research work on the disease. My understanding facilities at Hamilton Mont., laboratory now very much under requirements for proper study of this disease, which, as you know, is causing such concern in this State, there being something over 40 cases now outstanding; and that we have had 5 or 6 fatalities so far this year. Kindly give this your attention and urge the retention of this particular service as being very much in the interest of Wyoming.

LESLIE A. MILLER.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, this message is of especial importance at this time in view of the vicious character of this disease, and its enormous spread, not only in the Rocky Mountain country but in parts of the East. It was supposed at first that it was dangerous only in the Northwest country. It originated, I believe, in the Bitter Root Valley of Montana. Very recently, however, there have been epidemics of it, not only in States farther east, but in States as far east as Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. In what form does this matter come to us? Was it by some act of the Congress that the change was made, or is it a matter of economy?

Mr. KENDRICK. The late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, 3 or 4 years ago induced the Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose of building a laboratory at Hamilton, Mont.; and this laboratory has been only partly finished. The reduction in the appropriation threatens the construction of that laboratory. There has been a great increase in this disease, until now it is spreading all over the country. Not only is it vicious in character, but a feature of the disease is the perfectly hideous appearance of the victim. His skin takes on the coloring of a rattlesnake; and the matter is of vast importance not only to the West but to this eastern country as well.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KENDRICK. Just a moment. Upon receipt of this telegram I called on the Public Health Service for a statement, and I think it would interest Members if they would listen to this statement. I send the letter to the desk and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, June 6, 1933.

Hon. JOHN B. KENDRICK,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR KENDRICK: With reference to our several conversations with regard to the work of the Public Health Service on Rocky Mountain spotted fever, especially the production of the vaccine, the following points may be of interest to you:

The Public Health Service has been engaged in the study of Rocky Mountain spotted fever since 1903. During this time 23 officers and employees have contracted the disease or other infections associated with the work, and six of these have died.

As you know, the headquarters for the studies have been since 1911 at Hamilton, Mont., where the State erected a laboratory for that special purpose. From the original conception that Rocky Mountain spotted fever was a strictly western disease, studies made by the Public Health Service have demonstrated that it is not confined to that part of the United States. It has been found in 25 States and the District of Columbia. This interstate feature of the disease was recognized by the late Senator Walsh, who in 1931 introduced a bill for the purchase of the Montana State Laboratory, and in addition the construction of an additional laboratory to take care of the increasing requirements of the work.

In 1924 Surg. R. R. Spencer, of the Public Health Service, developed a vaccine made from infected ticks which was protective against the disease. The annual production of this vaccine in recent years has been as follows:

	Liters
1931	117.2
1933 (approximate)	175.0

The demands for this vaccine have continuously exceeded its production, so much so that the employees of the Government engaged in the reforestation plan and the troops of the United States Army have had to be denied vaccine in order to reserve it for civilian personnel living in those regions where the disease is most prevalent and most severe. No vaccine has been allotted to the eastern United States for extensive immunization purposes.

During the present fiscal year approximately $83,000 was allotted to the maintenance of this laboratory and its work. For the next fiscal year this has been cut to $49,000. To come within this allotment, the policy of the Public Health Service has been to maintain as high a production of the vaccine as possible, even at the expense of discharging some of its scientific personnel, although it was the work of this personnel that made the discovery of the vaccine possible.

Very truly yours,

H. S. CUMMING, Surgeon General.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, the letter which has just been read contains two significant statements:

There never has been definite proof that the vaccine that has been produced here would render a person immune; but the fact is established that among the thousands of people who have been vaccinated there has never been the loss of a single life.

This letter also points out the fact that 26 physicians have been employed in the manufacture of this vaccine, and 6 of them have died from the disease. It is the most deadly disease that has broken out in recent years, and promises to be of national importance. Therefore, I have asked to have this telegram and letter inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it seems to me unthinkable that we should reduce this appropriation. Senators will recall the effort made by the late Senator Walsh, of Montana, to have this small laboratory in the State of Montana transferred to the Federal Government in order that a large production of this vaccine might be had. I wish now to ask the Senator how it happens that the reduction was made. Was it a reduction in the appropriation bill, or was it by order of the Budget Director?

Mr. KENDRICK. I think it was made in the regular appropriation bill. I ought to say also that when the importance of the matter was called to the attention of the Director of the Budget a part of the money which had been cut off was restored, so that those interested could go on with their manufacture of the vaccine, and in part continue the construction and development of this laboratory.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, are they producing vaccine in this laboratory? Have they gotten to that point?

Mr. KENDRICK. They are producing vaccine; yet they cannot begin to supply the demand. There has been a large number of deaths from spotted fever over all the Rocky Mountain section of the country during this season because the vaccine could not be procured.

Mr. HATFIELD. In other words, Mr. President, on account of the lack of vaccine, those who have contracted this disease by bite from a tick die for the want of immunization. Is that true?

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes. I want to say again that they are proceeding with the production of the vaccine, but in nothing like sufficient quantity to meet the demand. As an illustration, the people located in our section of the country who are subject to infection cannot be supplied.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, has the Senator a plan to suggest by which we can get the funds? Certainly they ought to be provided at once, because the letter from the Public Health Service points out that the young men in the Civilian Conservation Corps are now to be subjected to the danger of infection with this disease. Certainly we ought not to permit a thing like that to happen. It has been very clearly pointed out here that, with the meager facilities now at hand, and through the hampering of the laboratory, it will not be possible to produce the vaccine in quantities sufficient. There should be provided some way. Has the Senator a plan?

Mr. KENDRICK. I have no plan for even an appeal to the Director of the Budget at this time, but I think such an appeal ought to be made, and such increased appropriation provided as will insure the completion of this laboratory.

Mr. COPELAND. May I suggest to the Senator that he prepare at once a suitable resolution which may be acted on today.

Mr. KENDRICK. I think it would not be possible to take such action here as would give us results this season, because of the fact that it takes quite a bit of time to secure the material for this vaccine.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; but if we wait 6 months, it will take so much more time to get the material. I do not think we ought to wait. I want to say in all seriousness to the Senate that this is a real menace. It is not alone in the Rocky Mountain States, but the State of Maryland and other Eastern States are infected. It is a matter of great concern to the entire country, and there should be found some way, as I see it, to provide the funds to produce this vaccine in sufficient quantities.

Mr. KENDRICK. I shall be glad to cooperate in any way I can, because over all my State the infection is breaking out, as well as over Montana and Idaho. It is found particularly in the Rocky Mountain States. The Senate has already heard that the disease is more vicious in its form than any other disease we have known in this country.

CONDITION OF THE INDIAN

Mr. WHEELER presented an address by Hon. John Collier, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, delivered at the National Conference of Social Work, Detroit, Mich., on June 13, 1933, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE JOHN COLLIER, COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, AT THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF SOCIAL WORK, DETROIT, MICH., TUESDAY MORNING, JUNE 13, 1933

INTRODUCTION

The Indian is revealed as an excessively underprivileged group—rather as a hundred groups—in situations extremely variegated and yet bound together by certain common conditions. These conditions have arisen out of the past, but they exist today as facts of law and administration, and of commission as well as omission.

Three main necessities have been driven home by your proceedings in these earlier years.

First. The resources of helpfulness, Federal and local, official and unofficial, have largely been withheld from the Indians or actually have been shut out from them. Those resources must be extended to them systematically, but coordinately the Federal responsibility for Indian protection must be kept intact.

Second. Indian administration needs to become decentralized and democratized. The changes must be not only administrative; basic legal reforms are needed, and these reforms should provide for the Indians clear and abundant civil status and a framework of group organization. Broadly, the constitutional rights.

Third. The laws affecting Indian property and the system of administering the physical assets of the Indians must be drastically changed. These laws at present necessitate the continued wastage of the Indian estate. The Indian lands have been cut down from 133,000,000 acres in 1887 to 46,000,000 today; the cutting-down goes steadily ahead, and the archaic property system necessitates a paternalism whose ramifications grow more elaborate each year and impede Indian administration and paralyze the Indians more hopelessly with each passing year.

DRASTIC REDUCTION IN AVAILABLE FUNDS

Let us glance first at the financial situation of the Indian Bureau. From last year (the fiscal year 1932) to the coming year (the fiscal year 1934, beginning July 1 next) the Federal appropriation for Indian Service has been cut from $27,030,047 to $16,586,059. The reduction is $10,443,988, or 39 percent. The Indian tribal trust funds available for Indian Bureau costs have been reduced from $3,385,934 to a sum not yet precisely known, but totaling $2,450,000, approximately, about a $930,000 diminution. And the tribal trust funds available for payment in cash to the Indians have been reduced from $3,289,160 to $2,000,000. A grand total appropriation of $33,704,000 for last year (1932) is cut to approximately $21,142,000 for the coming year (1934), and the total reduction is approximately $12,562,988. For simplicity I omit certain unexpended balances of tribal funds from the totals and certain revolving funds from irrigation projects.

Let us examine more closely that part of the reduction which is a taxpayers' saving. That is $10,443,986, of a total reduction of $12,562,988. It is divided between a saving of $5,890,440 on physical construction of all types, and a saving of $4,553,546 on personnel and administration and institutional costs. Of this cut in personnel and in institutional costs, a million and a half is represented by the uniform pay cut of 15 percent, leaving $3,000,000 to be absorbed, principally through abolition of positions and through institutional savings.

DEPLETION OF TRUST FUNDS

Roughly to finish off the picture, let me add that the payment of cash to Indians from their tribal funds and the use of tribal funds for Indian service costs is largely a diversion of capital assets into current maintenance; and the capital assets in liquid shape have, for some tribes, shrunken actually past the vanishing point; for all tribes possessing such funds they are vanishing swiftly. Another year may see activities of the Indian Service transferred from the tribal to the tax budget in the amount of $2,000,000. In large part they ought to be thus transferred. The use of Indian trust funds for administration costs is wrong; but inasmuch as the grant from tax sources can hardly be increased in the years just ahead, the effect of this shift from tribal to tax-raised funds will be a serious additional cut in the total appropriation available for Indian Service. Incidentally, the sharp reduction in per-capita payments to Indians from tribal funds (more than a million dollars in the coming year) may throw upon the tax appropriation an increased relief burden of several hundred thousand dollars.

I hurriedly complete the fiscal picture. Partially balancing the $12,500,000 reduction of total appropriations is a new grant of $5,800,000 for the emergency reforestation camps, in which 14,000 Indians will be enrolled, and we are hoping for substantial grants under the Industrial Recovery Act for road building and for construction. The Indians and the Indian lands will be benefited through these emergency grants, and through the emergency reforestation work especially we hope to achieve big advances in Indian organization for self-help. But the strain on the permanent Indian Service—the mandate for swift and drastic readjustments in the complicated institutional work of the Indian Bureau—is hardly at all diminished by the emergency grants. We do not complain at all. Ultimately we know that a permanently bettered Indian Service is going to be forged out through the economy blast, but we face extreme difficulties.

SCHOOLS AND INDIAN CHILDREN

Now I pass to the very human topic whose involvement with the fact of reduced and still-shrinking appropriations is immediate and mandatory. I refer to our schools. There are 90,000, approximately, of Indian children of school age. Of this total, 16,000 have not yet been provided with any schooling opportunity whatever. And of this number—90,000—there are 20,000 in Government boarding schools. On these 20,000 institutionalized children we have been spending, year after year 80 percent and upward of our whole appropriation for Indian education. We have left totally unprovided an almost equal number of "forgotten" Indian children. We have thrown upon the local school districts, with no Federal aid or supervision, more than 25,000 Indian children. We have paid tuition for perhaps an equal number in public schools and other schools. And to all the Indians we have denied the opportunity for advanced professional, vocational, and liberal education.

It is a state of affairs typifying a wider state of affairs in the Indian Service. We have, during all past years, concentrated on the institutional and the centralized and therefore, incidentally, the most financially expensive of the many services which we might have chosen to render the Indians.

This institutional concentration has typified our medical work as well as our school work; and it has been characteristic of our agency work on the reservations; and it has been again expressed in an overcentralization, reaching degrees which were and are fantastic, of policy making and of detailed administrative control at the remote Washington headquarters of the Indian Office. I need not, in this half hour, spin out the picture of the human, the social, the fiscal consequences of an exclusive reliance on institutional devices when one is trying to raise the life level of masses of people scattered amid the general communities of 20 States and with backgrounds and destinies as widely differing as can be imagined between the social poles.

ORIGINS OF THE PRESENT POLICY

Let me pause to explain that I am not here formulating anything new nor anything first thought of by the new Indian administration or even by its immediate predecessor. I do but summarize the facts and the conclusions of the Meriam report of 1928. And that report, while adding vastly to the factual data about Indian service, did but state with careful application a conclusion which many of the then superintendents in the Indian Service and probably all of the Indian welfare bodies had previously arrived at. The years since 1928 have made the beginnings in the transformation of Indian Service from institutional concentration toward diffusion of services and toward use of all resources of helpfulness for and by the Indians, and toward decentralization of responsibility and of power, and toward substitution of Indian self-help (communal and individual) for the more or less forced bottle-feeding by institutional methods of a minority of the Indians. The transformation as yet has been very incomplete; and the Indian administration since 2 months ago has not yet proved that it is going to have the skill or audacity to decisively speed up the transformation. But, in common with the administration which preceded us, we do at least know that our success or our failure will rest in one thing more than all else. There are many collateral necessities, but to move, and to move faster, from institutional concentration toward Indian-participated distribution of services is the one absolute mandate. And we welcome the forced economies, because they drive us forward on the one line that may bring to an end the social entombment of most of the Indians and the biological sentence of death which still hangs over a majority of the tribes.

HOW INDIAN CHILDREN ARE NOW SCHOOLED

Returning to our Indian shool situation, on 20,000 children in institutions (three fourths of whom, and probably more, are not properly institutional cases) we are spending $7,000,000, or 80 percent of our whole educational fund. Sixteen thousand children have no schooling opportunity at all. Forty-eight thousand Indian children are enrolled in public schools, and many of these public schools are threatened with suspension by the failure of local tax resources, while the Federal Government withholds from them any payment whatsoever for the schooling of untaxed Indian children. The Federal Government pays tuition for a minority only of the Indian children in public schools. I say nothing of the relative advantages of institutional boarding schools for non-institutional children as over against day schools near the homes; the superiority of the day schools, when adequate social aid is given, will be apparent to you gathered here and has been declared by every investigating body since 1922—every official and unofficial body. Why, then, do I pause to comment upon the obvious?

THE OPPOSITION TO THE CHANGE

I do so because we now are encountering, as the prior administration encountered, intense and organized resistance to the program of moving out of boarding schools one child in order to make for him and for two other children and for their families and their communities a more adequate provision. Invested in the boarding schools are millions of dollars—perhaps as much as $25,000,000 in plant investment. In the boarding schools there is 1 Government employee for every 7 children. Each boarding school is a civic institution and an economic feeder to the local community where it is situated. And many Indians have been trained by the boarding schools to expect to be relieved of the cost and the bother of rearing their own families. Hence the intense and the many-sided resistance to the deinstitutionalizing program. But in addition there is a resistance growing out of real considerations of emotion and of philosophy.

These Indians—these Mongoloid peoples; this broken and sequestrated race; this underprivileged race, victim of a century-long Federal bureaucratic monopoly over its life, and victim of the unconscious ideal of institutionalism, and victim of a mortality excessively high, of a poverty excessively deep; this alien race, so perpetually in the "limelight" and so wildly, so romantically, not understood. Indeed, are not the institutional methods proper to such a race? Are they not situated like the buffaloes, these Indians? Very general indeed is this view of the Indians, and it has not yet by any means faded from many minds even within Congress, and the resistance against the closing of boarding schools "rationalizes" itself convincingly, through evoking from our own racial unconsciousness this view of the Indian which has in it elements which are powerful indeed of envy and of fear, of hate, and of love.

THE TENTATIVE IMMEDIATE PROGRAM

We expect that 10 boarding schools will be suspended July 1, and the attendance at many others will be somewhat reduced. Of the 10 schools which may be closed, 4 were decided upon long ago. The 6 others would normally have been closed not this year, but next, or the year after; their immediate suspension, if it takes place, will be due to the emergency requirements under the Economy Act. The future speed of change will depend on two conditions primarily: How much money can be obtained from Congress for the construction of day schools, and how broad an authority can be secured for reapplying to public-school uses the money saved from the boarding schools. If 12,000 children be transferred from boarding schools, the effect will be to save about $4,400,000 gross. If each child be schooled at a public school, and if $80 tuition be paid the school district and an additional $45 be supplied toward social and health service, the expenditure will be $1,500,000. The net saving will be $2,900,000. If we be allowed to apply toward Indian education even half of this net saving, and if the needed construction of buildings be supplied under the industrial recovery bill, we shall be enabled to place in school 10,000 children now denied any schooling. Or, were we allowed to reapply half the savings toward other Indian needs, we could, for example, out of this single adjustment finance, in behalf of all the Indians, an adequate system of agricultural credit; or we could finance, year by year, the recapture of at least 20,000 acres of allotted heirship lands now destined to pass to white ownership; or we could institute, and make general through the Indian country, the health and home education which is now almost completely neglected, and on which the survival of the tribe may be even more dependent than it is dependent on our clinical services.

IN MEXICO

So much time given to the school question in this half hour may appear to disproportion it. It is not so, as one realizes the instant he looks at the Indian work of Mexico. In Mexico the community day school has been made the foundation of all the Government's Indian effort and of the Indian cooperative effort. Indian administration has been decentralized to the last outpost—the day school with its teachers' cottage. At this day school the agricultural work centers, as well as the health work, the political education, and the art expression. The day school is the headquarters of the local cooperative society and the credit union. Adult education bulks as large as child education in many of these schools. The Indian program is integrated through the school, and being thus a local expression, this program is found with each year more diversified as one goes from region to region in Mexico. And so largely does the Mexican effort rest upon the locally organized Indians that if through revolution or bankruptcy the governmental Indian program of Mexico were tomorrow completely abandoned, still the main elements of Mexico's Indian work would not perish. This is not a speculation but a fact of experience. Until 3 years ago half of all the Indian schools of Mexico were locally supported by the Indians, even the teachers, chosen by the local Indian communes, being paid by them through moneys not derived from taxation.

The release of ambition and vision, the joy of work, the excitement of adventure in the Mexican Indian system are very impressive. The absence of red tape and the vividness of local responsibility and the sense of free option among the Indian workers are noted by every investigator. The fullness of Indian participation is noteworthy above everything else. Indeed, the whole operation is Indian-made, and Indians are holding in the Mexican Indian service every class of technical position to the highest and most professional.

You will see, returning to our own Indian Service, that the issue is not merely a contest between boarding schools and day schools. It is not merely an issue as between a luxury expenditure and an economy. The issue, if our Indian Service people have the genius to make it such, lies as between an institutional practice that is archaic, on the one hand, and on the other hand a development of social enterprise, with the day school as its nucleus, which in its potentialities reaches far out beyond the present achievement of our white communities. The Indian, if we and he can make the transition, will move from the condition of an underprivileged group, locked within outmoded institutional provisions, to a position of a group claiming and having those advantages which lie out beyond our present day, which are the hope of the great century ahead. Indian affairs thus will become one of the social pioneering enterprises, and the Indian will be the principal in a social experiment critical to the whole world.

WHAT THE INDIANS NEED FROM CONGRESS

The next session of Congress will be for the Indians and the Indian Service a fateful time. The allotment law must be radically amended. Tribal status and the machinery for Indian organization must be defined. Civil rights must be extended—a budget of measures constituting an Indian bill of rights. Legislation must be secured widening the cooperative relationships between the Federal and local agencies in all types of Indian service, while preserving intact the Federal guardianship. Legislation protecting and fostering the Indian arts and crafts must be advanced. A system of financial credit for Indians must be established. The discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Indian Commissioner must be curbed. The ultimate discretion of Congress itself—its plenary power over Indian affairs—must be curbed. if Congress can be so persuaded. The system of budgeting for Indian Service must be overhauled from top to bottom. Tribal funds must be given a protection equal to that enjoyed by the Canadian Indians.

The drafting of this legislative program will be in competent hands. The legal staff of the whole Interior Department is being reorganized and concentrated under Nathan R. Margold, who is a lawyer both experienced and brilliant. The inspectorial forces of the whole Interior Department are being concentrated under Louis R. Glavis, a conservationist and a master of the techniques of investigation. To head the emergency unemployment and reforestation work for Indians, we have enlisted Dr. Jay B. Nash, known probably to all of you, than whom there is no better expert in community organization. We have announced that hereafter, as soon as we can achieve the result, the Indian timber holdings, exceeding 7,000,000 acres, shall be administered no longer through contract sales but by tribal operation, with a view to perpetual conservation and to the maximum of Indian employment and Indian communal development.

I can assure you that from the Secretary of the Interior right down through the Indian Office and out to many of its field agencies, there is an acute consciousness that Indian affairs have reached their crisis. It is a crisis which time has brought; and for most of the Indians, realization has not come too late. We know that we are facing a challenge to be met not by words but by deeds. We do not know that we shall have the resourcefulness to meet the challenge. Ultimately the decision concerning the Indians' fate will be made in large part by Congress. Of course, the Indians themselves, and only they, will finally cast the die; but we, their official and unofficial friends, must first correct those many and strange mechanisms which, in their total effect, amount to nothing less than a benign (and not always benign) enslavement. May you, who are Members of this session, watch the course of events in the months ahead; and we beg you to help us when Congress meets next January.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of House bill 5767, to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. Is this not a debatable question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are resolutions lying on the table coming over from a previous day, are there not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary clerk informs the Chair that there was no resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. BORAH. I introduced the resolution, which is on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a joint resolution, the Chair is advised, and does not come within the rule.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether, at the conclusion of routine morning business on any day other than Monday, the calendar is not automatically taken up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless otherwise ordered, the Senate at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, proceeds to the consideration of the calendar. On Monday the Senate, except by unanimous consent, is required to proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar in their regular order. On any other day, however, the Chair may recognize any Senator to move to take up any bill he desires to have taken up out of order.

Mr. McNARY. Irrespective of its position on the calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. Is it not proper to make some statement as to the character and effect of the measure the Senator from Maryland has moved to take up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would come within the purview of debate, it seems to the Chair.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly; but I mean in advance of any vote on a motion to take it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that would undoubtedly be debate. I think the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the measure be taken up, it will become subject to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly; then it will be subject to unlimited debate.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5767, authorizing the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii.

On a division, the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator proceeds with the debate, I want to ask if he will permit me to call attention to a joint resolution which, if we do not pass it speedily, will be of no effect. It is a joint resolution to suspend the President's executive order for consolidation, transfer, and abolition of executive agencies, which order contained the following language:

Payments for agricultural experiment stations, 25 percent thereof.
Cooperative agricultural extension work, 25 percent thereof.
Endowment and maintenance of colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, 25 percent thereof.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] has introduced a joint resolution which would have the effect of repealing this part of the Executive order. I have no pride of authorship in regard to it, but I do not believe we can successfully pass a joint resolution repealing. I do believe it would be agreeable to all parties to have that part of the order suspended until 60 days after the convening of the next session of Congress, during which time we may deal with the matter as we desire to deal with it.

Mr. COPELAND. Would not the Senator be willing to include vocational education also in the joint resolution?

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection myself to including that. It is in the same group. I was not so vitally concerned in that myself, but I have no objection to including it, provided it will not jeopardize the resolution.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator include it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Idaho will include vocational education.

Mr. BORAH. I will include that upon the condition stated.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should be very glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho, and I recognize the importance of his joint resolution, but if I should lose the floor and this should bring on long debate, I would be reluctant to yield.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. FESS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think, for the sake of orderly procedure, the matter which the Senator from Idaho is now discussing should follow the disposal of the subject matter suggested by the Senator from Maryland. I have a joint resolution on the desk the object of which is the repeal of section 18 of the President's order. I think I can come to an agreement with the Senator from Arkansas with regard to its disposal, but I want it fairly set forth in the RECORD, and I would prefer that no action be taken at this time, but later in the day.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me for a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask somebody who would know whether the suspension of a recommendation of the President in this particular reorganization authority would require a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution. If it would require a joint resolution, it would have to be signed by the President.

Mr. BORAH. I am not positive in my view; but after looking the matter up, I came to the conclusion that it was a matter to which the President would have to consent by signing the measure.

Mr. McNARY. I can state specifically that the joint resolution I proposed, having the same status as a bill, must be signed by the President.

Mr. BORAH. I only desire to say this with reference to time—that this matter must pass the House and must go to the President, and, therefore, we ought to be as speedy in dealing with it as possible. I regret an objection is made.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, it will be recalled that on May 22, 1933, the President addressed a message to Congress. It is a very short message of 10 lines, and I hope I may have the attention of the Senate while I read it. It is as follows:

To the Congress:

It is particularly necessary to select for the post of Governor of Hawaii a man of experience and vision who will be regarded by all citizens of the islands as one who will be absolutely impartial in his decisions on matters as to which there may be a difference of local opinion. In making my choice, I should like to be free to pick either from the islands themselves or from the entire United States, the best man for this post. I request, therefore, suitable legislation temporarily suspending that part of the law which requires the Governor of Hawaii to be an actual resident of the islands.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 22, 1933.

In response to that message a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives. Under the parliamentary situation in the House, it was necessary to secure a two-thirds vote in order for it to pass that body. At the time the vote was taken the measure was carried overwhelmingly, but it lacked a few votes of the necessary two thirds.

A day or two subsequent to that vote another vote was taken upon the proposal, and on that occasion over two thirds of the membership of the House voted to pass the bill. It came to the Senate on the 8th of June 1933, and there was very little time remaining between the 8th of June and the contemplated adjournment on the 10th. Therefore there was not the occasion which would ordinarily have been the case to go into the matter fully, as the Senate had a right to go into it; but because of the emergency that existed the committee nevertheless ordered the measure to be reported out without an adequate hearing. That must be conceded.

Now, in order to get a very hasty picture of the Hawaiian Islands, particularly for the benefit of those who have not had occasion to look into this matter, let me refer first to the population of the islands. According to the census of June 30, 1931, there were at that time 375,211 persons in the Hawaiian Islands. Of that number 143,754 were Japanese—about 40 percent of the entire population. But that in itself does not picture the racial divisions in the islands, because we find there about a dozen different racial divisions which I will mention.

Of Hawaiians there are 22,391; Caucasian Hawaiians, 16,454; Asiatic Hawaiians, 13,549; Portuguese, 28,219; Puerto Ricans, 6,886; Spanish, 1,255; other Caucasians, 41,968; Chinese, 27,317; Japanese, 143,754; Koreans, 6,583; Filipinos, 66,049; and all others, 786, making a total of 375,211 persons.

It is plain to be seen that there on those delightful and beautiful islands there is ample ground for racial differences, plenty of opportunity for conflicts, plenty of opportunity for racial isolation and hatreds and prejudices. Fortunately, as nearly as I am able to ascertain, up to the present the people there have lived in amity, and the islands have attracted people from all over the world because of their natural beauties and climate and the life which is characteristic of the islands.

However, some time ago incidents began to happen. I do not want to reflect upon the Hawaiian Islands by picking out one or two instances and saying that they are typical of the Islands, that the people there are a lawless lot, that they are a bad lot, for that would not be true, in the first place, and I certainly do not want to reflect upon the people there in the second place; but the statement is predicated upon truth, that there has been a degree of disrespect for law which has not been the normal situation in the Islands. A year or so ago some incidents occurred there which accentuated the racial divisions.

In the Philippine Islands, having a population of 13,000,000 souls, a population which is largely homogeneous, we pick the Governor from the United States. The Filipino Government is a stable Government. Only recently the Congress passed an act allowing the Philippine people to choose the path of absolute independence should they desire to do so. We have done all that in the case of the 13,000,000 people who live in the Philippine Islands at the present time; but, notwithstanding that advanced state of affairs, the Governor of the Philippines is a citizen and a resident of the United States. That is likewise true of Puerto Rico, the Senate having just confirmed another resident of the United States to be the Governor of Puerto Rico.

Originally the law was not in its present shape with reference to the selection of governors for the Hawaiian Islands. President Wilson appointed a Mr. Pinkney who served him in the islands; but later on the complexion of Congress changed and the Hawaiian organic act was amended so that, under the act as it now exists, the Governor of the Hawaiian Islands must be a resident of the Hawaiian Islands for a period of at least 3 years.

President Roosevelt has had an investigation made of the conditions in the islands, and he deems it wise in their interest as well as in the interest of the United States to have a free hand to scan the country from one end to the other in order to select the very best man he can find for this post at this time. I hope the Senate will support the President in this program.

I have no desire to make a long address concerning conditions in the Hawaiian Islands; in fact, I should rather not say anything than make a remark which by indirection or by innuendo might cast any reflection upon the people of those islands. However, the conditions are such that the President feels it will be in the best interest of all parties concerned if he shall be given this power as a temporary measure, during this period when there has been some unpleasantness in the Hawaiian Islands. I hope the Senate will sustain the President in this respect; I hope they will support his request and permit the amendment of the law as a temporary proposition so that the best man available may be selected for Governor of the Hawaiian Islands.

Much may be said for local self-government, and I am not going to say anything opposed to that proposition, except to make this observation: Under the present law, the citizens of the Hawaiian Islands do not elect their Governor; they have no voice in the election of their Governor any more than I have in the election of the Governor of Illinois or Connecticut. The Governor of Hawaii is selected by the President. The sole color of title to local self-government in the selection of the Governor arises from the fact that, under existing law, the Governor of Hawaii must be a resident of the Hawaiian Islands; that is all. The President may take any one of the residents of the Hawaiian Islands for Governor; the people of the Hawaiian Islands have no voice in the selection of the Governor. If they had the right to elect their Governor, the departure from the ordinary routine would be one thing; but when they have no right to elect their Governor, when the Governor is appointed by the President, anyway, it cannot be said that this proposal is any substantial infringement of the right of local self-government. Since they have no voice in the election of their Governor, anyway, and in view of the fact that a year ago the situation was very tense in the Hawaiian Islands, I am hopeful that, as a temporary measure, the Senate will accede to the President's request that he may be permitted to scan the whole country and select either from the islands or from the mainland the one man who he finds is best equipped and situated to administer the affairs of these very beautiful islands in the Pacific for a brief period of time until normalcy may be restored.

COOPERATION AMONG SUPERVISORY BANKING AGENCIES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to address myself to the pending proposition respecting the Governorship of Hawaii in just a moment, but preceding that discussion I want to offer one comment and suggestion respecting the contemporary banking situation, inasmuch as this may be one of the last opportunities we may have in the Congress to address ourselves to that subject before next January. The intervening months represent a dangerous interlude.

This administration, Mr. President, believes in unified command in everything except in the one field of present activity in which it is most sadly and tragically needed. It is practicing, or will practice, unified command in every field except that occupied by those incongruous and unharmonized agencies which are presumed to help open closed banks and which are presumed to help keep open banks that are already in operation. Personally I do not believe in many of these dictatorships, and therefore I find it particularly irksome that there is no unified command at the one point where it ought to exist; and, inasmuch as the situation is pretty clearly within the jurisdiction of the Chief Executive, I want to urge upon the President that he take effective Executive cognizance of the situation to which I am addressing myself.

Mr. President, I am referring to the fact that there are three governmental agencies with which an open bank must deal if it needs assistance in remaining open or with which a closed bank must deal if it is to obtain conclusive cooperation in a reorganization and reopening. These banks, whether open or closed, must deal first with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in respect to loans; second, with the Treasury Department in respect to licenses; and, third, with the Federal Reserve banks not only in respect to licenses and to the rediscount privilege but also with respect to those emergency sections of the first Glass-Steagall bill which were supposed to be helpful, but which are altogether too rarely invoked.

Mr. President, I have not meant to name these agencies in the relative order of their importance or in the order of their contemporary sterility, but all three of them are always involved in each situation which a bank confronts whether, upon the one hand, it is trying to procure the necessary assistance to stay open or whether, upon the other hand, it is a closed bank which is trying to procure the necessary cooperation in order that it may reopen.

The open banks, Mr. President, when they need assistance, need it promptly; they need it quickly; they need it conclusively; they need it dependably. They cannot wait for an indeterminate debate between the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve banks, for except as the assistance is prompt and conclusive it is useless. Yet these banks are finding themselves lost in many a critical moment—and I am referring particularly to such a moment which has just occurred again in my own State of Michigan—they are finding themselves literally lost in the diverse decisions and the lack of conclusive cooperation between these three separate agencies of the Government with which they must deal. There are examinations and then there are reexaminations and then there are re-reexaminations. One agency examines. Then another examines the examination already made. The process is as continuous as it is confusing. One instrumentality makes one decision. Another instrumentality makes another decision. Then the third instrumentality disagrees with both the others. The banker who wants an answer respecting his problems is on a veritable merry-go-round. It would often be funny if it were not so serious. I am not criticizing officials. I am criticizing the system.

Mr. President, closed banks are finding one of their chief problems in reorganization and reopening to be this difficulty in procuring a meeting of minds between the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Treasury Department, and the Federal Reserve banks. Not only that but when the field agents of these three instrumentalities of the Government, the men representing these instrumentalities out in the field, on the ground where the difficulty arises, tentatively agree upon a program, let us say, for the reorganization and reopening of a closed bank, that program has to come back to headquarters; it has to come back to the Federal Reserve banks; it has to come back to the national board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; it has to come back to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Comptroller of the Currency. Time and time again when there has been an agreement on the ground, in the field, upon a formula for opening these banks, the formula has been vetoed when it finally reaches headquarters.

Mr. President, this is coming to be a very serious menace, and, except as the Executive does take Executive cognizance of the situation, I am very much afraid it may produce serious jeopardy. This process cannot go on indefinitely. It already has cost infinite and needless grief, and it will cost more.

The President went upon the radio at the end of his national banking holiday and told the American people that they could trust every bank to which he has given a license. Mr. President, he must make good upon that promise. I submit to him in all sympathetic cooperation that he cannot make good upon that promise unless he speedily correlates the three agencies and puts them in unified cooperation in dealing with these banking difficulties in summary fashion.

Mr. President, there was once a very famous double play in professional baseball, "Tinker to Evers to Chance", and any runner and any batter who collided with that combination was always out. Mr. President, we have a modern double play—or perhaps it is a triple play—which is equally fatal to the banker and to his depositor when they confront the modern combination which shoots the ball from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Treasury Department to the Federal Reserve banks. It may not always be in that serial order, but it is always a potential threat and it has many a put-out to its credit during the last 3 months of play in the depression league. There must be an end to this type of diffused responsibility in dealing with the banking situation or, frankly, Mr. President, there will be needless difficulties which we all will regret. I am submitting this comment in the best of faith, believing that it is a suggestion upon which the President of the United States needs to act with exceeding promptness if there shall not be difficulties which none of us cares to contemplate.

So much for that subject. I desire now to address myself to the measure which has been brought to the attention of the Senate by the able senior Senator from Maryland.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5767) to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I find myself in complete and unqualified hostility to the proposition submitted by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] in behalf of the President of the United States. I think it is an indefensible affront to a free people. I think that temporary vicissitudes in the Hawaiian Islands cannot be pleaded in mitigation of our offense when we resurrect carpetbagging in the United States and inflict an external governor upon a people to whom we have covenanted a governor of their own residency.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYDEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. Would the Senator be in favor of amending the Filipino Act and the Puerto Rican Act so that those two sections might have governors who are natives of the islands?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very glad to discuss that in a moment. The answer is no, and the parallel is utterly without analogy, as I shall be very happy to show. The Senator from Maryland merely begs the question. If this is the best excuse that can be made for the proposed imposition, there is no excuse whatever. I may as well address myself to that subject now, since the Senator from Maryland has raised it.

Mr. President, there are two types of external relationship under the American flag. One type deals with so-called "possessions." "Possessions", within the use of that word, for example, includes Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands. The other classification is the classification of a "Territory." It is a totally different classification. It acknowledges a totally different obligation on our part and a totally different status in respect to the citizens who there reside. Our Territories are Alaska and Hawaii. It is no argument whatsoever to plead that the lack of a native governor in the Philippine Islands or in Puerto Rico is a precedent which justifies the withdrawal of the right of a local governor in Hawaii and in Alaska.

Mr. President, there is this further distinction and the Senator from Maryland well knows the distinction exists. We are under no covenant with the Philippine Islands in respect to their Governor. We are under a definite and specific covenant in the organic act which we have validated for some 30 years in respect to Hawaii. The pending proposal is a direct and specific nullification of an obligation that has been honored for 30 years, which certainly has partaken of the nature of a solemn contract between the Government of the United States and the government and the people of the Hawaiian Islands. It is perfectly absurd to suggest that there is any remote parallel between the problem which we confront in respect of the governorship at Honolulu and the problem which we confront in respect of the governorship at Manila. The governorship at Hawaii is a matter of contract under organic law, and this present effort either to suspend the terms of that contract or to violate the spirit of it is nothing more nor less than a resurrection of the old-fashioned carpetbagging which I never supposed would come to life and to the attention of this Congress under Democratic auspices.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I suggest to the able Senator from Michigan, in addition to the very strong statement which he just made and which cannot be controverted, that the Hawaiian Islands became a part of the United States by treaty, and the Hawaiian Islands were an independent government. It was a Republic, and one Republic dealt with another Republic. We did not conquer the Hawaiian Islands as we conquered the Philippines or as we took possession of Puerto Rico by military force. Here was an independent government, a republic which we approach and asked for consolidation. Here was one independent people covenanting and cooperating with another independent government.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do.

Mr. LONG. Since the Senator has yielded, I am very glad to hear the Senator from Michigan denouncing the carpetbagging that is apparently intended to take place in Hawaii. That is a subject matter very dear to our hearts down in my part of the country and it is quite an influential argument. Just wherein does the parallel come, may I ask the Senator from Michigan? I am really in sympathy with the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The parallel comes in the superimposition of an external governor over a people against their protest and contrary to their home-rule right.

Furthermore, Mr. President, in this same general connection, it is a very amazing thing to me and perhaps a significant thing that there is pending even a proposal to carpetbag the District commissionership in the city of Washington. Certainly there has not been any great outburst of violence in the National Capital, there has not been any clashing of races in the National Capital, quoting the argument submitted by the Senator from Maryland, to justify carpetbagging here, and yet the newspapers tell us, quoting from a headline in yesterday's newspaper, "Omaha man called District of Columbia head candidate." I read it because of its significance; significant of what may lie behind this amazing proposition to inflict an external governorship upon the people of Hawaii contrary to the organic contract under which we have lived with them for 3 decades.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I know nothing or very little about the Hawaiian bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will follow me, he will know a great deal more about it than he knows now.

Mr. BYRNES. I hope so. I do not think I would be very well informed as the result of newspaper statements because the Senator from Michigan knows that the law provides that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia must be natives of Washington.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; I know that; and the organic law provides that the Governor of Hawaii must be a resident for 3 years of Hawaii.

Mr. BYRNES. No other man can be appointed unless the law is changed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Exactly; and I am wondering, after this Hawaii thing has been flipped through the Senate in the last days of the session, whether we shall not confront an emergency resolution, because of an alleged emergency and the inability of the Democratic Party to agree upon who ought to be appointed to the commissionership, whether we shall not have another sudden emergency resolution like the one now pending for the purpose of authorizing the importation of one of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

I want to pursue that matter just a little because I think it is rather interesting. I read from this article, which may be as unreliable as my dear friend the Senator from South Carolina intimates, and yet which seems to have some basis and some significance:

> Postmaster General James A. Farley, who conducted the preconvention campaign for Mr. Roosevelt on the basis of home rule, is said to be wavering. Although the six votes of the District delegation to the Chicago convention were put in Mr. Farley's pocket at a time when they did his cause much more good than the number of them would indicate, the patronage dispenser of the administration now is reported ready to forget the voteless District and give District jobs to persons who have votes and a voting following elsewhere.
> Although the law would prohibit appointment of Mr. Hopkins—
> The point raised by my able friend from South Carolina—
> or anyone else who is not a bona fide resident of the District, residents of the National Capital would be practically helpless to upset any outside appointment the President might make. Similar appointments have been made in the past, and although contests were started in the courts, the contests were not effective, the courts denying the right of citizens to challenge the selection of the President when approved by the Senate.

So here is the contemplation close at home of an administration movement which evidently has taken formidable status already to carpetbag the government of the District of Columbia. Of course, if they are willing to carpetbag the government of the District of Columbia, they would not hesitate for a moment to carpetbag the helpless and more remote government of the Territory of Hawaii. I think it is very significant that the problem of carpetbagging the government of the District of Columbia is in the hands of, to quote the journalistic definition, the "patronage dispenser of the administration." I only hope that lying behind the proposition to carpetbag the government of the Territory of Hawaii is not a similar aspiration on the part of the "patronage dispenser of the administration" with reference to the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, the able Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has referred to the fact that the Territory of Hawaii came within our jurisdiction under particular and peculiar conditions involving a particular and specific challenge to the integrity of our relationship with those people. He is entirely correct. The islands were annexed to the United States in 1898. The organic act was adopted in 1900. Section 5 of the organic act provides that—

> The Constitution and all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within said Territory as elsewhere in the United States.

Thereby the Constitution of the United States became the constitution of the islands, and the laws of the United States became the law of the islands.

Section 4 provides that all persons who were residents of the Republic of Hawaii on August 12, 1898, "and all the citizens of the United States who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for 1 year, shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii." Then, respecting the qualifications for the governorship, I read from section 66:

> He—
> That is, the Governor—
> shall be not less than 35 years of age. He shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii.

Therefore, no one could have been Governor of Hawaii under the initial promise of the organic act except as he had resided there for 1 year or more.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I wonder if the Senator would be good enough to yield for the purpose of permitting me to present a conference report on the independent offices appropriation bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very glad to yield in just a moment, if the Senator will let me finish this particular thought.

Mr. BYRNES. That is very kind of the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to continue the quotation from the organic act in respect to the governorship, and to note for the sake of continuity that in 1921 section 66 of the act was amended by inserting, after the provision that the Governor should be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii, the requirement that he shall have resided there 3 years next preceding his appointment, in lieu of the 1-year residential requirement.

Therefore, Mr. President, so far as the organic act stands, so far as the integrity of our relationship with the Hawaiian people is concerned, we stand committed to the integrity of a promise that no Governor shall be sent to Honolulu except a Governor who has been a bona-fide resident of the Hawaiian Islands for a period of 3 years; and when the debate is resumed, I shall ask the privilege of reclaiming the floor to demonstrate how the Democratic Party, in particular, has underwritten that promise for the last 20 years, and that it does not lie within its honest and decent purview to propose to challenge and qualify it today.

I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has presented a conference report, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 9, 25, 26, and 32.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 12, 22, 23, 24, 27, 28, 29, 31, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, and 48, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: " and notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the Administrator is authorized to expend during the fiscal year 1934 not to exceed $2,000 for actuarial services by contract, without obtaining competition, at such rates of compensation as he may determine to be reasonable "; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 8 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out " $13,950 " and insert in lieu thereof " $13,110 ", and in the same line, strike out " $1,800 " and insert in lieu thereof " $1,530 "; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and restore the matter stricken out amended to read as follows:

" SEC. 10. The President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend the extra pay or reduce the rate of extra pay allowed to commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard while on flying duty, and to distinguish between degrees of hazard in various types of flying duty and make different rates of extra pay applicable thereto."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 7, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 30, 34, 43, 44, 45, 46, and 47.

C. A. WOODRUM,
JOHN J. BOYLAN,
W. W. HASTINGS,
J. P. BUCHANAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments numbered 7, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 30, 34, 43, 44, 45, and 46 to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. I offer the motion which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNES moves that the Senate concur in the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 47, with an amendment, as follows:

"Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who served 90 days or more, was honorably discharged from the service, is 55 years of age or over, is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President, shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 per month."

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BYRNES. I do.

Mr. STEIWER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

As most Senators know, it is my purpose at the appropriate time to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House amendment as it now stands, or as it may be amended by the proposal just offered by the Senator from South Carolina. Will it be in order for me to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute after the Senator's motion has been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that it will be. This is in the nature of a perfecting amendment, which has priority over a substitute.

Mr. STEIWER. Very well. If it is so regarded, I will not offer an amendment to the amendment, but will wait until action is taken upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that if the present occupant of the chair is still in the chair, he will so hold.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to raise the parliamentary question that before the amendment is voted upon it may be perfected. After that amendment is once perfected, can a substitute be offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the question—whether that is the case, or whether the substitute should be offered prior to that time, so that they may each be perfected.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, may we have better order? I cannot hear the discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BYRNES. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would seem perfectly clear that the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina brings the House text before the Senate as an original proposition in the first stage of legislation; and therefore, quite obviously, it is open to amendment by the Senator from South Carolina or any other Senator who desires to amend it. The substitute would clearly be in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I raise the parliamentary point that the substitute amendment can now be offered, and that it does not have to await a vote on or a perfecting of the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina. I much prefer to have that procedure followed. I believe it is in order. I propound that parliamentary question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that a substitute may be offered now or at any time before the motion of the Senator from South Carolina is finally disposed of; but a perfecting amendment would have to be voted on first, before the substitute would be voted on. Therefore, nothing would be gained by offering it at this time.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will yield to me, in view of what has just been stated by the Chair, I should like to make the necessary offer.

At this time, Mr. President, I offer, on behalf of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and myself, an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina in the nature of a substitute for the proposal agreed to by the House as an amendment to Senate amendment numbered 47. I ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator offers a substitute for whatever there is after it is perfected.

Mr. STEIWER. No, Mr. President. I am offering this as a substitute for the House language; but in view of the ruling just made by the Chair, I take it that it may be considered prior to the consideration of the proposal made by the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senator misunderstood the Chair. The Chair held that notwithstanding the substitute might be offered now, all perfecting amendments must be voted on prior to the vote on the substitute. Therefore there is nothing to be gained by offering the substitute now, although the Senator may offer it at this time and have it pending and voted on after the amendments have been voted on.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, do I understand correctly that the ruling of the Chair is that, after accepting the perfecting amendments offered by the Senator from South Carolina, we may then vote on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, although it may contain provisions totally contrary to those in the House provision accepted by the Senator from South Carolina?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to propound another parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. After the motion offered by the Senator from South Carolina, and the offering of a substitute, I take the parliamentary position to be that the vote will come on whether or not the substitute shall be adopted, before the vote comes on the question of the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would have to rule that the Senator's position is not well taken.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to make only a very brief statement as to the amendment I have offered.

The purpose of this amendment is to give the Senate an opportunity to vote upon the so-called "House compromise", plus an amendment which I have offered, and which includes the assurances made by the President in his letter to Representative CROSSER, the chairman of the special Veterans' Committee of the House during the consideration of this measure by the House.

I think the Senate is familiar with the House amendment, with the provision caring for directly service-connected cases, with the provision that the presumptives shall be continued upon the rolls until October, and that in the meantime a special committee, a majority of which shall not be connected in any way with the Veterans' Administration, shall look into those cases, and determine which should remain upon the rolls; and with the further provision that if, in October, the inquiry has not been completed, those whose cases have not been examined shall have their cases continued by the President until such time as they are examined.

Then there was another provision, which is not included in the Steiwer amendment, as I understand it, but which is in the House amendment, and which is to the effect that as to all of those cases making claims for insurance, for compensation, for allowances, for emergency officers' retirement pay, under the old law, and which cases, by the provisions of the Economy Act, were discarded, are revived, and the Veterans' Administration is authorized to consider those insurance cases, cases for pensions, and cases for allowances and benefits, upon the evidence in the files of the Veterans' Administration, and adjudicate them.

The Senate is familiar with the other provision, because it is contained substantially in these two measures.

In the House amendment there was no provision as to the Spanish-American War veterans. The House did have before it the letter of the President addressed to Mr. CROSSER, in which the President stated:

I give you the assurance that if the Congress sees fit to substitute the language attached hereto in lieu of the Connally amendment I will issue a regulation which will give some assistance to the Spanish-American War veterans who are 55 years of age or more, substantially disabled, and who are in need.

Because of the peculiar conditions surrounding the Spanish-American War and Spanish-American War veterans I want to emphasize that the assurance given in this letter and the action which I shall take pursuant thereto must not be considered as a precedent for veterans of other wars.

In the amendment I have offered I have written the language of the President with this exception, that instead of the words "substantially disabled", which would leave to the Veterans' Administration the determination of that question, the specific provision is "50 percent disabled." In the course of the debate in the House, veterans who represented the House stated that that was the understanding with the President. I wrote it into the law instead of letting it remain in the letter.

In the letter of the President no amount is specified, the statement of the President being that he would give assistance. In this amendment it is specified that the assistance shall be not less than $15 per month. The effect of it is this, that every Spanish-American War veteran 55 years of age or over, having a disability of 50 percent, whether service connected or not, will be restored to the rolls at $15 per month.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Please permit me to finish this statement. According to my information, there are but few of those veterans under 55 years of age, because of the years which have passed since 1898 and 1899. Therefore this includes practically all the Spanish-American War veterans.

The effect of the adoption of this amendment and of the House compromise would be this, that since the issuance of the first regulations agreed upon and issued by the President, the President has issued additional regulations, which increased the amount to be paid to veterans for pension benefits approximately forty-five to forty-seven million dollars. By the adoption of the House amendment, plus the amendment I now offer, approximately $50,000,000 additional will be added to the amount to be paid to veterans, so that as a result of the President's regulations and this action, the veterans would receive $100,000,000 more than they would have received under the regulations first issued by the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I will yield first to the Senator from Texas, who first asked me to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I defer to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BYRNES. Then I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. There is one clause in the Senator's amendment which seems to me to be objectionable from a practical standpoint. I am not opposing the Senator's amendment, particularly if this clause shall be stricken out. In addition to a veteran being 50 percent disabled and being 55 years old, and having the other disabilities mentioned, there is this language in the amendment as I heard it read, "and if in need, as found by the President." That is extremely indefinite. It seems to me that we have heretofore put nothing in the pension laws similar to that, "if in need, as found by the President." Of course, everybody knows that the President cannot look into these cases; somebody must do it for him. I wonder why that language is put in.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the primary reason is that it is contained in the letter indicating the agreement that was had between the Veterans' Committee and the President; but I know the reasons for that, and I will inform the Senator, because that is what he wants to know.

First, my information is that, as a result of the provisions written into the economy law as to non-service-connected totally disabled cases, the question of need is involved. If not, certainly it is in the regulations. But the reason behind it was that if a Spanish-American War veteran is 55 years of age, is 50 percent disabled, and has an income of five or ten or twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars a year, he is one of the few who is well to do.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that is the point I should like to call to the attention of the Senator. Somebody has to decide whether that kind of a man, 50 percent disabled, and 55 years old, who has an income of a thousand dollars a year, is in need or is not in need. It would depend upon the opinion of some person who looks into the matter as to whether that man was in need or not. I can see how one man might be much more than 50 percent disabled, much more in need, than a man who was just barely 50 percent disabled. If the Senator wants to put it on the basis of the income, then we ought to write in the law as we did years ago in reference to Civil War veterans, a provision that if a man has a net income of a certain amount he should not be entitled to the pension. But these words "if in need" are indefinite, almost meaningless, it seems to me. It depends on a thousand things, and no two men would agree, probably, as to when a man was in need and when he was not or to what extent he was in need.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, of course, that is the difficulty in connection with the provision. We would all agree that, as to the man who has an income and who is not in need and who is suffering from a disability which is in no way connected with the service, Congress would not be very zealous about providing a pension for him. It is difficult to write into the law, I admit, a principle which could be followed, unless we went to the income-tax figures.

The language in the President's letter was "who are in need." I have added to that language the clause "as defined by the President." I know that the Senator from Nebraska would say, as we have heard so often, and with considerable force, that the President cannot do all of these things and that it would be left to some other person. If the language were left simply "who are in need", certainly the Veterans' Administration would determine the question. Because I hoped that that might not be done, I specifically provided "as defined by the President", because I know that we have a letter which was written by the President, and it is a matter to which he has given and would give consideration. What guiding principle should be laid down to determine the need could be better decided by him than by the Congress, in my opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me the Senator's own remark is convincing; it looks to me almost like an impossibility. No two men would agree about the question. If we are going to pay pensions only to men who do not have sufficient incomes on which to live, if we are going to put that principle into the law at all, then it seems to me we could do it definitely by saying that any man with an income of a thousand, or fifteen hundred, or two thousand dollars, should not be entitled to the pension; in other words, provide that the veteran may draw a pension if he has a net income of less than $2,500, or something of that kind. That would be definite. It would not be difficult to prove. It would apply to all cases alike. I do not know that I should like to have it put in. I would rather not have anything in the nature of a pauper's oath required of a pensioner; but if we are to determine that one of the things necessary to be shown is that he is in need, it ought to be so definite that it would apply to all applicants. We administered that kind of a statute in our pension law several years ago in relation to widow's pensions.

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly it would be more definite. The only difference is, I willingly concede, that whereas I have sought to make every other provision in the amendment definite, as to that I have said, "in need as defined by the President."

Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. CUTTING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Texas first asked me to yield and I yield to him. Then I will yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas desires to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina as to the scope of the word "disabled." As I understand the Senator, the word "disabled" is not restrictive, but includes any disability from any cause, whether it can be traced to service or otherwise in the case of Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. BYRNES. Absolutely; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is clear that it has that implication and will receive that construction?

Mr. BYRNES. Not only has it that implication, but it is the intention of it, and it specifically says that any veteran whether his disability is service-connected or not benefits under this language.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not a question so much about the veteran as it is about the disability—whether it includes disability from any source?

Mr. BYRNES. There is no doubt about that, either in language or in intent.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. As I read the amendment which the Senator has presented, it is subject not only to the criticism which the Senator from Nebraska makes but also to the further criticism that the 50-percent disability is to be "defined" by the President.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico is in error. I think the Senator must have a copy of the amendment as it was first drafted, when it contained different language, because the amendment offered specifically uses the words "50 percent disabled."

Mr. CUTTING. That is what I say. The amendment reads "is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President."

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. So that the only Spanish War veterans who would get any benefit from this amendment would be those whom the President may define as being, first, 50 percent disabled, and, secondly, in need. What class of veterans will be embraced under this amendment is absolutely impossible for any one of us to determine.

Mr. BYRNES. O Mr. President, I regret greatly that I cannot follow the Senator from New Mexico at all. In the first place, the amendment reads, "is 50 percent disabled, and in need"; but, even if it were not so, it is true that as to what constitutes 50-percent disability certainly someone must decide, and, of course, it will be decided not by the President but by examinations that are made. I repeat, the degree of disability must be determined by someone; and who would determine it?

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator's construction of the amendment is exactly the same as my own.

Mr. BYRNES. No; I have made clear that the amendment does not say what the Senator suggests. It says, "50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President." I go on to say that when we come to consider the language as to a veteran who is 50 percent disabled, someone has got to determine the degree of disability; and necessarily that will be determined by the representatives of the President; the doctors who are appointed to determine disability in all other cases will have to determine it in these cases. It cannot be determined by the Senator or by the President; it will have to be determined as a result of some evidence showing disability.

Mr. CUTTING. O Mr. President, I beg to differ with the Senator. We could quite easily write into this amendment exactly which veterans we intend to keep on the rolls. We could write such a provision as is contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. We could write such a provision as is contained in the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] which we adopted the other day, providing that veterans who are now on the rolls, unless for some reason they should be ruled out, shall be retained. Here we adopt a perfectly vague thing. "Fifty-five years of age or over"; that is the only definite thing, I submit, in the Senator's amendment.

Fifty percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President.

I do not care at all whether the words "as defined by the President" in this amendment are grammatically connected with 50 percent disabled; the fact still remains, as stated by the Senator, that the President or the President's agencies will determine whether or not a man is 50 percent disabled; and that, to my mind, from long experience with the Veterans' Bureau, completely removes any substantial benefit which any veteran can obtain from this amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, there is not any question as to the fact that the amendment provides that as to those between 55 and 62 there must be a 50-percent disability, and that under the legislation with which the Senator is familiar veterans over 62, regardless of disability, will receive a minimum of $15 a month.

Mr. CUTTING. Can the Senator give us any definition of what is meant by the words "50-percent disability"?

Mr. BYRNES. They mean what they say—50 percent disabled—and that must be determined by the doctors who examine a man upon the evidence submitted by the individual in each case. The officials charged with the administration must determine that, just as disability is determined by the administration in all other cases.

Mr. CUTTING. Exactly; and a man who is now rated at 100 percent may under a new rating of the Veterans' Bureau be rated 10 percent. That has been done repeatedly since the passage of the Economy Act.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Could not that be cured by writing into the amendment the words "now rated at 50 percent disabled"?

Mr. BYRNES. I can very well see that a Spanish-American War veteran who is not now rated and becomes disabled when he is 56 or 57 years of age, or 6 months from now, would become entitled to the pension provided; and I do not believe that the suggestion of the Senator from Washington would remedy the situation he has in mind.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I prefer not to yield again, because I want to finish my statement.

My purpose in presenting this amendment, with the request that the Senate consider it at this time, is that the Senate may have an opportunity to pass upon the House amendment with this Spanish-American War provision, which is the provision agreed upon, as I have stated several times, by the Veterans' Committee of the House and the President. I know that we all have our views about this legislation; I doubt if there are any two of us who could agree upon all its provisions; I know that we have heard many cases that appeal to our sympathy; we have heard stories that have caused us to believe that certainly the first regulations adopted by the Veterans' Administration and approved by the President were too harsh; and, in an effort to remedy that situation, such Members of the House as Representative PATMAN, of Texas, Representative BROWNING, of Tennessee, and others whose names I do not now recall, but who have been through the years demonstrating their sympathy with and interest in the ex-service men of the United States in the hope of reconciling the differences, and in the hope of bringing about legislation that would result in really accomplishing something for the veterans, agreed to this compromise, and it was adopted by the House. Under it, as I have stated, veterans will receive $100,000,000 more than they would receive if we had nothing but the first regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. President, we may as well be practical about it. If this amendment shall be adopted, and go to the House, the House will adopt it, in my humble opinion; and, if it shall be adopted by the House, and shall go to the President, the President will sign it, and the veterans will receive $100,- 000,000 more than they would have received under the first regulation. I believe this is the practical thing to do. By the amendment relief is granted in the case of the Spanish-American War veterans under 62, which reaches a complaint that has been made against the House amendment. If we really believe that we should compromise our differences and do something that we know will meet the approval of the House and of the President and give relief to the veterans, this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield the floor.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

Mr. BYRNES. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator state what is the present draft upon the Public Treasury for pensions of Spanish-American War veterans? Will he also state what would be the draft upon the Public Treasury for Spanish-American War veterans under the regulations adopted by the President; and will he also tell us what would be the draft under his amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I am sorry that I cannot answer any question except the last one. Under the House amendment, as amended, approximately $50,000,000 would be the amount. That is the best estimate of the Veterans' Administration as to the amount that will be paid as the result of the adoption of the House amendment plus the amendment I have offered.

Mr. WALSH. The amount that is now paid to Spanish-American War veterans is about $125,000,000, is it not?

Mr. BYRNES. My recollection is that it is something over $100,000,000, but I do not know the exact amount. The statement I have made is that the House compromise——

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. In the bill which was passed during the latter part of the last session the item providing pensions carried for the Spanish-American War pensioners of all classes of approximately $124,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I thought. Will the Senator from South Carolina state what appropriation would be required to meet the regulations issued by the President without this amendment? Surely somebody ought to know what that amount would be.

Mr. BYRNES. Without this amendment, I cannot say at the moment what appropriation would be required, and it is difficult to estimate the cost of this amendment, but the best estimates we can obtain are that the adoption of this amendment would add six or seven million dollars, anyway, to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. WALSH. That is, the President's regulations approximately reduced the appropriation for Spanish-American War veterans from $125,000,000 to about $40,000,000, and this amendment would increase it about six or seven million dollars.

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know about the $40,000,000.

Mr. STEIWER. That is approximately correct, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. BYRNES. I will ask the Senator to wait a moment. The only figures I have are as to the effect of the adoption of the amendment of the Senate. I wanted to know from the Veterans' Bureau the cost of the House amendment plus this amendment, and that is given at $50,000,000. So, by the adoption of the amendment, we would add $50,000,000; and, of that amount, approximately six or seven million dollars would go to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. CUTTING. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question, if he will yield.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may we have for the RECORD now the figures showing how much the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico proposes would add to the appropriation?

Mr. CUTTING. That was just the question regarding which I wished to consult the Senator from South Carolina. I merely want to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

Mr. BYRNES. I shall be glad to answer it, if I can, although I have yielded the floor.

Mr. CUTTING. I merely want to say that I understood the Senator from South Carolina to say that the adoption of the House amendment, with the addition of the amendment which he has suggested, would add about $100,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstood me. I said that the regulations last issued by the President, revising those previously issued, added approximately $45,000,000 to $47,000,000; that the House amendment plus the Spanish-American War veteran amendment would add approximately $50,000,000; so that the total added, not by this amendment but by the liberalized regulations last issued and this amendment, would mean $100,000,000 more than the regulations first issued.

Mr. CUTTING. How can the Senator possibly make any such estimate? It will be realized that the entire substance of the House amendment is that presumptive cases are all going to be reviewed on their individual merits by special boards according to a set of standards which the Senate of the United States has not been furnished. Unless the Senator from South Carolina has information which the rest of us have not, either as to the manner in which those boards are going to perform their duties or as to some other instructions about which we do not know, how can he possibly tell what cases will be validated, what cases will be thrown out, and as a consequence how much money will be spent?

Mr. BYRNES. The only answer to the question is that manifestly, under the language of either the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico or the House compromise, which provides for the examination of presumptive cases, any estimate must depend upon the action in those cases. The Senator asked how I arrive at it. I would not attempt to arrive at it, and I stated, and have stated several times, that solely in order to secure as much information as possible I had asked for an estimate by the Veterans' Administration. That estimate is the amount I have given to the Senate.

The criticism which the Senator makes would, of course, be valid, and it would likewise be valid against any estimate made as to the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, which provides for review of presumptive cases. Any amount determined would rest upon the judgment of the Board under either amendment. It can be nothing but the best information possible, and when it was given to me it was stated that it was nothing but an estimate based upon the best thought that could be given the subject.

Mr. CUTTING. I appreciate the candor of the Senator from South Carolina. What he says is perfectly correct, and for that reason neither the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] nor I have attempted to estimate the necessary expenditures which will be made either under this amendment or the other. I prefer to determine the question on the grounds of justice and fairness rather than the precise amount of money which will be spent under one or the other arrangement.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand it, we are going to adopt the Byrnes report and then consider the Steiwer-Cutting amendment. If I understand the parliamentary status, we let him perfect his amendment and then we offer our amendments. That is my understanding.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. REED. I have been trying to get the floor to make an inquiry on just that point. I am a little concerned about the parliamentary situation. The motion of the Senator from South Carolina is to agree to the House amendment with an amendment which he proposes. Ordinarily I should have thought that if the amendment were acted on affirmatively, then any substitute would be foreclosed and could not be offered thereafter. I understand the Chair, however, to rule that the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] would then be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. REED. May we, for the purpose of removing all doubt, because the present occupant of the chair may not always remain in the chair, have unanimous consent that substitutes for the House amendment as amended shall be in order after action has been taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I say that there is not the slightest necessity for that. The Senator from South Carolina has the right to have his amendment perfected. After that has been done, as stated by the Senator from Louisiana, the question then will arise between the Steiwer-Cutting substitute and the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina as perfected. I should not be willing to agree that substitutes may be offered. That might prolong debate indefinitely. Unquestionably the substitute that has been offered is in order, and no question has been raised upon it.

Mr. REED. If that substitute——

Mr. LONG. I decline to yield further at this time if I can occupy the floor in my own time long enough to explain the situation to the Senator from Pennsylvania. We have already settled that question. This is only perfecting the House amendment. All we have before the Senate now is the matter of perfecting the House amendment. I am anxious to do that, to go ahead and go through the formality of allowing the Senator from South Carolina to perfect his amendment, and then let us come along with the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and go through with it. It would seem to me that we are arguing out of turn. There is no objection to perfecting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rose some time ago to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] or the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] as to how many pensioners, how many veterans, how many widows of veterans, and how many dependents, are now on the pay roll as the result of the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I regret that I cannot give the Senator the information.

Mr. GORE. Can the Senator from Oregon do so?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not pose as an authority upon all phases of this question. I understand, though, that there are approximately 250,000 Spanish-American War veterans. I am not advised concerning the number of widows and dependents. That depends on the number of children in the families, of course.

Mr. GORE. I think we are all as desirous of being just and even generous to the veterans of the Spanish-American War and their widows and dependents as to those of any other war.

Mr. President, I saw the statement the other day that during the Spanish-American War there were killed in Cuba 272 American soldiers. There were 272 killed in Cuba; 107 died of wounds received in battle; 288 others died of casualties not connected with their service. There were 379 American soldiers who lost their lives in combat or as a result of wounds in Cuba during that war. It is indeed true that 4,795 died as a result of disease. These figures were furnished me by the War Department. The Senator from Oregon has said there are 250,000 pensioners who are Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. STEIWER. No; Mr. President. I said there are 250,000 veterans. I did not attempt to state the number of pensioners.

Mr. GORE. I was referring to the Senator's recollection. My own recollection is that there are 192,000 veterans of the Spanish-American War now on the pay roll.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. BYRNES. Since the Senator inquired of me I have made some inquiry, and I am informed there were not 250,000, but 190,000, approximately the number stated by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield for a question?

Mr. GORE. Yes; in just a moment. As I understand it, the veterans of the war in the Philippines and the Boxer rebellion are classified as veterans of the Spanish-American War so far as the pension roll is concerned. As to the number of casualties occurring in the Philippines, I do not know. As to the number of pensioners resulting from the war in the Philippines, I do not know.

Now I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My inquiry is, What was the total number of soldiers engaged in the Spanish-American War?

Mr. GORE. That I am unable to answer.

Mr. BYRNES. The information I have is that there were 250,000 Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is, at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But that does not answer my question at all.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator mean the number mustered into service?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the statement of the Senator from Oregon, as modified by the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from South Carolina, to the effect that there are 190,000 Spanish-American War veterans on the rolls, is correct; but my inquiry is how many soldiers were actually engaged in the Spanish-American War? Of course, during the 35 or 36 years that have elapsed since the war a great many of them have died.

Mr. GORE. I do not know how many men were actually landed in Cuba.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know how many were actually landed in Cuba, but I want to call attention to the fact that the term "Spanish-American War" as used in connection with the pension laws likewise includes the Filipino insurrection and the Boxer rebellion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I still ask how many soldiers were engaged in the Spanish-American War? The statement of the Senator from Missouri comprehends as well the Boxer rebellion and the Filipino insurrection.

Mr. HATFIELD. There were 250,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Only 250,000? So we have now 190,000 veterans receiving pensions when there were only 250,000 soldiers, all told, engaged in the Spanish-American War. That is the most astonishing statement that has been made in connection with the matter! [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I make no statement on the Senator's consternation, but I did wish to point out that there are 192,000 pensioners on the rolls now. The annual expenditure on account of the Spanish War, including the different classes of pensioners, amounts to $124,000,000. I merely wish to make the point that the Government has been just, as it should be, has been generous, as it should be. It has not been niggardly toward the veterans of the Spanish-American War. It should never be niggardly toward the disabled and deserving veterans of any war.

Mr. GORE subsequently said: Mr. President, I know a citizen of my own State who is reputed to be worth a million dollars or more. He is a Spanish War veteran. He is receiving a pension of $30 a month. Somebody inquired of him why he sought and accepted such a pittance. His answer was that it went as a payment on his Federal income tax.

As to that class of people I think that it is not unreasonable to ask that they make a showing that they need the bounty of their Government, and that we ought not to tax our overtaxed citizenship in order to provide a pension to men who are in that situation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator brought out a few minutes ago the figures as to Spanish War veterans and pensioners. I have just been advised through the Pension Office, on the authority of Director Morgan himself, that the number of veterans of the Spanish War and the Philippine campaigns was between 400,000 and 425,000. That was the number. A good many of them have died. Less than half of that 425,000 have been pensioned.

Mr. GORE. I stated that I thought it was three or four hundred thousand. I did not have the figures. I was speaking of those on the pension roll.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that a large number of those who were mustered into the service never left the shores of the United States?

Mr. REED. That is true; but most of them were given typhoid in very unhealthy camps.

Mr. KING. As to that, I do not agree with the Senator. Many of them were sent to California, and lived in almost the most salubrious climate in the world.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the camps in Florida were shocking.

Mr. KING. I said California.

Mr. GORE. Part of my statement was based upon literature issued by the Spanish War Veterans' Association. I think it is only just to them that the statement itself, coming from their organization, should be printed in the RECORD. I ask the privilege of doing that, if I can lay my hands on it, as well as the figures furnished by the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DATA BY WAR DEPARTMENT

Information furnished by the War Department relative to the Spanish-American War:

Navy-Marine Corps (period of Apr. 21 to Aug. 12, 1898)

DATA BY SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

In the following statement appears a summary of statistics pertinent to the United States military forces:

WAR WITH SPAIN

Duration of war: April 21, 1898, to April 11, 1899; active hostilities ceased August 13, 1898, pursuant to the terms of a protocol signed on the previous day.

Troops engaged: 280,564 officers and men, of whom 223,235, including 10,017 commissioned officers and 213,218 enlisted men, were volunteers. The other 57,329 individuals, including 2,346 commissioned officers and 54,983 enlisted men, served as members of the Regular Army.

Casualties (not classified by components):

Killed in action	498
Died of wounds	202
Total battle deaths		700
Died of disease	5,423
Died by accident and other causes	349
Total		5,772
Total deaths		6,472
Wounded, not mortally		2,961

The foregoing figures cover the period of the duration of the War with Spain. Inasmuch as fighting with the Filipinos was already in progress on April 11, 1899, and troops were being enrolled and sent to the Philippine Islands, it is practically impossible to furnish accurate statistics on either the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection separately. The figures given, however, are based upon the most reliable data available.

PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION

Duration: April 11, 1899, to July 4, 1902, except in the Moro Province, where it ended July 15, 1903.

Troops engaged: 126,468 officers and enlisted men, of whom 50,052, including 2,185 officers and 47,867 enlisted men were volunteers, and 76,416, including 1,882 officers and 74,534 men, were members of the Regular Army.

Casualties (occurred during the period of fighting with the insurgents, Feb. 4, 1899, to July 4, 1902):

Killed in action	777
Died of wounds	227
Total battle deaths		1,004
Died of disease	2,572
Died by accident and other causes	589
Total		3,161
Total deaths		4,165
Wounded, not mortally		2,911

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, now that I have the floor in my own right, I desire to come back to the matter that I tried to elucidate.

It is perfectly evident from the statement of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that he has a different understanding from that which was announced by the Chair. The Senator from Arkansas states that the substitute, or substitutes—because any number of them may be offered—must be acted upon before final action upon the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina. I thought I understood the Chair as having announced the exact contrary of that ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order that the Chair may clear up the situation which he tried to clear up a while ago, when the Senator from Pennsylvania was not in the Chamber, the Chair will state that he is treating this amendment of the House as if it were an amendment on the floor of the Senate. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina is in the nature of an amendment to that. It is a perfecting amendment; and all perfecting amendments must be disposed of before a substitute is in order to be voted upon, although it may be offered and pending.

The Chair ruled that after the amendment of the House had been perfected, either by the motion of the Senator from South Carolina or by other amendments to it, it would then be in order to vote on the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER].

Mr. REED. I was concerned, then, because of the language used by the Senator from South Carolina in making his motion. It was that we agree to the House amendment with an amendment offered by him. That, as I understand from the Chair, is to be separated into two questions: First, shall the Byrnes amendment be accepted? Next, shall the House amendment, as amended, be agreed to?

Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not of the opinion that that necessarily takes two motions, although it would be in order to vote on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to agree to the House amendment, as amended; but the Chair held, and the Chair thinks it is according to rule XVIII, that notwithstanding the language of the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, the effect of it is to adopt a perfecting amendment, after which a substitute for the entire amendment, as amended, is in order.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that the practice here in the Senate, and also in the House, is to vote on concurring with an amendment as one motion. That has been the practice all along; but in this ruling, where there is to be a substitute offered, it is ruled that it is not one motion but that we will vote first on the motion to concur, and after that comes this substitute.

With that ruling made clear by the Chair, I did not raise any point of order at all.

Mr. REED. I was concerned about it because I did not want the Senator from Oregon to be foreclosed from a chance to have his amendment tested. The Chair has made it very plain now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has heretofore assured the Senator from Oregon that he will not be precluded from offering his substitute.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I desire to say just one word before we take a vote on this motion.

I do not mean to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina. The reason why I do not wish to oppose it is because I do not think it in any measure takes away any rights which veterans have at present. I do not think it affects the present situation at all.

So far as veterans over 62 years of age are concerned, the Spanish-American War veterans are taken care of by an Executive order issued on June 6, which restricts their cuts to $15 a month rather than $6, which was the case under the original administrative orders issued under the Economy Act. In addition, we have a vague clause here that a veteran over 55 years of age, and who is defined by somebody as being 50 percent disabled and in need, shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 a month. We cannot tell that that is going to add a single veteran to the pension roll; but as it cannot do any harm I certainly shall not object to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I merely wish to direct a question to the Senator from South Carolina, if he will permit me. Because of the confusion in the Chamber I did not hear the first part of the explanation made by the Senator. I thought I understood him to indicate that this proposal was in keeping with the letter which the President has sent to the House of Representatives. Am I right in that?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes, Mr. President; I made substantially that statement.

Mr. STEIWER. In other words, this proposal is one approved by the White House but not included in the action of the House of Representatives in the amendment agreed to there.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, that is substantially what I stated. I have sought to write into the law the statement made by the President in his letter to Representative CROSSER, of the House.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. LONG. Everybody understands this matter, and more than two speeches have been made by both these Senators on something nobody is voting against. I make the point of order that they cannot speak more than twice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am very happy that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has presented this perfecting amendment. It helps a little. But it is not enough. I want to see the Spanish War veterans and all the other veterans given more liberal treatment. We may well adopt this perfecting amendment and then, certainly, we will give favorable consideration to the Steiwer amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the proposal which I sent up in behalf of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and myself was not stated. May it be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert the following:

The President is hereby authorized under the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, to establish such number of special boards (the majority of the members of which were not in the employ of the Veterans' Administration at the date of enactment of this act), as he may deem necessary to review all claims (where the veteran entered service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disability is not the result of his own misconduct), in which presumptive service connection has heretofore been granted under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, wherein payments were being made on March 20, 1933, and which are heretofore or hereafter held not service connected under the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress. Members of such boards may be appointed without regard to the Civil Service laws and regulations, and their compensation fixed without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. Such special boards shall determine, on all available evidence, whether service connection shall be found in such cases, and shall in their decisions resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the veteran. For the purposes of this section the granting of service connection in such cases shall not be based upon the requirements of regulation no. 1, part I, subparagraph (a), or instruction no. 2, regulation no. 1, issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, it being the intent of this section to preserve service connections as granted by section 200, World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, title 38 of the Code (other than disability resulting from the claimant's own misconduct), unless affirmative evidence clearly discloses that the disease or disability had its inception before or after the period of military or naval service, and was not aggravated thereby.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the decisions of such special boards shall be final in such cases, subject to such appellate procedure as the President may prescribe, and, except in those cases where the special boards shall find that the award was based upon fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error not less than 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, therein shall continue to October 31, 1933, or the date of special board decision whichever is the earlier date: Provided, That where any case is pending before any one of the special boards on October 31, 1933, the President may provide for extending the time of payment until decision can be rendered. The President shall prescribe such rules governing reviews and hearings as may be deemed advisable. Payment of salaries and expenses of such boards and personnel assigned thereto shall be paid out of and in accordance with appropriations for the Veterans' Administration. In all cases where service connection shall be preserved under the review herein provided, not less than 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, shall continue, and the determination of service connection in such review shall be final in all cases: Provided, however, That in the event of a change in the degree of disability of any such veteran the amount of compensation payable shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect prior to March 20, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced by more than 25 percent.

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the compensation being paid for directly service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error, in receipt of compensation on March 20, 1933, be reduced more than 25 percent: Provided, however, That in the event of a change in the degree of disability of any such veteran the amount of compensation payable shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect prior to March 20, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced by more than 25 percent; and in no event shall death compensation, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error, being paid to widows, children, and dependent parents of deceased World War veterans under the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, on March 20, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, whether the death of the veteran on whose account compensation is being paid was directly or presumptively connected with service; except that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply with respect to veterans residing outside the limits of the continental United States and its territories and possessions, or with respect to any veteran who is being furnished hospital treatment, institutional, or domiciliary care by the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, if such veteran has neither wife, child, nor dependent mother or father.

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the pension paid to veterans of any war prior to the World War, or to any widow and/or dependent of such veterans shall not be reduced more than 25 percent of the amount being paid prior to March 20, 1933.

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 17, title I, Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any claim for yearly renewable term insurance on which premiums were paid to the date of death of the insured and any claim for pension, compensation allowance, or emergency officers' retired pay under the provisions of law repealed by said section 17 wherein claims were duly filed prior to March 20, 1933, may be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration on the proof and evidence received by the Veterans' Administration prior to March 20, 1933, and any person found entitled to the benefits claimed shall be paid such benefits in accordance with and in the amounts provided by such prior law: Provided, That the payments hereby authorized to be made shall continue only to include June 30, 1933, and only one original adjudicatory action and one appeal may be made in such cases. Where a veteran died prior to March 20, 1933, under conditions which warrant payment of or reimbursement for burial expenses, such payments or reimbursements may be made in accordance with the laws in effect prior to March 20, 1933: Provided, That such claim for payment or reimbursement must be filed within 3 months from the date of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] for the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 47, as amended.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate for any considerable time in connection with this matter; but I do desire to make a brief explanation of the parliamentary situation, and of the chief differences between these proposals.

In the first place, the amendment I have sent to the desk, which has just been read, is substantially the same proposal which was first sent to the desk last Saturday evening, and was printed and available to Senators upon Monday, and was argued out at considerable length here upon that day. To this proposal we have added a paragraph, referred to by the Senator from South Carolina as being one of the desirable paragraphs of the House amendment, that is, the paragraph at the end of the amendment which refers to yearly renewable insurance, and to certain other matters helpful in the administration of veterans' affairs.

The practical effect—and with this I think all Senators will agree—of the adoption of this proposal offered here now by the Senator from New Mexico and myself is to substitute it, so far as the Senate is concerned, for the amendment which was agreed to, and which was offered in the first instance by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. That amendment, as Senators remember, restricted cuts in service-connected compensation of veterans of the World War and pensions of veterans of the Spanish-American War, to a maximum of 25 percent.

The proposal agreed to by the House does not make that restriction. The proposal agreed to by the House provides for a review of the presumptively connected cases. It provides that a pension shall be paid to those pensioners until October 31, 1933, or until the review is completed, whichever is the earlier date with respect to any particular case. After that date, under the House provision, there would be no protection written into the law for presumptive cases; that is to say, the board could remove them from the pension rolls or leave them on; but it is perfectly clear that under the House provision the great majority of the presumptive cases would, after this time of grace between now and October 31, go off the rolls entirely. I do not propose to debate that feature of the matter at this time, but I invite the attention of Senators to that part of the House proposal, and I think they will concur with me; indeed, in the conference there was no controversy upon that question, and I understand that the Solicitor of the Veterans' Administration takes the view that the language employed in the House provision extends no ultimate protection to presumptive cases, except with respect to that limited number who under the liberalized proof will be able to establish direct service connection.

Mr. President, I argued at length here, and shall not repeat at this time, that the House proposal does not extend protection from extreme cuts even in the direct service-connected cases, and that is due to the peculiar language used in that proposal, which does not specifically and in plain terms limit the cut, but it does limit cuts in the rates of compensation payable to the veteran.

The proposal offered by the Senator from New Mexico and myself makes this provision perfectly clear by using language over which no one can quibble. It provides, so far as the directly service-connected cases are concerned, that no cut shall be more than 25 percent of the amount being paid on March 20, 1933. There are numerous other differences in these proposals, but those are the chief ones.

Mr. President, I want to submit to the Senate that it is better to accept the substitute offered by the Senator from New Mexico and myself, because that proposal with respect to the great class of World War veterans enables the Veterans' Administration to protect the interests of the United States Government. The Connally amendment does not do that, and when I make that remark I do not do so with the idea of reflecting upon the Senator from Texas. His amendment was prepared in the confusion of a very hotly contested debate. He wrote it on the floor so rapidly, as I recall, that the clerk could not read his handwriting, and the Senator had to go to the desk and interpret the amendment for the clerk so that the Senate might know its purport. In the haste of rushing it along nothing was provided to protect the Government against the claim of a pensioner even though he enlisted after the armistice, even though his disability came from his own misconduct, even though his disability was established in the first instance by fraud or by mistake on his part or on the part of the Veterans' Administration.

I submit—and in this I hope Senators may accept my view—that if controversy is to be had with the House of Representatives, or if difficulty should ensue later between the Congress and the President, it is altogether better, as it is altogether fairer, that we should protect our Government by agreeing to language which would meet these contingencies.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question, because I want to be clear about the situation. There are no World War willful-misconduct cases on the rolls except a relatively few cases of permanent and total disability?

Mr. STEIWER. Such cases, of course, are not supposed to be on the rolls, but I am not prepared to say there are not any. I have heard it claimed that there are such cases, and I did not want to put myself in the position, or put the Senator in the position, of agreeing to a provision which would protect such cases if they are on the rolls.

Mr. GEORGE. There are no cases of fraud on the rolls now, where it is known, at least?

Mr. STEIWER. The Veterans' Administration and the Pension Bureau have been reviewing cases for a long time. Some cases of fraud have been eliminated. I am not prepared to say how many cases of fraud remain, but undoubtedly there are many, and the claim is made constantly that there are such cases, and I should like to protect the Senate from taking the position that we are trying to defend those fraud cases.

Mr. GEORGE. Some fraud cases might come in under the Senator's amendment, because they cannot be thrown off until they are found out, but I cannot see the reason for emphasizing the fraud cases, or in case of the World War veterans the willful-misconduct cases, because they are not on the rolls, or are not supposed to be on the rolls now; so that the only substantial difference between the Connally amendment and the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator is in the post-armistice enlistment cases, as I understand it.

Mr. STEIWER. That is one substantial difference.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator another question. because I want to see if I understand the purport of his amendment. Under the amendment offered by the Senator all presumptive cases are to be considered as service connected?

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, no, Mr. President. Does the Senator mean in the proposal made by the Senator from New Mexico and myself?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. No. It is recited that it is the intent to connect those cases, but it opens to the Government the right to disconnect any case which, in fact, is not related to the war. If there is evidence that the case is not connected with the war, of course it will be separated from the rolls. Our proposal does have the effect, as the House language does, to place the burden upon the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Without regard to the presumption, the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Mexico permits the elimination of the presumptively service-connected case if the Government is able to show that it is not service connected?

Mr. STEIWER. That is what we attempted to write into the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. The House has substantially the same thing, except, as I get the Senator's contention, it is not so favorable to the veteran.

Mr. STEIWER. That is correct; and may I say to the Senator that my office advised with Mr. Roberts, of the Veterans' Administration, and he takes the same view of the matter which I have taken, and which the Senator from New Mexico has taken. He told us that under the Steiwer-Cutting amendment the conditions for the service connection of presumptive cases would be more favorable than under the House proposal.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is true.

Mr. STEIWER. That many would go off, but that a majority would stay on; and under the House proposal, a great majority would go off the roll.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is correct in that statement, and I am not attempting to controvert it. The point I am getting at is that under the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Oregon, and under the House amendment, all of the presumptive cases may stay on or a large number of them could go off, depending on administration.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I am disposed to feel, under the language employed in the House amendment, that very few of the presumptive cases would be retained. The provision in the House amendment is that the review shall be made upon the available evidence, and that the Board shall make its decision on that evidence. I am afraid it excludes any benefit of presumption, and excludes from consideration the fact that the case may now be service connected under existing law. It appears to me to be a direction to the Veterans' Administration to consider these cases de novo, on such evidence as they may find. Although it places the burden upon the United States and provides that the veteran is entitled to the reasonable doubt, it still leaves the case in such shape that I believe the House proposal will not assure any substantial protection to that great class of veterans who are more entitled to consideration than any other.

There are, I am told, 33,000 totally disabled World War veterans connected by presumption with the pension rolls at this time. That includes neuropsychiatric cases, even where such cases are violently insane. It includes the tubercular cases, permanent and total; the active cases, that great group of ghastly, heart-rending cases which I am sure the Senator would not want to leave unprotected.

I want now to add a little further answer to the Senator's earlier question. He said there were no fraud cases on the rolls. He meant, I think, that there were no fraudulent disability cases which are properly being paid pensions, and that there were no misconduct cases properly being paid pensions. I think that is true.

However, the claim is made constantly that fraud cases are on the rolls, and of course they ought to be reviewed; they are being reviewed. Under the Connally amendment the United States would be precluded from reviewing them; and the under the proposal offered by the Senator from New Mexico and myself, that review would still go forward, and the interests of the Government could be fairly protected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me suggest to the Senator that the so-called "Connally amendment" is not now before the Senate; we have substituted, on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, the House amendment with his amendment, and so the issue here now is between that and the motion of the Senator from Oregon. The Connally amendment is not before the Senate at all.

Mr. STEIWER. That may be technically correct, but the Senate if it desired could reject the substitute the Senator from New Mexico and I are offering; it could vote down the proposal which the Senator from South Carolina is offering and thus go back to the Connally amendment if it desired to do so. I seek to prevent that result.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is in error. We have already adopted the proposal of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator's statement would depend possibly upon the parliamentary ruling, which has already been disputed three or four times today. I do not want to be embroiled in that question at this time.

The amendment which the Senator from New Mexico and I have offered is a substitute for the entire house amendment as perfected; that is to say, it permits the adjudication of certain classes of pending claims, including the yearly renewable term insurance; it takes care of the Spanish-American War veterans; it takes care of everything that is dealt with in the House proposal; and I submit that it takes care of them in a better way than has been attempted in the House amendment.

I wish to make perfectly clear—and I can rest my case on this—that the House proposal contains no restriction upon cuts in the directly service-connected disability cases. The language employed in it may look as though it does, but every lawyer who has examined it, so far as I know, has reached the conclusion that it does not extend such protection.

The question is, Does the Senate want to protect disability cases of direct service connection by providing that no cut shall be more than a certain percentage? If so, our vote should be "yea" upon this substitute. If we do not agree to the proposal which is being offered by the Senator from New Mexico and myself, we shall be foreclosed absolutely from any opportunity to extend to direct service-connected pensioners protection against ruthless reductions in compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. STEIWER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much more would the Spanish-American War veterans receive under the proposed amendment of the Senator from Oregon than under the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. STEIWER. I cannot answer exactly, but I will give the Senator some idea about it. Under the appropriation bill passed at the last session there was carried for Spanish-American War pensioners approximately $124,000,000, or nearly $125,000,000. After the economy bill had been enacted the President on March 31 promulgated his regulations. The practical effect of those regulations was to cut the total payment of Spanish-American War pensions to a figure of approximately $41,000,000. The saving, as I remember, was around $83,000,000. Subsequently, on June 6, the President modified his regulations, but I cannot state the exact effect of that modification upon the Spanish-American War pensioners. Then we had presented to us the proposal made a little while ago by the Senator from South Carolina and agreed to.

Now, we have the House amendment as amended by the motion interposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

It is said that this additional provision would cost about $7,000,000. I believe this estimate should be under $6,000,000. I surmise that if the substitute of the Senator from New Mexico and myself is agreed to it may add to that total cost something like twenty-five or thirty million dollars. However, I should like to say further, because I do not entertain any illusions as to what may happen with respect to it, that the House conferees are not going to be in accord with us upon that proposition; they will no doubt stand upon their own amendment or upon the amendment as amended by the proposal made today by the Senator from South Carolina. Therefore, in conference no doubt, the figure will be reduced below that contemplated by the amendment as it stands.

I hope that the Senate will agree to the pending substitute, which is identical with the provision in the Connally amendment so far as the percentage of cut in the case of Spanish-American War veterans is concerned, and I hope we may agree to it so as to stand our ground, and that Senators who voted for the Connally amendment will vote for this one now, and if it is found necessary, appropriate concessions may be made in conference.

Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from Tennessee for reminding me of the figures, because I want to refer to them before I conclude my remarks. It was stated by the Senator from South Carolina that under the regulations promulgated by the President on June 6 there was added to the total veterans' compensation something in the neighborhood of $50,000,000. I believe that figure to be correct. It is the figure furnished me by the Veterans' Administration, and I have no reason to question but that it is approximately a correct estimate of the additional cost on account of the regulations of June 6.

The Senator from South Carolina also stated that the House amendment as amended by his proposal would add to the cost another estimated amount of approximately $50,000,000. I think that estimate is somewhere near correct, although it is subject to the criticism made by the Senator from New Mexico; namely, that it depends wholly upon the action of the reviewing boards. Under the language of the House amendment the reviewing boards may, if they please, take a very arbitrary stand reviewing any case. It is difficult, therefore, to estimate the exact amount of cost that results by reason of the House amendment. But, if we assume that those figures are entirely correct, the situation is presented to us in this way: The total cost over and above the low mark provided under the President's regulations of March 31 would be approximately $100,000,000. It might be a little more than that figure. I hope Senators will bear that figure in mind.

The Veterans' Administration estimates with respect to the proposal offered by the Senator from New Mexico and myself that the total cost over and above the cost under the regulations will be about $138,000,000. I wish to restate that in a different way. The estimate submitted to me was that the total cost would be about 90 percent of the cost of the Connally amendment and that the estimate that has been made of the total cost of the Connally amendment was $154,000,000. Senators will remember that there was carried in the bill to provide for the additional cost of that amendment $170,000,000 at the time the bill was before the Senate, or rather, the $170,000,000 was to care for the Connally amendment, the Dieterich amendment, and the Black amendment, the estimated cost of the Connally amendment being $154,000,000.

If that estimate was correct, the 90 percent now estimated as the possible additional cost of the Cutting-Steiwer amendment would be $138,600,000. So, as between the proposition which is contended for now by the Senator from South Carolina and the pending substitute which is offered to it, the outside difference cannot be more than $38,600,000. That is based on the figures of the Veterans' Administration; it is their own estimate, and I doubt if it will not be more than that, but it might well be less. I am contending for the higher figure of $138,600,000, and believe the Senate ought to support the higher figure, with the feeling that we are not going to unbalance the Budget and are not going to make necessary new revenue merely because we add some thirty-five or thirty-eight million dollars to the cost carried under the House amendment.

Yesterday we passed the fourth deficiency bill carrying over $3,600,000,000, as I remember the figure. On the Senate floor there was added $150,000,000 to provide the Government's contribution under the Glass bill for deposit insurance. The Senate voted it after a few minutes' debate and a short explanation. Nobody suggested that the Budget would thus become unbalanced, and nobody argued that additional taxes would have to be levied.

Furthermore, we are now dealing with our friends across the sea, and they are talking about taking away from us in the current payment on their debt something like $70,000,000. From press reports it seems that may be done; but nobody says that is going to unbalance the Budget. We provide appropriations for many purposes, the figures running into the tens and hundreds of millions of dollars, and nobody claims that such appropriations will unbalance the Budget; but whenever it comes to providing money to take care of the disabled veterans who are sick and suffering always somebody says that the money is not in the Treasury and cannot be provided. I should like to accept that challenge today; I should like to see the Senate of the United States accept that challenge and vote for the pending substitute, because we know that, although it will cost the Government something more in money, it will absolutely protect the directly service-connected cases against any cuts greater than 25 percent. We also know that it will keep a great many, though not all, of the presumptive cases on the rolls and that they will not be cut more than 25 percent. We know that protection will be afforded to the Spanish-American veterans; that it will be afforded to widows and orphans of soldiers of those wars; that it will be afforded to all that class that is generally entitled to our bounty at this time, and all this will be brought about under limitations that will permit the Government to clear its records of fraud cases, of misconduct cases, and to make cuts in those cases where the enlistment was after the armistice. The Government will be permitted to enforce its regulations by additional cuts as to those veterans who are outside the United States and other benefits to the Government will be permitted, which in the aggregate will save many million dollars and will still assure reasonably adequate pensions in the most worthy cases.

Mr. CONNALLY obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this moment, in anticipation of the vote, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Cutting	Kendrick	Russell
Austin	Dale	King	Schall

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER].

EXPENSES OF DELEGATES AT WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before saying anything directly upon the matter under consideration by the Senate at this time I want to make a brief reference to an article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune this morning, reading as follows:

UNITED STATES DELEGATES' FAMILIES COUNT PENNIES AT LONDON—UNOFFICIAL ATTACHÉS AT PARLEY CANNOT AFFORD MANY LUXURIES

LONDON, June 13.—Jokes about "Lo, the poor Americans", are being heard around Claridge's Hotel, where the United States delegation to the World Economic Conference is housed.

Families of the delegation attachés and others without Government expense accounts are taking their meals out, and surreptitiously sending out their laundry to be done, to save money.

Official members of the delegation receive special hotel rates, because of the $6-a-day restriction on expenses imposed by Congress, but unofficial members of the party pay the regular rates.

Mr. President, I was not aware that I had voted for anything in the Congress restricting the expenses of our delegates to the Economic Conference to $6 a day. It seems that over in London we are making a bad impression through our delegates in this respect. I read that our Secretary of State, a distinguished former Member of this body, when he arrived in London naturally expected to receive the kind of hand-clapping that greets a foreign ambassador coming here, that some of the delegates were very much disappointed because when they rolled up to the pier in a boat there was nobody there to meet them and because they had to take a hack and go up town and find a boarding house or some place to stay. [Laughter.]

It seems to me that, as good a creditor as we are to England and to France and to the other foreign countries, we ought to be able while our delegates are in London to allow them enough expense money so that they would not be ridiculed by the English people who are today indebted to us for so many billions of dollars that they are unable to pay anything like even a reasonable interest upon the amount. It seems to me, inasmuch as we are over there engaged in determining whether we are going to give the British Government several billion dollars—I am not now announcing that I may not be in favor of whatever they do—that at least we should extend the kind of indulgence to our ambassadors that would enable them to make a decent showing, that at least we ought to give them expense money enough so they would not be subject to this kind of embarrassment and this kind of ridicule.

I have never approved of this kind of penury in politics or in government. Every time a man comes in with his expense account showing that he has spent $10 or $15 a day, there are always speeches in Congress over the question whether it is possible for a man to spend that much money for a day's expenses and what a man could do with $15 a day. For the benefit of some of them I should like to show them what a man can really do with $10 or $15 a day in these cities for traveling. [Laughter.]

Then a good friend of mine from one of the Western States rose here, when we had up a measure allowing 20 cents a mile for Senators and Representatives to come to Washington and return home, and attacked that proposal as if it was a terrible thing, because, he said, a man could actually come here for 3 cents a mile and could return home for 3 cents a mile. Some of us have been taught that Members of the United States Senate had a right to travel in the same customary style that we did when we were ordinary traveling salesmen on the road. We did not travel for 3 cents a mile in those days, if we made several trips back and forth. Of course, we could get underneath on the rods and travel for less than 3 cents a mile, if necessary! [Laughter.]

If I was a party to this penuriousness I want to apologize to the Senate, because I never was aware of the fact that I was voting for any limitation of that kind. I hope that our President and those in charge of the matter will see, at least while our emissaries are in a foreign country dealing with the question of whether or not America can afford to sacrifice several billions of dollars to European nations, that they are supplied with sufficient funds to enable them to live in at least something like the fashion in which they live at home.

HEALTH WORK AND CONDITIONS IN LOUISIANA

Mr. President, before speaking more directly on the subject matter now before the Senate, I have another matter that I want to bring to the attention of the Senate and get into the RECORD, which was brought to my mind by the statement of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] this morning with regard to health work.

In the State of Louisiana we have two charity hospitals taking care of those cases which are being thrown out of Government hospitals. We are having to increase our charity-hospital capacity considerably. We are not able to absorb everything, but I want to state briefly to the Senate what is happening in the State of Louisiana in the way of health work. It will take but a moment.

I have previously told the Senate of the great hospital institution we have in New Orleans. Our second hospital has lately been examined, the charity hospital at Shreveport, and inasmuch as we have seen several articles about Louisiana I want to give the people at large to understand what is happening in the way of hospitalization and health work in Louisiana. I hope that my good friend the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] will be interested enough to notice what I am saying, because all of us read from time to time the health articles of his which appear in the papers.

In the State of Louisiana 5 years ago, before I became Governor of the State, the charity-hospital death rate was 9 percent. We reduced that rate to 3 percent. Out of every 3 cases coming to the charity hospital at Shreveport 5 years ago, we have saved 2 of those lives.

We instituted a treatment for cancer in that hospital, and out of 600 cases of cancer treated since last July 70 percent of them have received a cure of 1 year, and the balance of them are coming back from time to time for treatment. We are in a position to believe that our percentage of cures will not be reduced at all but will be greatly increased by the few years' treatment that will have to be given to those cases.

That is not all that is taking place in this health work in Louisiana. We had in the charity hospital in Shreveport at the time I became Governor 160 patients per day. Today we have in that hospital 500 patients a day. This is our second one. It is not our main hospital.

A few days ago the American Medical Association made an examination and made ratings which, by comparison, will show that the charity hospital at Shreveport led the Southern States in the treatment of tuberculosis, children's diseases, general hospital, and museum, and was even the first and best hospital in all matters and particulars of all the States of the South.

I want to say further that a celebrated authority from Philadelphia, Mr. Chevalier Jackson, who is known worldwide as the greatest man of his time in the treatment of the removal of foreign substances from the air passages of the body and the skull, has decided that he can be of great service to mankind; that the greatest opportunity afforded him is in the charity hospital at New Orleans; and he has connected himself with the Louisiana State University School of Medicine, because he finds it to be a great field, and therefore we will lead in his line in a few days after Mr. Jackson takes charge of that institution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 6, 7, 13, and 14 to the said bill and concurred therein; and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the bill and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 3344) to amend section 14, subdivision 3, of the Federal Farm Loan Act, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] for the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 47, as amended.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I now revert to the pending amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. I want to give a little analysis of the difference between what is proposed in the House amendment, as amended by my friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and what is contained in substance in the Steiwer-Cutting amendment.

The Steiwer-Cutting amendment limits the cut to 25 percent in service-connected cases of the World War. The House proposal limits the cuts in rates, but not in amount. In other words, the Steiwer-Cutting amendment sets a limit on service-connected cases of 25 percent. Those Members of the United States Senate who voted to reduce their own salaries from $10,000 to $8,500 a year, those Members of the Senate who voted to determine whether or not they would reduce their own salaries 15 percent, are now called upon to vote on whether or not they will cut the disabled veterans' compensation more than 25 percent.

In other words, we start with the Steiwer-Cutting amendment agreeing that the soldier who receives $40 a month ought to be cut 10 percent more than a United States Senator or Representative, who receive $10,000 a year. Do not make any mistake about that. The one thing we are going back to our people to explain is how, why, and where in this great drive for economy we saw it become necessary to cut by only 15 percent the salaries of Representatives and Senators and of officials of the bureaus and the departments of the Government, men who are being employed to administer these very laws at salaries all the way from $5,000 to $20,000, and why we saw fit to take the disabled veterans of the World War and refuse to stop their cut even at 25 percent, which, at the very least, is 10 percent more than we were willing to cut our own salaries and the salaries of men employed in the Government at equally high or higher salaries.

That is no. 1. Of course, there is an element of justice in all this.

No. 2: The Steiwer amendment protects many, not all, presumptive cases. The House proposal has no protection to presumptive cases after October 31. Now, do not misunderstand me. The Steiwer amendment does protect a good many presumptive cases—tuberculosis, mental diseases, and things of that kind—which the statutes have adjudged to be certain cases of presumptive injury in line of service.

Under the amendment as amended by my distinguished friend from South Carolina there is no such thing as protection for these presumptive cases after the 31st day of the coming October. The only difference between these is, if it is just to give these presumptive cases the benefit of the law's provisions up until the 31st day of October, then it is just to continue these presumptions after the 31st day of October. We will be meeting back here in January, if there is any extraordinary ground, 60 days after that time, justifying any further change not yet shown to be necessary.

The third point is that the Steiwer amendment limits cuts in Spanish-American War veterans to 25 percent. The House proposal, as amended by the Senator from South Carolina, assures Spanish-American War veterans $15 per month if 55 years of age, and if so-and-so, and if something else, and then if something on top of that. [Laughter in the galleries.] They have to take the pauper's oath to start with. In order for a man who stood on San Juan Hill or died in one of the camps in Florida to have his widow rewarded, or in order for any of these men who stood up during the days of 1898 and 1899, when we sang the grand and glorious song that—

As Christ died to make men holy
Let us die to make men free—

In order for that man to come and get the benefit of this supposed-to-be regulation of the House, the first thing he has to do is to take the pauper's oath. In other words, he has to paint his name in gilded letters on the rolls of the United States Government as being in actual, destitute need of the money before he can get a copper cent under the regulation that is proposed here by the House.

As long as I am drawing a dime from the United States Government I will never make a veteran of a war—a foreign war or a domestic war—go and take a pauper's oath to draw a dime from the United States Government when he was sent to fight for the life and liberty of the country. I will never be one of those who will stand in this Hall of Congress and vote to require the pauper's oath. You can go back and defend it before your people if you want to, and no doubt you will be able to do so; but I shall not have to defend it before my people—that I stood on the floor of the United States Senate, when I was not willing to vote to cut my own salary more than 15 per cent, when I was getting $10,000, and yet voted to take the Spanish-American War veteran off the list altogether unless he is willing to take the pauper's oath. I will not have that to answer for.

Mr. President, I want to stand by the President, but I shall have to stand for the President; and I shall be one of the men who will go out of this Hall of Congress who will be able to stand for the President. I intend to stand for him, Mr. President; but I shall be one of the men who will go out of this body saying that I can stand before the American people because, upholding the arm of my chief, I am unwilling to make the veterans of the war take the pauper's oath and then to get $15 a month—that is wonderful relief!—provided they were enlisted 90 days, I believe it says.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HATFIELD. The total number of Spanish-American War veterans on the roll at the present time is 196,000; 63,000 of them are between 55 and 61. There are 95,000 of them who are over 62.

I thought possibly the Senator would like to have that information.

I desire to call the Senator's attention further to the diseases to which the Spanish-American War soldier was subjected in that period.

Fifty-seven thousand two hundred and four suffered from dysentery. That is, 41.202 percent. Twenty thousand nine hundred and four suffered from typhoid and paratyphoid, or 15 percent of the Spanish-American War veterans.

The total number of Regulars was 57,000, and of Volunteers, 223,000, making a total of 280,000.

Mr. LONG. I wish the Senator would send me those figures in writing. I think I catch the import of the figures. I know that those are not all the diseases to which they were subjected—dysentery and typhoid. They had yellow fever, if I am not mistaken. A yellow-fever epidemic broke out in the Spanish-American War. Maybe I am mistaken about that, but I do not think I am.

I know this: I know that many of those soldiers were quartered down in Florida, and I know that a number of them died down there; and a number of them had smallpox, for instance. My friend from West Virginia does not remind me of that now, but I remember the smallpox epidemic. Why, I know men—I know one man in particular; I probably know a dozen men—who had smallpox in that war. Living through that war was almost an accident when they took the smallpox down in Florida, in the epidemic that broke out down there. I know a man in New Orleans, La. His face is so marked up that you cannot put the end of your little finger on his face and not feel a hole in the man's face that was caused by the smallpox scourge that he went through. He is one of the men who are not on the roll at the present time, I think.

Before reading these figures a little more closely let me give the last point.

Under the Steiwer amendment, generally the protection afforded by the Connally amendment is sustained. In other words, it is generally what they have under the Connally amendment, except that under the Steiwer amendment we provide for the reexaminations. We provide for the correction of any mistakes. We provide for taking off the roll any man whose condition has improved and who has become better. Under the Steiwer amendment, if a man got on the roll who does not belong on there now, we provide that he shall be taken off. Under the House proposal, however, instead of generally sustaining the Connally amendment provisions, they completely surrender, and, with some exceptions, permit cuts without limit.

That is the difference between these amendments.

I shall not read further from these statistics—I understand them—except just to repeat that of the Spanish-American War veterans between 55 and 61 years of age there are 63,000, and over 62 years of age there are 95,000; a total of 158,000.

I did not vote for the economy bill. Seven of my friends from the State of Louisiana who are in the lower House of Congress whom I had the honor to support for election and reelection to Congress last time, and another Member of the House as to whom I took no position either for or against him in his campaign—the entire eight Members of the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana, with the exception of one, voted for the economy bill, along with the balance of those who supported it.

Mr. President, I should have liked to vote for that bill myself in the Senate. I could not see anything to come of it, however, except regulations such as we had. They looked upon it differently. They thought the regulations would be entirely more humane. So did other Members of this body and of that body. I could see nothing to come from it except what did come from it. Therefore I voted against it.

Today, however, we have a chance to correct it. They say the President will veto our action. Mr. President, that is his responsibility. That is not ours. That will then be his responsibility. If we will put ourselves on record in a fair, honorable, legitimate manner to the effect that the Congress of the United States wants to correct the injustices of the Economy Act, any possible veto of our action will be the President's responsibility, and that is his prerogative anyway.

When the Senator from Texas offered the Connally amendment, I did not vote for it; but many of our friends who were voting with us for the Trammell amendment did vote for it because they were persuaded by the argument made by the Senator from Texas that it would mean something that would become law. The Senator from Texas thought that to be true. That was one of the main reasons why he offered his amendment. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas was in lieu of the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. The Senator from Florida proposed to restrict the amount that the compensation could be reduced to 15 percent, leaving the veterans 85 percent. The Senator from Texas added on the Spanish-American War veterans, and provided that none of them should be reduced below 25 percent, under a very eloquent and practicable plea that it might mean, or probably would mean, law instead of a gesture. Many Senators voted for the Connally amendment for those very good and probably sound reasons.

Today, however, we are not even arguing for the Connally amendment. We are offering to correct the matter down to a point that I am informed will mean that the Government will pay the veterans $40,000,000 less under the Steiwer-Cutting amendment than it will pay them under the Connally amendment as written—at least that much. Are we now to go and throw these men off the rolls again?

There are men who stood in front of the line of German soldiers who have been thrown out of hospitals today, gentlemen of the Senate, who have not a nickel in their pockets, and who are so disabled that they are unable to do any work, even though there were work to be had. There are men who have suffered from tuberculosis; there are men who have received shrapnel wounds in the back and in the head; there are men with their wives and their children helpless on the world today because of the rulings that have been made, whose cases are not corrected by this House proposal, which means that they today will have absolutely nothing whatever coming from the Government that is anything like respectable. Then when you talk about going into the case of the Spanish-American War veteran to prove that he was in service a certain length of time, and make him take the pauper's oath, providing which he gets $15, I say, Mr. President—and that is why I read this article—that the Members of the Congress cannot afford to say that. The members of the diplomatic corps cannot afford to say that.

I am not urging a reduction in the salaries of Congressmen. Do not understand me to be even urging that. I never have. When I ran for the United States Senate, I went out before the people of Louisiana and told them that I was running for the job to get $10,000 a year, and that I believed as a lawyer I could make four times that much practicing law in my State, and they knew it. Some man said a Senator ought to be able to work for $10,000 a year. I said, for some gentlemen, sure; but I was not trying to give them that kind of a Senator. I was trying to give them something that would cost them less than it was worth. I was trying to give them a $40,000 man for $10,000 a year. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we have Members of the United States Senate here today who can make thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, or one hundred thousand dollars a year in private life in ordinary times, who are here in Washington, put up in one little old peanut-shell room, sweating out and paying just about everything they get for a little old room and a few victuals in a hotel, with telephone calls back home. That is about all they are getting to be in the United States Senate today. If that costs all our salary, we cannot help it. For that reason I have never been one of the men to come here to urge that these salaries be cut, because if we are capable of discharging the functions of our offices, we are entitled to live in the circumstances in which we could live if we were pursuing the customary vocations of private life. For that reason I have been opposed to the slashes in salaries of Senators and Representatives.

I am opposed to this penurious way in which our delegates go to London, and arrive there under such circumstances that the Secretary of State has to take his valise and light a lantern to find his way uptown. I am opposed to that kind of penurious practice on the part of the United States Government. As it is now, how much more unjust and uncivil is it for us, in what are called "times of stress" when we cannot see fit to reduce our own salaries more than $1,500 out of $10,000, to stand for such cuts in the compensation of disabled veterans. Far more am I opposed to a veteran of the World War having his compensation cut off altogether, or reduced 60 percent, and the Spanish-American War veteran reduced to $6, and then come back with a proposition not to change the status at all except that the Spanish-American War veteran must give his coat of arms, and various and sundry descriptions and painted signs, probably giving the proofs in detail, with several other proofs which he probably cannot give, then add to that the pauper's oath, and then we say, "We will be so liberal to you as to give you $15 more a month." It is too ridiculous and absurd a proposition to talk about.

Mr. President, I love the President of the United States, I love the Members of the Senate and of the Congress, but the time has come, gentlemen of the Senate, to think about the welfare of America for Americans. This is not the Economy League, this is the United States Senate. This is not a resolution being passed at the urge of the Economy League.

Who is the Economy League, which has had us do that? Let us see if I cannot dig that up here real quickly for the benefit of the Senate. I have the information all here.

We whipped this law through Congress, and here was the chief propagandist. We all have been receiving these telegrams from the Economy League not to interfere with the recommendations which have been made and with the cuts which have been made.

"Stand by the Economy League," they say. Stand by the Economy League. Do not let the soldier of Chateau Thierry, or the soldier of the Argonne Forest, or the soldier of the Marne; do not let the man who died with the smallpox in the camp in Florida, do not let the man who walked away from here get compensation unless he takes the pauper's oath and swears that he cannot get along without it, because the Economy League says not to do it. Thirty-five thousand one hundred dollars was raised for this propaganda, contributed by the following persons:

It almost makes me laugh.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, is he the one who wrecked the Harriman bank?

Mr. LONG. I do not know.

E. Roland Harriman; I do not know whether that is the same man or not. He is probably one of the railroad men or bankers, it does not make any difference; one is as bad as the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, in testimony adduced before the Committee on Banking and Currency with respect to the bargain-counter offer made by the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., there were disclosed the following names of well-known people:

Mr. John W. Davis, who bought Alleghany shares to the number of 400, and who bought Standard Brand shares to the number of 5,000.

Mr. Charles E. Mitchell, whose name the Senator will identify, bought on the bargain counter Alleghany shares to the number of 10,000, and 10,000 Standard Brand shares.

Mr. Silas H. Strawn bought of Alleghany shares 1,000.

Mr. Alfred P. Sloan bought 10,000 Alleghany shares and 7,500 Standard Brand shares.

Mr. Bernard M. Baruch bought of Standard Brand shares 4,000.

Marshall Field bought of Standard Brand shares 2,000.

The Harrison Forbes Corporation bought of Standard Brand shares 5,000.

Mr. Arthur Hood bought of Standard Brand shares 500.

There are still others, but these I have identified, and I am able to state to the Senator that all these people are active members of the Economy League, and they helped bring on this effort to crush down the sick, crippled veterans of the wars of the United States.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator for that contribution. I want to say, Mr. President, that we investigated those gentlemen, we investigated, and we deplored what they had done; but they went back to New York City and wherever else they live with their flags flying, and they managed to bring pressure to bear throughout the United States, enough propaganda to have their way in this Economy League legislation, which took the disabled veterans off the pay roll.

I am not condemning the motives of the good men who want to balance the Budget of this Government. I think I have demonstrated completely, to the satisfaction of everyone, in his heart of hearts, whether he admits it particularly or takes time to admit it here, that we have not been at all consistent in our legislation. It was not consistent to take two or three hundred million dollars away from the soldiers and spend $500,000,000 on a sapling bill the next day. That was not consistent. It was not consistent to treat the States and the municipal governments as we have treated them. Down in the State of Louisiana we are today called upon by some means, somehow, to try to find a means of feeding these veterans, furnishing them with medicine, and giving them hospital treatment whenever it is required. Why, I ask the Senate, sitting here as jurors on the lives of the soldiers of this country, should we so discriminate against the soldiers?

I am not one of the soldiers. I was not a soldier, nor was I a man who asked other people to become soldiers. I did not go to any war, and I did not ask anybody to go to any war, and unless called I am not going to the next one, if it is like the last one, and if this is what we are to expect to come from it.

Mr. President, I say to my Republican friends, who have cried so much about President McKinley's bringing on the war with Spain, that there was no reason for that war. We should never have had the war with Spain. It is a matter of historical, public record that at the time the war with Spain was declared over Cuba President McKinley had in his pocket a telegram, acceding to every demand that had been made by the United States Government. But the propaganda and the fanfare throughout the United States had become such that McKinley yielded to that kind of pressure and declared a war that was absolutely useless to this country and something we will never get over.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think the Senator has misquoted President McKinley. The Senator will recall that he had stood like a rock against declaring war, and not until the sinking of the Maine, was the sentiment in the country so powerful that he yielded; but the President certainly did not bring on the war.

Mr. LONG. Mr. McKinley stood against the war for a good while and then gave in. He had no more right to give in when he did than he had at any other time. The reasons President McKinley gave for not giving in and declaring war before were just as sound at the time we went into the war as they were before. True, the sinking of the Maine brought on that war to a large extent. It gave the propagandists the material they needed to work up the sentiment. There never was any proof that Spain was responsible for the sinking of the Maine. There has not been any such proof to this date, and for a Nation to go and plunge hundreds of thousands of lives into the vortex of blood and murder, which such war is, for something that never was proved, never has satisfied the calm and sane judgment of the American people.

I must get beyond this, however, to what I say is a matter of history, as shown in the documents in the archives of Government. I did not believe we should have gone into the last war. I believe I have been vindicated in that attitude more and more by the declarations we have heard on both sides of this Chamber, when we have heard our leaders deplore the stand taken by our allies in refusing to come forward and repay the loans we made to them.

I do not commit myself on that question. I may be in favor, I do not say I will not be, of letting our debtors loose on some of the loans we made, when the time comes, because if I am convinced that they cannot pay those debts, I am not going to try to keep entangling the United States over them another day until war comes. It may become necessary, I do not say it will not, that we will have to disentangle ourselves by not trying to force something we cannot collect. I do not know what my stand is going to be on that question. But in view of the reports which have been made, the attitude of the foreign countries certainly has not been pleasing to the statesmen on either side of this Chamber. With our Government getting ready to relieve the debts which others may owe us, with Congress getting ready to reach economy by clipping off 15 percent from the salaries of those getting $10,000, how are we to go back, whether the war was justified or not justified, to the man who stood and fought our battle, to the soldier who took our place, and say to him, "We who stood in no shadow of danger, we who did not sleep underneath a canvas flap in the nighttime, not knowing whether we would ever again come back to our homes, are going to treat in this way those who volunteered as candidates to fill unmarked graves 3,000 miles across the sea—those who came back home, after all the misery and suffering and the apprehension, with their fallen comrades lying beside the foes in foreign lands, who came back here maimed and crippled, disabled for life, facing a friendly Congress, they hoped, who sent them across the seas to fight"? Are they to be told they can get $15 a month if they will take a pauper's oath?

Mr. President, I am not willing to stain the record I have on this subject. I was not in favor of the war, but I will stand for justice and respectable treatment to those men, and as one who faces his proportionate and practical responsibility regardless of my attitude at the time, I feel that our obligation to these soldiers is such that we cannot afford to do anything except what is respectable for an honorable citizen to accept under like circumstances.

Mr. President, I shall take but another minute or two. I see other Senators who want to speak. I have made my stand clear on the matter. It is all right to know what we are doing.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to have the record kept straight. I do not want to interfere with anything the Senator wants to say, but he made a statement about McKinley, and then when I thought I had corrected him he did not seem to accept my correction.

Mr. LONG. I accept all the Senator has said. On the contrary, the Senator from Ohio does not dispute anything I have said.

Mr. FESS. Let me make this statement. This body sent to Cuba two distinguished Senators to study the conditions in the reconcentrado camps under the administration of Governor General Weyler. One of those men was John M. Thurston, of Nebraska, and the other was Redfield Proctor, of Vermont. Senator Thurston made the report on this floor. It was so graphic that after it was made, there was no question as to what this body and the other body would do.

I recall this very dramatic incident. He stated at the close of his address, after making the report—

> I speak at the command of lips that are now silent in death—

Referring to his wife, who died on the way home. He stated that he made her a promise that he would come to the Senate and that he would tell the truth about what he had seen. When that report and the report of Senator Proctor were submitted there was not any power in the White House to prevent the declaration of war; and the blame ought not to be put on President McKinley.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not put it on President McKinley except in this respect—that he yielded to the fanaticism of the people. There are times when executives should not yield. I remember that there was a man sentenced to be hanged in a town in my State, and I was called on to sign a warrant to hang him in 4 days. I refused to do it. It had been the custom in that section to give a condemned man 30 days before he was hanged, and I would not treat his case in any other way. They almost burned me in effigy in the little town of Rayville because I would not do it. But they had to wait until the 30 days had expired; and at the next election, for the first time in my life, I carried the town of Rayville.

I remember another case of such fanatical pleas. I remember when in the State of Louisiana every woman's club and almost every other society, from one end of the State to the other, met and adopted resolutions because I was hanging the first woman ever hung in the State for murder. I remember, Mr. President, that it was hardly safe to risk doing it, but the hanging took place just the same. If the sentiment of the majority of the people at that time had prevailed, there never would have been another hanging in the State of Louisiana. There have been many Governors who have had many worse experiences than that to contend with, such as the case in Iowa sometime ago, when the citizens took a judge out because he would not agree not to sign any mortgage-foreclosure papers, and they were going to murder him on the spot; but he stood his ground and enforced the law, and was upheld by the Governor. So Governors in other States have been confronted with similar situations. In one instance a judge was told if he did not refuse to issue warrants for people who refused to pay their taxes, which he had no right to do under the law, he would face the consequences, but he stood his ground, because it was his right and duty to stand his ground, and not yield to what seemed to be the fanatical probabilities and possibilities of the moment.

I do not blame Mr. McKinley, but the uncontroverted facts are that we need not have gotten into that war, just as I do not think President Woodrow Wilson had any more right to go into the war with Germany than McKinley had to go in the war with Spain. I have got records sufficient to substantiate both those statements to my satisfaction, and I think to the satisfaction of others. I do say that Mr. McKinley had on his desk or in his pocket at the time that war was declared—and I admit that there was a pressure behind him to have war declared—a cable from Spain agreeing to every demand of the American Government. The Spanish people knew they could not whip America. That war was an absolute farce; there was not any war to it. Of course, my friend, Theodore Roosevelt, got up there and rode down San Juan Hill and got a big name over it, but there was never any more war to that thing than if we went into a war to whip Cuba tomorrow. The thousands of soldiers used and the millions and millions of dollars that were spent in that war were wholly unnecessary, and if McKinley had stood his ground long enough, I do not believe there would have been anything to it.

President Wilson withstood all the talk when the Germans sunk the Lusitania. We did not go to war over the sinking of the Lusitania, although two thirds of the people of the Nation think the sinking of the Lusitania brought on the war. On the contrary, he stood it down and said we were not going to war because of any such thing as the sinking of the Lusitania. It was not the sinking of the Lusitania that brought on the war. That was not the ground for bringing on the war, just as the sinking of the Maine did not bring on the war with Spain; the war was brought on on entirely different grounds, because we never did have any proof, and we have not got it now—not a scintilla of proof is in the files and records of this Government today that Spain was responsible for the sinking of the Maine. Nobody knows it today.

Mr. President, I would have concluded except for what my friend from Ohio mentioned. I hope we will vote for the Steiwer amendment. I do not care if it is offered by the Republicans; it is not a Republican matter or a Democratic matter with me. The Republicans gave the votes to pass the economy bill; so it is not a partisan matter. I and others voted against the economy bill, and it was necessary to line up for it most of the Republicans over there, although some of them did not vote for it.

Politics makes men feel differently. I remember the first time I ran for public office I naturally began to feel kindly toward my fellow men, and as it gets nearer election time naturally the Republicans will feel kindly toward the soldiers, and I am glad to see that. If they had stood with us on the economy bill we would not now have it; but we are glad to have them with us at this time. There is more cheering over one who is lost and has returned than over millions who are already saved.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if we could pass a retroactive statute and repeal the Spanish-American War and abolish the World War, of course we would not be confronted here today with this very difficult and vexing question. If I could satisfy a hungry soldier with a speech, probably it would not be necessary to give him a pension; if we could heal his crippled limbs with a little oratorical ointment, he would not ask for compensation; but, Mr. President, we are faced today with a very practical question. That question is, What are we going to do with the disabled soldiers? Are they going to get something or are they going to get nothing except speeches? The speeches may tickle the soldiers' ears, but they carry little nourishment to his stomach. I repeat, we are confronted with a very practical question.

As the Senate knows, some days ago we had the Trammell amendment here restricting the cut to 15 percent. The Senator from Texas offered a substitute providing a limitation of only 25-percent cut. That amendment was offered in the best of good faith. I have now no apology to make for that amendment.

In spite of what the Senator from Oregon says about that amendment, it simply accepted the status quo which the Congress had already established by law and limited the cuts on service-connected cases to 25 percent and provided a similar restriction on cuts in the case of the Spanish-American War veterans. Under the Connally amendment a saving of $306,000,000 annually under the expenditures estimated under the old law would have resulted. I had inserted in the RECORD for June 12, 1933, a statement from the Veterans' Bureau setting forth that state of facts. The savings under it would have been in excess of the 25-percent cut in expenses promised in the Democratic platform. That amendment was adopted by the Senate by the deciding vote of Vice President Garner. It went to the other House. Then what happened? We all know that the House of Representatives and the President together worked out an amendment which both admitted was the best possible that could be framed under the circumstances. The House adopted that amendment in lieu of the Senate amendment. Today the Senator from South Carolina moves to concur in that House amendment with a further amendment with relation to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. President, we are given assurances upon what I regard as absolutely unimpeachable authority, if the Steiwer amendment should be adopted by the Senate and should be concurred in by the other House, that a Presidential veto will strike down this whole bill.

Then what will be the situation? We shall come back to the Senate and pass a joint resolution continuing the present appropriation for another year, and the veterans will be right back where they were under the economy law without any legislation whatever.

We must face this question. It is not a theory; it is a reality that we must face. Shall we accept a compromise which we know will be approved by the House of Representatives and by the President and get some real relief for the veterans, or shall we content ourselves by making speeches, playing to their passions and to their sensibilities, and, while we are doing it, drive into their vitals disappointment through failing to get what we can assure them by an agreement upon this amendment? We are, I repeat, confronted with a condition, not a theory; and, as the author of the original Connally amendment, I propose to support the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to accept the House amendment, with a further amendment which will give added protection to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Some Senators on the other side and some, perhaps, on this side have said that the reforestation workers, in case they meet with accident, will draw more compensation than will some of the disabled soldiers under the Spanish-American War or the World War pension legislation. That may be true. Of course, it is silly and ridiculous to think that a reforestation employee 25 years old, who may stick a splinter into his body in the forest and thereby suffer some injuries, should draw larger compensation than a disabled soldier; but the reforestation matter is not before the Senate; there is nothing we can do about reforestation now. By our votes today we shall not correct that; we shall not modify that.

Let me say, Mr. President, that the salary cut of 15 percent is not before the Senate. We shall not change that by our votes today; it will remain the same; it has got nothing to do with this question. The question is whether or not the Senate is going to use judgment instead of passion; whether the Senate is going to use common sense instead of bombast. The question is whether we are going to prove our devotion to the soldiers by getting something that he can eat and getting something that he can wear instead of feeding him and tickling his ears with a speech and letting him go tonight without something to eat and without something to wear. That is the issue here today.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to my very good friend and a devoted friend of the veterans, the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CUTTING. Did not the Senator make substantially the same speech on June 2 in support of his own amendment, and was it not largely for that reason that the Senate voted for his amendment as against the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]?

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot assume that the Senate was influenced by what the Senator from Texas then said, but he did make somewhat the same argument.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator did say, "Let us get something that we can get and not take a chance of not getting anything at all."

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from New Mexico that when I first took the floor I said that I had assurances as to the statement then made, and I thought I had authority for it. I thought the amendment would be accepted, but it was not. Today, however, I have authority which is more direct, more certain. The Senator from New Mexico has seen in the press and perhaps has talked to others who are closer to the President than am I, and I am sure that the Senator from New Mexico has information to the same effect, that if the Steiwer amendment should be adopted and agreed to by the other House the measure will be vetoed and the soldiers will get nothing more than the economy bill, except the sympathy of the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. CUTTING. I want to say in the first place that I have no such information. I am not arguing with the Senator on that basis. I do recognize the force of the Senator's argument when he says: "If we can get something for the veterans, let us take it." I hope, however, before the Senator concludes that he will show us something in the House provision that really gives some benefit to the service men of the country which will not be provided if the House amendment shall not be adopted.

If the Senator will yield to me for a moment more, what I wish that he would elucidate is this: Is there anything in the amendment compelling the President to do anything which he will not do if we do not adopt the House amendment, anything which he has not authority to do if we do not adopt the House amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has covered a great deal of territory with his question. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does he not agree that the House amendment gives the veterans more benefit and more guaranty than they now have under the existing regulations?

Mr. CUTTING. Except with regard to widows and dependents, I think there is no word in the House amendment which is in any way mandatory on the executive branch of the Government. I think it allows the President to do a great many things which he already has authority to do.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, the President under the Economy Act can do almost anything. He could put all these men back on the rolls 100 percent, but the Senator from New Mexico knows he is not going to do it.

Mr. CUTTING. No; but the President has said he is going to do certain things. If we do not adopt the House provision, he can still do those things which he has promised to do, and the House amendment does not compel him to do one single additional thing.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from New Mexico that while the President, irrespective of the House amendment, could still do all of the things he is authorized to do under the Economy Act, the House amendment does guarantee to the veterans certain things. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] gives added assurance to the veterans in addition to the House amendment. We are voting in something more than is contained in the House bill.

I have no contest to make with the Senator from New Mexico. I want to pay my tribute to the Senator for his earnestness and his sincerity and his zeal for the soldiers. I am not saying that the amendment gives the soldiers all they are entitled to. I think my amendment adopted the other day was a fair and just amendment, but we cannot get it; we cannot secure it. We cannot secure the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] or the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. When Senators are confronted with that kind of situation what are we going to do? Are we going to refuse all aid because we cannot get exactly what we want?

Did the Senator ever vote for a bill in the Senate which he approved in every line and in every paragraph? No Senator ever had that experience. I have been in the Congress some 15 years. Legislation is a matter of accommodation and compromise. We cannot write every line in a bill or every paragraph. We have had to do the best we could. If I thought we could get more than the House amendment and the Byrnes amendment, I would stand here and fight for it. But, whether other Senators are convinced or not, I am convinced that we cannot get it, that it would be vetoed, and I am assured by those who have a right to speak that if we adopt the Byrnes amendment and the House amendment, the House will concur, the President will approve the bill, and the veterans will get something instead of oratory and enthusiasm. The veteran wants sustenance and not buncombe.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Assuming that the President does veto the bill, then he is still in position to do everything provided in the Byrnes amendment and everything provided in the House amendment as the bill now stands. So that as a matter of fact the veterans would not lose anything if we voted for the bill and passed it and he vetoed it, because the understanding is or it has been repeatedly said that he intends to do all the things that are in the House amendment and in the Byrnes amendment, anyway.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator's philosophy is correct, there is no use to do anything but leave it alone. The President can do and he will do all the things that he may desire, but we are trying to get the assurance of a statute as far as we can. The Senator from Montana would leave it all to the President, so why vote for the Steiwer amendment? If we kill it, will not the President have the power still to do all that is in that amendment? Of course he will. That answers the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think it does at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. Everybody else thinks so. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. What we are trying to do is to write into the statute something that will give the President authority to do certain things. We were promised certain definite things by the administration and by the Veterans' Bureau. When the Economy Act was passed, we were told what they would do. The Veterans' Administration did not keep their word. We are trying to see that something is written into the law that will absolutely give the veterans partial justice at least. The Senator says that if we vote for the Cutting amendment we are just giving the veterans buncombe.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I did not say that at all.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr CONNALLY. I said "oratory and buncombe", meaning a form of oratory of which the Senate has heard a great deal. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. That is a difference without a distinction. I submit that the President, having promised the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate that he is going to do what is in the House amendment, the least he can possibly do and be consistent would be to put it into operation. Some of us are not satisfied with that. We want to write into the law that he shall do more than that. It seems to me we ought to express our views in the matter, and not simply be guided by the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. CONNALLY. We expressed ourselves the other day on the Connally amendment. The Senator's idea of a compromise is that the President says, "I will do the following if you will agree to it." The Senator's idea is "No; we will not agree to it, but we are going to insist on the President doing it anyway." The President agreed to accept the House amendment, and it was the understanding of the House that it would go into the law if the Senate approved it. The Senator from Montana wants the President to abide by a unilateral promise and then try to exact something more. That is not the idea of the Senate of the United States with reference to a compact or agreement.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not understand it as the Senator does. As a matter of fact, the Byrnes amendment is simply writing into the law what the President said he was going to do with reference to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; it is not. It goes farther than that.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from South Carolina at least made that statement to me. Possibly the Senator from South Carolina knows more about it than I do. I am saying that is what he said to me, that this was simply writing into the law what the President had said he was going to do.

Mr. CONNALLY. In the form of a letter?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. He did not say that in a letter. He said he was going to give them aid and relief, but there was nothing definite about it. This is proposed to make definite what was uncertain. This is proposed to write into the law that which was nothing more than a letter before.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Let me see if I clearly understand the Senator from Texas. He said that the President made a certain agreement with Members of the House, and that if the Senate is not willing to abide by that agreement the President on his side is not bound to abide by it. Either the President feels that the agreement which he reached was a just one, or he does not. Surely the Senator from Texas does not imply that the President of the United States, after reaching an agreement which he thought was a just one, would thereupon modify the terms of it on account of some action or failure to act on the part of somebody else?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; the Senator from New Mexico is not warranted in making those assumptions. What the President agreed to do was this: He said, "If Congress writes into the bill these words, I shall approve it." He made concessions, just as I am compelled to make concessions here today by voting for the Byrnes amendment and the House amendment. I do not mean to say that I am satisfied with what is being done. Men make concessions. The President has made concessions. The bill carries $100,000,000 more than would have been carried under the Economy Act. I think it is an unfair position for Senators to take to assume that because the President has said, "If you make that into the form of a bill, I will approve it" that he is thereby morally bound to do that without the enactment of such a measure, while Senators withhold on their part the right to go ahead and get more if they can, and then if they cannot get more hold the President to some fanciful or imaginary compact.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. STEIWER. I understand the Senator to say that the President's proposition was that if Congress wrote the House amendment into law, extending certain protection to the veterans, he would carry out those instructions. Is that what the Senator said?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I understand he is to do anyway if it is the law. He would approve the bill.

Mr. STEIWER. Therefore the Senator is basing the virtue of his claims for the President on his agreement to obey the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have a tender affection for the Senator from Oregon, but he does himself no credit in making a reference of that kind to the President. He could veto the bill, of course. The President is not going to violate the law.

Mr. STEIWER. I was not really referring to the President. I was referring to the anomaly presented by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas has more anomalies than he has anything else, for that matter. [Laughter.] The point I was trying to make was that the President agreed to approve the bill; and if he does approve it, it will become the law.

Mr. President, we have got to realize that the Senate of the United States, though it may be the greatest deliberative body on the globe, is not the only body on the globe. There is a body over at the other end of the Capitol which under the Constitution has just as much power as the Senate when it comes to legislative matters.

The President, over at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, when it comes to legislative matters, has more power than either body unless we have two thirds of both bodies to overrule him. Those are the facts. There is no use ignoring them. They cannot be ignored. They cannot be brushed out of the way. The President and the House of Representatives have already agreed as far as they could agree. In addition to that agreement the Senate is securing a still further concession and we are faced with the dilemma of taking what we can get or voting it down and getting nothing for the soldiers except a veto.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if he did not feel, when he voted for the economy bill, that the administration would treat the veterans fairly?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say frankly to the Senator from North Dakota that we had assurances that the Economy Act would be administered in a liberal and generous fashion, and we relied upon those promises. There is no doubt that Senators relied on such assurances, although I believe the Senator from North Dakota did not vote for the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; I did not vote for the bill. I do not like to legislate that way.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then the Senator was not defrauded; he was not deluded; he was not deceived.

Mr. FRAZIER. If the Senator was mistaken with reference to the economy bill, how does he know that he is not mistaken on the proposal of the President to veto the bill if this amendment is adopted?

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course the Senator from Texas may be mistaken. He is frequently mistaken. He was mistaken when he thought the Senator from North Dakota was going to ask a question that would elucidate the matter and bring forth additional information. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, that is the situation and we cannot ignore it. We need not try to fool ourselves or delude ourselves with the idea that we are going to be able to go back home and tell the soldier, when he gets no additional relief, "I made a speech for you. Yes; I made a long speech. I sent it to you under my frank at route 3, box 47." But, Senators, when his compensation does not arrive, when his Spanish-American War veterans' pension is not delivered, he is not going to be able to subsist very long on a franked speech. He will not be able to subsist long on all the oratory which may be poured out here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. CUTTING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very much interested to know what the Senator from Texas thinks the veterans about whom he is talking will get from the House amendment, if it is adopted?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has read the House amendment, has he not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I have.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator knows just as much about it as the Senator from Texas, if he has exercised his usual astuteness.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Texas had reached the same conclusion after reading the House amendment that I have, he would not be making the speech he is making now. The reason why I asked the Senator the question is this:

The Senator says, in a nutshell, that the choice here is between getting something for the veterans and getting nothing for them. I should like to know what there is in the House text which gives any assurance that any substantial benefit is to be derived for the veterans from it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have not time now to analyze the House amendment in all its details. If the Senator from Wisconsin, with his analytical mind and his intellectual powers, has read it and does not know what is in it, I cannot pause now to explain it to him. Let me say to the Senator, however——

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Tell me just 2 or 3 things, if they are in it, that are any guaranty, that are any assurance to the veterans who have had this cruel and harsh treatment under the Economy Act that they will receive any substantial change under the House text.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the delegation in the House representing the soldiers were just as good friends of the veterans as the Senator from Wisconsin. They labored over this matter for a week or 10 days. They were convinced that the House amendment was a substantial improvement over what they secured under the Economy Act. Now, in addition to the House amendment, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has an additional amendment giving security to the veterans of the Spanish-American War. When I say "nothing" I mean nothing in the way of new legislation; nothing except the old Economy Act, which the Senator from Wisconsin denounces, and yet which he is willing now to leave in full force and effect because he does not get just exactly what he wants in the way of an amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the contrary, Mr. President, I am as anxious as the Senator from Texas to get tangible results. I state to the Senate frankly, however, that I have read the House text, and I have read it again; I have listened to the analysis of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], who has been a student of these matters; I have listened to the analysis of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]; and I state to the Senate that I am unable to find a single tangible assurance contained in that language which will give any substantial improvement to the veterans if it is enacted. I think, in all fairness, that as long as the Senator from Texas is putting it here as an issue between something and nothing, the Senate is entitled to have the Senator from Texas tell us just exactly what that "something" consists of.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will tell the Senator something of it right now.

Under the Economy Act and the regulations, more than half of all Spanish-American War veterans go off the roll entirely. The Senator understands that; does he not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right. More than half of them go off entirely. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina all veterans who are 55 years of age and above, and who are 50 percent disabled, will stay on the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Provided they take a pauper's oath, and after they have been rated by the Bureau.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right; but the Senator wanted to know. Now I am telling him, and he is not satisfied with the information.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a moment I shall yield to the gallant Senator from Oregon.

Let me repeat to the Senator from Wisconsin that at present half of them go off the roll entirely, while under this proposal we can keep on the roll all of those above 55 years of age—and that covers nearly all of them, because a man 20 years old at the time of the Spanish-American War is only 55 now. The average age is 60 years. So when we keep on the roll all of the Spanish-American War veterans 55 years of age and above who are as much as 50 percent disabled, even though the veteran does have to prove that he is in need, if he is in need had he not better prove it and get something than to stay in need and get nothing?

I do not favor the need clause—no. I never have voted for it in the Senate. I have voted against it; but if we are to have it, it is better than nothing. It at least gives those who are in need something, and those who are not in need probably can get along without it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas was challenged just now by the Senator from Wisconsin to state one thing of value to the veterans in the proposal for which he is contending. He singled out the thing which I assume he regards as most important.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has no right to make any assumptions. If the Senator heard what the Senator from Texas said——

Mr. STEIWER. I will not make that assumption then; but he singled out a thing which he thought worthy of presentation to the Senate, and he told the Senator from Wisconsin that one thing of value to those veterans was the assurance carried in the amendment that Spanish War veterans over the age of 55 would get a certain protection. Let me restate to the Senator, and then I shall no longer trespass upon his time, just what is given to those veterans.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator will hurry. I desire to conclude my remarks.

Mr. STEIWER. If they are over 55 years of age, if they make a pauper's oath, and if they are 50 percent disabled, they get $15 a month. If they are 62 years old, they are protected by the Economy Act in any event. So the only people the Senator from Texas is talking about are those between 55 and 62 years old. The Senator knows that that is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Oregon proceeds to deny something, and then he proves it. He pretends to show that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina does not give any security, and yet he admits that it does save the men above 55. What do they get now? Under the Economy Act more than half of them go off the rolls with nothing, and those above 62 get $6. Is it not better to give the majority of them at least $15 than to cut more than half of them off and give the others only $6 a month?

Mr. STEIWER. They can starve at either rate.

Mr. CONNALLY. And under the Senator's plan of having the bill vetoed they probably will. I yield now to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. STEIWER. Is the Senator accusing the President of that? Is the Senator saying that if the Congress does not restrict the President's power he is going to starve those men?

I want the Senator to answer that question if he will.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator wants me to answer which question—the one about the President, or his own question? Has the Senator got himself confused with the Presidency?

Mr. STEIWER. Not at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. What was the question? I shall answer it.

Mr. STEIWER. I know the Senator wants to be fair.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do. That is the reason why I am pausing to have the Senator state what the question was.

Mr. STEIWER. If the Senator's blood is not stirred too much with excitement in his declamation, I know he wants to be fair.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope so.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator has just said that if we do not succeed in passing some limitation, if we do not succeed in changing this law in some way so as to bind the hands of the President with respect to the curtailment in pensions, these men are going to starve anyway. What conclusion does the Senator want to draw from that statement?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas said that under the present Economy Act the men above 62 were guaranteed only $6 a month. I submit that no man can live on $6 a month. I want to give them more. Does not the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STEIWER. I certainly do.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield now to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, speaking for myself, I desire to say that I think the need clause in the pension bill is a very good one. It is a humane clause, because the less money is given to those who do not need it the more money can be given to those who do need it; and for non-service-connected disability I think the veteran should make out a case of need. In these times when the taxpayer is taxed on his moving pictures, his radio, his automobile, his gasoline, his automobile tires, his income tax, and hundreds of other taxes, and when 12,000,000 people are out of employment, and we are appropriating money to furnish them with employment, we ought not to give away money to non-service-connected disability veterans unless there is need for it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for his illuminating contribution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator has told me what is in the Byrnes amendment to the House amendment, but I hope he is going to go on and tell us what is in the House text.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right; I shall tell the Senator. If he could not find out from reading it, I shall tell him.

In addition to what the veterans have now, they have the guaranty that a board will be appointed, and that these cases will be reviewed by a board not connected with the Veterans' Bureau, an impartial board which will pass upon these presumptive cases. That is not guaranteed at present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What happens after the 31st of October?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will not let me answer one question until he propounds another. Did not the Senator from Texas answer correctly? Is not that a guaranty that these men have not under the present law?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I want the Senator from Wisconsin to answer that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, these boards are set up, as I read the language under the law, with the task of reviewing all of these presumptive cases; and any case which is not acted upon or has not been disposed of by the 31st day of October goes off the roll.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; and on the other hand they go off the roll on the 1st day of July under present conditions, and yet the Senator cannot tell the difference between the House provision and the existing law!

Under the existing law and regulations all these presumptive cases go off the rolls on the 1st day of July. Under the House bill they are continued to the 31st day of October. In the meantime these boards are set up to review all cases. If that does not answer the Senator from Wisconsin, I do not know how to answer him. He challenged me, and said that the House provision gave no added benefits. If that does not reply to him, I cannot answer him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I asked the Senator to show us the substantial benefits.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is not that a substantial benefit?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not so regard it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh well, I do not understand the word "substantial" if that is the case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator tell us what else is guaranteed to the soldier?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Wisconsin, after reading the House provision a number of times, does not know what is in it, I cannot enlighten him now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I just wanted to know if that one proposition in the House text was the thing upon which the Senator from Texas was basing his impassioned appeal to the Senate to capitulate and abandon its position.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Wisconsin had been listening, and if he can gain any impression at all as to what the poor powers of the Senator from Texas were undertaking to convey, he would know the reasons that I have been urging. I have already consumed a great deal of time, and in order to answer the Senator I cannot go back and repeat my whole speech.

In conclusion, Mr. President——

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very anxious to close. I am anxious to conclude my remarks.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator says that under the present regulations these presumptive veterans will be taken off the rolls on the 1st of July, but that under the House compromise they will remain on the rolls until the 31st of October. Will the Senator tell us whether it is not perfectly possible for the President's boards to act immediately? If he establishes them in sufficient number, and if they are instructed in such a way by the Veterans' Bureau and the Director of the Budget, are they not going to be able to take those men off the rolls perhaps by the 15th of July or the 1st of August?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall answer the Senator. The Senator asks, "Can they not do it immediately?" They could not do it immediately unless they had a committee for each veteran. I do not believe, of course, and I do not think the Senator believes, that they can review this large number of cases within 2 weeks' time. That is impracticable. Of course, the Senator can imagine all sorts of things. If we are going to indulge in fancy, if we are going to indulge in bogies and ghost stories, of course, we could conjure up all sorts of things; but if they stay on only a month, that is more than they will stay on under the Economy Act.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, if they are going to stay on the rolls only a month——

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator did not say that. I said, "If they stay on only a month."

Mr. CUTTING. I am saying, "If they stay on only a month." [Laughter.] If they stay on only a month, then does not the Senator think that if we did not pass this House compromise the President would remove them on the 1st of July, and not let them stay on the rolls a month?

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it on that assumption that the Senator has been making all his speeches in favor of his amendment?

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I have been trying to write something mandatory, something not dependent on the Director of the Budget.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what we are doing now—writing something mandatory, so that they will have certain rights.

Mr. CUTTING. But the Senator has not shown anything mandatory.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will not argue with the Senator about that.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say to Senators that this is not the last session of Congress which will convene. The Senate and the House will be back here in January. We do not part with all of our legislative authority when we adjourn tonight. Our legislative functions do not become paralyzed because we wait until January. Let us adopt these substitutes. Let us try them out. Let us set up these boards. Let them examine these presumptive cases. Let us observe the results. Let us weigh the consequences. Then, when we come back here in January, if the Veterans' Bureau has not been honest in administering this act, if the President has not kept faith, the Congress then can do what some Senators want it to do now, but which it cannot do in the face of a veto. Two thirds can override a veto then just as well as now, and we shall have the added benefit of the experience and observation of the workings of this measure.

Mr. President, I dislike to part with the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Oregon. I pay tribute to their zeal and to their industry and to their sympathy for the soldier. I am just as anxious about the veterans as they are. I do not approve the House measure and the Byrnes amendment as being sufficient. If I were writing this amendment, I would make it more generous. But, as I view it, it is either accept this or have a veto, a veto to hope, a veto to the very guaranty which Senators have been pleading for; and, believing that, I am going to vote to accept this compromise, let the House adopt it, let the President sign it, and we shall go home having really done something for the veteran besides make him speeches.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, except for the fact that we are considering a different amendment from the one we had before us about a week or 10 days ago, the Senator from Texas has repeated the speech, almost verbatim, he made at that time to persuade Senators not to vote for a 15-percent restriction. He pleaded just as earnestly at that time as he does at this time that if Senators would only vote against the 15-percent restriction and adopt the 25-percent restriction, as proposed by his amendment, then everything would be lovely, the soldiers would be protected, and everybody would be happy. But it seems his prediction and his forecast have not come true.

Again, when the Senator finds that it looks as though a certain number of the Senate, at least, believe in more liberal policy and consideration of the veterans he makes an appeal for the purpose of defeating the more liberal provision made for and in behalf of the veterans, as proposed by the other amendment. Had not the Senator, when we first had before us last week the matter under consideration, made that persuasive appeal—that is, persuasive to some—that we should then defeat the 15-percent restriction and take the 25-percent restriction, or that we would have no chance whatever, the 15-percent restriction would have been adopted. Everyone knows that last week it was a tie vote and that the question was decided only by the vote of the Vice President.

The Senator's [Mr. CONNALLY] appeal worked very successfully at that time. A number of us who were fighting for a reduction not to exceed 15 percent had fought up to the line and had practically won the victory; but by the very persuasive argument of the Senator and his assurance that nothing could be achieved unless it was achieved through a 25-percent restriction, some Senators, instead of holding the line, broke the line and voted with the Senator for his 25-percent proposal.

The same effort is again made to get those who believe in the more liberal treatment of the veterans, instead of holding the line to break loose and go with those who want to give the veterans the least possible they can get under the circumstances. I should like to remind Senators of that little incident and of this repetition of the argument made in the hope of catching some Senators, just as was done before.

If we could have had a vote without the argument of the Senator from Texas, which was persuasive, on the 15- and 25-percent amendments, we would have won by at least 8 or 10 votes for the 15-percent restriction. We would then have been in a much better position to have effected a compromise which would have meant something for the soldier.

As far as I am concerned, I am for something for the soldiers. There is a little to be gained in this proposition, it is true, but it is of minor consequence, and I imagine that all the rejoicing throughout the land which will go up, if the Senator from Texas and those with him win on this proposition at this time, will be on the part of the Economy League and those in sympathy with them; and, on the contrary, the soldiers of the country and those who believe in them, who believe that they should have fair treatment, will be bowed down in despair and in disappointment. I hope the Cutting-Steiwer amendment will be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I regret very much that I am compelled to part company with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on this very important proposition. The Senator from Texas started out in his great oration by saying, in effect and substance, that the way to do something for the soldier was to stop talking, not have a lot of oratory, which he called "bunkum" or something of that kind, and then proceeded to talk for an hour and a half. [Laughter.] I would not have said a word, I had no intention of saying anything, because I did not want to be classified by my friend from Texas as one who would indulge in bunkum or useless talk; but after he has set the pace and the precedent I think I am justified in saying just a few words.

Mr. President, I am not criticising the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] or any of those who support the House amendment as amended by the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina. I am not criticising those who say we must take that or get nothing. They may be right. I do not believe they are. I have more confidence in the President of the United States than those who take that position.

It is said that if we agree to this substitute, known as the "Cutting-Steiwer amendment," we will meet a veto from the White House. I do not believe it; but if I knew that we would, I would still say of the President, as I say to Senators who are opposed to the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, "I concede your motives are high and pure, and that you are acting in the best of faith from the viewpoint which you take."

I see nothing in the House amendment as amended by the Senator from South Carolina. But I am not frightened now—I have never been frightened—by the threat of a veto, and for many years I have lived under that kind of a threat. I have my responsibilty, others have theirs, and the President of the United States has his. I am conceding that others are acting from motives which are pure, and that the President, from the way he looks at it, is doing the same, with the highest of patriotic motives and purposes. But that does not excuse me if I look at the matter from a different standpoint from his. I have my responsibility, others have their responsibility, and they cannot get away from theirs by trying to say that somebody else who has a responsibility of a different kind, of a more important kind, perhaps, looks at the matter differently from the way they do.

If we all carry out our responsibility as we see it, if we all follow the dictates of our consciences and do our duty as we see it, without fear and without favor, we will all feel better when we get through, regardless of the outcome.

I do not for a moment criticize those who favor the House amendment as amended by the Byrnes amendment. But as long as I know I cannot see anything in it, as long as I believe the Steiwer-Cutting amendment is a just and a fair compromise, it seems to me, though it does not go as far as I should like to have it go, as long as I believe that I am going to vote for it, even though every friend I have criticizes me and says that I am wrong. I should be sorry to have the criticism, I should like to avoid it if I could, but I am not going to be scared away from what I believe to be my duty by a threat that somebody else higher in power will nullify what I do if I do not obey and do as I am told to do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator lays down respecting the justice or the merits of the situation I suggest to him that, on a mathematical basis, the only difference remaining in dollars and cents between the House proposition and the Steiwer-Cutting proposition does not exceed $30,000,000, which is less than 1 percent of the amount appropriated in a bill which went through the Senate yesterday in half an hour with the administration's blessing. I do not believe that even the President of the United States will undertake to make a major issue of $30,000,000 under such circumstances.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, perhaps I had better say that I am reminded by the suggestion made by the Senator from Michigan that the President's ideas are in conflict with mine and others here. There is not a man in the United States in whose sincerity, in whose honesty, and in whose courage I have greater faith than the man who now sits in the White House.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, feeling that way, if the President told the Senator that he was going to veto the bill, would he believe him?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I would believe him; of course I would, if he told me he was going to veto it; but I would vote for the amendment just the same if I believed it was right. I am not going to be driven from what I believe to be my duty by the threat of a veto, even if it comes from my own father. I do not mean to criticize the man who vetoes the bill. He has his right and he ought to follow his convictions. I am willing to take his advice, I am willing to compromise to meet his idea, but I will not go farther than it seems to me I am justified in going, and I am going to be the judge of that. Nobody else, however great, however good a friend, or however greatly I may be obligated to him, is going to control my conscientious convictions.

Mr. President, that does not mean any disrespect to my friends. If I had a friend I could lead around by the nose and tell what to do as I can my dog, I would not respect him any more than I do my dog, probably not as much, because there was a time in my life when I had a dog, and I loved him as dearly as anything I ever had, and I would have gone almost as far for him as for my own life.

I only want to say that it does not mean one lacks in loyalty to another Senator because he does not vote as the other one says. It does not mean one lacks in loyalty or friendship or confidence in the President of the United States if he does not agree with him on everything. We never had a President with whom we agreed on everything. There are no two men here who agree on everything.

There is not a married man in this Hall who always agrees with his own wife [laughter]; and usually in such a case he finds out after he has disagreed with her that he was wrong and she was right. [Laughter.] So we may find out afterward that we were wrong in these great questions of state; I concede that; but we can only go according to the light that God has given us, carry out the dictates of our consciences, and wherever they land us let us land there and maintain our own self-respect, and even the respect of our fellows who do not agree with us.

As I read the Cutting-Steiwer amendment, I am impressed with its fairness; I am impressed with its moderation and the way to compromise that it opens; the opportunity that it affords to clear the roll of those pensioners who ought not to be there by methods that will be controlled by the President himself.

As I look at the other proposal, I see nothing in it except the sop that comes in the way of the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina which is given to the soldiers of the Spanish-American War. I think when the Senator from Texas was pressed he practically admitted that, after all—at any rate, that is all I could find in analyzing what he said in his eloquent speech—its only advantage was that it gave to the soldiers of the Spanish-American War something which they would not have without it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is one other advantage that I might mention. I do not know that it is of any consequence to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. It will be, I will say to the Senator. I want to meet these questions in a fair way.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the House bill a limitation of 25 percent is placed on the cut which may be made in all service-connected cases, with the exception of such presumptive cases as may be eliminated. In the economy law there is no such provision as that. Does the Senator not regard that as a substantial benefit to the veterans suffering from directly service-connected disabilities and to the presumptive veterans also?

Mr. NORRIS. I think——

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I desire to say that I am sure the Senator from Texas does not mean to misstate the provisions of the House compromise. The only restriction on the cut in directly service-connected disability cases provided by the House amendment is in "the rates of compensation" made payable, not in "the compensation being paid" to the individual veterans; so that the individual veteran may have his rating cut down any extent, but the "rating schedules" of the Bureau cannot be cut down more than 25 percent. That is the main difference between the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and the amendment of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina, but I will say to the Senator that I am about ready to conclude. I will yield the floor in a very few minutes, but I yield to the Senator to ask me any question that I may be able to answer.

Mr. BYRNES. I merely wanted to say that the construction placed upon the language of the section is certainly not in accord with my construction or justified by the language itself. The words "rates of compensation" refer to the difference in ratings by the regulations. There was a rating different from that which existed prior to the economy law. I do not agree with the construction placed upon the language by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Michigan a moment ago made a most astounding statement. He said that there was involved in all of this controversy only the sum of approximately $30,000,000, and in a Congress that has been appropriating billions of dollars I wonder if we are now going to dismember our entire program over this little item of $30,000,000 which is less, as the Senator indicated, than 1 percent of the amount we appropriated the other day. Certainly all this controversy would not be justified if that is the amount involved. I should like to know whether that is true or not; and I wonder if the Senator from South Carolina could enlighten us on that subject?

Mr. BYRNES. There is no question as to the statement of the amount of money involved in this particular amendment. I think it was stated that approximately $50,000,000 would be added to the sum for veterans by the adoption of the House compromise plus the amendment which has been adopted by the Senate today; that that is the amount of the additional appropriation that would be made available to the veterans. I have not attempted to secure from the Veterans' Administration an estimate of the cost of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment. The Senator from New Mexico said it could not be done, but the information I had at the time it was pending here before was that it would cost something over $100,000,000. There were various estimates, one running up to $130,000,000 at that time. The Senator from Oregon, as I recall, stated that his amendment would mean an expenditure of approximately thirty or forty million dollars less than the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I only state the estimate as to the House compromise, and that is the best information I could get as to that.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan to repeat his statement for the benefit of the Senate? It was so astonishing to me that I should like to have it repeated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I will be happy to do so, if the Senator from Nebraska will yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not believe that Senators ought to take my time in having side discussions. The figures can come out in the time of the Senators who want to participate in the discussion. I should rather continue.

When interrupted I was about to discuss something to which I called the attention of the Senator from South Carolina in regard to his amendment to the House amendment. I wish to refer to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to the House amendment just briefly. The amendment provides:

> Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who served 90 days or more, was honorably discharged from the service, is 55 years of age or over, is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 per month.

I think, Mr. President, by the time the soldier gets through proving all these things which are necessary and answering the questions that will be asked probably by an unfriendly Bureau—as I think we all know the Bureau has been unfriendly and technical, trying to require proof according to the technicalities of the law—when the soldier gets through with the Bureau in establishing all those facts he will be dead of old age.

He must show that he served 90 days; he must show that he was honorably discharged; he must show that he is 55 years of age; he must show that he is 50-percent disabled, and "in need as defined by the President."

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. It is rather eloquent, I think, that the amendment from which the Senator is reading does not define the disability; that is to say, it does not define the method of fixing the disability. That would be done by a construction made in the Veterans' Administration. The evaluations of different disabilities or injuries will be subject to their procedure, and I suggest to the Senator that it might be quite possible that they would make regulations under which practically no veteran of the Spanish-American War could ever qualify with a 50-percent disability.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has said in part what I was about to say, that under this proposal the question would arise as to what was a 50-percent disability as defined by the President. I know and you know, Mr. President, the Senate knows, and God knows that the President cannot write these definitions. He is going to and must delegate the duty to someone else, presumably to a bureau that has been, I think ever since I have dealt with it, as technical as possible in passing upon these claims, construing the doubt against the soldier in most cases that have come to my personal attention.

The soldier must not only prove that he is disabled according to that definition, but that he is in need according to the definition. What does that mean? It may mean anything. With an unfriendly bureau it will mean practically nothing to the soldier.

"In need." I do not believe in the history of Congress we have ever passed legislation that would afford a precedent for anything of this kind. What will constitute being "in need"? Will it apply to a man who has an income of $2,500 or $1,000 or $500? Will it make any difference whether he has a wife to support or not? Will it make any difference whether he has a mother dependent upon him or a sister or children? Who is going to decide what that means? We have left it wide open, as far as the proposed law is concerned, to make it a practical impossibility for this provision to do any good to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Why should we do that? Why enact that kind of a law? Why open that door and put on guard at it the Bureau that has always been technical in construing the claims of the veterans of our various wars?

Mr. President, we have laid the road wide open for a complete failure. It seems to me no man living can point out a thing that is unfair in the Cutting-Steiwer amendment. I have not heard anybody yet point to an error that is in it; anything that is in it that is unjust. Therefore, Mr. President, without fear and without hesitation, I am going to vote for the substitute, and I hope nobody will vote any other way, except according to his own convictions, on account of anything that may happen in the future. If it shall be vetoed, we will meet that situation when it arises. Let us not stop now until we have exhausted every resource to do justice to these thousands of men who, by this cruel order, have been put out upon the streets practically in suffering and in distress.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The statement was made by the Senator from Texas that if this amendment were added the bill would be vetoed, which would force us to pass a continuing joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. That does not follow by any means.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask whether we could follow the Senator in that statement? If we were to meet that kind of a situation, and be forced to act upon a continuing resolution, if the sense of this body is that this thing ought to be done, could the resort to a continuing resolution prevent our doing this? Would not the way still be open?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I think so.

Mr. FESS. I could not follow the Senator from Texas in that respect.

Mr. NORRIS. I could not, either. I think the Senator from Texas was wrong about it, without any idea of being wrong. I may be wrong and he may be right; I realize that; but there is not anything bad about that. If we put this amendment in the law and the President thinks it ought to be vetoed, he will veto it. When that time comes we will meet the situation. We will then have to perform our duty. He will then have performed his duty. There will be no suspicion that we acted from a bad motive, and I would be the last man in this body to intimate that the President had acted from any other than the very highest and noblest of motives. If it comes to that, and we can get nothing but what we have on the statute books now, we will have to take it. But that does not excuse us from not doing what we believe ought to be done, and that is to right this wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from Mr. Vincent Bendix. As Members of this body know, Mr. Bendix is a very prominent and thoroughly representative business man of the United States. The telegram reads as follows:

> HON. ARTHUR R. ROBINSON, > Senate Office Building:
> Regarding war debts, I strongly believe our country definitely cannot afford any substantial reduction or cancelation, especially when debtors are easily able to currently pay the interest and later can positively liquidate the principal with various kinds of tangible considerations. Foreign misleading and malicious propaganda is directed merely to cheat our country out of billions of dollars and place the great burden on our citizens, and in the end will amount to a great penalty on American foreign business and a correspondingly great bonus to our foreign competitors. Debt discussions should not be entangled with the Economic Conference.

VINCENT BENDIX.

Mr. President, everybody knows, in fact, I think it has never been denied, that the House of Morgan and organized wealth of this country desire to unload Europe's debts on American taxpayers. That same group of individuals is doing everything in its power to take bread from the mouths of the disabled veterans of the United States. The record discloses that the National Economy League is recruited from Wall Street. The record shows also that the President of the United States, in submitting the indefensible so-called "Economy Act", followed the behest of Wall Street. The very program of the President with reference to veterans' legislation is the program of the National Economy League, many of whom have their names in the record here as beneficiaries of large gratuities from the House of Morgan.

Mr. President, I have just learned that the Chief Executive of the United States has accepted $10,000,000 from Great Britain in connection with the debts. The installment of Great Britain due tomorrow is something over $79,000,000. The entire installment should have been paid, or none. Yet the very Chief Executive who takes $400,000,000 from the veterans of the United States undertakes to accept today $10,000,000, following the program of the House of Morgan, Wall Street, and organized wealth, a little more than 10 percent of the amount that is due. Everybody understands perfectly well that if this President listens to Wall Street, that is all we will get of that installment. Thus we would donate $69,000,000 to Great Britain. Oh, that some of our American statesmen would think more of America and less of Europe!

In just a moment we are going to vote on this measure and I shall not detain the Senate. Understand, this great wrong has been done to the disabled veterans of America. Understand perfectly well, so far as the World War veterans are concerned, that if they were service connected under the former structure of the laws they had to show affirmatively 10-percent disability. If their disability was not connected directly with the war, it was up to them to show affirmatively 25-percent disability. So the injustice done to the World War veterans was done to disabled men all the way through.

So far as the Spanish-American War veterans are concerned, their benefits have been practically wiped out in the most cruel fashion by the dictator who has been placed over the destinies of the defenders of the Nation. All in the world the Steiwer-Cutting amendment undertakes to do is to bring some little measure of justice to the Spanish-American War veterans who served their country well and worthily more than 30 years ago when service records were not known. Whatever records were kept have been lost. Yet they are asked to show and to prove service connection. Is there anyone here who can refuse to vote for the small meed of justice contained in this amendment?

We are simply trying to bring some little measure of justice to the veterans; in other words, trying to right in some small way the great wrong that was done to all of them. I hope the Senate will show in its vote now on this question that it is at least as friendly to the defenders of the Nation as it is to Europe and the powers that owe this country billions of dollars, one of the largest of which has just offered approximately 10 percent of the installment due tomorrow, which has been accepted by the President of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it will require only a brief time for me to express the thoughts in my mind in relation to this controversy. That the issue has become very tense, everyone in the Chamber must realize. Subjects closely akin to the one now under consideration have from time to time been brought forward and always there has been revealed very profound feeling.

During the course of today's debate, references have been made to subject matters which, in my humble judgment, are only remotely, if at all, connected with the issue here. It has been said that there should never have been the Spanish-American War, that the then President of the United States precipitated the country into a conflict with Spain without warrant and without right, simply yielding to public sentiment. The declaration has also been made that this Government should not have participated in the World War. I cannot see that the United States could have avoided engaging in that war.

Mr. President, as I see it, no advantage whatever is to be gained by entering into a debate here at this time on the merits or justice of the cause of the American people in the two conflicts to which reference has been made. I have never felt that President McKinley committed a crime against his country and against civilization or that the Congress committed an unpardonable error when it declared war against Spain in 1898; nor has it seemed to me that there was sound basis for the theory of those who supported the cause of the Central Empire; namely, that the United States sent her sons to danger and to battle in violation of the cause of justice and humanity, when this Congress recognized a state of war with Germany in 1917. Whatever may be the justice or injustice of the causes involved in those great conflicts, history must decide. No act of ours can relieve our people and our Government from the responsibilities and the duties that arise out of the conflict.

There is no Senator here who is not willing and anxious to respond to those sentiments of patriotism and manhood which inspire and prompt every local citizen of the country to do justice to the soldiers who wore our uniform in the Spanish-American War and to those who wore it in the world conflict; but it is not to be assumed that any Senator or group of Senators can monopolize for themselves the right and title to patriotism which may be claimed by public officials who differ from them and who yet perform their duty in accordance with their conception of justice to the living and the dead.

There is involved here today no question of war debts. There is involved here today no question of the success or failure of the London Economic Conference. Senators on this side of the Chamber may respond, if they choose, to the small, secret influences that are at work from other sources to prolong this session indefinitely, so that the opportunity may be afforded of using the Senate and the House of Representatives as a forum to impair the strength and break down the effectiveness of our representatives in the Economic Conference.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who preceded me on the floor, declared that the acceptance of a partial payment on the war debts constitutes a yielding of the claim as to the balance, and that if 10 percent be paid now it means that no additional sum shall be received. On what authority, I inquire, is such a declaration made? Is it the purpose of the Senator from Indiana to weaken the arm of the President in his efforts to carry out the mandate of Congress respecting the subject of war debts? Does he believe that if the Constitution of the United States devolved upon him, rather than upon the President, the obligation of conducting our foreign relations, he would be able, by some magic process known only to his mind, to assure collection of the debts in full?

Let me say, for the benefit of those who are precipitating in advance of the 15th of June a debate on this subject, that while I have no authority to commit or to bind the President of the United States, it is my belief that he is acting strictly within the line of his duty; that he is not influenced in the slightest degree by the House of Morgan or any other financial interest in the United States; that he is prompted solely by a sense of weighty responsibility and of duty to the American public.

Yes; you can make it harder for him. Speeches like that of the Senator from Indiana may be regarded by some here and by others abroad as having some foundation in fact or circumstance. By raising that issue here and now, and declaring that the acceptance or receipt of a partial payment means the cancelation of the remainder, you may give encouragement, if you wish, to the forces which agitate in favor of cancelation. What will be said in the debtor countries should they take note of the declaration of the Senator from Indiana? It will be said that a leader of the opposition to the administration stated, on his responsibility as a United States Senator, that the President, inspired by the House of Morgan, has yielded the substance and right of the people whom he represents and serves. Will not the advocates of cancelation take heart and courage?

Let it be understood that the President from the beginning has recognized that he has no authority to alter in the slightest degree the existing arrangement respecting war debts. Do you understand the significance of that declaration? No change can be made without approval by the Congress. It is not fair, it is not just, it is not patriotic, to indulge in expressions of suspicion here, particularly when they involve detrimentally the best interests of the United States.

In the next place, the President has proceeded throughout the discussions and negotiations on the theory that any payment tendered or received shall in no wise operate to effect a change in the debt settlements heretofore entered into.

The third principle in these important discussions having relation to the debt discussions conducted by the President is that the debtor making partial payment recognizes the validity of the obligation.

In the fourth place, it is believed that it is not sound policy to pursue a course that will prompt the obligor nations into the position of undeniable and decisive default, since this will bring the controversy to a point of disadvantage and insurmountable difficulty to the United States.

Again, who controverts the suggestion that a debtor claiming inability to meet his obligations is entitled to the privilege of discussing the subject with his creditor? The controlling principle that has guided the Executive has been, however, that no arrangement can be or will be entered into except upon the condition that it shall be submitted to the Congress and approved before it becomes effective.

Those who have not been directly concerned with a study of this problem, or with efforts to compose the disputes that revolve around it, may be unable to appreciate the many difficulties in the present situation. They may believe that they could conduct the negotiations more skillfully and more effectively than the President can conduct them. They are not at liberty, however, from any fair standpoint, to confuse the public mind by the statement of partial truths, or by giving expression to misinformation. In doing so, they assume a responsibility which they have neither the authority nor the intelligence to discharge.

I pass now to a consideration of the proposed substitute that has been offered by the Senators from Oregon and New Mexico.

As stated in the beginning, this controversy has been prolonged and somewhat intense. In the hope that practical help may be given in arriving at a conclusion, I am impelled to make these few remarks. I do not ask any Senator to yield his views, or to take a course which appears to him to be unjust, but I do ask that we all pursue a course which intelligent men may regard as practicable and fair.

We have an amendment proposed by the House of Representatives. To that amendment the Senator from South Carolina has proposed an amendment. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina having been incorporated, the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Mexico offered their amendment as a substitute. I said 2 or 3 days ago, after we had debated these questions at some length, that in my opinion we had better take the vote then on the Steiwer-Cutting amendment; that time would be saved by doing so. It appears that that view has been supported by subsequent events.

The President will veto the independent offices appropriation bill if the Steiwer amendment is incorporated in it. I grant that the Senate has a perfect right to vote for the amendment notwithstanding that fact, but those favoring it also have the right, if they choose to do so, to place the responsibility on the Chief Executive, the announcement being made that the bill will be vetoed if the amendment is incorporated.

Yes; perhaps you can incorporate this amendment and send the bill to the President and have a veto of the independent offices appropriation bill, and then, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, if a continuing resolution is offered, we can write the Steiwer amendment into the continuing resolution and have it vetoed again. But who here thinks any such course will be pursued?

The course that will be pursued is, in all probability, if we have a veto of the independent offices bill, that the veto will be sustained, because the vote on this amendment, whether the Steiwer amendment is carried or defeated, will disclose that there is not the two-thirds vote necessary to pass the bill over the President's veto. Then, after months of labor, and after weeks of discussion, we will demonstrate the fact that we have moved in a circle, and are right back at the position from which we started. If a continuing resolution is then presented, and the Senate sees fit to do so, by the same vote by which it incorporates the Steiwer amendment it can incorporate it in the continuing resolution.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I do not want to disturb the Senator's argument, but would it not be possible, under those circumstances, to write into the continuing resolution, not the Steiwer amendment, but the House amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly it would be possible, but that is the very point; if the Senate is going to yield on it, and place the responsibility on the President, let us do it now, and end this session of Congress.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, then we would be in an entirely different situation, I think. We would know that we could not get what we wanted, and the responsibility would be exactly where it belongs.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator may be assured of it now. I make the statement on the authority of the President that this bill will be vetoed if the Steiwer amendment is incorporated in it, and that statement is not made with a view to intimidating Senators in their votes; it is made in order that the situation may be made known, and that the practical course may be clear. If, as the Senator from New Mexico implies, we will finally have to take the House amendment with the Byrnes amendment added to it, then the sensible thing to do is to do it now, without a week's delay, and thus make it possible to end the session.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, would not the President be disingenuous if he failed to make that disclosure now?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think so. He has made the disclosure. I have discussed the matter with him repeatedly, and during the last 2 days have sought to find some way of composing this controversy. The President is perfectly willing to take the responsibility. He does not base his opposition to the amendment so much on the amount of money that is involved as upon what he designates "a principle."

The fundamental objection to the Steiwer amendment, according to the President, is that it would preserve the 6-year period of presumption and restore to the rolls practically all presumptive cases, regardless of the fact that their disabilities cannot be traced as a matter of fact or of medical knowledge to the military service. The American Medical Association has supported the presumption of 2 years which is contemplated by the President's regulation.

The second feature of the Steiwer amendment which the President regards as objectionable is that it would restore to the rolls more than 75,000 Spanish-American War veterans, quite irrespective of service connection or need or degree of disability.

Mr. President, a good deal has been said here today about the pauper's oath. No such thing is involved in this legislation. I wish to ask the Senate now to take into consideration the case stated yesterday by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and answer to their consciences whether they wish to perpetuate such cases, a millionaire with an enormous income drawing a pension of $30 a month, justifying his action on the ground that he uses it to pay his income tax!

Mr. President, that type of man is not entitled to receive a pension at the expense of the millions of people who live and toil in this country. There are thousands of men on the pension rolls now who have large incomes who pay little to the support of the Government, and there ought to be some means of eliminating them. No one would denounce the President as an enemy to the human race, as some have sought to do here today, if he removed from the pension rolls the millionaire in Oklahoma, who uses his $30 a month pension to pay his income tax.

I express the hope that the Steiwer amendment will be rejected and the House amendment agreed to.

THE LONDON ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to intrude myself into the debate on this subject of debts, but in view of the fact that it has been discussed here I think it not inappropriate to say a word as to the view which I entertain with reference to what has taken place today between the President and the British Government.

My view is that the debt situation has not been changed in the slightest by reason of anything which has taken place, according to the reports which we have before us. The President has accepted $10,000,000 upon a debt due. He has not changed or sought to change the contractual relations between the debtor and the creditor; and so far as I understand from reading the report in a brief moment, he has not entered into any negotiations with reference to any change.

The British Government owes the balance due; in other words, in accordance with the express terms of the contract. It is true that the President has stated that he would not characterize the failure to pay as a default. I presume that had a reason or a justification; nevertheless, it does not change the contract or change the relationship of the debtor and the creditor in the least. I do not understand that the President has undertaken to do anything of that kind. I do not understand that he has accepted the $10,000,000 upon any condition which would affect the balance of it, either for collection or in the way of adjustment, cancelation, or reduction.

Let it be understood, if there is any misunderstanding upon the other side of the water, that the Congress of the United States alone can change the terms of this contract. The President has so announced, and before any reduction, any modification, or any cancelation, can possibly take place, the Congress must act upon the matter.

Although I do not know, I presume that the amount which was paid was all the debtor was willing to pay, but I find nothing here which gives the debtor any advantage of the situation whatever by reason of any communication between the President and the British Government.

We are now prepared to take what course we may, either in the way of reduction or cancelation or collection, as freely and as unhampered and as unembarrassed as if the $10,000,000 had not been received. In other words, we have $10,000,000, and the balance of it is precisely where it was before the $10,000,000 was paid. I am unwilling to find fault with mere expressions in these negotiations, since no change as to our substantial rights have been effected. A great and most momentous conference is in progress. I am as anxious as anyone to protect our rights, but I do not wish to embarrass negotiations, so long as those negotiations indicate no substantial forfeiture of the rights of the American people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I note the President's statement that, in view of the representations that were made to him by the British Government, and in view of the fact that they have paid about one eighth of the amount which they were obligated to pay tomorrow, he has no personal hesitation in saying that he does not characterize the resultant situation as a default.

I suppose a default by any other name will smell the same; but can it be anything else but a default? A definite agreement has been made between two nations that there should be paid some $79,000,000 on the 15th day of June. No one has power to change that definite agreement, so far as the United States is concerned, save the Congress of the United States. Congress has not changed it.

When the day for performance comes, the debtor turns over to the creditor about one eighth of that which he has promised to pay, and the Executive, charged with the execution of the law, soothes the debtor's feelings by saying that he personally does not regard this clear default as a default!

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me suggest, right there, the foreign viewpoint as evidenced by a London dispatch of the Universal Service, written by William Hillman. I quote from the dispatch as follows:

> President Roosevelt, Washington denials to the contrary, is reported already to have agreed to accept a "token" or "goodwill" payment of 10 percent from Britain, and the present delay in announcement is understood to wait upon finding a formula by which to express the administration's solution of the debt dilemma.

Then the story concludes with this very significant statement referring to Mr. Neville Chamberlain. I hope that the speech of Mr. Chamberlain does not sour in him; he is expected to make it as soon as we adjourn.

> Chamberlain appeared before Commons in the afternoon and begged off his expected debts-policy statement by promising to announce the Government's intentions tonight. When he made a tardy appearance in Parliament at 10:10 p.m., he said he was still not in a position to make a complete statement, whereupon Commons adjourned. Chamberlain forecast an adjustment "satisfactory" to Britain and promised full disclosures at 10 o'clock tomorrow night.

It is hoped in some circles that by that time we shall have gotten rid of veterans matters and adjourned the Congress so that Mr. Chamberlain may make his speech.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean to state that there is no difference in meaning between the word "regard" and the word "characterize"? The Senator stated that the President said that he did not "regard" it as a default. The President, as I understand, said that he did not "characterize" the partial payment as a default. There is a difference, I submit, between the words "characterize" and "regard." May I also suggest to the learned Senator to consider the fact that Congress alone has the right to change or modify the terms of the contract. The President would not have the right to change the terms, and therefore he may be entirely right in saying that he does not "characterize" the nature or quality of Great Britain's procedure. If there is any characterization—under a proper interpretation, if characterization is to be made, it would seem that Congress is to undertake the task.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I should like to inquire if the Senate has among its Membership an entomologist? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Did the Senator say "entomologist"?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, quite seriously, the only security America has for the payment of its international debts is the good faith of the debtors. On that and on that alone we advanced this vast amount of wealth, borrowed from our taxpayers for the purpose. The only security for the payment is the good faith, the character, and the honesty of the debtor nations. What becomes of that good faith, of that character, of that honesty, and of the will to pay when the President of the United States says to all the world that a failure to pay is not characterized by him as a default? How can that good faith and that desire to pay exist when the head of our Government issues a public statement such as this?

Remember, Mr. President, that in all the correspondence we are given which has passed between our Government and the British Government there is not the shadow of a suggestion of their inability to pay; there is no pretense that they have not the capacity to pay what they agreed to pay; there is no pretense that the debt is not just; there is no pretense that they did not enter into the debt settlement with their eyes wide open, gladly accepting the reductions we then made, with appreciation for the generosity we showed; there is no pretense about all that. There is merely an indisposition to pay; they do not want to pay. That is all that appears from the correspondence, and, almost as a contemptuous gesture, they hand us about 12 percent of what they had promised. Then, when through our President, we say, "Wo do not regard that as a default", what can lead us to think that any Briton will care to exert himself to pay anything of the December installment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to ask the very able Senator from Pennsylvania if it is not true that Great Britain at present has a larger supply of gold than ever before in her history?

Mr. REED. I do not know that to be a fact. I do know the fact with regard to France.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is true of France, is it not?

Mr. REED. Yes; it is true of France.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator had been in the President's place would he have accepted the 10 percent?

Mr. REED. I would have accepted it; I would accept a postage stamp; but I would have made it perfectly plain that as for the unpaid balance I regarded its nonpayment as a breach of faith, as a dishonorable thing, as a plain default.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, according to my information, they probably would not have paid anything, and would have actually been in complete default, and thus prevented the Government of the United States even from having an opportunity of getting anything at all.

Mr. REED. I differ with the Senator as to that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the United States had stated to Great Britain, "Unless you pay all this debt, I denounce you as dishonest", as the Senator has implied he would have done, and declared, "You are in default", I think it is certain that nothing ever would have been paid and there would have been a default of all the indebtedness.

Mr. REED. We differ as to that. I should have said to Great Britain, "I depend upon your good faith as America depended upon your good faith when she advanced this money to you. We still depend upon it, and we believe, from past experience, that Great Britain honors her word." I believe, in that event, there would have been no default.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I take it from the Senator's remarks that he is in favor of the President's addressing a note to France, through the Secretary of State, saying, in effect, "We, the Government of the United States, feel that the French Government is thoroughly dishonorable, that it is a defaulting Government and deserves no contact with us at all, and therefore your Ambassador should be recalled."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that we are now engaged at the London Conference in the farcical performance of writing agreements with a number of governments, when right before our face lies the evidence that they do not regard their agreements as binding upon them. I think it is a silly thing to do. Why should we accept new promises from governments that dishonor their existing promises? Why should we have new debt negotiations with these governments if, as the President says, he is going to swap a dishonest promise for a new promise that probably will be no better?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And for the old promise we have their bonds.

Mr. REED. We have their bonds, but their bonds constitute merely promises, and now it is proposed that we surrender them and take other bonds based only on good faith where good faith does not exist.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. VANDENBERG addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I will yield in just a moment. I said that unless America shall have gained by the experience, she has lost everything in this transaction, and what experience should teach us is to be very chary in accepting the promises of peoples whose promises are only good in fair weather. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator if my recollection is at fault when I recall that he very heartily approved the extension very generously granted about June a year ago by the then President of the United States when he assured us that there was a reason why insistence upon the payment of the installments then due by one of our sister nations could not be made?

Mr. REED. That is quite true. I approved the moratorium because under the facts as we were told them it looked as though it would avoid the bankruptcy of central Europe.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator think that the world has so greatly improved at this time as to take away all justification for the President of the United States to accept a partial payment upon the maturing installment?

Mr. REED. I am not objecting to his accepting a partial payment; I am objecting to glossing over the default of seven eighths of that debt and his destroying the value of that debt for this country.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it comes——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I will yield at the end of the sentence. It seems to me that it comes strangely from the President, who is cracking the whip over the Congress, to make drastic reductions in the compensation of our veterans who suffered from combat-incurred injuries at the same time he is, in effect, giving to one single country in Europe more than it would take to pay all the allowances about which we have been debating, for the Steiwer-Cutting amendment would not increase the pension roll by anything like the amount of money annually which this gracious gesture to Great Britain decreases our revenue. We lose more by this pretty gesture to Great Britain than we would lose by doing justice to the veterans who are suffering from injuries received in combat; and it is for them that the majority of the Senate is concerned.

Now I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand, the Senator was objecting to glossing over an extension of seven eighths of this debt?

Mr. REED. It is not an extension; it is a default.

Mr. BLACK. Why does the Senator object to glossing that over and not glossing over the moratorium for the entire debt?

Mr. REED. In that case the payment was definitely extended by agreement between the countries that were in default.

Mr. BLACK. They did not pay the money, did they? They have not paid it as yet, have they?

Mr. REED. We agreed that payments should be extended in 10 annual payments.

Mr. BLACK. They defaulted, did they not?

Mr. REED. If the Senator does not see the difference between our agreeing to an extension and our not agreeing to an extension, I am afraid I cannot enlighten him.

Mr. BLACK. I do see this difference that now we get part of it while under the moratorium we received none and have received none yet.

Mr. REED. That may satisfy the Senator.

Mr. President, a word more about the pending bill and I have finished. It is quite true, doubtless, that the President will veto this bill if it shall contain the Cutting-Steiwer amendment. We are expected to vote against our own good judgment because the whip is cracked over our heads. We were not sent here to take orders from the White House; we were sent here to vote, according to our consciences, as we honestly think best; and it is a poor excuse for us to go back to our own States and say, "No; we did not believe in this. It is true that we had plain warning all the way that the Executive was going to use his power over the veterans; it is true we all thought that our confidence had been abused in the way the economy bill was applied, but when the chance came to us to rectify all that, although we believed it ought to be rectified, the President said he was going to veto the bill, and so we voted contrary to our belief." What will we say to those who call attention to our power to override a veto?

Last night we had a test vote on the question of the compensation of veterans. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] moved to recommit this measure to conference, so that some such amendment as the Cutting-Steiwer amendment could be considered. The vote on that question was 48 yeas and 31 nays. Out of those 31 nays surely there must be 5 Senators who want to see justice done to the veterans who have been so brutally treated by the Executive order. There must be 5 out of that 31 who will vote for justice in spite of the telephone messages they have been getting and in spite of the cracking of the whip; and if 5 of them will change their votes, we will then have more than the two-thirds vote necessary to override a veto. But suppose they should not—suppose the veto should be sustained—it would be necessary to come back to us with either a continuing joint resolution or an appropriation bill; and it will then be within our power—and we have the votes, beyond peradventure—to put the Steiwer-Cutting amendment on that measure, whatever it may be. In the long run in this contest Congress will win.

We know that this is just and, knowing that it is just and knowing that if we exercise ordinary manly fortitude we will win, there is no excuse for our being terrified by the threat of a veto.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I had no intention of discussing in any degree this matter at the present time. So much has been said, however, that I am very glad to have the opportunity to say to my fellow Senators a word or two of the position which I have occupied for some years in respect to it.

Great Britain could have paid and should have paid the installment that is due tomorrow. I have no criticism of the President in receiving, of course, a sum which has been paid on account. I have no criticism, indeed, if the statement has been plainly made that this particular matter of debt is within the Congress of the United States, in their jurisdiction alone, and that Congress has the right and the power to determine for the Nation whether there shall be cancelation or reduction in any of the debts subsisting.

This question, sir, with me has gone far beyond the question of dollars and cents. No financial idea—save, of course, the good faith that a debtor always owes to his creditor—have I now in speaking of it at all. Something else is involved in this debt situation besides the mere money that ought to be paid under the contracts that have been made.

I saw with amazement the other day, when the great Economic Conference opened at London, the Premier of Great Britain inject, notwithstanding the agenda of that great Conference, this controverted question. I read with astonishment yesterday that of all orators who addressed that conference, three of them berated the United States of America—three of them; indeed, one of them severely and bitterly criticizing our country.

This thing has gone beyond the mere payment, I repeat. Today our dignity and our honor and our self-respect are involved. It is silly to say to me that there has been no default in $69,000,000 of the amount that is yet due, because that is the indubitable fact. There are $79,000,000 due, $10,000,000 paid, accepted by the President, I assume, solely on account of the subsisting indebtedness, and $69,000,000 of that sum in default at the present time.

There was once a Democratic President, whose fame has lived during all the years, who, once confronted with a situation much more serious than any debt, expressed himself in no uncertain tones. He struck then what I believe is the keynote of the present situation. Grover Cleveland in his famous Venezuelan message wrote words that are written in the annals of the history of this country and that, as long as there are Americans and as long as we yet have a Republic, will be read by Democrats, Republicans, all Americans alike, with approval and with enthusiasm.

Senators will recall, I presume, that dispute which occurred many years ago. Then, in a concluding sentence in a splendid special message to the Congress of the United States, Grover Cleveland wrote these words:

> I am, nevertheless, firm in my conviction that while it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English speaking peoples of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and a consequent loss of national self-respect and honor beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

When Mr. MacDonald on Monday last did a thing that in my opinion constituted not only bad manners, but bad sportsmanship, when other representatives in that Economic Conference yesterday spoke of the United States of America in tones of scorn for all the world to hear, then there was injected into the debt situation, concerning which they were speaking, an element that we cannot forget. Today, sir, the question of those debts becomes a matter of national self-respect. Today, sir, those debts become a matter of national dignity with us. I do not care whether we ever collect a penny from any nation on the face of the earth. There is the obligation written by them as they desired. There is the obligation witnessed by the bonds which they handed to us for the payment of those obligations. There is the agreement that we had, and we are berated because we yielded to their blandishments and to their importunities concerning those debts, and permitted settlements to be made for 50 percent, and less, save in one case, of the particular obligations. Then how different was their attitude.

Today, gratitude? Not a bit of it. To scorn our Nation is held up in a great world conference. In a world forum America is denounced. And the palpable combination of these nations owing us makes this matter of greater importance than the mere collection of any sum; the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, which are, as Mr. Cleveland put it, after all the shield and the defender of a people's safety and a people's greatness, is after all far worse than the loss of the money due us. There are the debts, we can say. We do not ask any nation to pay that cannot pay. There they are. If they cannot be paid because of incapacity and poverty, well and good, but to observe our debtors berating and denouncing us in a world forum because as creditor we have treated them with unexampled generosity is something that makes my gorge rise. Because of the very circumstances of bad faith I would insist upon our obligations and leave those who can and will not meet their just obligations, to the obloquy which is the price of broken faith.

Mr. President, permit me now to say a word upon the pending bill. I have sat quietly these 3 days and had no intention whatsoever of speaking on it at all; but when, sir, the question is presented to us that we cannot adopt an amendment because of the possibility of a veto, I will not remain silent. I yield to no man upon this floor on the other side of the Chamber in my respect and my admiration, aye, in my affection for the present President of the United States. I was willing to risk a political career in order to do my part in his election last year. But the man does not live, Mr. President, be he one sort or another, be he in one position of power or another, who can say to me that I must do something that I believe ought not be done and compel me then to act in defiance of my own judgment and my own conscience. And, of course, no such request has been made of me.

What ought we to do? Every man upon this floor has the same thing to say. Wrong has been done to the veterans of the United States, wrong that should be repaired. No man denies it. If he does let him say it upon this floor now. Wrong has been done. It ought to be repaired. The only reparation possible that is adequate is that which is accorded by the Steiwer-Cutting amendment. It is said that if we adopt it we get nothing. Not so! Not so! It goes to conference with the other House, as I understand the rule, and the other House determines what it will do in respect to it. The opportunity is presented when it goes to conference of having the conferees write into the bill that which they deem appropriate. It is the only opportunity for a compromise upon this vexed question. Vote against the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and the matter is ended, and we are utterly remediless. Vote for it, and it goes to conference, and subsequently, if it be necessary for us to yield or recede, that can be done and the possibility exists yet there in the conference for some action to be had.

Again it is asserted, and was asserted by my very dear friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] today, that if we do not do as the House has done or as the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] would have us do, we would be utterly unable to get anything for the veterans. I deny it! I deny it! That originally may have been the position that was taken when first this contest began. Oh, how short our memories. We were told, with the same authority with which we are told today, that if we adopted any such amendment we had to provide in the very amendment itself for the taxes to enforce that amendment. Better judgment prevailed subsequently and we hear no more of that.

We were told in the beginning of this contest that we could not practically alter a "t" or dot a single "i" in what became known as the economy bill, so far as veterans were concerned. Already the House has agreed upon another measure, another measure that was far from contemplation at the time this contest was initiated. Do not forget that. It is evidence of the wisdom and good faith of the President that he is willing to change his mind when he sees that he has been in error in any particular or in reference to any legislation.

I will not believe that when the President of the United States has decreed that what has been done by the House is the appropriate thing to be done; that thereafter, because some fanciful contract may not have been consummated by a vote in this body, the President will recant and retract his agreement in regard to what has already been agreed between him and the House, and would continue the cruelties we all know have occurred.

My opinion of the President is far different from that, Mr. President. When he agreed to that which was an advance in what had been done by the House, then no matter whether the House passes that bill or not, he will do just exactly what he said was just and right and proper, whether or not any amendment or bill be finally passed. To imagine that any other thing would be done would be, it seems to me, a reflection upon the President rather than a compliment to him.

So, by whichever mode we approach the reality—and my friend from Texas was speaking of realities, and realities alone, today—through whatever mode we approach the reality, this amendment, if we believe it to be right and just, should be adopted by the Senate, and the subsequent events then would give us the opportunity to act again if it were desired.

I do not intend to occupy time in speaking of the veterans. I looked the other day at the pictures that were presented here by one of the men sent from Fort Bayard in the custody, for a brief period, of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. It was a sight, indeed, to wring one's heart. Not only did it wring one's heart but the cruelty and the injustice of it roused our indignation.

There was a man with a total disability. There he was, receiving $100 a month, married, with one lung gone, with a heart that could be seen through the gaping wound in his back, reduced to $20 a month—an amount, of course, upon which he could not live, and which, unless it be rectified by the Government, means his death. But there was another point in connection with it that to me was all-important, too. He was put in this pitiful condition by a bureaucrat in this land; put in that pitiful condition where there was nothing for him to do but die; and then that same bureaucratic office reviewed his case. They reviewed it with all the wounds of the man before them, I assume; and then, in their generosity, they raised his stipend to $30 per month—a man living a living death, and two doctors of this body examined him with care and reported their findings, now a part of the record.

If you want to aid these men for whom every one of you has expressed heartfelt sympathy, if you want to do something that may be done for the people who bore the brunt of the battle in the days gone by and who proudly wore our uniform, if you want to respond as we ought to respond to those who require our aid and our help and who are entitled to comfort the rest of their days, there is only one way that you can act today, and that is by the adoption of the Cutting-Steiwer amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion of foreign debts owed to this Government, because I do not think such discussion has any appropriate place in the consideration of the pending question. I rise simply to say that at the appropriate time I do intend to enter upon that discussion, and I am going to enter upon it in full concurrence with the suggestion of the Senator from California that the honor and self-respect of this Nation are involved. I intend to enter upon it with a view to dissenting totally from some of the declarations and sentiments that have been expressed upon this floor within the last few months in respect to these debts.

All I care to say about the debts right now is that it is to be deplored that the attempt has been made here to make a partisan fight upon the matter, when I assert upon my own knowledge that the views entertained by the President of the United States today do not differ one whit from the views that were entertained by his predecessor, or that would be entertained by his predecessor had he been reelected to the Presidency.

I say upon my personal knowledge that Mr. Hoover entertained precisely the same views about the desirability of readjusting foreign debts that Mr. Roosevelt entertains today; and any attempt, in an effort to make a partisan matter of this debt question, to asperse or malign Mr. Roosevelt because, charged by the Constitution with the negotiation of foreign affairs, he might be willing to receive representations from foreign nations as to their attitude on the debt question, is unworthy of any Senator on the other side of this Chamber.

When the appropriate time comes I intend to show that our money was put against the blood of these nations, and that from the day we entered into a war that we declared was our righteous cause and the "cause of civilization" and the first American offensive, 106,000,000 of the boys of these debtor nations were killed in battle in the cause that we professed to be our cause. I should like to see the mother or father in America who would have been willing to have his or her son killed on the battlefield of Europe as these 106,000,000 boys were killed——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. Not yet.

Mr. REED. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the total male inhabitants of Great Britain, Italy, and France are not 106,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, well, the Senator knows what I mean. I mean 1,600,000. Are not they enough? Are not they enough? Would you have been willing for your boy to be killed rather than to lose a few paltry dollars?

Not only that, but for 3 years, before we realized that it was "a war for civilization", many millions more were killed. Not only that, but for 3 years and after we made fortunes—fabulous fortunes—out of the very money that we loaned these foreign nations, requiring them to spend every dollar that was loaned in this country, at extortionate prices, for our products; and the Federal Treasury collected alone in 4 years more than Great Britain owes to the United States now—collected it in excess-profits taxes from these fortunes made out of the expenditures of these millions of dollars in the United States.

Oh, no; there is no sentiment involved in the discussion; but when the time comes, standing upon the self-respect and honor of the United States, I intend to rise in my place in the Senate and discuss with any Senator who wants the contest the right at least of decent consideration of propositions that may be presented to us for the settlement of these debts and undertake to show that the talk about American "generosity" in their adjustment is a sham and a fraud, because we did not manifest any.

Moreover, I resent the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] that those Senators who may exercise their right under their oaths and under their consciences to vote against the Steiwer-Cutting proposition are "under lash." I have seen the lash wielded, and I have known it to cover the back of the Senator from Pennsylvania, too.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the Senator will tell us when.

Mr. GLASS. Numerous times.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator name one time?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; I could name numerous times. Can the Senator name one time whenever the "lash" was applied to my back? Can the Senator name one time whenever I have stood here in my place and failed to vote my convictions, regardless of White House influence?

Mr. REED. Of course I cannot.

Mr. GLASS. Then why does the Senator, pointing his finger here, talk about Senators on this side being "lashed" into a certain position?

Mr. REED. Because the Senator knows very well that the White House has been calling up Senators all day long.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Virginia attributes to other Senators the same self-respect and the same degree of courage that he claims for himself. I assume that any Senator who votes today will vote his convictions and not vote under lash; and I resent the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the contrary is true. The Senator from Pennsylvania can be lashed just as well as any other Senator I know on this floor.

I intend to vote against the Cutting-Steiwer amendment. I have no doubt on earth that particular cases of great hardship may be presented pathetically, as one a while ago was presented by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]; but that does not constitute a system.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I am going to vote against the proposed amendment because I feel that no man who will not fight for his own country is worth living in that country.

Mr. CUTTING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. When he comes out of the combat without wounds, without disability, he has no right to raid the Federal Treasury perpetually because he was called into the contest—called in under draft, too, when it was a question of being shot here or shot at abroad. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTTING. Will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GLASS. The first speech that ever I heard the Senator from Pennsylvania deliver when he came into this body was against the bonus. I voted against the bonus, and I never have apologized for it for a moment. I never cast a vote here of which I was prouder, and never expect to. I had two boys in the front-line trenches, one of them being nearly killed. I had a nephew there, who was gassed so badly that he will never recover. He was decorated by his country for extraordinary heroism. I had a sister in a hospital in France, and two daughters in the hospitals in this country, to relieve trained nurses. I would not want ever to speak to one of them if they would join in the raid upon the Federal Treasury made by people who have never suffered any disability. Thousands of those in the service got better treatment, better clothing, better food, better discipline, the only discipline they had ever gotten in their lives, after they went into the service.

I would empty the Federal Treasury for any man who was wounded in the war, or for those who had been dependent upon a man who was killed in the war, but I have not any respect for any man, whether he be a millionaire or a pauper, who, drafted into the service of his country to defend its honor and its security, would take a dollar for his services from the Treasury. It is commercializing patriotism, a word we roll under our tongues, and I am not one to condone that.

For the reasons I have given, I want it distinctly understood that when I vote against the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, I am not doing it under "lash", nor in fear of the votes at home.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia tells us that he is going to discuss the debts at some time in the future.

Mr. GLASS. At an appropriate time; yes.

Mr. REED. At an appropriate time in the future; and he defies any Senator to dare to joust with him at that time and on that subject.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; I simply invite any Senator to do it.

Mr. REED. Very good. I accept the invitation, and I hope that I shall be here when the Senator makes his speech.

Mr. GLASS. I hope so. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I most cheerfully grant the courage, the independence of thought, the entire freedom of action now and always displayed by the Senator from Virginia. I am only sorry that he is so little charitable as not to be willing to make a similar allowance. Like him, but not with his courage, I opposed the bonus from that time in 1922 when it was first suggested down to the latest bonus proposal that has been put before us. I opposed it, although it meant flying directly in the face of the wishes of my own comrades in the Army.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and that is when I thought the Senator was a great Senator.

Mr. REED. And I kept on opposing it right along until the present, and I hope that the Senator's opinion, or some small fragment of it, will remain.

Mr. GLASS. A good deal of it remains.

Mr. REED. That is very kind. Just a word more. I cannot sit quiet and allow the argument to be made that from 1914 down to Armistice Day in 1918 the Allies in Europe were fighting our cause for us. They were not doing anything of the sort; they were fighting their own war, and there was not a precious one of them who would have given a hair of the head of a single soldier for the United States or the interests of the United States. They were wholly selfish in all they did, and they were immeasurably lucky when Germany stupidly dragged us into the war in 1917. They held it as incredible luck, because the war was slipping, so far as they were concerned. At the time we were dragged in Russia was caving in, and their war was going to be lost, and would have been lost if we had not come in. They thanked their lucky stars for the support we were able to give them from the beginning. They thanked their lucky stars they were able to buy munitions here. They thanked their lucky stars that the American Battle Fleet went instantly to Scapa Flow to help hold the ocean in their control.

Talk about their fighting our war all that time! They were fighting their own war, and nobody else's. There was not one single thought of our interest in all they did. They did not even want to give us credit for being in the war.

They demanded of us that we send no officer of a grade higher than captain, and that our enlisted men and line officers be fed as replacements into French and British regiments. Had they had their way, history would not have known that the United States was in the war. We would have had all the expense and a lot of casualties and not even the credit of participation.

I cannot sit still when it is said that we ought to cancel all these debts as our contribution for what they did for us. They did nothing for us before or after the armistice. They were selfish throughout.

Mr. HATFIELD. And they were amply rewarded under the Treaty of Versailles.

Mr. REED. Of course they were. They got what they were after in millions of square miles of territory, in dominion over millions and millions of human beings. They got all the booty of the war, and that was what most of them were fighting for. Talk about it being our war!

Mr. KEAN. Has the Senator even seen the place where the armistice was signed, and the monument that has been erected there, which does not mention the United States as being in the war at all?

Mr. REED. Yes; I have seen that. They give us no credit. In Great Britain today they are saying that we did nothing but make money out of the war; that we did not join in the fighting of it. Yet the fact is that the American Army on the western front, on the day of the armistice, was larger than the British Army, but there is not 1 Briton in 10,000 who knows that.

Talk of giving us credit! They regard us as "easy marks"; and I will debate that question with the Senator from Virginia at the appropriate time about which he speaks.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator is not able to sit in his chair at what I have said today, he will not be able to sit down at all at what I will say when I discuss the question at the appropriate time. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I never felt less like addressing the Senate than I do at this moment, but there are some things I feel it necessary to say to my colleagues on this question, so vital to the veterans of this Nation.

Mr. President, we are about to return to our respective constituencies. I say to my colleagues that we are going to face great groups of wronged veterans who are enraged by what we have done in this session of the Congress. I am not talking about non-service-connected damaged men; I am talking about those who suffered combat injuries, and who are suffering from broken bodies directly traceable to the war. It would not be true to great groups of men and women in my State if I did not face the wrath of a Senate anxious to adjourn, long enough certainly to say a few words on this subject.

I suppose that what I am going to say might more properly be said in the Democratic caucus of the Senate than to be said in the Senate proper. But I want to call the attention of my Democratic colleagues to the fact that there will be practically 100 percent vote for this amendment on the opposite side of the aisle.

Mr. President, if I may repeat, there will be practically 100 percent vote on the other side of the aisle in favor of the pending amendment. That will be accepted by the public as an evidence that the Republican Party is the party that befriends the soldier.

We have had here the threat of a veto, and the charge has been made that the lash is being applied to place the Democratic side in line. That, too, will be used throughout the country as an evidence that the Democratic Party is unfriendly to the soldier. It will still further consolidate the position of the Republican Party. I would not be true to my party if I did not say this much, even though it may be thought by some to be in bad taste.

Let me remind my friends in the Senate that we did not cut our own salaries 25 percent. We took a 15-percent cut. Fifteen percent off $10,000 is all we took.

I voted the other day against the Connally amendment. I did not think then, and I do not think now, that it would be decent for me, at least, to vote for a 25-percent cut in the veterans' compensation, when I took only a 15-percent cut in my own salary.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, did not the President take a cut in his own salary? How much was that cut?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I did not yield for that particular question. I do not want to pass criticism on anybody. I am not going to criticize the President or any Senator. I voted for a 15-percent cut in my own salary, and it is not decent for me to vote for a 15-percent cut in my own salary and ask that there be a 25-percent cut in the compensation of veterans. That is the way I feel about it.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the Steiwer amendment provides for a cut of 25 percent.

Mr. COPELAND. Not to exceed 25 percent.

Mr. President, I am not going to be diverted, and I am not going to split hairs.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I simply want to ask the Senator if he is not overlooking the fact that while we cut our salaries only 15 percent we increased the income tax very materially and cut our mileage 25 percent, and that the veterans, as I understand, do not pay any income tax on the amount they receive from the Government.

Mr. COPELAND. I heard today about one veteran—one veteran of the Spanish-American War—who used his pension to pay his income tax. That is the case of one swallow making a summer. There is not another case like it to be found in the history of our country; yet that was held up to us today as a reason why nobody should have a pension.

Why should we not pay our income taxes?

Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator misunderstood what I had in mind when I suggested that there was more than 15 percent taken from our salary. The extra income tax amounts to $300 or $400; mileage was cut one fourth; and, adding the items together, I think the cut amounts to 20 percent instead of 15 percent.

Mr. COPELAND. Well, let us say the cut was 20 percent. But now we are being urged to provide that the veterans shall take 25 percent.

I remember very well that after the armistice I myself served upon a soldiers' reception committee in New York. On Fifth Avenue we erected benches along the park and in front of the public library. With the greatest of enthusiasm we welcomed back these boys. We were ready then to give them everything in the world. In the language of New York, "We promised them the Woolworth Building, and now we are giving them doughnuts." It is not fair; it is not just.

When we passed the economy bill we never dreamed that the things would happen that have happened; and I want the law written so definitely and so specifically that some veterans' administrator will not provide regulations to determine just how much these boys shall have. I want it written in language that the man who runs may read and understand.

I think the Steiwer-Cutting amendment is fair; it is clear-cut. It goes further in percentage than I would have it go, but it does not leave to administrative officers to say how much the cut shall be or how it shall be handled.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYDEN in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I hope the Senator from New York will make it clear when he says the percentage goes further than he would go that he means it cuts the veterans further than he would want to cut them.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes. I thank the Senator. We ought not to cut these men 25 percent. I voted for the Trammell amendment because it was, in my opinion, a fairer amendment. If we had adopted the Trammell amendment, we would have had something to present to the other House that would have had in it the opportunity for compromise. There would have been brought back in the compromise something which would be much more liberal than anything we may now adopt.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I have heard it stated here on the floor of the Senate repeatedly today in the debate on this subject that the economy bill would never have passed if any Member of the Senate or any Member of the House had had any idea that cuts of more than 25 percent were to be imposed on the veterans; and yet, Mr. President, it was repeatedly stated on the floor of the Senate during the debate on the economy bill that a saving of $400,000,000 was to be effected, and it is impossible to conceive of any way in which a saving of $400,000,000 could be effected without making cuts of more than 25 percent. The Senator will recall that on the floor of the Senate when I offered an amendment for a cut of 25 percent it was voted down, and I was not even able to get a roll call on it.

Mr. COPELAND. So far as I am concerned—I can speak for nobody else—I never dreamed that such cruelties would be perpetrated upon the men who fought for our country; I do not care whether they were drafted or they volunteered, they did go out, ready to give their lives to their country, and many of them did. I never voted believing that any such regulations could have been formulated by anybody who had a heart in his body.

I want to say something about the "pauper oath." We pride ourselves that we live in a democratic country. I do not want any American citizen to have to go to any official and make oath that his need is such that he must have relief. I want every soldier treated just like every other soldier. I do not want these veterans to have this money because we are extending charity.

We have always resisted the idea that this payment was anything except compensation for services rendered. These men went away, many of them under draft. Other men who had disabilities, but not enough to keep them from their ordinary activities, were permitted to stay at home and earn money—much money. When we passed the Adjusted Compensation Act it was with the idea of returning to these men some of the money they might have earned had they had physical disabilities and stayed at home.

Now, when we talk about giving them this compensation we demand that they shall take an oath that their poverty is such that they need this money and must have it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. There were 280,000 soldiers engaged in the battles of our country in the Spanish-American War. Fifty-seven thousand of those soldiers suffered from dysentery from either the amoebic form or the Shiga's infection. Twenty-one thousand of them suffered from typhoid fever due to the Eberth' bacillus or from paratyphoid, making altogether 30 percent of the 280,000 soldiers who were infected with either one of those maladies. What would the Senator say, from the standpoint of a physician, as to the percentage of those men who would acquire a permanent disability because of such infection?

Mr. COPELAND. I remember very well, Mr. President, that we sent an army down to Chickamauga Park, was it not? They went down there and died of typhoid fever like flies. I do not care whether the Spanish-American War veteran ever faced a volley or not; he faced death in a more terrible form than those men who faced the rifles on the battlefields.

Mr. HATFIELD. And the complications that followed.

Mr. COPELAND. And every man who suffered at Chickamauga and recovered some degree of health after having typhoid fever was a weakened man from that day forward and was not competent physically to do what a well man could do.

Mr. President, there is not any question at all that the Spanish-American War veterans faced disease and death in more terrible form than any soldiers who have since been in battle. Yet we know of such cases as the one to which I referred the other day, of a man who had been a major in the Spanish-American War, who was wounded during that war, who also suffered disease during his service, who now at 70 years of age is broken in health, and yet has had his pension reduced from $50 a month to $6 a month as a result of "regulations."

I do not want any regulations; I want the law written so that everybody may know exactly what it means. It should be understandable without the intervention of any Veterans' Administrator.

Finally, Mr. President—and I speak once more to my colleagues on this side—we render a disservice to our great President if we fail to guard him from the actions of cold-blooded officials. No man who has ever been elected to the Presidency had more friends than Mr. Roosevelt. I spent the day yesterday in my State. I had dinner last night with a great group of business men in one of the leading cities of my State, 90 percent of them, at least, being Republicans. Every man there had kind words to say for President Roosevelt. He has the respect, the regard, and the affection of the American people, and, so far as I am concerned, may I say to my Democratic colleagues, I want him to retain that respect and regard and affection. It is not right that we should menace his popularity by permitting the passage of any law which will impose unnecessary hardships upon any man in America.

My plea to you—and particularly because the threat of a veto has been made—my plea to you is to do what you think is right; what you think is right for the party, what you think is right for the President, and, above all, to do that which you think is right by the veterans.

Many of these veterans and their wives have made financial commitments; they have purchased homes, expecting that the contract made with the United States Government was a valid contract. Let us not, Senators, now take this step which will ruin them financially and break their hearts.

Let us not do that which will threaten the popularity of our President and hamper him in his great work.

He is doing a great work; our country recognizes it. The Congress during the past 3 months has done more than all the Congresses that have convened for 40 years past. If we can have a real recovery of business, as I believe we are going to have—and recovery is now on the way—let us not hamper it or interfere with it by any action which will impair the influence of the President.

So, Mr. President, my appeal, particularly to my own colleagues, but also to the entire Senate, is to do right by these men who fought for us.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I can state very briefly and directly my position on the pending amendment. In a word, I am going to vote for the pending amendment because I have lost faith and confidence in the bureau of the Government entrusted by the Congress with making economies in veterans' compensations and pensions upon a liberal and just basis. That is a strong statement, but I submit that the facts justify it and lead to no other conclusion. Let us review them briefly.

Shortly after the 4th of March we enacted the economy law. The banks of the country were closed. The credit of the Government was threatened. The President asked Congress to give him the power to make drastic reductions in the expenses of the Government, to cut salaries, and to rewrite all legislation affecting the veterans of all wars. We gave him that power willingly. The country demanded and approved it. On the floor of the Senate I, myself, with other Senators, pleaded that he be given that power, expressing my sincere confidence in the belief that he would administer with liberality and with justice the extraordinary powers granted. Because we all believed reasonable and not unfair regulations would be adopted, we voted for the bill. On that occasion I offered an amendment on the floor of the Senate. I said, whatever else we do in transmitting this power to the President, let us not leave the battle-casualty veterans to the whims of any Government bureau. I asked that they be protected from bureaucratic uncertainty and a definite policy toward them be declared, and that their rights, subject to reasonable reductions, be defined with certainty.

In fairness to the Government, I inserted in that amendment a provision which permitted the Government, in case a veteran's condition improved or he recovered, to readjust the compensation base. Had I offered on that occasion an amendment that no disabled veteran whose disability was service connected could be cut, undoubtedly and unquestionably such an amendment would have gone into the bill. But in fairness to the Government itself, so that it could not and ought not to pay veterans when they recovered from their disability the same compensation as before, I allowed a phrase to be inserted in the amendment giving the Government elasticity as to rates.

Now, let us consider how this amendment, declaring a congressional policy in behalf of disabled veterans with service connections, was distorted and perverted. Let us analyze the attitude of mind applied to interpret this amendment.

On April 20 regulations were promulgated under the power which we decreed in the economy law. That these regulations shocked all who had knowledge of veterans' legislation cannot be denied. I do not hesitate to say that I have not found anyone from the highest to the lowest official of the Government who has undertaken to justify or defend these regulations. Every strong adjective which could be found has been resorted to by conservative and informed Members of the Congress in order to describe the character of those regulations. "Inhuman", "unjust", "cruel", "brutal", have been the descriptive words. I have heard a Senator on this floor assert that these regulations were reasonable or just.

Even the National Economy League, which appeared before the special joint congressional committee studying veterans' legislation, asking to have the overgenerous benefits that the Congress had enacted in the days of prosperity repealed or modified, protested, and some of them denounced as too drastic the regulations which were issued by the Government. Even the very forces that appeared before the committee of this body trying to battle down, and in many cases remove, in view of the economic conditions in this country, the laws where we had been overindulgent and extravagant in our benefits to the veterans, protested vigorously against these regulations. Senators and Representatives protested. In the press and in public meetings protests were made, and day went after day until finally came the 20th of May, when we began talking about adjournment, when Congress was getting nervous and restless, and when Members of Congress felt that they could not go back to their constituents to defend these regulations after having voted this power to the President.

Mr. President, on the 20th of May, when rumblings were becoming widespread, when it was known that the Congress was becoming rebellious at the delay in correcting the generally admitted injustices, a new set of regulations containing slight modifications were issued. These regulations are before us. They do not meet with the approval of those who sought justice for the veterans, and yet were willing to accept and support the economy program of the administration.

What was the next concession? The House amendment. When it was found that the Senate had adopted the Connally amendment another concession through the House provision was proposed. Again, after the hospital amendment had been adopted, knowing the temper and spirit of this body, a further concession was made and today we received the additional Spanish-American War prospective benefits.

Mr. President, this is a story of hesitancy and indifference for which every Democrat will have to apologize.

It has been like getting blood out of a turnip, like getting blood out of a corpse, to get liberal regulations for the veterans of the World War.

The proposition now is to let that same Bureau continue to make regulations and dispense justice, when we have had to fight and fight to obtain the slightest concessions to deserving veterans and their dependents.

I am going back to my constituents for the first time since I have been in this Chamber with my party in power. I will go rejoicing, except for our record toward the veterans. I believe the record has been a glorious one on the whole. Even if we have differed in some few particulars, we can all agree that the President has shown mastership and leadership that has inspired us and that has commanded the approval of the country. Yes, in a few days I shall go home to a community in Massachusetts of 12,000 people with its factories closed and only 400 or 500 people out of the 12,000 employed. I can patiently listen to their tales. I can make some explanation and offer some hope to them because of the record this administration has made in their behalf, but when I see those wounded and diseased veterans, when I see those widows and orphans who are penniless by Governmental decree, I shall have no defense. When I see, as I will see, marching into my home, the unemployed, battle-scarred veterans, the insane and tubercular veterans, asking me to explain why my party repealed or reduced to a pittance their benefits, I must admit that I cannot defend many of the acts of injustice that I feel have been inflicted upon them. I should like to hear some Senator here make a defense. I should like to hear somebody say these regulations are fair and just and all that the veterans are entitled to because of the need of economy. What Senator, I inquire, can write in all honesty to a constituent of his and say, "I uphold and defend the veterans' regulations of the Government; they are just and fair to the veterans and to the taxpayer"?

Mr. President, look at the table inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] setting forth a few cases of what has been done, not to those who have benefits because of presumptions of disease contracted in the service, but those who received serious wounds in actual combat. Let me read only a few of them. Here is one with a gunshot wound whose old rating was $17 and new rating $8; gunshot wound, old rating $49, new rating $20; pleurisy $27, reduced to $8; heart $70, reduced to $40; gunshot wound, paralysis from discharge, $100, reduced to $20; three gunshot wounds $40, reduced to $20; amputation right leg $80, to $40; shrapnel wound in head and high explosive $77, reduced to $20; deafness in combat $39, to $18; gunshot wound $71, to $20.

Mr. President, the indefensible and extreme character of these regulations can be best understood by quoting some statistics furnished by the Veterans' Administration itself.

Prior to the Economy Act, the annual expenditure for disability compensation was $204,620,000. This includes disabled and diseased veterans of service connection origin, and also that class of veterans who are insane or diseased and have been compensated on the presumption that their diseases were the result of their military service.

The Economy League recommended reductions for this class so that the disbursement would be about $125,000,000. The regulations issued by the President reduced these allowances to $64,902,000 annually, which is $156,837,875 less than the appropriation made in the independent offices appropriation bill that passed the Congress prior to the 4th of March, but which was not signed by President Hoover. These figures show a total reduction of 70.72 percent in compensation to this class, which is a reduction which no one can or no one has defended.

It is a reduction that will bring misery, suffering, and destitution to many veterans injured in actual service, and also to their dependents.

A few more facts pointing out the extreme reductions that have been made are as follows: The compensation paid to widows and dependents of World War veterans has been reduced 34.60 percent. The pensions paid to Spanish War veterans have been reduced 66.61 percent. The reductions in both these classes of beneficiaries was greatly in excess of that recommended by the Economy League, who made an extensive study of the question of veterans' legislation, and recommended every possible reduction that they thought could be fairly made in justice to the veterans and to the taxpayers.

Were these awards originally just? If not, why should the officials be retained who fixed these rates? Are bureau officials expected to be honest with taxpayers only in periods of depression? If these are undeserving awards the fault is with the administration of the law and not in the law itself. That there may have been abuses and overratings is the fault of the administration and not Congress. What has been done to punish the responsible officials for these alleged discriminations and this favoritism that is alleged to have cost millions of dollars? These are not presumptive cases, not men reeking with tuberculosis, not men crazy mad and insane, not veterans who are unable to trace their disease to service, but men with battle wounds. Who can defend in the name of economy such cuts and slashes?

What is now proposed? We are asked to continue the same authority and the same discretion in that very Bureau where this record of extreme reductions has been written. As for me, I cannot do it. Mr. President, it seems to me there has been an atmosphere of indifference if not actual hostility to the veterans in these bureaus. No man that I know of who has believed in and urged economy, who has devoted his efforts to helping the soldiers, has been invited to make suggestions in regard to these regulations or in regard to changes that might right the errors made and the injustices done.

I repeat, I am convinced that there is an atmosphere of antagonism and hostility to veterans' petitions where pity and sympathy ought to go hand in hand with reductions and economy. I may be mistaken. I hope I do not do anybody an injustice, but the facts show, and the record shows that we have had to plead and fight from the day the economy bill was passed to this day, and only when the Congress was on the threshold of adjournment have we obtained, and grudgingly made, the slight and yet inadequate concessions that have been made here to remedy regulations no Member of the Senate defends.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Speaking of the atmosphere which has been going out from these quarters all over the country, may I quote a telegram which I received this morning, which is the direct result of that kind of propaganda? I do not know the author of the telegram. He lives in New York. The telegram reads:

> Go home. Stop stealing the taxpayers' money to pay pensions to men who never lost a finger nail in actual military service. Go home.

That is what we are faced with. People think we are fighting for men who do not deserve to be on the rolls—for grafters, for panhandlers. That is the result of the propaganda that is going out from Washington, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, what is the present proposition? The proposition is to instill hope and confidence that justice will be done, but they must put their trust in the same bureau that presented a record of indifference to our obligations. It is a declaration that we must recognize economy, yes, but an economy that cuts all veterans and puts whole groups off the pension roll and reduces the widows and dependents of veterans to a mere pittance. I do not admit that our economic condition requires this extreme treatment.

On the other side, we have an amendment that will settle this issue, that will make the veterans feel that we have treated them fairly, and that can be defended both as an economy measure and as just to the veterans.

Mr. President, as between those two alternatives I have no hesitancy as to what I shall do.

Mr. President, one of the best definitions of justice I have ever heard is by the poet Whittier:

> Justice: The hope of all who do right, and the fear of all who do wrong.

Mr. President, if we have not hope of knowing that which we do is right, that it will be supported and sustained, then we will have at least our conscience to sustain us. But there is justice, and we are fighting injustice—3 months of injustice; 3 months of pleading and begging to change regulations that all concede are extreme, drastic, and unfair. Were the original regulations just? If so, why the modifications? If the other concessions made were just, why have we been continuously changing them?

I am for this amendment because it is just. It is fair to the country for it reduces benefits that should be reduced, in view of our economic condition. It is fair to the veteran. It protects the rights of service-connected disability veterans. I shall vote for it, and go back home, look my constituents in the face, and say to them, "Yes; I recognize that the economy law I voted for did you an injustice that I did not anticipate, but I took the first opportunity presented when I discovered it to try to restore the measure of justice to which all reasonable people think you are entitled. I insisted that you share in the economies necessitated by present conditions in America but I have tried to be reasonable and fair and not extreme, unjust, or unmindful of the debt of gratitude we owe you."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have listened with so much interest to Senators here who grow enthusiastic over the Steiwer amendment, and attack with great vehemence the House provision with the Byrnes amendment attached, that I have secured the two amendments and tried to read them and understand them. Frankly, with the exception of the last paragraph of the Steiwer amendment, one is just as indefinite as the other, and just as hard for any ordinary man to understand; and I submit that it is just as impossible to tell what is going to happen under either one as it is under the other.

The vice of both of these propositions is that there is not a specific, definite, written statement in either with the exception of the last paragraph of the Steiwer amendment. Both of them create boards. Both of them give the right to overturn these pensions that are being paid. Neither of them does the thing that Senators talk about as the thing that should be done. One has tried to imitate the other. Worst of all, in my judgment, is the fact that the language of the last six lines of the Steiwer amendment will permit the cutting of the pensions of Civil War veterans to the extent of 25 percent. I do not think the Senator intended that. I maintain, however, that it is the only fair construction to put on that language.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. The language was drawn in such a way that it would not cut the pensions of the Civil War veterans; and if the Senator will examine the Economy Act, and advise with the drafting bureau and our own lawyers, as I did, he will change his view upon that subject.

Mr. DILL. It may be that that is true.

Mr. STEIWER. It is true.

Mr. DILL. But the language is so simple that I do not see how any man who reads the English language can misunderstand it, because it wipes out any provision of the Economy Act, Public Law No. 2, that interferes with this. If the Senator wants to stand on it, he can do so; but I would not vote for anything that would by any possibility allow the pensions of Civil War veterans to be cut 25 percent.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator from Washington said that this would interfere with the provisions of the Economy Act. The Senator supported the Connally amendment for a 25-percent reduction in order to defeat a limitation of 15 percent; and that amendment specifically provided that in the case of all wars preceding the World War, as well as those after the World War, a 25-percent reduction should be permitted. I called attention to that specifically on the floor of the Senate and asked Senators if they wanted to vote to reduce Civil War veterans' pensions 25 percent. In spite of my calling their attention to it, the Senator saw fit to take that in preference to the limitation of 15 percent.

Mr. DILL. I desire to say to the Senator that I never had any conception that the Connally amendment did that, and I do not believe it did it. Nevertheless, the point I make is that the Steiwer amendment as it is written here, with the exception of the last paragraph, does not differ enough from the House amendment to be worth fighting about.

There are two bad features of the last paragraph of the Steiwer amendment. One is that it opens the door to cutting the pensions of Civil War veterans 25 percent; and anyone who will read it cannot put any other meaning on it, regardless of drafting attorneys or anybody else. The second bad feature about it is that it places on exactly the same basis the men who have been placed upon the rolls because they are past 62 years of age and those who have not been placed on the rolls on that basis.

I desire to offer as an amendment to the House provision and in addition to the Byrnes amendment, an amendment that will provide that notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 2, no Spanish-American War veteran or veteran of the Boxer rebellion or the Philippine insurrection who is past the age of 62 years and who was entitled to and receiving a pension under the laws existing prior to March 20, 1933, shall be reduced more than 25 percent.

If that amendment is adopted, the dollar-a-day men, the men who are on the rolls because they are past 62 years old, cannot be cut more than 25 percent. That was the intent of the Senate when my amendment was adopted to the Economy Act. Nobody ever dreamed that these men past 62 years would be cut below $20 a month at most.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Do I understand that the Senator says that the language—

> Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the pension paid to veterans of any war prior to the World War, or to any widow and/or dependent of such veterans shall not be reduced more than 25 percent of the amount being paid prior to March 20, 1933—means that the Civil War veterans' pensions can be cut?

Mr. DILL. Why not?

Mr. WHEELER. Why, of course, it does not do anything of the kind.

Mr. DILL. Why not? Was not the Civil War before the World War?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but the public act referred to does not give any authority to cut the pensions of Civil War veterans. Consequently, this measure simply says that under any law that is previously passed giving the right to cut pensions, they shall not be cut more than 25 percent.

Mr. DILL. The Economy Act permits them to be cut 10 percent.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Economy Act permit the Civil War veterans' pensions to be cut 10 percent?

Mr. WHEELER. What I am saying is that this amendment simply says that under any act under which they have previously been able to cut them more than 25 percent, they shall not under this provision be able to cut them more than 25 percent.

Mr. DILL. It does not say that. It says notwithstanding any provision of that act.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, it says that.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Let me remind the Senator from Washington, in order that he may be relieved of his distress, that the pension laws providing pensions for Civil War veterans were not repealed. The Economy Act repealed certain other pension laws, but did not repeal those laws; and those laws now stand unimpaired in every respect, except that in the Economy Act the rate for the fiscal year was cut down 10 percent.

Mr. DILL. Perhaps the Senator is right.

Mr. STEIWER. I know I am right. I do not like to be so sure about it, but I spent some hours in arriving at a conclusion concerning the matter.

Mr. DILL. At any rate, I should like to see the amendment written so that there cannot be any question about it.

The other point I desire to make against the Senator's amendment is that he puts the men who are not 62 years of age on the same basis as those who are past 62 years of age.

There has been for a considerable period of years in this country a pension law providing that when any man who was in the Spanish War reached the age of 62 years, he was entitled to a pension of $30 a month. Until that time he was entitled to a pension only on the basis of disability. I believe there should be a difference, and I believe there properly is a difference between those who have not been put on the roll because of age and those who have been put on because of disability.

For that reason I am offering this amendment to perfect the House amendment, in addition to the Byrnes amendment—not as a part of it but in addition to the Byrnes amendment. It will insure that every Spanish War veteran past the age of 62 years, now on the rolls, shall not be cut more than 25 percent, and then those who are between 55 and 62 will come under the provisions of the Byrnes amendment. With that change in it there is not enough difference between the two amendments to be worth fighting about so far as the language of the House section and the language of the Senator from Oregon is concerned.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUTTING. For 4 hours on Monday the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and I stood on the floor of this Chamber explaining the differences between these two amendments. I am sorry the Senator from Washington does not agree with us that the differences amount to anything; but, if that is the case, will the Senator explain why one of these propositions is sure to be vetoed and the other one will be accepted?

Mr. DILL. The reason, I understand, is because of the difference in the amount that it will cost the Government. That is one of the reasons. Another is that it is claimed that there are included in this amendment certain presumptive cases that are not included in the other.

Mr. CUTTING. Then certainly there are some substantial differences.

Mr. DILL. But the trouble is that the language of both of them is so involved that a man would need to take 2 or 3 days to analyze them, sentence by sentence, to get the legal effect of them. I am always annoyed by language that is so written that the average man cannot understand it, to say nothing of a man who is familiar with legal terms.

I do not want to delay the Senate. I do want to offer this amendment, and have it read at the desk, and ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add a new paragraph after the amendment of Mr. BYRNES, as follows:

> Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, no pension of any veteran of the Spanish-American War, the Boxer rebellion, and the Philippine insurrection who is past the age of 62 years and was entitled to a pension and being paid under the laws existing prior to March 20, 1933, shall be reduced more than 25 percent.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a perfecting amendment. It is in order and takes precedence over the substitute. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 47, as amended. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. LONG. I just wanted to make that inquiry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, when the President of the United States announced this afternoon through his natural spokesman in this body, the Senator from Arkansas, that it was his intention to veto the independent offices appropriation bill if it should contain the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, he did so assuming the responsibility of his high office, under his own oath, performing his own duty as God gives him to see his duty. It now devolves on each individual Senator, under his individual oath of office, on his personal responsibility, to make up his own mind and to perform his duty according to the dictates of his own conscience.

Mr. President, the situation in which the Senate and the country find themselves today vividly illustrates the dangers and the vice of the Congress of the United States in abdicating its constitutional functions and granting to the Executive powers and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution of the United States. This situation does not arise today; it did not arise yesterday. This situation takes its origin in the month of March 1933, when the Congress of the United States deliberately abdicated its own functions, tied its own hands, and delegated to administrative officials appointed by the President of the United States powers and duties which the Constitution of the United States had imposed upon the Congress. We had a right to assume, and those of our number who are members of the Finance Committee were put on notice that what has been done would be done. I voted against the Economy Act; and, whatever may be its effects upon my personal political fortunes, that is one of the things which I wish to be written on my tombstone when I am dead.

It ill behooves anyone who deliberately signs a blank check to protest that the amount filled in is greater than the signer happened to expect. Under the powers conferred in the Economy Act, the administrative officials of the Veterans' Administration and of the Bureau of the Budget have made regulations which contain instance after instance of what is generally recognized on all sides as constituting most execrable cruelty. The men who prepared those regulations must have hearts of ice. So flagrant has been the situation that a demand has arisen on all sides for a liberalization of those regulations for the purpose of undoing some of the inequities and injustices therein contained.

When the independent offices appropriation bill came into the Senate, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and I collaborated in the preparation of an amendment which he offered in our joint names. That amendment at that time represented not what we should have liked to do in the way of removing the inequities and cruelties of the regulations promulgated by the Veterans' Administration, but it did represent the absolute maximum we had any hope at that time of being able to enact into law as an amendment on this legislation.

Mr. President, in the progress of the debate, in the exposition of the regulations, and in the consideration of instance after instance of gross unfairness and of gross cruelty wrought by those regulations, sentiment was created in this body which went far beyond the scope of the original Cutting amendment. I say frankly, as I said a moment ago, that the only reason why the Cutting amendment was originally limited as it was, was that we believed that to be the absolute maximum we had any opportunity of enacting. If I had any hope now, Mr. President, that affirmative Senate action on the Steiwer-Cutting amendment would contribute to the amelioration of the inequities of the regulations already promulgated, my vote would be cast for this amendment. My only purpose has been throughout to obtain the maximum consideration for those cases of disability of service origin and of those cases involving a presumption where the presumption amounts almost to a certainty that the disablement either originated in or was accentuated by military or naval service.

The Senate agreed to the Connally amendment, representing a still further advance over what the Senator from New Mexico and myself had originally contended for, a very much greater advance over the scope of the original Cutting amendment. The House of Representatives refused to accept the Connally amendment. The conference report came before us, and before its consideration was begun I joined in conference with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and others for the purpose of agreeing on a parliamentary procedure by which we would be able to insure a vote on the original Cutting amendment.

Mr. President, I favor the provisions of the Steiwer amendment with every fiber of my being. If I believed there was any chance of the Steiwer amendment's being enacted into law, I should unhesitatingly vote for it. If I believed that we could pass the bill over the President's veto, when he vetoes it, I should unhesitatingly vote to put the amendment in and vote to pass the bill over the President's veto. If the Steiwer amendment is adopted and the President vetoes the bill, as he has pledged himself to do, I will vote to pass the bill over his veto.

We are confronted with a practical situation in this matter, however. As an old colored man out in Missouri used to say, I would rather have part of something than all of nothing. [Laughter.]

The provision of the House amendment unquestionably represents a great advance in the liberalization of the regulations promulgated by the Veterans' Administration. It provides for payments of $50,000,000 in excess of those which would be provided for under present regulations. It provides for restoring to the roll 156,000 presumptive cases, not permanently, I grant, but it would restore 156,000 presumptive cases which are about to be stricken off. These men will be put back pending the time that there can be a complete review of the cases.

It contains substantially, although in somewhat different language, the provisions of the amendment which the Senator from New Mexico and I originally offered.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, may I recall to the Senator the language of the amendment which he and I introduced?—

> Nothing in this act shall authorize the President to reduce to a degree greater than 25 percent the compensation, pension, or allowance of any veteran or dependent of a veteran—

And so on. Those words "compensation, pension, or allowance", as I remember it, were insisted on by the Senator from Missouri in order that there might be no room for argument whatever.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. CUTTING. Will the Senator from Missouri compare those words with the words contained in the so-called "House amendment", "Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the rates of compensation payable for directly service-connected disabilities", and so on, be reduced more than 25 percent. Does the Senator think those words mean the same thing, and if they do not, why should not the House compromise have adopted the word "compensation" instead of the words "rates of compensation"?

Mr. CLARK. So far as I am concerned, I much prefer the word "compensation" to the words "rates of compensation." On the other hand, it is perfectly obvious that the term "rates of compensation" was inserted in the amendment on the theory that to the extent to which a veteran's condition was improved, his compensation should be correspondingly reduced, and it was for that reason that those words were used.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, because this is the second or third time the statement has been made, I ask the Senator from Missouri to yield to me.

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Under the contention of the Senator from New Mexico, if the amendment contains the statement that the compensation received by a veteran on the date mentioned should not be reduced more than 25 percent, the effect would be that if on that day there were a veteran who had been determined to be suffering from a disability of 50 percent, and upon a subsequent examination it should be found that he no longer suffered any disability, under the language for which the Senator from New Mexico contends, he would still have to be paid compensation upon the basis of what he was receiving in March less 25 percent.

Mr. CUTTING. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The language of the amendment provides that the rate of compensation shall be reduced not more than 25 percent. Therefore, if in March there were a veteran who was determined to be suffering with a disability of 50 percent, by this amendment the rate of his compensation could not be reduced more than 25 percent; but should a veteran, some individual, heretofore determined to be suffering with a disability of 50 or 75 percent, be cured, and no longer suffer with any disability, the administration would not be forced to pay him the disability allowance he was receiving last year less 25 percent. The words "rates of compensation" are essential to the intelligent administration of that provision.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, it is quite obvious, from what the Senator from South Carolina has said, that he has not read the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, because beginning with line 14, page 4, it is provided:

> That in the event of a change in the degree of disability of any such veteran the amount of compensation payable shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect prior to March 20, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced by more than 25 percent.

It is perfectly clear, from that language, that the Veterans' Administration has complete ability to rerate the veteran.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from New Mexico has made that statement, and because I know him, I know that he is sincere in it; but, at the same time, I am absolutely satisfied that there is no justification for the contention. It is never the intention, under this amendment, that anything should occur other than that which the Senator from New Mexico has said, but I contend that it is absolutely essential that the words "rates of compensation" should be included instead of "compensation." Otherwise, any man on the rolls in March would have to be paid the compensation he was then receiving, even if it were determined, and he admitted, he was suffering no disability at all.

Mr. CUTTING. Then what meaning does the Senator attach to the proviso beginning with line 14?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have not before me the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, but I know the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico accomplishes the same result that will be accomplished, which is the only intent of the amendment which was adopted in the House, and which is offered here, and the ex-service men of the House, Mr. PATMAN, of Texas, Mr. BROWNING, of Tennessee, and others, who know this law as no other men know it, agreed to that, and they were right.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, all I can say is that the Senator from South Carolina makes that statement on the same authority back of all the other statements made on this floor from the beginning of the debate on the Economy Act, and we have found again and again that in administering the act no attention whatever has been paid to the pledges which have been made on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for one observation? I do not want to interrupt his remarks.

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. The position of the Senator from South Carolina has been most thoroughly considerate, but after the Senator from Missouri shall have concluded his remarks and I can be recognized I am sure those of us who are responsible for the language which appears in the Steiwer-Cutting amendment can make it entirely clear to the Senator that his contention is unfounded, that the language in the House proposal is utterly inadequate, and that language of the kind we have used is absolutely essential. I will not take time to make the explanation until later.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I much prefer the Steiwer amendment to the House substitute. I would gladly go much farther than the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Mexico go in their proposition, but what is the situation with which we are confronted? By the broad grant of power contained in the Economy Act we have created such a situation that there is no power on the face of the earth to interfere with the regulations promulgated by the Veterans' Administration without the consent of the President, except by a two-thirds majority of both bodies. As far as I am concerned, I am in absolute sympathy with the purposes of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, and if it is inserted in the pending measure and the bill is later vetoed by the President and again comes before this body for consideration, I shall vote to override the veto. This, however, is not the situation which confronts the Senate today.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that I heard the statement of the Senator from Arkansas to the effect that the President would veto this bill if the Cutting-Steiwer amendment were agreed to. I am satisfied, however, that the reason why that statement is made is the fact that the President of the United States does not understand the full purport of the Cutting-Steiwer amendment. I am just as sure as that I am standing here that the President of the United States would not think of vetoing the bill if misrepresentations had not been made to him with reference to the exact meaning of it from the experts of the department.

What the Senator from South Carolina says with reference to the Cutting-Steiwer amendment convinces me that not only has the President been misled with reference to the matter but that the Senator from South Carolina has been because I do not see how anybody can read the language of that amendment and come to the conclusion to which the Senator from South Carolina has come, and I am sure that he has been given wrong information about it; and not only that, but the experts who have been advising the President from the Veterans' Administration have given him the wrong information.

It seems to me that it is too bad, if I may say so to the Senator from Missouri, that we should be quibbling about a matter that is due entirely, in my judgment, to the experts of the Veterans' Bureau who are desirous to have their way and to impose their will upon the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator from Montana that I would not put anything past the officials of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am sure that they have given the wrong information and a misinterpretation. The trouble seems to be that the Senate is going to be forced to act because of the views of a few experts of the Veterans' Bureau, who have given the Senate misinformation, who have misled the President of the United States, and who have misled the Congress of the United States.

It is said we must go ahead and follow their judgment or the judgment of some one of these experts. I, for one, am not willing to see the veterans of the Nation sacrificed because some little expert in the Veterans' Administration says that we have got to do this or we have got to do that. I wish the Senator from South Carolina, for whose judgment I have great respect, and who, I am sure, has worked zealously and faithfully in this matter, and the leader on this side of the House, for whose judgment I have great respect in legal matters, would take the time to sit down and analyze this proposal instead of taking the judgment of the experts and the judgment of somebody else. I am sure if they will do that they will come to the conclusion that the Steiwer amendment does not bind the hands of the President of the United States. It does not bind the Department if the desire is to do what is right.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know about the Senator from Arkansas, but certainly, so far as the Senator from South Carolina is concerned, the statement he has made is based upon his reading of the language of the amendment. I have never had any doubt about the interpretation of it. It never was suggested until it was suggested by the Senator from New Mexico that the proposal could be interpreted in any other way. But if it be true, if the Senator be correct, and the Veterans' Administration has construed it as I have construed it, then the Senator from Montana, for once, is safe, and this language will be construed as we intend it to be construed.

If it be a fact that they have agreed with that construction, it makes certain that there will not be more than a 25-percent reduction in the rate of compensation that was received by any veteran on a given date in March. That is what the Senator from New Mexico wants; and if the Veterans' Administration is in accord with that construction, then we are all agreed that is what will happen and nothing more.

Mr. WHEELER. But how can the Senator say, with the proviso in his amendment, that it limits the cut to the compensation received on the given date in March, when it expressly says that there shall be a rerating? I am at a loss to understand how the Senator from South Carolina or anyone else can come to the conclusion that the veterans cannot be rerated in the event that their disability has been overcome, we will say, to the extent of 50 percent.

Mr. BYRNS. I concede that that could be done. If a man was 50 percent disabled in March, and was awarded a pension and since then has entirely recovered, would the Senator think that because he was disabled in March, but has now entirely recovered, he should receive compensation for 50-percent disability?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course not.

Mr. BYRNES. That is all that is provided.

Mr. WHEELER. I say that under the provisos in this amendment they can eliminate that man entirely from the roll of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. BYRNES. Undoubtedly under the House amendment that can be done; the rate of compensation cannot be changed, but if a man's disability has changed he is eliminated. If it be determined that a veteran is not disabled, he goes off the rolls; but if he stays on the rolls the rate of compensation for the disability remains the same; the rate of compensation remains the same though the rate of disability does not remain the same. If next year a man recovers and becomes entirely well, he goes off the rolls under either provision. If he stays on the rolls, under the House amendment, the rate of compensation cannot be reduced more than 25 percent. I am absolutely certain about that and absolutely sincere in the belief that the gentlemen who prepared the amendment are absolutely correct.

Mr. WHEELER. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator, and if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, I should like to ask another question.

Mr. CLARK. I yield to all Senators engaged, for I think this is a helpful colloquy.

Mr. WHEELER. Do I understand the Senator to contend that if a year ago a veteran was disabled 50 percent and today his disability has disappeared, that, under the Cutting amendment, he would not be removed from the rolls?

Mr. BYRNES. No; I say he would be; and I say that under the House amendment, if his disabilities disappear, he would also go off the rolls.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course.

Mr. BYRNES. All the House amendment provides is that the rate of compensation to be paid for disability, assuming the compensation is $50 a month, shall not be reduced more that 25 percent; that the veteran shall not be reduced more than 25 percent for a 50-percent disability; but if the veteran recovers, if his disability disappears, he goes off the rolls. The rate of compensation for the disability remains the same, but he no longer receives it because he is no longer disabled.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, of course——

Mr. BYRNES. That is what the words "rate of compensation", as framed by gentlemen of the House, mean, and that is what they are intended to mean. I think the Senator from New Mexico has identically the same object in mind, and it is accomplished by his amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. It is accomplished?

Mr. BYRNES. It is.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood the Senator from South Carolina to say that it was not accomplished.

Mr. BYRNES. No; I say the same thing is accomplished under either amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in response to what the Senator from Montana said a few moments ago, I will say to him that personally I very deeply regret the position taken by the President of the United States. I feel, as does the Senator from Montana, every confidence that if the President of the United States had the opportunity of studying this matter as some others have he would not act upon the advice of the officials of the Veterans' Bureau. But, Mr. President, we are confronted by the fact that the President of the United States has officially announced, through his spokesman in this body, that he will veto this bill if it contains the Steiwer-Cutting amendment. Personally I regret very much that a matter of $30,000,000—large as it is actually but small as it is in comparison with the vast sums we are appropriating—should be allowed to stand in the way of further justice to the veterans of our wars. I wish the $30,000,000 might be scaled off the huge sums being spent on reforestation camps and used for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment; but I do believe, Mr. President, that while the provisions of the House substitute, with the addition of the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina which was adopted this morning, fall short of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, we are confronted with the necessity of taking the House substitute or running the danger of getting nothing, and that there will be no amelioration whatever of the effect of the regulations. For that reason——

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I will yield in just a moment. For that reason (and I can say, for the benefit of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that I am not one of the Senators who talked to the President or any Cabinet officer today) I am very reluctantly going to vote against the Steiwer amendment, in the hope of getting the utmost for the ex-service men that can now be secured. I now yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, in the event the Steiwer amendment should be adopted, and if the bill were vetoed, does the Senator see any way by which we could accomplish the same end as would be accomplished if the bill were passed with the Byrnes proposal adopted?

Mr. CLARK. I see no way except by overriding the President's veto in each House.

Mr. McGILL. In other words, if the Steiwer-Cutting amendment is adopted and then the bill be vetoed, the Senator takes the view that nothing can be done on behalf of the veterans?

Mr. CLARK. Under the powers granted by the Economy Act, the only way of which I know to change the regulations, without the consent of the President, would be by a two-thirds majority in each House. I do not believe that a two-thirds majority of each House could be obtained; and I am too much interested in the welfare of the veterans of this country to indulge in idle gestures; I am too much concerned about the welfare of the veterans of this country not to take what I can get, rather than to run the risk of losing everything that may be obtained.

So long as I may serve in this body I will never be willing to vote away the functions and duties imposed upon me by the Constitution and then to attempt to alibi myself to my constituents by idle gestures for political purposes.

Mr. LONG and Mr. STEIWER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47, as amended.

Mr. VANDENBERG and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, before the yeas and nays are ordered, I want to change one word in order to perfect the substitute. The Senator from New Mexico and I are under obligation to strike out the word "affirmative", on page 2, in line 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the modification suggested by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the yeas and nays not having been ordered, I think the modification may be made. We desire to strike out the word "affirmative", in line 22, page 2, and substitute for it the word "the", so that the line will read:

> Unless the evidence clearly discloses—

And so forth.

This modification, Mr. President, requires but little explanation. It makes it easier for the Bureau to rebut the presumption of service connection and to remove the veteran from the rolls. It is a concession to the Veterans' Administration, or to the White House, as the case may be, and is against the veteran; but we deem it more appropriate.

Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate for longer than 2 or 3 minutes. I now address myself to the question that has been discussed here late this afternoon by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], and others, because in my opinion it is the crux of the whole situation. Correct understanding of that question may determine the vote of Members of this body.

It was said earlier in the afternoon by those opposed to the Cutting-Steiwer substitute that there is so little difference between the two proposals that we might as well accept the House amendment. The explanation I hope to make will have a bearing upon that proposition, and I submit that it will convince any Senator who will listen to me that there is a most vital difference between the two, and that that difference justifies the Cutting-Steiwer proposal and condemns the House proposal.

The difference chiefly is in line 7, on page 4. The House proposal reads, commencing in line 6—

> That in no event shall the rate of compensation payable for directly service-connected disabilities * * * be cut more than 25 percent—

While in the Cutting-Steiwer proposal the language is that—

> In no event shall the compensation being paid for directly service-connected disabilities * * * be reduced more than 25 percent.

What is the distinction between the two expressions? Let me explain.

The equation that makes up a veteran's compensation has two factors, as we all know. One is the rate of compensation which is provided by law or by regulation. That is the rate which stipulates the amount that shall be paid for a disability in any certain degree. The other is the rate or rating of the individual's disability, a thing personal to the veteran himself. In order to determine how much the pension shall be under the compensation law it is necessary to determine both the factors; that is to say, the rate or rating of his disability or how much he is hurt and to provide the rate of compensation, which is the figure that will be paid for that degree of disability or injury.

When it is recited, as it is in the House language, that the "rates of compensation payable shall not be cut", it means exactly this and nothing else, that even though the rates of compensation shall not be cut the rates of disability may be changed from time to time and rerated at the will and the pleasure of the Veterans' Administration. Therefore there is nothing in the House language that places any substantial restriction upon the Veterans' Administration in making drastic cuts in compensation. If we agree to the House language, the Veterans' Administration can proceed in the next 3 months, as they have in the last 3 months, to make such cuts as they wish. The President by regulation has cut the rate of compensation of total disability from $100 to $80, which is 20 per cent, but on the average throughout the whole Nation the Bureau has cut the rate of disability more than that.

The total resulting is something like 54 percent in the service-connected cases, and that is made up of 20 percent in cut of rate of compensation, and the other 34 percent is made up of the reduction in rates or rating of disability. So I assert most earnestly that the House language gives no protection, and from the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] I think he does not regard it as giving protection except in the sense that it provides against cuts in the "rates of compensation payable * * *". The pending substitute does afford protection by restricting reductions in the amount of compensation being paid March 20, 1933.

The argument was made that because in the Cutting-Steiwer substitute we used the phrase "compensation being paid shall not be cut" it was inelastic, that it was not susceptible to review, and that if a man recovered he would still be on the rolls. That is manifestly untrue and in error, because, as pointed out by the Senator from New Mexico, it is provided in line 14:

> That in the event of change in the degree of disability of any such veteran, the amount of compensation payable shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect prior to March 20, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced more than 25 percent.

In other words, the Veterans' Administration, although they cannot change the compensation except where there is change in degree of disability, can review the case under the law and change the evaluation of the disability. With respect to this I will say, as I said about something else a little while ago, this language was carefully considered by the sponsors of the proposal. It was written for the purpose of providing elasticity and at the same time of preventing the application of an unfair and arbitrary rating schedule; making it possible to reduce the evaluation of disability in those cases in which recovery is had and incidentally to increase the evaluation of disability in those cases where the disability becomes more serious. But it was also written with the idea that by the language in line 7 we would place upon the Veterans' Administration a hard and fast restriction under which they could not, in the future as they have in the past, cut ruthlessly and indiscriminately in order to save money at the expense of crippled men.

Mr. President, I am not going back over the ground that has been covered so thoroughly this afternoon. Like the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], I am ready for a vote. When it is thought there is no difference between the two propositions and we find that one prevents a cut beyond 25 percent in direct service-connected cases, and the other does not prevent a cut beyond 25 percent, we are moved to ask what is the attitude of this body with respect to combat disabilities. That is all that is in the issue involved in this paragraph.

What is the attitude of this body with respect to the men wounded on the field of battle? What is the attitude of this body with respect to the men whose bodies are filled with shell fragments and shrapnel, the men with an arm or a leg gone, who are reduced in health and almost destroyed, living dead men upon the face of the earth? Are we going to protect them or are we going to permit the Veterans' Bureau to continue its pillage in these cases? We know the situation. We are not going to deceive anybody. We are not going to deceive ourselves. We are not going to deceive the veterans. The issue is clear cut and plain; we will protect the American veteran, or we will betray him. He who has fought the Nation's battles deserves better than betrayal.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] asked, "Are we going to permit the Veterans' Bureau to continue its pillage in these cases?" There can be only one answer to that question. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], himself a soldier, and a known friend and champion of the veterans, has just announced that he intends to vote against the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and intends to vote for the conference report. I shall follow his example.

The heart of every Senator must have been moved by the eloquent references to our battle-scarred veterans. I was particularly impressed by the eloquent remarks of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. He iterated and reiterated his devotion to the battle-scarred veterans of our various wars. I am sure that sentiment is shared by every Senator. I do not intend to weary the Senate by repeating that I have as deep a desire and as fixed a purpose as anyone on either side of the aisle, or at either end of the Capitol, to see that justice is done to our battle-scarred veterans and our disabled and deserving heroes.

Mr. President, I am equally concerned that justice should be done to the American soldier and the American citizen; that justice should be done to the American veteran and the American taxpayer. Each has a claim upon us. We are under obligation to both. We ought not to default either debt. Let us discharge our debts to the battle-scarred veterans. Let us discharge our debt to the battle-scarred taxpayers, to the overburdened taxpayers of the country.

Mr. President, I was not a member of the committee which handled this legislation up to the present parliamentary situation. I do not profess to be as familiar with its details as I ought to be or as I should like to be.

The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], himself a Spanish War veteran, I know has the welfare of all the Spanish War veterans at heart. I know that he would not, here or elsewhere, sacrifice their interest. I find the Senator from Texas supporting the committee which has been charged with the responsibility of managing the legislation. I feel justified, therefore, in voting against the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and in voting for the committee report, sustaining the committee, when in doing so I am but treading in the steps of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. President, the pending measure at least moderates some of the harsher provisions of the recent Executive order. I think some of them were too harsh. I supported the Walsh amendment when the economy bill was pending in this body in order to erect a safeguard against injustice; but the pending measure, at any rate, is a distinct gain as against the Executive order. The pending proposition moderates some of the harsher provisions of the Executive order with reference not only to the World War veterans but with reference to the Spanish War veterans. It has a double advantage. There is a distinct advantage to each class of those veterans. Shall we not avail ourselves of that advantage?

Two birds in the hand are better than none in the bush—better even than one; and, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, it is better to have a part of something than to have all of nothing. I know that some of our soldiers feel that they are getting "nothing." Some of them naturally remember that when they set sail to the strains of martial music they were assured by eloquent orators that "nothing is too good for the soldier." Some now question the sense in which the word "nothing" was used in that assurance.

Mr. President, I can appreciate the reaction of Senators to the statement that a Presidential veto is impending if this measure passes the Congress. I do not know. Indeed, sir, I do not wish to know. Personally, I do not feel that I have any right to know. Under our Constitution all legislative power is vested in the Congress. Under our Constitution all executive power is vested in the President. The powers are distinct, vested in independent and distinct departments. I think they should be so. Under our Constitution the power to veto legislation is vested in the President. I think that power ought to have been vested in the President. I think that upon occasion it has been wisely exercised, although Thomas Jefferson never exercised the veto power one time during his occupancy of the White House.

But, sir, when the Congress passes a measure which the President regards as unconstitutional it is not only his right but his duty to veto it. When the Congress passes a measure which the President deems to be impolitic, fraught with danger to the public welfare, it is his right to exercise the veto power. Some Senators indicate that they shall be dissuaded from voting against the Steiwer amendment and supporting this legislation, which provides some measure of relief, on account of the statement made here concerning the pendency of the veto. I hardly think that justifies a deliberative body in changing its mind or its judgment concerning serious legislation such as that now pending. Our duty is our duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] to the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 47, as amended.

Mr. STEIWER and other Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NEELY. While the Vice President was absent from the Chamber, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] offered a perfecting amendment to what is commonly known as the main "Steiwer amendment."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is voting on the modified amendment now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will continue the calling of the roll.

The calling of the roll was resumed.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. COOLIDGE's name was called). At this moment may I announce the general pair of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES].

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will vote. Before voting, I wish to announce that if the senior Senator from Missouri were present he would vote "yea." I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Rhode Island be so kind as to announce the pairs, if any, that I have failed to announce?

Mr. HEBERT. I am informed that the Senator from Illinois has announced all of the pairs. I rose merely to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 39, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the House amendment to Senate amendment no. 47, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire whether the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] desires a further conference? Certain amendments having been rejected, the question is whether the Senator from South Caroline desires a further conference.

Mr. BYRNES. I do not think that is necessary.

FOURTH DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I send forward the conference report on the fourth deficiency bill and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of the confusion and the lateness of the hour, and since the Senate is to be in session tomorrow, I shall object to the present consideration of the report on the deficiency bill.

The report submitted by Mr. BRATTON is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 9, 11, and 12.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, and 10; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$1,460"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 2, 5, 6, 7, 13, and 14.

DEPRESSIONS AND CRISES, AND SO FORTH

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune; also an address by Dr. Benjamin M. Anderson, whom I regard as one of the greatest economists in this country; also an address by Dr. A. B. Adams, of the University of Oklahoma, who is an authority on depressions and crises; and two reports from Comptroller General McCarl.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by Dr. Benjamin M. Anderson, whom I regard as one of the greatest economists in this country; also an address by Dr. A. B. Adams, of the University of Oklahoma, who is an authority on depressions and crises, and an editorial which will appear in the New York Herald Tribune, June 15, 1933.

The addresses and editorial are as follows:

A PLANNED ECONOMY AND A PLANNED PRICE LEVEL

(An address by Benjamin M. Anderson, Jr., Ph.D., economist of the Chase National Bank of the City of New York, before the Pilgrims of the United States at a dinner given in honor of Sir Josiah Stamp on the evening of Thursday, June 8, 1933, at the Plaza Hotel, New York City)

ECONOMIC REVOLUTION OR ECONOMIC REVIVAL?

We must be clear as to our objectives. To my mind, the great and vital problem confronting the United States and the world today is that of getting many millions of men back to work, getting business going again, getting goods moving throughout the country and throughout the world, increasing enormously the volume of production in the world, so that the volume of consumption may also be greatly increased. But among the proposals which purport to have this economic revival for an objective there are not a few which really look toward different ends. There are, as usual, social revolutionaries who like to fish in troubled waters, who would seek radically to recast the whole economic system, to shatter the sorry scheme of things and "then remold it nearer to the heart's desire."

Whatever else measures of this sort might accomplish, they would not, in the near future, restore production and consumption in the world or set men to work. And there are many more moderate proposals which, while they might or might not be meritorious in themselves, if adopted in a tranquil time, when the general economic machinery is functioning well, would, none the less, interfere with economic revival if adopted today. There are schemes for the redistribution of wealth, which schemes may or may not have merit, considered as long-pull measures, but they certainly are not revival measures. There are other proposals, growing out of the righteous anger of honest men who have discovered iniquity, which are punitive in their nature, and which can easily go so far as to impair the efficiency of existing economic machinery which is necessary to facilitate revival. We must be clear as to our objectives. If, as an incident to revival measures, or if, as contributing to revival measures, we can end old abuses and can improve the general economic system, so much the better. But we must not permit the present unhappy state of the world and the present flux of bewildered political opinion to be capitalized by those who advocate new and untested economic theories in the making of hazardous experiments. This sick economic world of ours is a patient in a hospital, not a subject for experimentation in a laboratory. And if, as I believe is the case, we can cure this patient by tried and tested measures, surely we have no right to discard those tried and tested measures and to turn the patient over to a new school of physicians who have some theories that have never been known to work.

In medicine when radical new measures are proposed it is at least the common practice to try them out on animals first, and then, after long and careful experimentation, to try them out tentatively on human beings. We must certainly ask the new schools of economic practitioners to try things out on a small scale first, tentatively and cautiously, before they ask us to transform the whole economic system radically.

OLD ECONOMICS AND NEW ECONOMICS

We have heard a great deal about the failure of the so-called "old economics" and the need for new doctrines. I think it can safely be said that there has been no failure of the old economics in this post-war period, because so little of what the old-economics advocates has been done. The old economics taught and teaches that tariffs should not be unduly high and that goods should move with reasonable freedom across national borders. The post-war period has seen a steadily mounting body of tariffs and other trade barriers choking the flow of goods across national borders.

The old economics taught that excessive credit and artificially cheap money would generate great speculation and the piling up of unsound debts which could not be paid and which, in their qualitative deterioration and collapse, would create crisis and panic. But we spent the post-war years, especially from 1922 into 1928, in an altogether unprecedented expansion of credit at artificially low interest rates, with rediscount rates held below the market instead of above the market, as the old rules prescribed, and we generated a credit bubble and a speculative bubble, the collapse of which has brought us untold disaster.

John Stuart Mill knew the dangers both of excessive tariffs and of excessive credit. No new economics was needed to avert them.

The old economics taught that international debts must be paid primarily with goods and services. It taught that the debtor country, in the period when it was borrowing, would have an import surplus, but that when it began to repay it must have an export surplus, sending out more goods than it consumed, and it taught that a creditor country, when the time came to receive payments, must receive an import surplus, a so-called "adverse balance of trade." But the old economics also knew what the new economics seems unwilling to admit, namely, that it was good for a creditor country to receive an excess of imports; that the term "adverse balance of trade" under these circumstances was a meaningless and misleading phrase. The old economics taught that when goods come into a country in payment of debts they do not reduce the ability of the country to buy the products of its own labor, but, rather, increase its total income and its total consumption. The foreign goods coming in in payment of debts are sold in the creditor country and the proceeds in money are not taken out, but, rather, are turned over as income to people within the creditor country, increasing their incomes by the same amount in money as the goods which come in in payment of the debts and leaving them with undiminished buying power for their domestic products. But the new economics seems to be returning to seventeenth and eighteenth century policies with respect to these matters, seems to be afraid of goods, afraid of production, afraid of income, and afraid of an abundance of goods for consumption.

The old economics knew very well that it was absurd to try to expect any definite equivalents in imports and exports as between two particular countries. It understood triangular and quadrangular trade. It knew that if a country's general balance of trade with the whole world was in proper adjustment to its creditor or debtor position things were going right, and that nothing need be done about it. The new economics seems to be veering strongly toward the notion that the volume of exports and imports with every particular country must be regulated, and that trade must be discouraged with every country which does not buy more from us than it sells to us. It is not pleasant to see this recrudescence of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century fallacies!

The old economics taught that there is no such thing as a general overproduction. It taught that the power to consume grows out of the power to produce, that consumption grows out of production. A man producing one commodity, as automobiles, contributes to the supply of automobiles, to be sure, but equally contributes to the demand for wheat, for silk, for cotton, and for other commodities which he wants. And the man producing cotton or cotton goods contributes to a supply of these things, but also to demand for silk, for sugar, for automobiles, and for other things which he wants. The old economics recognized that things could be produced in wrong proportions, some things too much, others too little, and that then great abnormalities and distortions would come. The old economics recognized that when you had overproduction of certain things and underproduction of other things, the terms of exchange between them could be so deranged that the buying power of the producers of the excessive commodities would sink very low, and then even the underproduced commodities would seem to be overproduced, because they could not be sold. But it sought the remedies in better balance and better proportion, and not in a general contraction of all production. The old economics saw purchasing power growing out of production, and it held that a good equilibrium among the various elements of production meant large aggregate purchasing power, which could take care of large aggregate production. The new economics separates production and buying power. It looks on goods on the one hand and buying power on the other hand as separate and independent things, and it proposes artificial increases of buying power through currency and credit manipulations.

A PLANNED ECONOMY

One of the most dangerous of the proposals of the new economics is that of a so-called "planned economy." Economic life as we have known it has been, in large measure, an unconscious thing, in the sense that no mind or no group of minds has seen the whole picture, and certainly no one mind or group of minds has directed the whole picture. Intelligence runs through it, but it is the intelligence of individuals or organizations seeking their own particular wages or their own particular profits, seeing their own sources of supply, seeing their own markets, but not seeing with any great clearness the movements of the system as a whole.

AUTOMATIC VERSUS CONSCIOUS CONTROL

In general it is not the function of government under the present system to produce goods or to perform economic services. The actual direction of industry, the decision whether more shoes shall be produced and less hats, is not made by the state or by collective society but is left to the choice of independent producers. These independent producers make their decisions with reference to the state of the markets. The up-and-down movements of prices and wages determine whether more or less of a given thing shall be produced. If prices are rising in a given industry and falling in another, the tendency is for labor and capital to flow from the industry where prices are falling to the industry where prices are rising. The tendency is, moreover, for consumers to consume less of those goods the prices of which are rising, and to consume more of those goods the prices of which are falling. Oversupply of any given commodity, accompanied by falling prices, thus tends to correct itself, since production declines and consumption increases, whereas the shortage of supply of another commodity, accompanied by rising prices, likewise tends to correct itself through an increase of production and a curtailment of consumption. Under this system of free, private enterprise with free movement of labor and capital from industry to industry, the tendency is for an automatic balance to be maintained and for goods and services to be supplied in right proportions. A social order is created, a social cooperation is worked out, largely unconscious and largely automatic, under the play of the impersonal forces of market prices and wages.

This system obviously predicates a sound money which men can trust. The success of this system, moreover, depends upon its flexibility and the quickness with which readjustments can be made, and this in turn depends largely upon the extent to which it is competitive and free from unified conscious control. If a government of a collective system undertakes to regulate the business of a country as a whole and to guide and control production, there is required a central brain of such vast power that no human being who has yet lived, or can be expected to live, can supply it. When millions of people are working, each at his own special problem, studying his own special market, making his readjustment piecemeal, under the guidance of market prices, the problem is manageable. If a central brain must do the thinking for all of them, chaos is inevitable. Great mistakes are made and these mistakes are carried much further than would be possible under the competitive system, controlled by free prices.

Here, then, is the central contrast between our present system and a planned economy—in the problem of coordinating the economic activities of men and making a social order. Our present system relies upon the unconscious, automatic functioning of the markets. A "controlled economy" must do it, if at all, by conscious public planning, a central brain guiding, controlling, and regimenting the masses of men, controlling production, controlling consumption, controlling the distribution of wealth, and in a large measure regulating the lives and activities of men.

The limits of economic theory and statistics

If we wish revival without an early relapse into chaos, I do not think we shall go far with the advocates of the planned economy. They cannot make a comprehensive plan. The ablest and best trained brains, given unlimited power, could not do it. The ablest students of economic theory can, for a little while, at times when their energies run high, see in theoretic outline, in schematic outline, an abstract picture of the economic order. The concatenation of prices and costs, the interrelation between the industries, the international interrelations, the relations of capital market, money market, securities market, and industry—there is a body of economic theory dealing with these matters sufficiently definite and sufficiently clear to enable us to reach some very important practical conclusions regarding public policy. But to put flesh and blood upon this abstract skeleton, so as to make it a thing adequate for conscious control of industrial life, is an impossibility. We have an immense mass of statistical detail regarding many phases of economic life, but not nearly enough for purposes of this sort, and not, moreover, in manageable form. Further, it cannot be assembled with sufficient speed to enable one central planning body or one central brain to use it in making day by day decisions. Neither economic theory nor statistics begins to supply the necessary foundation for dealing with such a problem. The best industrial and financial intelligence sees only a part of the picture with definite realism. The coordination of the multitudinous elements must be through the markets, and not through a central brain or central authority.

Economics must yield to politics in practical administration

But, further, no one supposes that if we are to have a planned economic order the matter would be turned over to the men who have trained themselves to see the whole economic picture. They would not be regarded as competent to handle the administrative problem—and they would not be. The thing would be turned over to practical administrators, chosen primarily with respect to their ability to get along with men, and with respect to their acceptability to controlling political groups, and instead of economic planning we should get political compromise. The plans that would be made would be only partially harmonious from the standpoint of economic consistency. They would be, in large part, a mere resultant of political pressures, contradictory in their economic implications.

The administrative problem would be an impossible problem, particularly difficult in the United States because of our conflicts of State and Federal jurisdictions and our constitutional limitations. With the control of industry, it would involve an immense bureaucracy—a bureaucracy so great that it might, indeed, go far in solving the problem of unemployment!

We used to have an immense respect for the power of the Federal Government to give us clean and efficient administration. In the old days, when the Federal Government had very limited functions, our Internal Revenue Service was extraordinarily clean and efficient (if one forgets the scandals of the seventies), there was immense respect for Federal law and its administration, and we made frequent contrasts between the efficiency of Federal administration and the inefficiency of State and local administration. But when we gave the Federal Government problems similar to those of the States and municipalities, as in the case of prohibition, we saw the same evils creep in, the same abuses, the same corruption of Federal law-enforcement officers as we had had when the States and municipalities dealt alone with the liquor problem. The regulation of industry and the enforcement of regulation are increasingly impossible to the extent that it is thorough-going. Let Federal agents go about inspecting the affairs of business men, and you will have a multiplication of the evils and abuses, including bribery and blackmail, that we see in our municipalities enforcing building codes, tenement-house regulations, and so on.

It is urged that we have an experience on which to build in this connection. During the war we did have a good deal of regulation and control of industry, and it is thought that this experience can be applied today. I believe that that war-time experience will be largely useless as applied to our present problem. The objectives in the war time were simple and clear. We were overstraining our productive capacity, and the problem was to produce essential goods. So-and-so many tons of steel were needed for such-and-such definite purposes. So-and-so much wheat was needed to go across the water. There was a definite military problem, and the big purpose of the war control was to hold down the production of nonessential commodities to provide resources for essential commodities. There was the definite further problem of holding prices down and limiting profits, along with the maximization of the production of specific needed goods. There was unlimited demand and limited supply, and the problem was to restrict demand and to direct supply.

The present problem is radically different. It is the problem of getting men to work producing goods that can be sold. No central brain can know which these goods are. The markets know. The individuals in charge of industries, each studying his own specific market, can know, but not even they can know how much demand can be increased as they and their fellows each increase production, each take on new employees, and generate new buying power for all other products.

Who will coordinate the trade associations?

I am particularly apprehensive regarding the proposal to allow trade associations on a great scale to get together, with the Sherman law waived, to raise prices and limit output, euphemistically called "adjusting supply to demand." If one industry alone does this, it may, if it does not overdo it, increase its profits, although even one doing it could easily mean less men at work. But if all of them do it, they will simply strangle one another.

Here there would not be one central plan, but merely a central validation of a multitude of conflicting special plans. The great and growing increase in demand which will come as men are steadily added to the pay rolls, and as more and more raw materials are used, increasing the buying power of producers of raw materials, will simply not materialize. There is no surer antirevival measure than a wide-spread application of this plan.

The plan would prevent the restoration of balance between manufactures and raw materials and foods

One of the great troubles in the present situation has been that manufacturing has curtailed output—"adjusting supply to demand", as the phrase goes—on a colossal scale, while agriculture and raw material production have gone on largely unchecked. There is an immense unbalance between extractive industries, on the one hand, and manufacturing on the other, manifest in the exceedingly low prices of raw materials and agricultural products as compared with the prices of manufactured goods.

We want this unbalance corrected, and the great correction will come through the expansion of manufacturing activity at home and abroad. The lowering of the tariffs, permitting manufactured goods to come in from abroad, but, much more important, enabling foreign countries to buy on a great scale the raw materials and foods in this country which they need, will restore this balance. It will lead to an almost explosive rise in the prices of foods and raw materials in the United States, and to an almost explosive expansion of manufacturing industry here and abroad. Our own factories, sharing an expanding market with reasonable foreign competition, will produce and sell vastly more goods than they can do with exclusive control of the depressed agricultural market and the depressed raw-material market.

I am not wholly hostile to some measure of cooperation under Government auspices, looking toward the restriction of output in certain raw-material lines, particularly where wasting natural resources are involved. We probably need it in the extraction of crude petroleum from the ground. Here supply is little influenced by price, but rather is governed by the discovery of new fields, and by the necessity which every producer faces of pumping oil if his neighbor is pumping, in order to protect his own oil from being drained away. Natural gas may present a similar case. Lumber possibly does. And the long-sick bituminous coal fields may well justify careful study and conscious public planning. But I know no case of manufacturing, refining, or processing industries where I should be willing to see trade associations get together with the Sherman law waived, to raise prices and restrict output. I should regard that as a measure tending to increase, rather than to diminish, the unbalance between raw-material production and manufacturing, and I should regard it as an antirevival measure.

Political conflicts and compromises

I have indicated that economic planning cannot be done on strict economic lines. It inevitably involves political compromises and the conflict of political purposes which will make the plan an economic disharmony. There will be conflicts among different trades—steel wanting higher prices, the railroads wanting lower steel-rail prices. There will be conflicts between labor and capital. There will be political maneuvers and pressures. Congressmen and Senators, under bombardment from their constituents, will be spending an ever-increasing amount of energy in putting political pressure upon the coordinator to favor this or that or the other special interest—and the Congressmen and Senators are sufficiently overburdened with private affairs at the present time not to welcome much more of this kind of thing. Let us hope that the Administration will use these vast new powers with the greatest caution, in the most tentative manner, try them out on a very small scale, and extend the application very gradually. A sudden sweeping application could create a fearful chaos.

Overburdening Washington

Let us bear in mind, too, the limitations upon nervous and physical energies in Washington, and let us have in mind that we must not put an unbearable burden upon the ultimate coordinator, the President of the United States, whose great abilities and high courage we recognize, and at whose immense social energies we marvel, but of whom we must not demand superhuman things.

Fortunately our economic system is not a closely fitted mechanism but, rather, a very loosely articulated and flexible organism. A closely dovetailed mechanism would break down in short order, if called upon to carry out all the conflicting purposes and if subject to all the conflicting control mechanisms which the different schools of economic theory and the different political forces are simultaneously applying to it. But a loose and flexible organism can stand a great deal of abuse and can respond to a great many contradictory purposes. If our administration can succeed in its main objectives at the London conference, we can stand a good deal of experimentation and even a good many unsound policies in domestic matters. They will do harm, but they won't be fatal.

Lower tariffs and a resumption of the gold standard essential

In the present state of world fear and apprehension, reciprocal tariff reduction seems to be about the only way that the matter is politically feasible. I believe that it is perfectly feasible and desirable, from the standpoint of economics, for us to lower our tariffs and restore our gold standard, whether other countries go along with us or not, and that we should speedily find ourselves with a rapidly growing trade, with our currency held in high esteem throughout the world, and with our position, both relatively and absolutely, enormously improved, if we were the only country that did it. We should get a greatly increased proportion of world trade, export and import, we should greatly strengthen our own internal economy, and we should stimulate the world as a whole. Other countries, moreover, would follow our example.

The view has been expressed that, if the London conference fails and we turn to the plan of controlled economy in the United States, we must then raise our tariffs in order to protect the rising costs which this would involve. This seems to me to be particularly erroneous. I think that in this case we should all the more need lower tariffs to protect our consumers against excessive price increases by trade associations, free from the operation of the Sherman law, and to protect the trade associations themselves from the strangling effect of one another's activities upon their markets.

I have in mind here a remark made to me several years ago by a British economist, that England didn't need to have a Sherman law because she had free trade, but that in the absence of free trade she, of course, would have to have one.

PLANNED ECONOMY VERSUS PLANNED PRICE LEVEL

There is another line of thought and body of proposals, in many ways different from that which I have just been describing, which would not seek to regulate prices, wages, and industrial activity bit by bit, but which feels that enough is accomplished if, by currency and credit manipulations, we control the general average of commodity prices, leaving general industrial decisions to individual enterprises. There are some minds capable of trying to combine price-fixing and industrial regimentation with the notion of currency and credit manipulation designed to make all prices rise, but I do not know any clear economic theorist who would do so, and I should say that the two general notions are economically contradictory, and that a scheme which combines them is a political rather than an economic synthesis.

It is very important that we should recognize that the vast powers which our Congress is giving the President, in legislation adopted or pending, do, in fact, represent political compromise rather than consistent economic planning, and that the simultaneous exercise of all these powers would get us into hopeless chaos. We must distinguish between the political legislation and the administrative economic program under the powers, if we are to see clearly or to hope for any good outcome. The President does not need to do all the things that he has authority to do, and there is every reason for believing that he intends to do only those things which he believes to be necessary to get the business machinery working. He has himself indicated very clearly, in connection with the agricultural legislation, that he regards it as experimental, intends to apply it experimentally, and, if it does not work well, to acknowledge it promptly. This experimental attitude is good, within limits. The danger comes if there are so many experiments that they breed uncertainties, and if business men must be constantly altering their plans as the news from Washington varies from day to day.

Greater volume and more employment

There are those who believe that the way to start business going is to raise prices and wages by whatever method this could be accomplished, and that, in particular, a rise in the prices of manufactured goods and a rise in wage rates in factories should be the starting point. I think this view very definitely wrong. I think that what the factories need is greatly increased volume, and that what labor needs is, first of all, greatly increased employment. The price rises that we want to come first are in foodstuffs and in raw materials. Ultimately, as employment increases and as raw materials and foodstuffs rise, the aggregate of buying power in the country would be so greatly increased that the prices of manufactured goods and the wages of factory laborers can rise also, but this should be a later step, brought about by natural forces, by the markets, rather than a first step artificially forced. To get rising prices of manufactures, or even rising wage rates, before there is an increase in employment and an increase in volume of production, is merely to choke off demand, and to add to the misery of the millions of unemployed the additional burden of a rising cost of living.

PRICE LEVELS, DEBTORS, AND THE GENERAL ECONOMIC PICTURE

I want to say something about that school of economic thought which sees all our difficulties in terms of the price level, the general average of commodity prices, and which believes that if we could stabilize the general average of commodity prices, we should solve all our economic problems. They do not agree among themselves as to which price level is to be stabilized. Some wish to take the general average of commodity prices at wholesale, others would take the cost-of-living average, which would involve retail prices and rentals and perhaps wages of domestic servants, and should, of course, include physicians' fees and things of that sort.

Still others think in terms of a larger number of things which are bought and sold, including real estate itself and even stocks and bonds, and would make their price level wider than the commodity price level. But, in general, this school maintains that if we keep the price level stable, we should avoid all trouble. Rising prices generate speculation and unsound credits, falling prices rob debtors, and, if they go too far, make it difficult, and in many cases impossible, for debtors to pay their debts. The solution, from the standpoint of this school, is to strike at prices—not at particular prices, but at the general average.

Exclusive concentration upon the commodity price level as a criterion of credit and currency policy must necessarily lead to failure to use credit and currency policy properly with respect to other and at times much more important phases of the economic situation. Thus, in 1928 and 1929, after years of overexpansion of credit which had generated an absolutely wild stock-market boom, we were told by the advocates of commodity price stabilization, notably Professor Cassel, that we should not tighten money rates to check the stock-market boom because commodity prices had not risen, and that we should, in fact, increase the volume of credit because commodity prices had moved down moderately. Whatever may be said of commodity price stabilization, as one among several goals of credit policy, there are many other things also to be considered in the rest of the economic situation in determining credit policy. Exclusive preoccupation with commodity prices can lead only to disaster.

It is usual for adherents of this school to use the terms "value of money" and "general level of prices" as if the one were merely the opposite side of the other. When prices have risen they say that the value of money has fallen, and when prices have fallen they say that the value of money has risen. There is no harm in this if they are merely giving a definition of the value of money, though I don't think that such a definition is very useful. But there is great harm in this if they conclude from the fact that the general average of prices has risen or fallen that money is somehow or other to blame and that the remedy is to be found in currency manipulation.

It may or may not be true that the cause of a rise or fall in the average of prices is due to money. A rise in prices may be due to the fact that the world has increased its consumption of goods and decreased its production of goods, as was true during the war, so that goods become scarce and dear. It may be due, on the other hand, to money itself, as was the case from the middle nineties down to the war time, owing to the fact that the world's production of gold increased enormously, and that gold itself was cheapened. But the great fall in prices from 1929 to the present is, in my view, much more due to nonmonetary causes than to monetary causes, and I think that the remedy is to be found very much more in nonmonetary measures than in monetary measures. From the end of the war on, the world was busy in multiplying tariffs and other trade barriers which operated to prevent the marketing of goods. But, from 1922 on to 1929, we offset that by creating an unsound fabric of credit, which made it possible for lending countries to extend vast foreign loans to debtor countries, selling them goods without receiving goods in payment, and which enabled the debtor countries to consume far more goods than they could afford to consume on credit. Then, with the smash in 1929, these credits ceased, and repayments began to be demanded, and then the effect of the trade barriers, which prevented the normal marketing of goods, promptly manifested themselves, and the great international staples fell violently in price because they no longer had markets. Later, and more slowly, declines in other prices came, as the decline in the purchasing power of the producers of the great international staples made it impossible for them to absorb, in accustomed amount, the manufactured goods they were used to buying.

Price raising versus price stabilization

An interesting development of this school's line of thought is the doctrine, widely current today, that we should radically raise the level of commodity prices. In 1920 proposals were made that we should stabilize the prices then existing, and the doctrine was that it doesn't matter where prices are, so long as they are fixed, either a rise or a fall being regarded as an evil; but today we are being told that prices should be radically raised, and, in particular, that they should be raised to the level of 1926, this average being considered one that would be fair to debtors and creditors, or being considered one that somehow or other has a sacrosanct quality, for reasons not definitely stated.

Let me say that the effort to reach the 1926 level of commodity prices from the present level would involve a rise of about 66 percent, and that such a rise, put through by methods of currency manipulation in a short period of time, would involve all the evils against which the adherents of the price stabilization school have so eloquently warned us. It could come about only as the result of an immense speculative movement, in the course of which some prices would rise very much more than others. There would develop a new great unbalance in the price and cost system, and an immense instability in general economic life. There would develop also a great new group of speculative debtors. You cannot extend credit without creating debt. Credit and debt are opposite sides of the same shield. Every creditor has a debtor. Every debtor has a creditor. If we ease the burden of existing debtors by this method, it would only be to transfer that burden to another group, and we should have at that time the same kind of instability that we had in 1929, the same imminent disaster of violent reaction, and the same cry from ruined debtors for more credit and more currency manipulation. The adherents of the doctrine of relief from the present situation by currency and credit manipulation must set themselves much more modest objectives than the 1926 price level if we are to avoid disaster.

In the second place, however, while all of us would recognize that it is desirable to have a rising price level in the present situation, if it comes soundly, it is surely necessary to raise the question whether the desirable thing is to strike directly at the price level or to use indirect means for rectifying troubles that have led to the great fall in prices. A physician, dealing with a headache, does not usually rub the patient's head. He looks about to see if there is not a typhoid germ or something of that kind, or he considers whether there may not be a digestive upset. Even if we set a higher price level as an objective, we have still the question of whether we wish to strike directly at the price level or use indirect methods of reaching it. Moreover, the identification of the value of money with the reciprocal of the price level surely begs the whole question if it is to be made a premise in the argument. Is it money and currency that are at fault; is it gold that is at fault; or is it the strangling of the markets for goods and the disturbances in the balance among the different industries?

I am convinced that it is the latter primarily. I am convinced that it is, first of all, the excessive tariffs and other trade barriers which we have been so laboriously building up, year after year, and which we have so intensified since the great trouble began in 1929. I am convinced that if the London Conference is successful in getting these trade barriers down that there will come a great rise in commodity prices throughout the world. Each country will be able to dispose of those commodities which are most depressed in price, because produced in great excess within its borders, with an immense lift to the buying power of the producers of those things. The countries will balance one another, equilibrium will be restored, an immense wide-spread growth of employment will create additional pay rolls and additional buying power on the part of labor, an immense increase in the utilization of existing plant and equipment will create additional buying power for shareholders and partners in businesses, income growing out of increased production will support an immensely increased consumption, and prices will rise. We shall not need to force an expansion of credit. Expanding industry will invite an expansion of credit.

I should be greatly concerned if we set as our objective any particular level of prices. How far prices can safely rise without generating unreasonable speculation and unsound credits is not something we can tell about in advance. The tests of whether we have a wholesome situation are not to be found in any particular level of prices, but, rather, in whether there is a good balance among prices, full employment, and things of that kind.

Finally, I am very sure that no technique exists, even in theory, through which, by means of credit and currency manipulation, we could reach a particular price level and hold it. There are some to whom money is a very simple matter, and the question of monetary control is a very simple matter. They believe that by merely manipulating the quantity of money or the quantity of money and credit you can raise or lower prices as you please or you can hold them steady if you wish. It doesn't matter whether your money is sound gold money or irredeemable paper money. The question of quality makes no difference at all. It is purely a question of quantity. And the question of whether the credits are sound credits, based on moving goods for which markets exist, or whether they are unsound speculative credits based on fictitious values of real estate and securities or an unusable plant and equipment makes no difference.

To my mind, on the other hand, the question of the quality of money and the quality of credit is all important. I do not believe that sound money is possible which is not definitely linked to precious metal of fixed weight and fineness. I have no confidence whatever in the possibility of a managed paper currency divorced from gold. It has been a great satisfaction to me to see recent statements from Mr. Chamberlain in England to this same effect, and from President Roosevelt in his joint communiqué with the Italian representative, Signor Jung, that he, too, believes that gold must be restored as the standard of value.

Paper money, divorced from gold, without change in quantity, can fluctuate enormously in value, whether measured in the foreign exchanges or in the commodity price level at home I think that the worst possible state that the world could get into would be a welter of inconvertible paper in the main commercial countries, none of them anchored to gold, none trusted by the nationals of other countries, fluctuating in their relations day by day, introducing an incalculable speculative risk into every transaction, foreign or domestic.

We must get back to gold. One of the most important objectives of the London Economic Conference is precisely this.

There is likely to be, as a result of the unfortunate developments of recent years, and the unsound theories of recent years, a needless controversy between England and the United States in this London Conference over the particular rate at which the pound sterling and the dollar are finally stabilized. We have the feeling in this country that a high sterling is desirable, and our British friends have the feeling that a low sterling is desirable for them, each feeling that it has an advantage to gain by jockeying regarding this point. I am convinced that, from our point of view, the all-important thing is a strong and steady sterling, and that the particular rate is far less important than prompt settlement of the matter. We want a sterling which can bear its accustomed load in international commodity financing and in facilitating the flow of goods.

The notion that we must fix a price level which we desire and England a price level which she desires, and then try to adjust the gold stabilization rate to these price levels, seems to me a very dangerous notion, which can only lead to prolonged debate and interfere with the settlement. The fear that, if the rates are fixed too high for any particular country, that country may have to undergo some further downward price adjustment is not one which I should suppose need be considered, unless the rate were fixed very high indeed. Prompt settlement at London, including the lowering of tariffs and the stabilization of exchange, accompanied by a good modus vivendi regarding the interallied debts to be reached in separate negotiations, should cause such a radical upswing in general confidence and such a general rise in the level of world prices as to mean that the only difference for any country in a higher or lower rate of stabilization would be in the extent to which its prices rose rather than the fact of a rise itself.

The gold standard rules

In this London Conference questions will doubtless arise regarding the so-called "rules of the game" for the gold standard. I hope that our British friends will not ask us to repeat the errors which we made from 1922 to 1928 in generating an immense expansion of credit which, unneeded by commerce, went into securities, real estate, excessive foreign loans, and installment finance. I hope that they will put their emphasis upon the great fundamental that neither the gold standard nor any other monetary standard can work well if you have (a) excessive tariffs and trade barriers and (b) the gigantic creation of international debts. If only gold and securities are free to move across international borders, the securities turn bad after a while, and then there is not enough gold. That is quite true. But if trade barriers are moderated sufficiently so that there can be an adequate flow of goods throughout the world, so that countries which are in debt can increase their exports to the point necessary to pay their debts, then there is plenty of gold. The mobility of goods can supplement gold, and credits can be safely extended, because the goods against which they are extended can move from producer, through the markets, to consumer. In that case, a moderate revolving fund of credits can keep going a great volume of trade, while with the excessive trade barriers even a vast and growing body of long-term credits cannot permanently maintain trade.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OVER BUSINESS

An address by Dean Arthur B. Adams

A new departure in our national policies in reference to the relationships of the Government to business is contained in most of the emergency legislation which has been put forth by the Roosevelt administration. The Inflation Act and the industrial-control measure in reality will mark the beginning of a new era in our national economic life as well as in our political policies. When the industrial control bill becomes a law this Nation will have abandoned, at least temporarily, the traditional policy of the preservation of competition and will have adopted one of forced elimination of competition. The provisions of the bill definitely limit the freedom of private initiative in business; when it passes, there will be enacted into law the policy of Government control over private business activities. As a result of this measure the Nation will have definitely abandoned the laissez-faire doctrine and will have adopted the policy of Government regulation of private business.

The industrial-control measure and the Inflation Act are complimentary acts, and so interwoven in their causes and effects that it is necessary to consider these acts together in order to understand the policies of the "new deal" in reference to the relationship of government to business.

The object of the Inflation Act is to raise artificially the general price level by deliberate reduction of the purchasing power of the dollar. The act provides that the President may cheapen the dollar through the use of one or the other of the following methods: (1) By reducing the gold content of the dollar; (2) by adopting bimetalism; (3) by a limited coinage of silver; (4) by issuing Government paper money; and (5) by forced inflation of bank credit. The President is given the power to use any or all of these means of cheapening the dollar in order to raise the general price level. Thus far he has declared the Nation off the gold standard and has used only the method of forced inflation of bank credit through the purchase of Government securities by the Federal Reserve banks in order to raise prices; but it is expected that he will use one or more of the other methods of cheapening the dollar as a result of agreements that may be reached at the forthcoming Economic Conference in London.

The industrial-control measure is designed, first, to maintain and to regulate prices by limiting industrial production through trade-association agreements in each industry. It is designed, secondly, to reduce and to regulate the number of hours of labor of each laborer in each industry, and thirdly, to raise real wages (purchasing power) of the mass of laborers of the country.

These three objectives are to be accomplished by the following methods: First, the bill permits all business enterprises in each industry to make joint agreements as to the volume of production, the hours of labor, and the rate of wages to be paid. These agreements are to be made through trade associations in each industry. Each agreement is to be subject to the approval of the Government and is to be administered under the supervision of the Government. In carrying out the provisions of the measure the Federal Government is to be given the power to force each business enterprise to cooperate with all other enterprises in the respective industries in making the trade agreements; the Government is to be given complete supervisory power over the carrying-out of all trade agreements. To make effective the power of the Government, each business enterprise is to operate under a Federal licensing system, and, in a case of violation of any of the provisions of the trade agreement, the license of any business enterprise may be canceled and the enterprise prevented from carrying on business. The industrial-control measure is truly an emergency measure if not a revolutionary one. Each business is to operate under Government supervision and control of its general business policies.

Why were these two drastic legislative measures decided upon by the administration? The main reason why they were decided upon was that private business demonstrated its inability to effect business recovery after more than 3 years of a disastrous business depression. There was a public demand that the Government do something about the business depression, and many business men and laborers requested that the Government present a plan to end the business depression. The depression became so bad that more than 12,000,000 workmen were unemployed and private charity was inadequate to support them. It looked as if the Nation would be forced to accept the dole system for the unemployed. Prices continued to fall and the burden of debts and taxes became so heavy that many debtors were unable to pay even the interest on their debts and taxpayers were unable to pay their taxes.

The natural course under the laissez-faire policy would have been to let business readjust itself on a lower price level, and to have forced debtors and creditors to agree to scale down the excess debts. A great number of people believed that such a method of readjusting business would have been too drastic, and that before the process would have been completed the majority of our business enterprises might be wrecked. Certainly, under the present circumstances, such a readjustment of business would have been a long-drawn-out one with little prospect of improvement in the unemployment situation. This was the view taken by the President; therefore his administration decided to force the price level up by the passage of the Inflation Act. As a result of the passage of the Inflation Act it became necessary that the administration also force a rise in real wages and a reduction in the hours of labor in order to maintain a balance between production and consumers' purchasing power under conditions of a rising price level. This was the immediate reason for the industrial-control measure.

Inflation of prices would not cure the fundamental problem of the inadequacy of real wages and consumers' purchasing power; the deficiency of consumers' purchasing power is the kingpin of our national economic jam. Inflation alone would produce only a national economic spree or jag which, when it ran its course, would leave the Nation in a worse economic condition than it now faces. Unquestionably inflation would increase prices temporarily and would cause a temporary increase in the volume of business and in the volume of production. Such a movement would slightly decrease unemployment. But, unless wages were increased more rapidly than prices, the beneficial results of price inflation would be temporary only.

In order to understand the heart of the economic impasse which confronted this Nation in March 1933, one must understand that our industrial system has passed from a state of a deficiency of capital and production to one of a surplus of capital and production; that the Nation has passed from a state where it was necessary for society to save all it could in order to increase the capital and production of the Nation, to one where it is necessary for society to distribute a larger and larger proportion of the proceeds of production (or national money income) to wage earners so that the consumers of the Nation may have enough purchasing power to purchase the finished goods which are produced. Under the laissez-faire policy a smaller and a smaller percentage of the national money income went to labor. If industry is to operate again on a normal basis, a smaller percentage of the national money income must go to property owners in the form of interest and profits and a larger percentage of it must go to laborers and to small business men as wages and wages of management. Only by increasing the real purchasing power of consumers and decreasing the surplus funds for new investments can industry find a market for the goods which it is able to produce.

Under the laissez-faire policy, when prices go up the rise in wages lags behind the increase in prices. This lag of wages behind prices causes a decrease in the actual purchasing power of consumers; a shortage in consumers' purchasing power would bring about another business depression. In order to force wages up under conditions of rising prices it was necessary for the Government to assume control over the wage scales of industry. Also, because of the growth of mass production and the use of automatic machinery, there was an enormous amount of unemployment in this country in 1929 before the depression started. If we are to have business recovery, it is necessary to reduce the hours of labor of workers in order to increase the number of jobs for the unemployed; the natural tendency of competitive private industry is to increase the hours for employees when profits are low. Low wages and long hours are the fundamental reasons why the industrial-control measure was formulated.

Again many of our big business men have maintained that our antitrust acts which prohibit trade agreements among competitors made it impossible for industry to adjust production to the market demand. They take the position that under conditions of higher wages and shorter hours it will be necessary for the different business enterprises to agree upon the volume of production in order to keep down overproduction and ruinous prices. The production-control provision of the proposed law was a concession to the business interests on the part of the administration in return for the concession which business is to make in reference to the higher-wages and shorter-hours provision of the law.

We may summarize the reasons for the inflation and control acts as follows: The Inflation and Industrial Control Acts were decided upon because it was the opinion of the President and his advisers that it would be impossible to have an orderly business recovery without having an increase in the general price level. By the time the Inflation Act became a law it became evident to the administration that the ultimate success of inflation would depend upon an increase in the money income of the consumers of the Nation at least equal to the increase in the prices of consumers' goods. In other words, it became evident that if a balance between production and consumption was to be maintained, and that if the unemployed were to be reemployed with an improvement in business, the Government must force a rise in the wage level and a reduction in the hours of labor.

Will these acts prove to be successful and beneficial? Inflation will prove to be a benefit to the Nation if it can be and is controlled. Heretofore inflation has never been controlled, but the Inflation Act puts into the hands of the President of the United States the power to control the amount of inflation. It is the theory of the act that the Presiden will stabilize the general price level at somewhere near the 1926 price level and that he will succeed in getting other nations to do likewise. If he succeeds in this policy, inflation will not be a detriment to the Nation; but should he fail, the act may prove to be disastrous to our business edifice.

The administration of the control measure will be one of the most delicate and complicated problems that has been attempted by our Federal Government. Its administration will require the formulation of definite industrial plans for each industry affected by the law. To do this wisely and fairly will necessitate the employment of our most expert and most honest business managers and national economists as administrators of the act. The bill now provides for a 1-man administrator as the responsible head who will employ his advisors and assistants. The plan seems to be to have an advisory board of 10 experts—5 representing employers and 5 representing labor and the public.

In the formulation of trade agreements for each industry there will be the problem of deciding on the correct volume of output and the distribution of the quotas of production among the different enterprises. The decision on the exact wage scales and hours of labor in each industry will not only be difficult from the standpoint of social justice but decision on the questions will be a battle between immediate self-interest and public welfare and justice. The soundness of the decisions on each of these three great problems in each industry will depend more upon the public honesty than upon the technical wisdom of those making the decisions.

According to recent newspaper dispatches from Washington, the administration is planning on using several dollar-a-year men in the administration of the control measure. I question the advisability of such a policy. The dollar-a-year men were by no means entirely satisfactory as agents of the Government in administering war-regulatory measures. The principal functions of the wartime dollar-a-year employees was to stimulate production and to keep prices down and profits reasonable. They succeeded in stimulating production, but they did not succeed in keeping prices down and profits reasonable. The principal job of the administrators of the new control measure will be to regulate production (to limit it, but not too much) and to raise wages and shorten hours. I fear that the dollar-a-year men would not be disposed to materially raise wages and shorten hours, and I fear also that their control of production would be to unduly limit output in order to push prices up and to keep them high.

The great bulk of the dollar-a-year men in Washington during the war were really representatives of various industries—from which they received their incomes while in Washington—and as public officials the majority of them served their industries first and the public last or not at all. Would not the dollar-a-year men employed to administer the new control measure go to Washington to serve their particular industries specifically, rather than go there to serve the Government and the general public interest?

The success or failure of the industrial control measure will depend largely upon whether big business dominates the control policy in the interest of immediate profits or whether the Government dominates the policy in the interest of a permanent higher national money income and a balance between production and consumption. If the act is dominated by big business to serve its immediate ends, prices will be forced up and production will be limited unduly, but real wages will not be increased in proportion to the increase in the price level and there will result a shortage of consumers' purchasing power.

Should the control measure be administered by the Government to serve the ultimate interest of the Nation, profits would thereby be limited and big business might object to the administration of the measure and attempt to make it unpopular with the public. However, should the measure be administered in the interest of immediate profits to business, big business would cooperate with the Government, but an administration in the interest of immediate profits would result in a shortage of consumers' purchasing power, and another disastrous business depression would result. In other words, the act wisely and correctly administered may not be generally popular with big business, but if it is not wisely and correctly administered, it will ultimately bring disaster to both big business and the public.

[Editorial from the New York Herald Tribune]

THE GREAT EXPERIMENT BEGINS

The passage of the industrial recovery bill has been accompanied by statements from the president of the National Association of Manufacturers and the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States endorsing its main provisions and calling upon business to give its administration whole-hearted cooperation. This is the proper spirit. The vast experiment the new law launches in the governmental regimentation of industry must be undertaken with good will and forbearance on both sides. Only so can its risks be minimized and the country be spared the application of a dictatorship ruinous economically and socially.

Both of the spokesmen mentioned very naturally stress the advantage to business in the bill's relaxation of the antitrust laws. This, of course, is its compensatory feature. They also voice their confidence in its administrator, presumably Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, who has been organizing his staff and perfecting his plans to give the bill's provisions immediate effect. Here is the most hopeful note in the whole discussion. For on the administration of the statute, far more than on its terms, depends the success of the experiment.

All of which suggests that the real test of the Roosevelt regime is now at hand. Congress has given the President virtually every power he has asked for, comprising a greater authority than was ever wielded before by a peace-time Executive in the history of the country. The Nation's currency, its agriculture, industry, and transportation are all now subject to his control to a degree inconceivable a few months ago. With Congress out of the way, he must proceed at once to prove that he has the wisdom to exercise this prodigious trust in a way not only to solve the problem of the emergency but to preserve the national heritage. By the latter we mean, of course, that complex of institutions and customs, political, social, and moral, at the foundation of American life. There can be no victory that sacrifices or alters them.

Significant beyond measure, therefore, will be his choice of those to whom he must delegate his authority. If he continues to confide it to men like General Johnson, the country, while vigilant, will follow his leadership in the faith that his intention is not to remake but to restore America. On the other hand, should he begin picking for key positions political favorites or radical theorists, it will know that ahead of it lies not the United States of its dreams but the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

But let none of us anticipate this contingency. Every patriot today owes the President the benefit of the doubt and his full cooperation in making a success of the extraordinary program settled upon.

PRINTING OF NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL (S.DOC. NO. 76)

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask that House bill 5755, an act to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, as agreed to in conference, be printed as a Senate document. My reason for making this request is that it may be several days before the bill will be signed, and there is quite a request for copies of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BEDFORD COUNTY, TENN.—TRANSFER OF JUDICIAL DISTRICT

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiciary I report favorably House bill 5909, to transfer Bedford County from the Nashville division to the Winchester division of the middle Tennessee judicial district, and I call the bill to the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this bill merely provides for the transfer of one county in Tennessee from one division of the middle district to another. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Bedford County of the Nashville division of the middle district of the State of Tennessee is hereby detached from the Nashville division and attached to and made a part of the Winchester division of the middle district of such State.

CONFIRMATION OF J. ELLIOTT RIDDELL TO BE COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, KENTUCKY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, earlier in the day the President sent to the Senate the nomination of Mr. J. Elliott Riddell, of Kentucky, to be collector of customs. I have been authorized by the Committee on Finance to report the nomination favorably, and I so report it. I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, that the nomination be confirmed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of J. Elliott Riddell, of Kentucky, to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 42, at Louisville, Ky.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is this the nomination of a collector of customs in Kentucky about which the Senator spoke to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; this is the nomination.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

NOTIFICATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF CONFIRMATION OF HERBERT J. DRANE

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Herbert J. Drane to be a member of the Federal Power Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE DIRIGIBLE DISASTERS (S.DOC. NO. 75)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present a report from the Joint Committee to Investigate Dirigible Disasters. I ask that the report be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator expect to have the report printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not ask that it be printed in the RECORD. I should have said that this is a majority report, not a unanimous report.

Mr. KING. As a member of the joint committee, indeed the chairman of the committee, I was unable to participate in the closing hours of the hearing because, as a member of the Finance Committee, I was compelled to take part in the conferences upon the industrial recovery bill.

The report of the special committee on the Akron disaster was presented by the committee's attorney, and it was agreed to, I am advised, by the members of the committee, except the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself. I have had no opportunity to examine the report because of the multiplicity of my public duties, but I have been advised of the nature of it and the findings of those submitting the majority report. I do not agree with the majority report and desire to file a minority report as soon as time permits. I ask permission to submit a minority report as soon as possible after adjournment and request that it be printed with or following the majority report.

Mr. WALSH. The members of the joint special committee join in the request that that be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 47 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, June 15, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, with the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. BANKHEAD] in the chair.

Rev. Edward P. McAdams, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers, who has elected the people of these United States to be the torchbearers of Thy truth and of Thy knowledge in these days of distress among the nations, vouchsafe, we beseech Thee, to infuse into the minds and hearts of their assembled Representatives the spirit of Thy wisdom, knowledge, counsel, and understanding, and that in their deliberations and by their enactments they may be actuated to the perpetuation of Your ideals, the consummation of Your plans, the furtherance of Your will, the relief of distress among the nations of the earth, to the spiritual advancement and to the physical prosperity of the people of this country. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H.Con.Res. 23. Concurrent resolution authorizing the enrollment, with amendments, of H.R. 5661, the Banking Act of 1933.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes; that the Senate insists upon its amendments to said bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. BRATTON, Mr. GLASS, Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. HALE, and Mr. KEYES to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1869. An act relating to the manner of appointment of certain officers of the United States.

FOURTH DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION, 1933

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BUCHANAN, TAYLOR of Colorado, AYRES of Kansas, OLIVER of Alabama, TABER, and THURSTON.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, I think within 20 minutes we will have a conference report on this bill.

Mr. SNELL. I would say that is very fast work.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY—COMMUNISM

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, at the session last night I happened to be absent when my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], made some remarks about Howard University. I am glad to see the gentleman on the floor today. I know nothing about the remarks made by Dr. Johnson, charged to him in the Chicago Defender, but I do know that every Member of Congress has been misquoted by newspapers. Every man in public life is usually misquoted by newspapers. If Dr. Johnson is guilty of teaching communism at Howard University, then it is about time Howard University had a new president. [Applause.]

I never have been in favor of communism. I think the Members on this floor know that. In every talk I have made I have been against it, but I am not willing to condemn Dr. Johnson by a report published in a newspaper. The Members of this Congress ought to know, since Congress is making liberal appropriations for that university, so I sent to Dr. Johnson this morning for a statement of his stand on communism. I think we are entitled to know the situation, but I also know the newspapers, and I know the Chicago Defender. It is in my district. I know it very well.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read to the House Dr. Johnson's statement, so that you can hear for yourselves just what he has to say about it. This is a statement issued to the press, denying that he believed in communism, just after this article came out in the Chicago Defender. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read this.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I should like to ask whether or not specific inquiry was made of the president of Howard University whether or not he made the statement attributed to him, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] put into the RECORD last night? Was he asked whether or not he made those statements?

Mr. DE PRIEST. Dr. Johnson is not in the city. I asked his secretary to send me the release that he wrote immediately after the statement came out in the press.

Mr. BLANTON. Does this explanation come from the president of Howard University?

Mr. DE PRIEST. It comes from the secretary of the president of Howard University.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not come from the president, himself?

Mr. DE PRIEST. This is a statement that Dr. Johnson issued himself.

Mr. BLANTON. But we ought to know whether or not he made the statement attributed to him; not his general ideas about the matter but whether or not he made the statements that were attributed to him by the press and which were put into the RECORD last night. That is what we should like to know. I agree that if he did make those statements Howard University ought to have a new president.

Mr. DE PRIEST. We agree on that.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think a statement from his secretary should be read.

Mr. DE PRIEST. No. This is a statement he issued himself.

Mr. BLANTON. Then we ought to follow that up and get a "yes" or "no" statement as to whether or not he used the language attributed to him.

Mr. DE PRIEST. I am willing to go farther than that. I am willing to have this Congress investigate the whole thing. We want to know what is going on. I do not think it is good Americanism to teach communism to the students of this country. [Applause.] We have had outbursts in several colleges lately. Some students have been suspended from school for spreading that kind of propaganda.

Mr. BLANTON. Unfortunately, it is not only Howard University that is involved. It is also some of the large white universities, and they ought to be cleaned up, and the American father should investigate and send his son only to institutions in the United States that do not teach communism. [Applause.]

Mr. DE PRIEST. I am happy to say that this is one time the gentleman from Texas and I agree on something. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I, too, am gratified immensely that I can heartily endorse the patriotic American utterances which our colleague from Illinois has used so eloquently in denouncing un-American communism.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

BRIEF SUMMARY OF VIEWS ON COMMUNISM EXPRESSED BY PRESIDENT JOHNSON IN HIS BACCALAUREATE SERMON, JUNE 4, 1933

"I am not a Communist. I am always on my guard against any dogmatic panacea for the settlement of the complex difficulties which confront us in the modern world. On the other hand, I am not in accord with those who believe that the best way to deal with communism is to persecute those who believe in it. And I am not of the opinion that patriotism requires any thoughtful man to subscribe to the doctrine that there is nothing good to be found in the Russian experiment. The determination of the leaders of this movement to make use of modern scientific and technical resources to emancipate the masses of the people from poverty and its ills, including the disease of acquisitiveness, is a commanding undertaking which no modern nation can ignore. The enthusiasm and devotion with which they give themselves to their major purpose is suggestive of the kind of idealism which religion has always felt to be precious. The way to meet this new movement is not to persecute those who believe in it, or merely to focus attention upon the errors and perversities which may appear therein, but to beget on our own soil and in a manner consistent with the religious and political beliefs of our fathers, a movement which sets forth objectives no less splendid and which can arouse the whole-hearted allegiance of our citizens. Many men in America are trying to do this. Their work is timely, their patriotism is wise, and their following will increase."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE PRIEST. I yield.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I agree with the view expressed by the gentleman from Illinois. It is not only Howard University, but a few days ago the mother of a student in one of our public high schools in the District of Columbia told me that her son had advised her that one of his teachers had a Soviet primer translated and had read it to the class in high school.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is a member of the Appropriations Committee and is a member of the subcommittee on District of Columbia Appropriations. I have told the gentleman from Texas what this lady told me, and I am going to get that teacher's name and turn it over to the gentleman from Texas. Knowing the gentleman from Texas as I do, I am sure before he gets through with this teacher, if she read that primer as charged, she is going to find herself out of a job.

Mr. BLANTON. The difficulty about the matter is that the Committee on Appropriations acts merely as the servant of the House, and it cannot legislate. It can only appropriate. It has to appropriate according to legislation that is passed in the House. It cannot pass legislation itself.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But the gentleman can bring out information and knows how to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of cutting off all appropriations from any teacher who teaches communism in the United States.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will have the information for the gentleman in a few days.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE PRIEST. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois tell the House what occasioned this statement which has just been read into the RECORD from the president of Howard University?

Mr. DE PRIEST. It is an answer to newspaper charges that he preached communism.

Mr. SISSON. But he merely said in substance that he thinks there may possibly be something in the Russian experiment. Does the gentleman think that is objectionable?

Mr. DE PRIEST. I am not trying to defend Dr. Johnson.

Mr. SISSON. Would the gentleman deny the right of free speech in America?

Mr. DE PRIEST. I have presumed that in America the people had the right of free speech, but this involves a school sustained in large part by money appropriated by the Federal Government. I do not think this school or any other institution in America which teaches un-American doctrines should receive Federal aid. [Applause.]

Knowing Dr. Johnson as I do; knowing Dr. Johnson as a Baptist minister in favor of God and God's teachings, and knowing that communism is against the teachings of God, I cannot believe he is a Communist.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE PRIEST. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. In the statement read by the Clerk I do not think there was a definite statement from the doctor. I think the matter should be looked into further and a more definite statement obtained from him as to his attitude on this question. Does the gentleman agree with this? I ask this question as a friend of Howard University and as a supporter of the appropriations for its maintenance.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I may say for the benefit of the gentleman from New York that I will prepare a resolution this afternoon to investigate communism as taught in the American schools, all of them. Let us know what is going on in our school system. These long-haired communistic professors are ruining some of our children in many of our institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege the House accorded to Members to extend, I want to commend with all my heart the patriotic expressions against communism made by our colleague from Illinois. He demonstrates his fitness as a leader of his colored race. If such sound doctrine of patriotism were preached by all colored leaders it would be impossible for the destroying blight of the red flag of Russia ever to gain a foothold in the hearts of colored people.

In connection with what has been said today and yesterday about Dr. Johnson, president of Howard University, I received in my mail from New York this morning an issue of the New York Age, which carries at the top of its front page this slogan: "The national Negro weekly. Accurate and dependable." It was printed in New York on Saturday, May 27, 1933. This paper brought the information that on Thursday night, May 18, 1933, before a large audience at the Mount Olivet Baptist Church, One hundred and Twentieth Street and Lenox Avenue, this president of Howard University, Dr. Mordecai W. Johnson, dumbfounded his audience by saying that communism is a religion and that religion is not so much about God but about the nature of the world, and that he did not mind being called a Communist, as the day will come when "being called a Communist will be the highest honor that can be paid to an individual," and he further said that "that day is soon coming." This colored newspaper claimed that over a year ago this Dr. Johnson was severely criticized for similar statements.

This New York Age further asserted that Dr. Johnson seemed to be in hearty accord with the practice of the Soviet Union of putting all women to work, his claim being that women are still the slaves of men.

This colored newspaper, the New York Age, took the position that it was none of its business whether Dr. Johnson was a Democrat or Republican, or Socialist, Fascist or Communist, as he had a perfect right to his own opinions, but inasmuch as he is the president of Howard University, which is the largest institution of higher education in America for young Negro men and women, and that the funds for this university and his own salary are provided by the United States Government, it behooves him to exercise judgment and display discretion when speaking in public. And this colored newspaper expressed the fear that Dr. Johnson is not rendering any good service either to Howard University or to the young colored men and women of America.

I sincerely hope that our colleague from Illinois—who is in a most strategic position to do it—will carefully check up these alleged utterances of this president of Howard University, and if he has been quoted correctly, he should demand that as a menace to Americanism and good government, he should be removed from this institution. If the charges are untrue, he should be exonerated.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to, I should like to address the House for 10 minutes following the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the gentleman's request later.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by appending to them a speech delivered by the Honorable Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, chairman of the American delegation, before the World Monetary and Economic Conference at London this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I have been striving diligently to secure the floor since Monday in order to avail myself of the first opportunity to reply briefly to the speeches delivered Saturday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

At the outset I wish to make clear to them and to the House that what I say will be said in the utmost good spirit and good humor. With two of these gentlemen I have enjoyed a very pleasant association on the Foreign Affairs Committee and I am happy to count all three of them as my personal friends. However, the subject matter of their addresses of Saturday is of such importance not only to the House and to our country but to the entire world that I am constrained to trespass briefly upon their indulgence and yours.

These gentlemen combined against the London Conference in an onslaught which was magnificent but not war.

It was not war, I say, because war implies an enemy. And these gentlemen were attacking their own Government, together with a project of that Government which even they would hardly condemn as in itself bad.

The fact is they did no more than exhibit pardonable, because uncontrollable, weakness common to all three. I mean that they did what they have been doing with various degrees of frenzy whenever the word "international" or anything like it was used.

Upon hearing read an appropriation item for the International Monetary and Economic Conference, the honorable and gallant gentleman from New York suffered such an eclipse of his ordinarily sound ethics that he persisted over the protest of his own leader and distinguished colleague [Mr. SNELL] in violating an agreement against points of order. And why? I can only guess what his modesty prevented him from saying with regard to a most conspicuous omission of which the President was guilty in appointing the delegates. Actually the President had left out the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, the honorable and gallant gentleman from New York.

I must add that the point of order was overruled as pointless and that this devoted effort to protect the country against the presidential blunder went awry. The objector "took nothing by his clamor", as the honorable and learned gentleman from Massachusetts might say.

By way of avoiding the slightest dispraise of him, I concede the natural effect when he learned who had and who had not been appointed delegates. He got wounded at the opposite end of the foot from where Achilles was. But I would have suggested consultation with a good chiropodist rather than exhibition of the injured member in any such way.

Hear the complaint: "Since 1920, under Republican administrations, such well-known and distinguished Democrats as Oscar Underwood, Owen Young, Bainbridge Colby, Joseph T. Robinson, and Claude A. Swanson have been appointed and have served as delegates at important international conferences." But in 1933 under a Democratic administration only Senator COUZENS, among Republicans, was appointed, not the ranking minority member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the honorable and gallant gentleman from New York.

Hear again: "None of the delegates has had any experience in international conferences or European affairs. None has any knowledge of foreign languages or has traveled extensively abroad or understands conditions there. In brief, the American delegation represents the 'new deal' at the International Conference, or 'innocents abroad', and naturally the London Conference is doomed to failure." So instead of considering the delegates eminently qualified by their supposed ignorance of anything foreign, as he should logically do, he only saw their inferiority in accomplishments to the ranking minority member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from New York.

One of the delegates, Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, is from the least-populous State in the Union, we were told by the gentleman from the most populous State in the Union, who further reminded us that "the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois are unrepresented, as is also New England."

Still another criticism was that all the American delegates are over 60 years of age. What a contrast with the youth of the gallant gentleman from New York!

Now, I want to ask what possible good the honorable and gallant gentleman and his two associates expect to accomplish by damning the American delegation and the Economic Conference in advance.

Surely the state of the country and of the world is such that even though we can expect little of disarmament conferences until peace has been made in Europe, the most jealous nationalist may well look toward increased economic cooperation with hopeful eyes. Probably not much can be done in lowering tariff barriers. The conference may not completely solve the problem of an international monetary yardstick or standard. Commodity prices may not receive any immediate boost. But what harm can it possibly do, assuming that the President knows his own mind and that our delegates are not imbeciles, for representatives of some 65 countries to discuss such things?

In this general connection it has been well pointed out that many of the common economic difficulties are not international at all, except in their universality; but really spring up within national areas. If Canada or Sweden or Argentina has found a good way of dealing with some trouble by no means confined to her, why should we not learn it? We have thus learned from others, as they have likewise learned from us, time and time again. The International Monetary and Economic Conference at London comes at a period when the exchange of counsel along many economic lines is more needed than ever before.

From any conceivable point of view, the Conference is one string to the country's bow. Even if it fails completely, it will have been worth trying. Then President Roosevelt and the rest of us will know what we can count upon and what we cannot count upon. A program of increased self-dependence, of more nationalism rather than less, will follow. Congress, with the hearty assent of the country, has just conferred upon the President most abundant powers. But few of us, and least of all such interests as our cotton and tobacco growers, can consent to look with actual indifference upon the question of foreign trade.

In our great enterprise at London we can regard our delegates with the fullest pride and faith. An unofficial commentator of recognized authority estimates them thus: "No American delegation has ever been more highly respected, or even feared, abroad. This is due to a realization of the hard practicability of the American position, though married to the usual American idealism. The delegation unfailingly emphasizes that business recovery is entirely possible within America's own borders, irrespective of international accords."

Mr. Speaker, I do not expect miracles from the London Conference. All of us recognize the vast difficulty in securing satisfactory agreements out of a conference of 60 different individuals, not to speak of all the nations. The hopes of a war-worn and depression-weary world have looked up to the London Conference under the leadership of such men as President Roosevelt, Ramsay MacDonald, and others. We do expect from the Conference at least an agreement to stabilize international exchange, so that foreign trade can be resumed. Without such an agreement, we can look forward only to chaos so far as trade relations with the rest of the world are concerned.

Secretary Hull, speaking for our Government, in London today said:

> If, which God forbid, any nation should obstruct and wreck this great Conference with the short-sighted notion that some of its favored interests might temporarily profit while thus indefinitely delaying aid for the distressed in every country, that nation will merit the execration of mankind.

In like manner, Mr. Speaker, any representative of the American people who is so hostile toward this conference as wantonly, gratuitously to prophesy its complete failure will bring down upon himself the execration of the American people.

Again, I ask, what possible good can the tactics of these three gentlemen do?

TEXT OF SPEECH DELIVERED BY THE HONORABLE CORDELL HULL, SECRETARY OF STATE, CHAIRMAN OF THE AMERICAN DELEGATION, BEFORE THE WORLD MONETARY AND ECONOMIC CONFERENCE, LONDON, JUNE 14, 1933

Mr. Chairman, it is appropriate that the nations should meet in this great capital to deal with the crisis which besets them all. The compelling necessity for the present meeting of chosen representatives from 65 nations has been demonstrated by disastrous experience. The whole panic-ridden world is looking to this Conference for leadership with a program of basic relief, and every participant here must realize at the outset that distressed peoples in every land expect concord, cooperation, and constructive results from these proceedings. The success or failure of this Conference will mean the success or failure of statesmanship everywhere, and a failure at this crucial time would long be conspicuous in history.

It is universally agreed that economic calamity, with attendant losses, sufferings, and hardships unparalleled in our time, have for 3½ years afflicted each nation and the world in common. Depleted treasuries, collapsed price levels, a destroyed international finance and commerce, greatly diminished domestic production and consumption, 30,000,000 of unemployed wage earners, a prostrate agriculture, universal monetary and exchange instability, mountainous debt and tax burdens constitute some of the awful panic experiences of recent years. The people of all nations now realize that despite unbounded opportunities they are actually worse off and more insecure than they were 12 years ago and that the necessity for new policies and new leadership is obvious and urgent.

This is a conference of representatives of sovereign governments; I have absolute faith in its complete ability, power, and disposition to move the world, and this it will accomplish if it promulgates a program which, in conjunction with suitable domestic programs everywhere, will restore confidence, employment, and full and stable prosperity alike in every country. We would be false to the trust reposed in us by the anxious audience of humanity everywhere if this great tribunal were complacently to adjourn with the humiliating implication that we are incapable of providing new policies at all and that the same nation-destroying, world-wrecking economic policies that have been in operation since the war must continue.

If we are to succeed, narrow and self-defeating selfishness must be banished from every human heart within this council chamber. If, which God forbid, any nation should obstruct and wreck this great conference with the short-sighted notion that some of its favored interests might temporarily profit while thus indefinitely delaying aid for the distressed in every country, that nation will merit the execration of mankind.

Ignoring all realities all nations have strenuously pursued the policy of economic isolation, each futilely and foolishly striving to live a hermit's life.

The cherished idea of the extreme type of isolationist that each nation singly can, by boot-strap methods, lift itself out of the troubles that surround it has proven fruitless. Each nation by itself can to a moderate extent restore conditions by suitable fiscal, financial, and economic steps. Thus the administration of President Roosevelt has within 3 months adopted an effective domestic program to promote business improvement in the fullest possible measure. The equal necessity for an equally important international economic program of remedies is clear. A brief examination of existing problems and conditions and the underlying influences chiefly responsible for their creation sustains this conclusion.

When every nation is visited by disastrous panic it is for the isolationist a mere coincidence. For him no panic has an international character, cause, or cure. He credulously believes that the present depression just happened to come upon all countries at the same time and that, despite demonstrated failure to do so since 1929, each by its own local program can at will restore full prosperity.

Economic nationalism as practiced since the war comprises every known method of obstructing international capital and trade, such as high tariffs, quotas, embargoes, exchange restrictions, and depreciated currencies. Many governments, by manifesto, are constantly changing their tariff and other obstructions so that their utter lack of stability is seriously destructive of business. These trade barriers inevitably caused a disastrous reaction upon production, employment, prices, and distribution within the confines of every nation. Under the ravages of these combined methods of extremism uncounted millions of people are starving in some parts of the world while other parts are glutted with vast surpluses. Raw materials are fenced off from factories, factories from consumers, and consumers from foodstuffs.

How many nations can get along without world trade? The indispensable nature of international commerce is better understood when we recall that most Latin American countries ordinarily sell abroad from 30 to 85 percent of their total production of movable goods; England must sell 25 percent; Germany, 30 percent; Canada, 30 percent; Australia, 30 percent; New Zealand, 40 percent; and Japan, 45 to 60 percent. A serious decline of the international market can cause a severe impairment of the economic and financial life of these large exporting countries, and this in turn dislocates all foreign trade and, as has been demonstrated during this panic, cuts deeply into all production and throws tens of millions of wage earners out of employment.

The strangulation of international trade from more than $50,000,000,000, the amount it should be according to the prewar rate of annual increase, down to a rate less than $15,000,000,000 reveals a most tragic phase of this short-sighted and ruthless policy. An international transaction has become an exception rather than a rule. Each country proposes to sell but not to buy, to export but not to import, and to get rich at the expense of the other.

The inevitable effect of these contradictory practices has been to reduce to the lowest level all prices of primary commodities bought and sold in world markets with similar effects upon commodity prices back in each country. The inability of peoples in different countries to transfer goods in payment of balances strains all domestic financial structures. Currencies and exchanges become unstable. These practices, offensive and defensive, have forced business in every nation to an artificial basis and plunged the world into economic war.

The more extreme proponents of these disastrous policies in operation during the post-war period, in a spirit of mistaken selfishness or unreasoning fear, have insisted strenuously upon the very minimum of economic contacts with other nations. Their slogan has been the talismanic word "prosperity" and each nation living by itself was to grow rich and the people everywhere were to wax fat and be clothed in purple and fine linen. In their eyes it was unpatriotic not to buy home-made goods regardless of costs.

In the making of tariffs thought was given only to the safeguarding of the home market, even to the extent of protecting the more inefficient individual businesses, inefficient industries, and industries clearly not justifiable economically. No serious thought was given the disposition of surplus production through exchanges. The home market was to be kept separate from the world market and prices bearing no relation to those of other countries would be fixed arbitrarily within each nation.

Has not the time come for governments to cease erecting trade barriers with their excesses, rank discriminations, and hate-breeding reprisals and retaliations?

Honest intelligence now compels the admission that nations are substantially interrelated and interdependent in an economic sense with the result that international cooperation today is a fundamental necessity. The opposing policy of self-containment has demonstrated its inability either to avoid or arrest or cure the most destroying depression in all the annals of business.

This Conference should proclaim that economic nationalism as imposed upon the various nations is a discredited policy; and from those who insist that the world should continue in this discredited policy the Conference must turn aside. Many measures indispensable to full and satisfactory business recovery are beyond the powers of individual states. The extreme difficulty is manifest of one nation by itself undertaking largely to reduce its tariffs or to remove exchange restrictions or to stabilize its exchange and currency or to restore the international financial credit and trade structure.

It is equally true that mutually profitable markets could only be obtained by the liberalization of the commercial policies of other countries, and this is only possible by the simultaneous action of all governments stabilizing exchange and currencies and reducing to a reasonable extent trade barriers and other impediments to commerce between nations.

This Conference must formulate plans to deal effectively with these difficulties. Satisfactory conditions of peace and prosperity and human progress itself require the maintenance of a growing international commerce. The Conference must make clear whether civilized countries can ignore this economic fact and shirk the duties which such fact imposes.

Let me here reassert the principle that trade between nations does not mean the displacement of established home production and trade of one country by that of another. International trade is chiefly barter of a mutually profitable exchange of surpluses by different countries either directly or in a triangular manner. It specially contemplates too that an enterprising nation goes out into the world and locates and develops new markets for the goods it effectively produces. The gradual and careful readjustment of the excesses of tariff and other trade barriers to a moderate level would not contemplate either unreasonable or excessive competitive imports against efficient domestic industry operated under normal conditions on the one hand nor monopolistic price advantages at home on the other. This policy, if practiced generally among the nations, would insure healthier and more prosperous conditions in all industries at all efficient in every country. This broad program while disclaiming extreme economic internationalism on the one hand would challenge extreme economic nationalism on the other and launch every nation upon a sane, practical, middle course. It would reciprocally supplement efficient home markets with capacious foreign markets. In no others half so feasible can the present 30,000,000 of unemployed wage earners be returned to work nor bankrupt agriculture be restored to solvency nor famished industry be brought back to normal.

The world cannot longer go on as it is going at present. A successful meeting of this Conference in my judgment is the key to widespread business recovery. While it is true that at the present time there does not exist a sufficiently informed public opinion in support of a necessary program of international economic cooperation, it is my firm conviction that the losses and sufferings of peoples in every country have been so great that they can soon be aroused into aggressive support of such a program.

The first and greatest task at the present juncture is the development here in this hall of a will and a determination on the part of nations vigorously to advocate this course. Thereafter plans and methods will readily take form. My firm prayer, therefore, is for a spirit of cooperation necessary to create a unified leadership program in this Conference that will carry hope to the unnumbered millions in distress throughout the world. A preliminary step indicative of sincere purpose would be the immediate general adherence by all the participating governments to the tariff truce already agreed to by at least a dozen countries to continue to the end of this Conference. The full program should comprise a succession of methods and plans of international cooperation.

All excesses in the structure of trade barriers should be removed, all unfair trade methods and practices should be abandoned, the nations should attack these conditions and problems simultaneously, and by as many effective methods as we can devise. In the monetary field suitable measures must be taken to provide for an immediate policy which will give the greatest possible measure of stability for the period during which the groundwork will be laid for enduring reform. Simultaneously all the nations must stimulate the natural sources of employment, restart the wheels of industry and commerce, and so build up consumer power that a rise of the price level will of necessity follow.

Then the Conference must face the vexing problem of a permanent international monetary standard and lay down the proper function of the metals, gold and silver, in the operations of such a standard in the future.

Coincident with the immediate and the ultimate monetary problems there is the necessity of taking measures for the removal of restrictions upon foreign-exchange dealings. This may involve a balance-sheet reorganization of certain countries. The American delegation is prepared to offer concrete suggestions in regard to all these questions.

The nations which sent us here are interested above all else in peace and prosperity, and the prerequisite of either is a wise readjustment of economic policies. Economic conflicts, with some exceptions, are the most serious and the most permanent of all the dangers which are likely to threaten the peace of the world. Let this great Conference therefore proceed to the herculean task of promoting and establishing economic peace, which is the fundamental basis of all peace.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statements that have been made by our colleague the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH], and I want to pay my respects to the delegation which President Roosevelt has sent to London, some of whom are our colleagues. We know them and we know they are the right sort. However, they are in an atmosphere of intrigue, European intrigue, and, as I have said to this House on several occasions when the proposal to send a delegation to London was pending, the Conference was for the purpose of dealing with the debts which the Allies owe the United States.

Confirmation of this was given day before yesterday by Premier MacDonald at the opening of the Economic Conference. When the appropriation bill providing for the expense of the Conference was up on the floor of this House the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, who is now in London as one of the delegates, denied that debts were to be discussed and everyone connected with the administration has made similar statements. I wonder now what our colleague [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] thinks, and what he will do under the circumstances.

In this morning's paper we have this information, and I am quoting from the Philadelphia Ledger:

Warning halts British speech on debt policy. Congress still sitting. "Say nothing", Lindsay phones London.

Now, who is Lindsay? This is Sir Ronald Lindsay, who was negotiating this debt matter even before the present President took office. This is the same Lindsay that I referred to in a resolution which I presented to this House on February 25 last, in which I asked that he be recalled. My resolution was as follows:

Whereas on February 15, 1933, the Washington Star, in an article concerning the war debts, published the following statement in regard to the lobbying activities of the British Ambassador, Sir Ronald Lindsay, intimating that he had been able corruptly to influence Members of the House of Representatives in the interests of Great Britain:

"Sir Ronald Lindsay realized that, on the one hand, he had to deal here with a government which had no longer any authority from the country and, on the other hand, that every day public sentiment was changing from friendly to hostile toward Great Britain. All this, he thought, was due to a misunderstanding of America's problems on the part of the British cabinet. The public statements Chamberlain was making were a clear illustration of the lack of comprehension of the situation in America by a majority of the British Government.

"Lindsay decided to make a comprehensive survey of the situation himself. This was a difficult and delicate task for a foreign ambassador, who is supposed to deal exclusively with the State Department. He talked the situation over with Secretary Stimson and obtained the latter's approval to deal direct with the legislative body of the United States and eventually with the President-elect himself.

"Lindsay did good reporter's work. He talked to almost every Member of Congress who had any definite opinions on the debt question and whose voice was likely to influence the coming debates. After having gained a comprehensive picture of the attitude of the Congress he managed to obtain an invitation from the President-elect to come and visit him at Warm Springs on the eve of his departure to London to present his complete report.

"Roosevelt and Lindsay talked together for hours and, according to reliable reports, they surveyed not only the debt question but also the question of the Geneva Conference and the far-eastern conflict. He obtained a clear picture of the future foreign policies of the incoming administration."

And

Whereas the Government of the United States has never lost its authority, as falsely realized by Sir Ronald Lindsay, and the House of Representatives has never lost its authority; and

Whereas Sir Ronald Lindsay, Ambassador of Great Britain to the United States, has rendered himself obnoxious by publicly invading the Capitol of the United States and attempting to influence legislators in the interests of Great Britain; and

Whereas the said Sir Ronald Lindsay is conducting an extensive propaganda in the United States for the cancelation of the war debt owed to the United States by Great Britain, to the end that England may dishonor her signature without incurring too much the contempt of the world, and whereas the United States has had enough and to spare of British propaganda; and

Whereas Sir Ronald Lindsay, Ambassador of Great Britain, is required by law to confine his communications to the Secretary of State, and whereas it is a gross violation of United States rights for him to issue statements to the press in an attempt to defeat the measures of the United States Government, and whereas he has been guilty of such violations of United States rights and has given offense to the people of the United States; and

Whereas there is no authority in the United States which can confer upon a foreign functionary the right to interview any person, other than the Secretary of State, connected with the Government, and whereas the Secretary of State and his principal, the Executive, have no power to permit a foreign functionary to interfere with the Government of the United States by interviewing Members of Congress, and whereas it is an insinuation against Members of Congress to assert that they willingly permitted themselves to be interviewed by the British Ambassador in his violation of their right to freedom from molestation on the part of foreign functionaries, and whereas the said unlawful molestation of Members of Congress by the said Sir Ronald Lindsay and his attempt corruptly to influence them to defeat the measures of the United States Government in the interests of Great Britain constitutes an invasion of the rights and privileges of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas the Logan Act (U.S.C., Criminal Code, title 18, sec. 5) makes it a crime for a private citizen of the United States to have intercourse with a foreign functionary unless that private citizen has been duly authorized by the Government to have such intercourse, and whereas neither the Secretary of State nor the Executive has power to permit intercourse between a private citizen of the United States and a foreign functionary in regard to matters which have been or which may be the subject of legislation by Congress, when such matters affect the revenue of the United States; and

Whereas the lobbying activities of the said British Ambassador, Sir Ronald Lindsay, carried on in the halls of the Capitol, at the British Embassy, in the houses of citizens of the United States, in the offices of predatory international bankers, on shipboard, on trains, and elsewhere, have for their purpose the taking from the United States Treasury of assets which it is the sworn duty of this Government to protect by every means within its power, not stopping short of war, if need be; and whereas the said Lindsay's lobbying activities likewise have for their purpose the defeat of measures enacted into law by the Government of the United States to insure the repayment of moneys advanced to Great Britain on her written promise to repay them; and whereas the lobbying activities of Sir Ronald Lindsay likewise have for their object the overthrow of the Government of the United States and its reorganiaztion as a part of the British Empire: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that its rights and privileges have been invaded by Sir Ronald Lindsay, British Ambassador to the United States, in his molestation of Members of Congress and private citizens in the interests of Great Britain, and by his subversive activities against the Government of the United States and his attempts to defeat the measures of the United State Government, and that his lobbying activities and utterances assail the honor and dignity of the House of Representatives and constitute an attack upon the integrity of its legislative proceedings, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and the Department of Justice.

This same gentleman now telephones to his Government in England warning England against permitting Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, making his speech before the Economic Conference and says nothing must be said until Congress adjourns. Twice during last evening in the House of Commons Mr. Chamberlain rose to speak and each time had to say he was sorry he could not give the promised information.

Reading further from the Philadelphia Public Ledger:

America placed on defensive in economic parley. Europe refuses to act until debts are settled. Hull revises speech.

These performances should show the American people why President Roosevelt has been so insistent that Congress adjourn before the opening of the London Economic Conference. Interpreted, it discloses complete cooperation between Premier MacDonald and President Roosevelt on the conduct of this Conference and on the conduct in the handling of the June 15 payments on war debts.

We all know that the Lausanne Conference provided for a cancelation of the reparations due the allied governments down to 10 percent of their value. We all know that the Lausanne agreement is not complete so far as the allied nations are concerned until they have persuaded the United States to likewise cancel the debts down to 10 percent, which means the taxpayers of the United States are to pay the debts owed by Europe.

We have other reports in the papers today indicating that tomorrow, when the payments are due, amounting to some $140,000,000, Great Britain, the leader of the united front against us, proposes to offer a token or something of the sort for 10 percent of the amount due us, and we know that in Washington today we have their ultimatum. This, I understand, the President will accept, with an apology. This is his second step toward cancelation of these debts.

Apparently the London Conference cannot function until Congress adjourns. Now, why should this be? Why should this Congress, which has the sole authority to deal with this debt question, not have full information before it today? Who has any authority to negotiate or to accept a token or a partial payment of the debt that is due tomorrow from Great Britain? Nobody but the Congress of the United States. Why does the President carry on these negotiations? Why does this House sit supinely by and permit this?

It is intimated that a token will be accepted and that then the President of the United States will enter into some treaty looking toward a revision downward, to 10 percent, of this debt later on, just as England and France and the other countries have decided—and we, the people's representatives, sit by and let them get away with it.

The Congress of the United States should beware of negotiations which are taking place relative to a further reconsideration of this debt question, because such a plan absolutely nullifies the wishes of the Congress and the people of the United States.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I may be mistaken, but I understood the gentleman to say it had been admitted that an arrangement would be made by which the debt would be reduced.

Mr. McFADDEN. "Intimated", I said.

Mr. BYRNS. I thought the gentleman said "admitted."

Mr. McFADDEN. No.

Mr. BYRNS. I just want to remind the gentleman that the question of the debt settlement is not on the agenda and will not be taken up, so our delegation at the London Conference assures us.

Mr. McFADDEN. I hope that is the case, but I may say to the gentleman that during the sessions of this Economic Conference in London there is another meeting taking place in London. We were advised by reports from London last Sunday of the arrival of George L. Harrison, Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and we were advised that accompanying him was Mr. Crane, the Deputy Governor, and James P. Warburg, of the Kuhn-Loeb banking family, of New York and Hamburg, Germany, and also Mr. O. M. W. Sprague, recently in the pay of Great Britain as chief economic and financial adviser of Mr. Norman, Governor of the Bank of England, and now supposed to represent our Treasury. These men landed in England and rushed to the Bank of England for a private conference, taking their luggage with them, before even going to their hotel. We know this conference has been taking place for the past 3 days behind closed doors in the Bank of England with these gentlemen meeting with the heads of the Bank of England and the Bank for International Settlements, of Basel, Switzerland, and the head of the Bank of France, Mr. Maret. They are discussing war debts; they are discussing stabilization of exchanges and the Federal Reserve System, I may say to the Members of the House.

The Federal Reserve System, headed by George L. Harrison, is our premier, who is dealing with debts behind the closed doors of the Bank of England; and the United States Treasury is there, represented by O. M. W. Sprague, who until the last 10 days was the representative of the Bank of England, and by Mr. James P. Warburg, who is the son of the principal author of the Federal Reserve Act. Many things are being settled behind the closed doors of the Bank of England by this group. No doubt this group were pleased to hear that yesterday the Congress passed amendments to the Federal Reserve Act and that the President signed the bill which turns over to the Federal Reserve System the complete total financial resources of money and credit in the United States. Apparently the domination and control of the international banking group is being strengthened.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. BYRNS. I am sure the gentleman will agree with me that no composition of our foreign debts can be made without the consent of Congress, and I am reminded that the President made this statement yesterday.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am pleased to hear that the President is making that statement. The papers from London and New York and all over this country are stating that negotiathions are on dealing with the debts. As a matter of fact, it was determined at the London Conference of July 20, 1931, that this conference should be held following the Lausanne Conference. It follows a complete sequence of events: First, the Hoover moratorium of June 1931; then the London Conference of July 1931; then the standstill agreements and the conferences with the Bank for International Settlements on the German reparations matter; followed by the Lausanne Conference; and now the London Conference dealing with debts, international exchange, and trade. This conference is an international conference, and our participation should not be construed as a party proposition. It is international in every sense of the word. It was Hoover's plan, and it has been accepted by Roosevelt. We are being led by the international Jews operating through Great Britain and the Bank of England, and it is the purpose of those who are directing and cooperating that debts be reduced to 10 percent or canceled entirely.

Again I repeat—there can be no cancelation; there can only be the transference of the burden of payment from the backs of the foreigners to the back of the American taxpayer.

I want to say further that these people who control and dominate the Federal Reserve System are greatly exhilarated because you have taken into the Federal Reserve control the entire credit and money resources of the United States. You are forcing all of the State banks in the United States to become members of the Federal Reserve System under the penalty that if they do not join the new system they will have to close up, because their deposits are not guaranteed. No bank will be able to keep open whose deposits are not now guaranteed since the passage of this guaranty bill.

So you have these international bankers controlling this London Conference. There can be no question about that. They are, no doubt, gratified that all of our financial resources are now turned over to them.

I want to see an American banking system controlled by Americans, for the benefit of the 125,000,000 people, not dominated by foreigners.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH] referred to the fact that our delegation to London have had no experience in international conferences, but I would call his attention to the fact that while they may be inexperienced in international conferences they have with them so-called "financial experts" who understand international economic and financial questions. Professor Sprague, to whom I have just referred, has had charge of the stabilization fund, now amounting to $1,300,000,000, which, after all, is really the British treasury, and which, under Professor Sprague's direction, has been used to keep down prices in the United States and to speculate in the international exchange market principally in the control of the value of the pound and the dollar. The operation of this stabilization fund has been a great aid to England in tying up all of her trade agreements with the different countries of the world prior to the convening of the present London Economic Conference.

Then there is James P. Warburg, who was called in by the President and who has sat in on all of the conferences here in Washington participated in by the foreign representatives recently, and he is the financial adviser at the Economic Conference and at the conferences in the Bank of England to which I have referred. Mr. Warburg, you undoubtedly know, is the head of the international Jewish financial group who were largely responsible for the loaning abroad of the vast billions of dollars by the people of the United States and which loans are now frozen. We must not overlook the fact, however, that J. P. Morgan & Co. were close seconds in these transactions, and in connection with this I wish to point out that George L. Harrison, Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, is closely identified with the Morgan House in all of the undertakings internationally in which the Federal Reserve banks participated.

Such are the influences which are dominating and controlling that conference.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to address this question to the gentleman and other Members of the House on both sides of the aisle. I shall ask the gentleman to reply to it. Does not the gentleman think that since the House of Representatives can take no action whatever, it would be infinitely better if we refrained from discussing newspaper reports of what may be or may not be done in London, thus running the risk of saying something that might in some way interfere with the efforts of the American representatives to that Conference?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say that there is no one who would like to see the situation solved more than the gentleman now addressing you at this time.

Mr. McFADDEN. I ask unanimous consent for 5 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman answer one question?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What particular expert adviser would the gentleman recommend should be sent over there?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am not recommending anyone. That is not my business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Who would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am not suggesting anyone.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is interested in it, and he must know someone.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; there are many.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Who are they?

Mr. McFADDEN. There are plenty of them. I want to again call attention to the statement in the paper this morning of Mr. Neville Chamberlain's address being held up waiting for Congress to adjourn. We are told that the whole Conference is being held in abeyance. What is there that the American people should not know about this? It seems to me that Congress should remain in session. There is nothing that is indicated that is taking place over there for the benefit of our people that these matters should not be discussed here. Congress, if it adjourns today or tomorrow, will not reconvene of its own volition until next January, a period of over 6 months. It seems to me, during this important discussion, which is dealing with the future welfare of this country, so far as economics and finances are concerned, that this Congress should remain in session. I am willing to stay here for the next 3 months or the next 6 months, because it is the most serious condition that the people of this country have ever faced. There is no demand that Congress adjourn at this time except the demand that comes from the administration apparently to get rid of us.

I want to point out now that Great Britain's position is to dominate this Conference to the benefit of Great Britain, and not to help the people of the United States. It is the purpose, under the leadership of Great Britain, to cancel or reduce these war debts down to 10 percent. It is the purpose of these financial advisers who have gone over there, who are more interested in the cancelation of these debts than anything else—both Mr. Harrison and Mr. Warburg, for they are for cancelation, 100 percent. They also are to deal with the fixing of the ratio between the pound and the dollar. England is interested to see to it that the dollar becomes that fuzzy little piece on the end of the tail of the English lion; England wants to stabilize the pound sterling at 3.25 to 3.40 and keep the dollar stabilized where it has been, and if we do not look out that is just exactly what is going to happen. England is out to capture the world's trade and become the world's banker; she wants sterling to help her and the dollar not to interfere. There is involved in this that which I said in my first speech delivered before this House some 4 years ago, the enlargement of the facilities of the Bank for International Settlements, and possibly the moving of that bank from Basle, Switzerland, to London. Into that bank are to be deposited certain portions of the world's gold, or it may be done by process of earmarking our gold, but they are after control of the gold, and when they get control of the gold we will go back on the gold basis, but who will control? England will control the International Bank, and our participation will be by and through these international banking groups, J. P. Morgan & Co., and the Warburgs, of New York and Hamburg, Germany.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has expired.

AMENDING FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 3344) to amend section 14, subdivision 3, of the Federal Farm Loan Act.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY]?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Has this bill been considered by a committee?

Mr. DISNEY. Yes. The Banking and Currency Committee favorably reports the bill.

Mr. SNELL. And it has the unanimous support of the committee?

Mr. DISNEY. We have a majority report. It may not be a unanimous report. I do not know that all members of the committee were present.

Mr. SNELL. If there is some opposition, I wish the gentleman would wait until we can get in touch with them.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] were present and discussed the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14, subdivision 3, of the Federal Farm Loan Act (39 Stat.L. 372) is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Third. To accept any mortgages on real estate except first mortgages created subject to all limitations imposed by section 12 of this act, and those taken as additional security for existing loans: Provided, That the first-mortgage loans shall be made without regard to the mineral rights therein."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK]?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if he is going to discuss the International Conference?

Mr. LAMNECK. I am going to discuss war debts and the International Conference.

Mr. BYRNS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object. I feel it is my duty to do this. We have had two speeches on this subject, one on each side, and I think we are making a mistake in undertaking to discuss something that is now being discussed by the Conference at London. We accomplish nothing by it, and it means nothing except an expression of our own individual opinions.

Mr. LAMNECK. It means a lot to the United States.

Mr. BYRNS. That may be; but I believe in leaving this matter to the conferees over there, confident that they are not going to discuss debt settlements because it is not on the agenda, and as such statements can only tend to provoke some opposition, I object. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the war debts.

Mr. BYRNS. I object.

Mr. LAMNECK. I object. There will be no more speeches here today.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes, not on the subject of war debts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman withold his objection for a moment?

Mr. LAMNECK. There will be no more speeches today if I can stop it.

FOURTH DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

J. P. BUCHANAN,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
W. B. OLIVER,
W. A. AYRES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman ought to make a statement. This increases the amount by a considerable sum, and I think the gentleman ought to tell the House what the increases are and why they have been agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am willing to answer any question that the gentleman may propound to me.

Mr. SNELL. Unfortunately the gentleman from New York knows very little about it, but I see you have increased it some three or four hundred million dollars. I think the gentleman should at least tell the House what he is asking it to vote on.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The greatest increase is the $150,000,000 to carry into effect the recent Banking Act we passed day before yesterday.

Mr. SNELL. What provision has been made to raise the $150,000,000 appropriated for this purpose?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No provision is made in this bill. This is an appropriation bill, not a revenue bill.

Mr. SNELL. The President the other day said he would oppose any more large appropriations unless taxes were levied to provide the money appropriated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Congress of the United States passed the banking bill and that rendered the appropriation necessary.

Mr. SNELL. Is the President going to refuse to sign the bill because it carries $150,000,000 for the raising of which no provision is made?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We will leave that problem to the Ways and Means Committee. It does not concern the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SNELL. I notice in the papers this morning a statement that during the last 102 days we spent $300,000 a day more than was spent in the preceding 102 days. I think the gentleman should tell us something about this money situation. I think the House is entitled to know by how much each one of these amendments increases the expenditures.

I notice there is an item for 12 additional Capitol Police, Will the gentleman tell us why we need them?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We did not allow the 12 additional Capitol Police. That was a Senate amendment. The House conferees succeeded in having the number cut down to eight.

The necessity for these additional police is that the new park of about 60 acres between the Capitol Building and the station will no longer be policed by the Police Department of the District of Columbia. That burden has been thrown on Congress, and the force of the Capitol Police will have to take care of it.

Mr. SNELL. I thought we increased our own force here a short time ago to take care of that situation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No. That was for the New House Office Building.

Mr. SNELL. How many have we at present?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We had 33, and we increased it by 6, which makes it 39 for both House Office Buildings, whereas the Senate has 32 for just one building.

Mr. SNELL. I know; but how many have we altogether in the Office Buildings and on the Capitol Grounds.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not recall.

Mr. TABER. I think, if the gentleman will yield to me, I can supply the information. I think, after these 8 are added, the number will be 126.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is not for the Capitol Grounds alone, I may say to the gentleman from New York, but that is the total number.

Mr. TABER. That is the total number.

Mr. SNELL. Why, under Democratic control, do we need so many more police to protect us?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think my colleague will recall that a few years ago, by reason of these grounds being insufficiently policed, a young lady while passing through the grounds was assaulted and outraged and lay in the hospital for months and months. It almost killed her. It crippled her for life. We do not want such a thing to occur again.

Mr. BLANTON. And a murder was committed right here in the Capitol Grounds not over 3 years ago. That was under Republican control.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell me what experience the men will have whom it is intended to put on this augmented force?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The ones we will put on will have exactly the same experience as the ones the Republicans put on when they were in control.

Mr. SNELL. We did not ask for any more, did we?

Mr. BUCHANAN. You had plenty of them.

Mr. SNELL. If we had plenty of them then, why have you not plenty of them now?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Because we have more grounds to patrol.

Mr. SNELL. Where is there any more ground to patrol?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The 60 acres between here and the station that you did not have. Then we have a new House Office Building and a new Senate wing which the Republicans did not have.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that you have more Congressmen to give patronage to and you must have more jobs?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am glad to say we have more Congressmen, and I think we will continue to have more.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Can the chairman of the committee tell us why the President will permit $150,000,000 more to be expended here without demanding additional taxes, yet he sees fit to come to the Senate in person, as we understand he is doing this morning, and fight a compromise on veteran legislation that will involve but $40,000,000 or $50,000,000?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is not a part of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman for or against the President?

Mr. KVALE. I am against the President if he insists on the veterans' cut without a compromise. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New York 5 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I think before the House goes on with this bill it ought to know what it is.

The first item of money is $100,000 for more Senate investigations.

The second item is for eight more police, $12,213.

The third item is for four additional female attendants for the Senate Office Building.

The fourth item is to complete the George Rogers Clark Memorial, which I supposed we had completed in the last appropriation bill, $250,000.

The fifth item is to pay to white squatters on Indian lands in Arizona, $232,000.

Out in our country if we go on our neighbor's land and build some buildings there and have not any title to it, when we get through we are just out of luck; but down in Arizona when they do this sort of thing, in the days of the new deal they get reimbursed by the Federal Government. [Laughter.]

The seventh item is $150,000,000 for the bank-guarantee bill.

The eighth item is $3,000,000——

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BECK. Is there any reason why, as the bank insurance does not take effect for nearly a year, we should at this time appropriate $150,000,000?

Mr. TABER. Oh, no; but under the new deal we have to have all the money right now on everything, even though statements are presented to the committees which hold the hearings that not half of it can be used during the year for which the appropriation is made. This is the new deal.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I should like to ask the Democratic leadership a question. For the last week or 10 days we have heard the President's statement that he is willing to stay here all summer to balance the Budget. Now, we are haggling in the Senate over a matter of $40,000,000 to be provided for in new taxes. I do not know what bookkeeping system the Democrats are using today, whether it is the double-entry system of this year or some new system they are going to have next year. I should like someone on the Democratic side to tell me how they are going to charge the $150,000,000 authorized in the branch-banking bill passed yesterday, or are we to believe that the President is not for the Glass-Steagall bill, since there is no provision as yet for raising this large sum of money through taxes? I have enough confidence in the President, based on his statement of last week that he is willing to stay here all summer to balance the Budget, to believe that he means what he says; but are we to assume now that he is against the Glass-Steagall bill, or what does he mean by balancing the Budget?

Mr. TABER. I cannot yield further on that point.

In addition to these items we have referred to, there is an additional $3,000,000 to be lent by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, making a total to come out of the Public Treasury of $153,598,000, and the total of this bill as it will probably pass will be $3,613,079,167.74. I suppose the reason it is $153,598,000 more than as the House passed it is because the Senate is not willing to have the House outdo it in spending the people's money and it wanted to go a little further. If we stayed in session another 2 weeks, there would be no bottom in the Treasury, and I do not believe there is any now. It seems to me we are going to get our Government in such a position that it can never work out of the picture.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, my good friend, the gentleman from New York, usually speaks for a purpose, and generally that purpose is to give information, but I submit that those of you who were here last week when this bill passed can find but little, if any, information in the speech just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The bill which you passed last week, known as "the deficiency bill", carried all of the items included in this conference report except those which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] elicited full information about by questions asked of the chairman of the committee immediately before the speech was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. In other words, this House last week approved without a record vote all the items included in the conference report plus the items which Mr. SNELL, in his inquiry of the chairman, disclosed just a few minutes ago, one of which is $150,000,000 made necessary by the bank-deposit guaranty bill approved yesterday. This House, by an almost unanimous vote on yesterday, passed that bill, and if there be any on that side of the aisle who object to this item's being appropriated for, they should register their objection and reasons therefor.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BECK. My inquiry is not an unfriendly one. I was simply wondering when I addressed the same question to the gentleman from New York why the $150,000,000 could not wait until the next session of the Congress and thus save to some extent the burden falling this year.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the membership of the House feel that the suspension of the date when this is to be effective will in a large measure be helped when the general public understands that Congress has appropriated the amount required to guarantee such deposits. [Applause.]

It is a very splendid encouragement to the American public, who approve this guaranty provision as passed yesterday almost without dissent—there were perhaps six voting against it—if they now understand that the Government's contribution to the fund has been appropriated to make effective this very wise legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. In line with what the gentleman is saying and in spite of the fact that yesterday the bank guaranty bill was passed by 191 ayes and 6 noes, and those who were for the bill were not proud enough of it to go on record and vote for it, I will ask the gentleman if anyone in this House can seriously complain against this appropriation of $150,000,000 except those who stood up here yesterday and voted against the bank bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the six Members and the gentleman who now propounds the inquiry was one of the six, feel proud of their opposition to that bill, then it is their privilege to make it known in the proper way and let their constituents understand what their reasons were for opposing the legislation.

Mr. McGUGIN. I was proud of that opposition then and I am exceedingly proud of it today.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. On the other hand, those of us who favored it are well satisfied and feel that the people of this country will give full approval to what we did. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I voted for the measure yesterday because I thought it was the best banking bill we could get at the present time, but the point I want to develop is what has been done to provide the money to pay this $150,000,000 appropriation. The President is quoted in the public press as saying that he would not sign a bill that provided an additional payment to soldiers of $170,000,000 because no provision had been made to finance the proposition. What provision has been made to finance this $150,000,000?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman who is the leader of the minority is very familiar with all the legislation that has been passed at this session and knows what broad authority Congress has given the President to make the legislation effective. I have not time now to discuss those measures in detail, but since the President is not asking at this time, nor the Ways and Means Committee of the House suggesting the necessity of any further legislation, I respectfully submit that this is not the proper time to suggest we should postpone adjournment until legislation is passed for raising the funds that may be required. [Applause.]

Let me suggest to my distinguished friend from New York, who is usually very frank, that we understand, of course, the underlying purpose of his inquiries to the chairman of the committee, as well as other like inquiries he has made within the last week—and I think I am on safe ground in assuming that the gentleman is just a little fearful lest prosperity may return before we reconvene in January; and if so, that it would be very disastrous to his party. [Laughter and applause.] My belief is that the gentleman, rather than being anxious to suggest something constructive which he may have in mind, is entirely content to take up the time of the House in propounding mere futile inquiries in the chance hope that something may develop in the future to which he can later refer and then pose as an "I-told-you-so prophet." [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is one of the valuable Members of this House. It is only on very rare occasions that you hear a partisan speech from him, such as he delivered a few moments ago.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman approve of this item——

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I have not the time to yield to the gentleman. If the gentleman's party during the last 12 years had passed such a bill as the bank-deposits guarantee bill, against which the Republican leader from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] arrays himself, they would have saved the ruination of millions of families in the United States.

During the last 2 years there have been millions of families in the United States who for a lifetime have been scrimping and saving and denying themselves the ordinary necessities of life in order to put a little nest egg aside to use against the days of old age—amounting to $5,000, $6,000, or $7,000, stowed away in some bank that they thought was perfectly safe. If the gentleman's party had brought in such a bill as the guaranty bank deposits bill, which we Democrats have forced to be passed, no matter what it cost—if the little deposits of these families over the United States had been made safe—he would not have found the desolation and misery that now exist in so many millions of homes in the United States.

It is a great bill—the greatest bill that has been passed by Congress during the 17 years that I have served here.

I want to take my hat off to the men who have worked so hard to pass the bill, who have put their best services into it for its success, who have seen to it that Congress should not adjourn until the bill was signed and has become a law.

I have worked on committees with my friend from New York [Mr. TABER] and I think he has helped to save the Government many million dollars. He has been instrumental in helping us to save much money, but he has not been going along with his Republican Party very much, because during the last 12 years his party has been one of extravagance, one of money-spending, until it has been a scandal to the Nation.

Take this $20,000,000 Commerce Building on land that is worth $20,000,000 more. In order to construct it they had to tear down fine building after fine building, amounting in the aggregate to millions of dollars, in order that that great structure could be built there in honor—and I am glad to say they have it in big letters on the building—"Built under President Herbert Hoover and Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon." We must never allow that inscription to be taken off that building, because it stands as an everlasting monument to the unprecedented extravagance of the Hoover Republican administration.

It takes an Indian guide every morning for the Secretary of Commerce to find his office by way of a secret elevator that was built especially for him and is daily run for him by its special operator. Very few Congressmen know how to find it. It is shut in and enclosed so that very few men in public life know where it is. The ordinary chiefs down there get lost trying to find their offices every morning. [Laughter.]

All these many other extravagant buildings, built and now under construction, are a part of the extravagant Republican regime.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. I yield to the new leader of the Republican Party, the gentleman whom the minority are training up here to get in action so frequently.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Do I understand correctly that the gentleman from Texas agrees with the President?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, so long as the President knows where I stand and is satisfied, I do not care how ignorant my friend is on the subject.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Possibly the gentleman can explain why the President refuses to pay forty or fifty million dollars additional to deserving disabled veterans unless we impose new taxation, and nothing is provided to meet the $150,000,000 authorized in the branch-banking bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York has no authority to say that. He cannot speak for the President. I want to say that the veterans of the United States have more confidence in the present Democratic President of the United States than they have in the gentleman's whole Republican Party. It was the gentleman's Republican Party that refused to pay them an honest debt, a debt of honor that was owing to them since the day they came back from France, for they should have been paid in cash instead of adjusted-service certificates.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I have only 2 minutes. Why did not those men who carried our flag in France have a right to come to their Nation's Capital last year? Other people have the right. Why did President Hoover run them out? Why did they not have the right? Will you Republicans answer that? When they came here this very same Republican Party that now makes itself out as a friend of the soldier, as the only friend the veterans have—it was this very same Republican Party, this cold-blooded, cruel Republican Party, that set policemen on them and ran them out of their Nation's Capital as if they were a bunch of outcasts. They will not forget that. It is the soldiers of the United States today who have absolute confidence in their present President. They know they are being cut. They know it hurts. They know they are cut to the quick, but they know that Franklin Roosevelt, before he quits, will see to it that justice is done to every disabled veteran of the war, and they know, too, that he is saving this Republic for them.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. When will it be done?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret I have not the time. Oh, nothing would be done at all for the veterans, either as to pensions or the bonus, if the Republicans had it in charge; but, thank God, men have it in charge now, led and guided by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who know how to do things, and justice will be done all veterans. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. ARENS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. ARENS. I notice in the report the appropriation for $300,000 to fight grasshoppers is eliminated. Last year we had a plague in several of the Western States. Does the gentleman not think there should be funds available in case a plague occurs, if only for the purpose of protecting the Government's security? The Government has made a great many seed loans, and if the grasshoppers should appear again, as they did last year, the Government would lose its security. I should like to ask the gentleman whether there are any funds available in case of an emergency, or whether this eliminates all of them?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There are no funds available from the Federal Treasury now. I may say to the gentleman when this matter was considered last year there was a real threat, a real menace pending, when they found tens of thousands of eggs to the square foot, and even under those circumstances the Congress refused to appropriate.

This year there is no menace, or at least it has not appeared. The eggs are not there in the ground, and as far as I know there is no threat of any character whatever. So it would be foolish at this time of the year, at this late date when the grasshoppers would be hatching out, to appropriate money to fight them. When January comes along, if the Congress sees proper, it may, through a legislative bill, provide a permanent fund to meet these emergencies as they arise, and I commend that to the gentleman, if he wants to provide that fund to take care of these emergencies in connection with the pests that attack agriculture.

Mr. ARENS. It would not do any harm. If there was no plague, the money would not be used.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I understand that, but it is too late now to do any good.

Mr. LEMKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. LEMKE. I think the gentleman is in error in his statement. There is not only an apparent menace but it exists now. In our State grasshoppers are hatching out by the millions and there is real danger of crop destruction.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then it is too late for this appropriation to do any good.

Mr. LEMKE. I might state that for these same States, where the grasshopper menace exists, Congress last year appropriated $90,000,000 to make loans to the farmers to put in their crops, and now they are denying them $300,000 to protect the crops, after they appropriated $90,000,000 for loans with which to produce these crops, and your committee seems willing to permit these crops now to be destroyed by grasshoppers.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I may say to the gentleman that the only successful fight to be made against grasshoppers is at the time they are hatching out and while they are small. The Department could not get ready in time now to do any good. The money would be wasted.

Another thing, there is not one iota of testimony before our committee that there is any threat of any kind.

Mr. LEMKE. I appeared before the chairman's committee and I was sent to another committee—a legislative committee—by him. I went to the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee and he suggested that I get the amendment put on this bill in the Senate. I then went to the Senate, and the Senate added the Frazier amendment here in question.

This appropriation to prevent the grasshopper menace has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. There was plenty of evidence that I would have gladly presented to the conferees, and I know that Senator FRAZIER, the author of the amendment, had plenty of evidence. I feel that the House conferees deliberately closed their eyes to the evidence—apparently there was no attempt made by the conferees to get any information on the subject. I had plenty of information and testimony to give to the conferees and so did Senator FRAZIER.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to adopt the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment no. 7 and concur in the same.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 14: On page 25, after line 18, insert:

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment no. 14 and concur in the same.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several motions were agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three hundred and fifty-five Members are present, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. CULLEN, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass House Resolution 50, with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

House Resolution 50

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of five Members of the House, one of whom shall be designated as chairman, and such committee is directed to conduct an investigation into the procedure and practice, under the rules and regulations of the Department of Labor and/or the Bureau of Immigration, relating to deportations and/or affecting detentions pending conclusion of deportation proceedings, for the purpose of enabling Congress to ascertain whether or not any necessity exists for legislative measures to correct any unnecessary hardships to aliens against whom deportation proceedings are instituted under existing law and regulation; said committee is also directed to conduct an investigation into the extent of alien smuggling into the United States, especially from Cuba and other islands adjacent to the State of Florida, for the purpose of ascertaining what legislative measure under our immigration laws might tend to reduce the extent of these surreptitious entries to the United States.

SEC. 2. Such committee, or subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit in Washington or elsewhere in the United States and, if deemed necessary, in the American consulate in Habana, Cuba, at the discretion of the chairman; to employ necessary stenographic, clerical, and other assistants and investigators; to have necessary printing and binding done; to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of necessary books, papers, records, documents, and other pertinent instruments of record, by subpena or otherwise; to make necessary traveling and other expenses, which shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee on Accounts: Provided, That the total expenses under this section shall not exceed the amount authorized to be appropriated under section 4 of this resolution. Subpenas shall be issued over the signature of the chairman and served by persons designated by him. The chairman of the committee or any member of the committee may administer oaths to witnesses. Any person who, having been summoned as a witness by order of the committee, or subcommittee thereof, willingly makes default, or who, having appeared, fails to produce the necessary books, papers, records, documents, or other pertinent instruments of record required, or refuses to answer any question deemed pertinent to the subject then under consideration, shall be subject to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The committee shall report to the House with recommendations, by bill or otherwise, not later than the first day of the session of Congress convening on or about January 3, 1934.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of State are requested to issue such instructions as they may deem necessary to the personnel of their respective departments to insure to the committee or any subcommittee thereof the necessary cooperation in the conduct of this investigation and the appearance of desired employees for testimony and the production of desired books, papers, documents, and other pertinent instruments of record, whether the same be in Washington, elsewhere in the United States, or in the American consulate at Habana, Cuba.

SEC. 4. There is appropriated from the contingent fund of the House the sum of $2,000, or any necessary part thereof, for the use of this committee for the purpose of conducting this investigation, which amount shall be immediately available.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Missouri opposed to the resolution as amended?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the second.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. DICKSTEIN and Mr. JENKINS.

The House divided, and the tellers reported that there were ayes 67, noes 35.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, it was really surprising to see any opposition to this resolution, the purpose of which is to secure factual information, upon which to base legislation, by Members of this House and upon your authority to investigate into certain conditions which are alleged to exist.

What do we propose to do? The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, after many years of public hearings, is still trying to find out where the leaks are, along the borders and with steamship companies, through which so many aliens are smuggled into this country.

I do not think either the Members on the Republican side or the other Members, who passed between the tellers in opposition, are really serious in trying to prevent an investigation to determine how so many Chinamen and other aliens get in here every day of the year through the operations of alleged smugglers' rings, and how best to correct the situation by legislation. I call your attention to one of the purposes for which this investigation is asked—line 3 to line 6, on page 2, I quote:

> For the purpose of ascertaining what legislative measures under our immigration laws might tend to reduce the extent of these surreptitious entries to the United States.

I think those who passed through the tellers in opposition to consideration of this resolution have an erroneous idea of the objects of the investigation.

I suppose you do not want to know how so many Japanese, Mexicans, and other aliens come into this country illegally every day. You do not seem to be interested. While you, gentlemen, are raising technical objections to this resolution, our country is being flooded with oriental and other aliens by all kinds of rackets in the smuggling of aliens.

Did you see the picture "I Cover the Waterfront"? If you did, you will recall when that ship came in and the inspector was examining the ship and they opened up a whale there they found a Chinaman. Now, you may think this is impossible, but it is true. Suppose I tell you that some months ago they found a bale of hay on a boat that came from China that had traveled almost 4 weeks; when they opened up the bale they found six Chinamen in the hay. Suppose I tell you that there were over 22,000 smuggled across the Mexican and Canadian borders? Are you still prepared to prevent authorizing this committee to conduct these investigations to find out just exactly what is the trouble?

I am not trying to build up a case; I am appealing to your sense of Americanism, because this committee at no time has had an opportunity to get the facts and the information as to why we have so much smuggling into the United States.

Suppose I tell you—and the figures will bear me out from your own administration in 1932—that over 8,000 aliens were smuggled into this country by the steamship companies, and only 1 percent of them were caught, and when we got them we deported them without penalizing the companies so that they would be more careful in the examination of their ships.

Did you know it has been charged by the newspapers and the press generally of the country that this racket of smuggling aliens has brought a profit to these unscrupulous persons amounting to over $20,000,000? Did you know that it is alleged there is a list somewhere in Habana, Cuba, of over 21,000 aliens who have actually been smuggled into the United States from Cuba and perhaps as many more on the lists waiting to be smuggled in?

Now, what are we trying to do? This committee can be given information about places where they can study the question of the smuggling of aliens so that they can come back to the Congress and present such recommendations as will stop the leaks through which these smuggling groups operate, so that we may present a constructive report of conditions as they exist and then submit to you recommendations for constructive legislation that will be beneficial to the country.

And what are we asking in the way of funds? We are asking $2,000.

The resolution further provides that the investigating committee would also ascertain at first-hand the facts upon which we can base legislative measures to correct alleged abuses against aliens who are held on technical grounds over unreasonable periods of confinement pending deportation proceedings and other alleged questionable practices which inflict what are claimed to be undue hardships upon aliens suspected as being subject to deportation.

I do not think the Department of Labor or the Department of Justice have the time nor, possibly, the authority to conduct an investigation such as I propose this select committee of the House shall conduct. This investigation is intended to assist the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in the formulating of legislative measures designed to stop the side doors for illegal entry to the United States and to correct abuses to aliens charged with being here illegally.

Ever since I have been the Chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization my attention has been called to the great number of cases which indicate careful study at first hand should be made to ascertain the facts that result in long detention of aliens held on technical grounds pending their deportation.

Just about 2 years ago the Honorable George W. Wickersham submitted to the President of the United States the fifth report of the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, which report treated the Enforcement of the Deportation Laws of the United States. It was an exhaustive report and much of its information will prove increasingly valuable as time goes on.

Through the text of the pages of this report reference is frequently made to the fact that under present immigration laws tremendous power is exercised by the field personnel in deportation cases whereby members of the same office locally make investigations, conduct preliminary examinations, decide whether or not an interpreter is needed, act as interpreters, act as stenographers, conduct warrant hearings, and make recommendations to Washington as to whether or not a suspected person should be deported; and the records sent to Washington generally contain only so much of what has been done as the inspector wishes.

In short, the same man or the same group of men, in a given case act as the inquisitor, interpreter, prosecutor, judge, and later follow through and become the agency for the execution of the sentence pronounced. All through the processes of deportation the same administrative Department of Labor control and execute the methods and determinations which sometimes involve possible interference of the gravest kind with rights of personal liberty.

I believe it is as important to American institutions that fundamental principles of fairness and justice be observed in the administration of the immigration laws as it is that aliens unlawfully here should be sent out of the United States.

The many complaints that have come to me, as the Chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, coming as they do from all parts of the country, convinces me that many times those fundamental principles of justice and fairness may have been sacrificed by overardent employees in the interest of departmental efficiency or by erroneous interpretation of the relative values of facts.

I am more and more convinced that Members of Congress should be delegated by the House to investigate these conditions from the viewpoint of a legislator in the hope that as a result of their personal inquiry in the actual existing processes in deportations your committee may evaluate the necessity for legislative action to further minimize abuses of the judicial principle stated by several Federal courts, to wit, that aliens as well as citizens are entitled to the protection of the fourth amendment to the Constitution.

Many complaints have come to me of undue hardships imposed by officials upon aliens held for deportation. They are too numerous to give in detail here. I will simply illustrate by a few instances of importance.

[From the Buffalo (N.Y.) Times]

JAILED ALIENS USE GRAPEVINE TO ASK BETTER TREATMENT—PETITION SIGNED BY 15 BEHIND BARS HERE POINTS OUT THAT NONE ARE CRIMINALS

A plea for better treatment during their imprisonment emanated Saturday through the "grapevine" route from 15 aliens held in the county jail as Federal prisoners.

The aliens attached their names to a petition in which they urged that the authorities provide them with better food and the means of taking exercise.

"We, the immigration prisoners of the Erie County Jail", the petition stated, "are sending out this message hoping that you will find space in your paper for publication. We take these means as our only way of expressing our opinions to the public as to what we regard as inhuman treatment. Amongst us there are no criminals. We have committed no crimes worse than being in the country illegally.

"We are compelled in some cases to remain in here as long as 8 months. We understand that with the immigration laws it takes time all right, but what we cannot understand and what we are positive the public does not understand is why we should not be accorded a little better treatment than the criminal cases in here."

A postscript said: "This letter may come to you from a point outside of the city as it would hardly be passed through the office."

I have a letter from a frantic wife and mother who tells me her husband is threatened with deportation although he has lived a respectable life in this country for 17 years and he has been confined in jail for over 4 weeks charged with being an alien because he had not taken out naturalization papers. She said she had taken him supplies which have disappeared and were never received by him.

I have a letter sent me from the managing editor of the Buffalo Times under date of November 14, 1932, which calls attention to six specific charges of abuse.

The following editorial from one of the Buffalo papers of just recent date which would seem to show the need of an investigation was just as essential now as it is reported to have been in that letter of November 1932:

[From the Buffalo (N.Y.) Times]

SIX MONTHS FOR NOTHING

When Frances Perkins became Secretary of Labor, succeeding "Bill" Doak, of unsavory memory, it was widely assumed that we were going to have a new deal in immigration matters.

The good news apparently has failed to percolate down to the immigration bureaucrats of the Buffalo district.

Jose Diuski, native of the Argentine, was released from county jail Monday night after being held for 6 months while immigration officers were trying to "pin something on him." With Diuski's money gone and his clothing reduced to shreds, immigration officers refused to heed the request of Jailer Edward Tranter that they permit him to remain in jail another day until he could be provided with new clothing in which to face the world. He was sent from jail to the county lodging house.

One of the first official acts of Miss Perkins was to dismiss from the service the stool pigeons and spies used by Doak to harass aliens. The act, we had reason to believe, was meant to signalize an end of Doak terrorism. But apparently local officials have been proceeding under the old Doak theory that the country can somehow be made safe and prosperous by making things tough for immigrants. We hope Miss Perkins will soon get around to ending alien abuses on the Niagara frontier against which this newspaper has repeatedly protested.

It is pleasant to know that Diuski, guilty of nothing, is at last free. But how many more friendless aliens are being held in jail without charges? It is time for another accounting.

In my office I have similar complaints from over all the Nation, and I dare say many of you have similar complaints from your own congressional districts.

It is these things which a legislative group of Congress should look into personally so as to frame laws intended to correct these abuses.

The so-called "Wickersham Commission", in its report on this subject, suggested that in deportation cases the alien be given the benefits to be secured by consideration of the facts and law in his case by an independent board of review outside of but correlating with the Department of Labor. Such a board having a sort of quasi-judicial authority to pass upon the facts and law as they affect the alien upon appeal from the field service of the Immigration Service.

I have in the course of preparation a bill to follow out those recommendations, but have delayed to introduce it in the House pending the results that I hope will follow from the investigations proposed in this resolution. The need of a study of the actual operations in the field at several of the immigration stations by members of this legislative body is more and more apparent as the sections of that proposed bill are looked into.

The following statement from the Cosmopolitan Association of Erie County, New York, which association is federated with the Buffalo Educational Council and the Buffalo Society of Natural Science, speaks for itself:

At a regulation meeting of the executive board of the Cosmopolitan Association of Erie County the following resolution was adopted:

"We have watched with much interest the efforts of the Buffalo Times and a group of Erie County lawyers in behalf of the alien men and women who have been summarily seized and held in prison on a claim that they are unlawfully in the country.

"We join with others in condemning the methods of the enforcing authorities in depriving these unfortunate and illiterate persons of legal advice and subjecting them to a long prison confinement. In regard to the absence of a full and lawful hearing before a responsible judge, this is a violation of one of the basic American principles.

"We therefore gladly join with the other agencies which are now engaged in an endeavor to correct these great evils, and to this end we sincerely pledge our support."

E. CLAUDIA HANDLEY, (Mrs. Jas. H.), President.
MRS. BURR H. NICHOLLS, Secretary.

Now, please understand me, I am not criticising former Secretary of Labor Hon. William N. Doak, nor am I condemning the subordinate officials and the employees under him. The trouble seems to be the system and the laws under which the immigration laws are enforced, rather than the persons who execute them. I may say further that the very capable woman who is the present Secretary of Labor is making a splendid record for herself in a very difficult position. I believe she is sincerely trying to carry on in a manner which will be a credit to herself and to the Democratic administration. However, the Madam Secretary is under the same handicaps that surrounded her immediate predecessor, and it is my honest belief that an investigation such as I propose in this resolution will result in clarification of several provisions of the immigration law by the enactment of measures which will strengthen the arm of the Secretary and her capable subordinates in the enforcement of the immigration law.

Now, to recur to the topic which I discussed at the beginning, namely, the question of investigating the loopholes through which smuggling gangs operate.

I just want to refer briefly to extracts in the last annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration covering the operations of the Bureau of Immigration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932. In his report Hon. Harry E. Hull states, with regard to this smuggling situation, in part, as follows:

During the year the border-patrol service as a whole apprehended 21,579 aliens who had smuggled themselves or had been smuggled in by other persons across the Canadian and the Mexican borders. One hundred and forty-nine smugglers of aliens were caught during the year, as compared with 228 during the previous year.

The service was called upon to deport to their home country from the El Paso (Tex.) and the Los Angeles (Calif.) districts 2,256 Chinese at a cost of $288,650.

The airplane is a growing and favored method of travel, and smugglers have not been slow to seize upon this modern and comparatively secure means of bringing inadmissible aliens over. There was captured in Canada recently an airplane smuggler who had been carrying Chinese to the United States and others from this country to Canada.

The situation regarding seamen and aliens smuggled in by steamships is indicated by the following abbreviated table from Mr. Hull's report:

Alien seamen deserted, ordered held on board vessel, escaped, removed from vessel, certified for contagious disease, and removed to hospital for treatment, as specified

Deserted:
Chinese	76
Japanese	12
Others	1,256
Total	1,344
Ordered held on board vessel:
Under sec. 20, Immigration Act of 1924	3,087
Not on visaed crew list	8,036
Escaped after being ordered detained on vessel	25
Removed to immigration station or elsewhere for safekeeping pending departure of vessel	153
Certified for loathsome or dangerous contagious disease	827
Diseased and other seamen removed to hospital for treatment	842

I want to emphasize that the professional smuggler, who is connected with a national or international ring that operates to get into this country aliens who otherwise could not come here, seems to experience little or no difficulty in getting criminal aliens by the thousands through the side doors left open by our immigration laws, while on the other hand honest, law-abiding citizens of the United States and upstanding aliens lawfully here for permanent residence are met with all kinds of obstacles when they try to bring into this country near relatives which the law entitles them to bring in to join the family circle here. Furthermore, certain smuggled aliens whose records are none too savory travel about with what sometimes appears to be immunity from immigration inspection, while on the other hand husbands of law-abiding American citizens with wife and American-born children are subjected to long detention in prisons and immigrant stations without bond pending a determination of their status here. These inequitable operations of the law and regulations promulgated under the law are subjects for investigation by this committee, as proposed by this resolution.

Now, in closing let me call the attention of the Members of this House who voted against the adoption of House Resolution 50 to the fact that by your action—that is, by your vote—I dare say you have extended aid and comfort to every person engaged in the nefarious profession of alien smuggling; they are watching the course of this resolution perhaps as carefully as you are, and I dare say that history will prove that your vote against this resolution providing for an investigation into these smuggling practices will bounce back to vex you among your own constituents. You restrictionists who voted against House Resolution 50 are not consistent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was very eloquent about the second proposition authorizing a select committee to investigate with respect to immigration smuggling, but he did not say one single word about the first purpose of the investigation, which is to inquire into the hardships concerning the deportation of undesirable or smuggled aliens in order to recommend legislation to soften our deportation procedure.

As to the smuggling of aliens into this country, what on earth can a select committee of five Members of this House ascertain in the way of facts that the special investigators of the Immigration Service or the agents of the Department of Justice cannot much better ascertain?

What legislation can be recommended after such an investigation concerning the guarding of our 3,000 miles of border between Canada and the United States and our many miles of border between Mexico and the United States and the coast line of the two oceans?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; I have only 5 minutes.

The Department of Labor has studied this question and time after time has fully covered it in its reports. The physical difficulties admit of this smuggling rather than any lack of knowledge or any lack of recommendations by any special committee as to how to proceed to stop it, but the most important objection I have to the resolution is this: This resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Rules, after a hearing and after consideration, refused to report it. This is, in effect, to discharge the Committee on Rules from the consideration of this investigation resolution, and my recollection is that in the 20 years of service I have had in this House, not a single resolution to investigate anything has been adopted by the House of Representatives without first a favorable report from the Committee on Rules. In order to check my recollection I wish to appeal to the gentleman from New York, whose time of service coincides with mine, whether my recollection is correct.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct. I have never known of such procedure as this with regard to any investigation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think this proposition to spend $2,000 to send five Members of the House to Habana, Cuba, on a vacation, where they can accomplish nothing and where they can bring back nothing of value in the line of information to this Congress is little short of outrageous.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, we now have about seven investigations ordered by the House. This resolution, which comes in the closing hours, has been considered by the Committee on Rules, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] told you, and it has not been reported by the Committee on Rules. Seldom are we asked to vote on resolutions not reported favorably by the Rules Committee.

The resolution provides for the expenditure of $2,000, and in section 2 it gives the special committee the power to employ stenographic, clerical, and other assistants and investigators; to have necessary printing and binding done; to require the attendance of witnesses, which costs money, requires the production of necessary books, papers, and so forth; and to pay necessary travel and other expenses, which will be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Just imagine for 1 minute how far you can go on $2,000. This is a little bait. If you start this investigation, before you get through it will cost fifteen or twenty thousand dollars.

We had a little experience in the last Congress when we investigated government in business. I forget how much it ultimately cost, but somewhere around $15,000.

Why does not the gentleman go to the Department of Justice and require them to enforce the law?

I know the gentleman will say we cannot get action from the Department of Justice or the Immigration Service. Remember, my friends, you have a new deal, and if you cannot get results you will probably be able to get new officials who will get results. Give the Democrats a chance before you start investigating. You know the former Secretary of Labor appointed a crook as special investigator at a very large salary, and the first official action of the new Secretary was to discharge him. Such a man should never be on the Government pay roll. They said it took a racketeer to catch racketeers; that was their only excuse for making the appointment. He only lasted a few hours after the Madam Secretary took office.

I want to repeat that if you have any information relative to the violations of law, why not go to the proper Government authorities who are ordered by law to make these investigations that should result in sending people to jail who violate the laws. That is what we appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars for, and if they do not stop the practices you complain of, then get new officials who will.

So far as enacting legislation making it easier for those who have been ordered deported, that is a joke. Who wants to make it soft for aliens who violate our laws? Would you put them up in the best hotels while awaiting deportation? The place for them is in jail until the hour arrives to put them on the ship and send them back to their native country. I would rather spend this $2,000 to send crooked aliens back home rather than to do work that Government officials are charged by law to do. Aliens are being deported by the hundreds monthly. Aliens convicted of felonies must be deported under the law, and just as soon as they serve their time they are being sent back home. The State authorities are cooperating with the Government. I know this to be a fact.

I want to say in conclusion that we are operating now under a Presidential order that practically prevents any immigration. Some few people are still coming in. I am willing to vote for a resolution that will stop immigration entirely until the American people out of jobs get jobs. [Applause.]

I am not going to vote for this resolution to spend money when you have agencies in the Government for which you appropriate large sums of money to enforce the law—enforcement agents who are supposed to do what this resolution seeks to do. As far as I am concerned, I am opposed to a resolution of this kind until the Government authorities that are being paid for doing work of this kind shall fail to do their duty.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is just what we are trying to do. The former President by his order is keeping out immigration, but the back door is open. We are trying to get hold of the international gang of crooks who are operating between certain ports. The Department is now apparently unable to obtain information. The committee could get that information under authority of this resolution to bring in books and papers and require the attendance of witnesses.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You have the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, and if they are not doing their duty, go to the Attorney General and show him they are not apprehending criminals, and he will get men who will bring them to court, for he is just that kind of a man. Give him a chance. If you know anything, go place the evidence on his desk, and see how quick he will get men on the job who will bring in this so-called "international gang of crooks" you refer to. That is part of his Department's duty. Do you tell me you have no confidence in the lady Secretary of Labor from your own city? Why not see her, and if you give her information that there is an international gang of crooks operating, she will soon have every inspector in the Immigration Service on the job. Give her what leads you have, and I am sure she will respond, for she is part of the new deal. You do not have one but two agencies you can appeal to—the immigration officials and the investigating division of the Department of Justice. I advise my friend from New York to get in touch with them.

The Attorney General announced a few days after he took office that America was no place for rackets and racketeers. Smuggling aliens over our borders is a racket. If it exists, it is a racket the Attorney General will break up; so go to him with what information you have and give him a chance.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are powerless. The committee would have the power to investigate where the Department cannot. The authority of Congress to its own committee would permit the finding of information which will enable constructive legislation to cure these evils when we come back here for next session.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. A congressional committee can go no further than a Government enforcement officer. A Government enforcement officer can go into any part of the country, and he can go to other countries if necessary. I can see no need for this investigation when we have Government officials being paid to do just what you propose to do by this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the subcommittee handling appropriations for the Department of Labor for many years, and regret that I cannot support this resolution which the Chairman of the Immigration Committee has brought before the House. In my opinion, it would be a useless expenditure of money. I concur in the statement just made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] when he suggested that there was no need for this inquiry, because if the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] has knowledge of facts which he feels justifies legislation at this time, he should report that legislation to the House. Several times before I have called the attention of the gentleman from New York to the importance of reporting to the House some legislation that will correct the evils which do exist and which he claims to have knowledge of. It is not convincing to argue that $2,000 will enable a committee of five Members of the House by the inquiry here proposed to obtain information which may furnish the basis for needed legislation.

If the gentleman from New York will do what he now states he is willing to do, in reply to a question put to him by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]—namely, prohibit all immigration for the time being—and which he says, I repeat, he wants to do, and if he will go further and require the registration of all aliens and pass a law making it unlawful to employ in gainful employment anyone who cannot show that he is an American citizen, he will go far toward driving out of this country all aliens now unlawfully here and will at the same time remove the chief incentive for their coming here.

The Committee on Immigration is clothed with full authority to bring in legislation which will correct all of the secret wrongs and violations to which the gentleman from New York calls attention, and while he seems to have very full information as to what is going on, yet apparently he feels unable to draft legislation to correct the wrongs. I submit it would establish a bad precedent for the House to appropriate $2,000 to enable a select committee, which admits it now has much information of violations and wrongdoing, to make an inquiry for the purpose of recommending needed legislation.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any information that could be available anywhere that is not in the Department of Labor at the present time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I feel sure there is not.

Mr. SNELL. That Department has made a number of investigations of exactly this same proposition.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And they are earnestly endeavoring to enforce our immigration laws. We now have a very capable and active Secretary of Labor, so why, just as she is taking charge of the Department, should this committee feel that it is incumbent on them to make an inquiry which the Department is not requesting? Would it not by implication express lack of confidence in the Department?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I want the gentleman and the House to know that I am not aiming to criticize or seeking to embarrass anybody, the Secretary of Labor, past or present, or any other official. The committee is simply trying to obtain some information at the source for constructive legislation. How does the gentleman from Alabama explain that in the last fiscal year, according to the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, over 8,000 were smuggled in on ordinary boats, and over 100,000 across the borders? Someone is at the head of that smuggling ring across the borders from Cuba and Canada.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It so happens that the gentleman was himself partly responsible for increasing the amount that might be expended out of the regular appropriations in employing special agents to look up violations, and I was very glad to learn that the new Secretary of Labor had discharged them, because there was brought to the attention of certain Members of this House, in connection with the work of such special agents, some things which in my judgment were hurtful to the morale of the regular personnel and reflected no credit on the Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE].

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, there has been a resolution presented here proposing to spend $2,000 for investigating the smuggling of Mexicans and Chinese coolies into this country. I believe that is the sole purpose of this resolution.

I am in hearty accord with this proposition, as I represent, in all probability, one of the largest manufacturing districts in this country. I represent the Calumet district, described by captains of industry as the "greatest industrial region in the world", "the workshop of the universe", and I stand here to protest against the invasion of this type of worker into my district and to fight for the rights of the citizens of the region I represent. The men and women of my territory, those who pay the taxes and work at honest toil to help pay their share of the cost of this Government—a cost, gentlemen, that is necessary in order that we can come down here and make laws for the protection of the people we represent and for their general welfare—are demanding to know for what reason these Mexicans are being brought into this territory and why they are allowed to cross the border unhampered. Not that I bear any ill will toward the Mexican or have any ill feeling toward him or his race, but I certainly do object to his being smuggled across the border and then being brought into my district and there replace the workingman who has lived in my territory for a number of years, only to find that when he goes to his place of employment that his job has been taken by one of these men who has been smuggled in and who is holding down his job at a lower rate of pay.

In times of depression the man or woman who has saved up a little money to purchase a home is now faced with the task of paying a heavier tax than before, owing to the fact that it is costing my district more than $100,000 a month, because of the large number of Mexicans who have found their way into the territory to take the jobs of the tax-paying citizen, and who are now dependent upon charity. So you see, it is not only unfair to the working man and woman of this country, but also unfair to the Mexican himself, as he becomes an object of charity in slack times. So, Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with this investigation as I believe that by going into the situation, and this committee being sent to the border where they may obtain first-hand information of just how the smuggling is taking place, we can come back here next January and pass a law that will be so airtight that never again will this situation prevail.

I hope that I am not misunderstood in the plea that I am making here today. I have no score against law-abiding citizens—whether they be Mexicans or whatever nationality—who have lived in my district for many years and who have done everything possible to keep the respect of their fellow man; nor have I any malice toward residents of my district who, although they have shown no inclination to become naturalized citizens, have lived in our territory long enough to pass the status of being classified as "floaters." I am pleading for a square deal for residents and citizens of my district who have shown by their faith, by their hope, and by their charity that they mean to live up to the laws of their Government and the wishes of their fellow man. I am pleading for these people regardless of color, creed, and nationality, against the outlawry of those who might stoop to gain a pittance from smuggling in undesirable aliens who, once within the confines of such thickly populated manufacturing districts such as I represent, take the daily bread from the widow and her orphan, the industry from the father and his family, and deprive the Government of the just tax to pay for the protection of law and order.

I hope that all of my colleagues in Congress will see the situation in the same light as we, the Members of Congress who come from the heavy populated or manufacturing districts of this great Nation. The thing that is uppermost in my mind is for the protection of the workingmen in this country whether they be foreign born or American, and whether or not they are fully naturalized citizens of this great Nation. It is my ambition to help my people to again build up this country to the standard which it attained in 1921, when the price of labor was adequate enough so that the worker had a bank account and could enjoy not only the necessities of life but also some of the pleasures. And last, but not least, to send his children to school to receive a fair education, which would equip them mentally to combat some of the situations in this life and better equip them for good positions.

In my closing remarks I hope this bill will pass unanimously. I thank you.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I must protest against the vicious attack which was just made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] on the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Immigration, Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is no more patriotic or conscientious Member of this House. If the gentleman from Alabama wants to leave those remarks in the RECORD, I shall be content. I trust he will not revise them.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], as Chairman of the Committee on Immigration, has probably done more to prevent the improper entry of aliens into the United States than any Member who has an obsession on the immigration question. As for myself, I have never favored immigration restriction bills, because I came to the conclusion many years ago that the spirit behind most immigration bills is antiforeigner and un-American. It is the same spirit that prevailed in the election of 1928. However, after we have passed immigration bills and kept honest, legitimate immigrants and aliens out of this country—men, women, and children who would contribute to our Nation—if there is smuggling of undesirable aliens, we surely should keep those people who are being smuggled in from coming into our country. When the Italians and natives of Poland are barred, principally because of their religions, we should be concerned about the smuggling of Chinese and other undesirables.

Everybody knows what interest is lobbying against this bill. It is the steamship companies who profit by this smuggling.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; and you cannot laugh it off either.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Has the gentleman spoken to any representative of steamship companies or any other interests on this question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, they would not come to me. I would be the last person they would approach. If the statements we heard before the Rules Committee are only partly true, if these aliens are being smuggled in from Canada, from Cuba, and from Mexico, anybody here who believes in upholding the immigration laws of our country should take greater pleasure in voting for this bill than all the immigration bills that have ever been presented to this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER].

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, in California and on the entire Pacific coast, the Japanese, the Chinese, and the Mexicans perform most of the common labor. After the border was closed at San Diego there still seems to be a hole in the fence. For some years I have been trying to find out how it is that Mexicans, Chinese, and Japs come in through those holes. The purpose of this is not to investigate the Department of Labor. It is to investigate where the leak is. Who is it down on the Mexican border or on the Pacific coast that is permitting these immigrants to come in illegally? I believe if this resolution provided for $50,000 it would be worth that to the Pacific coast alone, and I hope all of the Members of the House, and particularly the Members from the Pacific coast, will support this important resolution. Our inspection is entirely too easy and too loose and needs teeth in the examination of all those who seek entrance into the States.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, 6 minutes, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I should dislike very much for any of the new Congressmen to find themselves lined up today on the wrong side. In other words, if they are restrictionists, if they are men who believe in restricting immigration——

Mr. KRAMER. Is the gentleman referring to me as a new Congressman?

Mr. JENKINS. No. I did not have the gentleman in mind.

Mr. KRAMER. I have been on this side ever since I have been here, and I am very happy about it.

Mr. JENKINS. I did not have the gentleman in mind. I never thought about the gentleman.

What I started to say was that if there are any new Members here who have come to Congress with the idea that they wanted to be restrictionists they had better be on the side of the men who have been restrictionists here for years. Do not be misled by somebody who has failed in all his experience in this Congress to vote for any restrictive measure, and who has always voted against every restrictive measure. Let us not be fooled about Mexicans coming up to Chicago and places like that. When I was a member of the Committee on Immigration I visited every immigration station from Boston to San Francisco.

I know the conditions intimately. I think I know the Mexican situation. We have gone into that in times past, as the older Members know, extensively. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from El Paso know this.

Let us not be misled by this thing. Here is a measly little resolution calling for $2,000. What for? For no other purpose than to give somebody a little vacation, just a little junket. That is all it means. Let me say that the Department of Labor has not asked for this. The Department of State has not asked for this. They do not want this. Why? Because the State Department has a Consular Service of which it is proud. They know conditions. They are well posted. They do not need to be investigated.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I am sorry, but I cannot yield.

They know exactly what they are talking about.

The Department of Labor does not need this at all, because they have at these stations many fine men, men of great natural ability; men who love their work and who are devoted to the cause that they represent.

The border patrol is a great organization. I wish you could all see the border patrol—fine young men, most of them ex-service men. They know their business. They do not need to be told where these leaks are. Two or three years ago some of these district directors testified before our committee. They know what is going on. There are large numbers of the people illegally in this country already apprehended. What the Departments need is money. The Departments need money to send back the hundreds and thousands of people that have been apprehended. Why arrest any more when we cannot handle those we have apprehended?

What do you want to spend $2,000 on this for? Let us appropriate $200,000, $300,000, or $1,000,000, if you want to, and send these people back; but if you spend $3,000,000 or even $5,000,000, you cannot send them all back. Do not do a vain, foolish thing; do not do it simply because somebody wants to do it. Do what your good Democratic brethren want you to do—uphold the hands of the new Secretary of Labor.

Let me say I have had occasion to deal with the Secretaries of Labor for a long time. We had two Republican Secretaries of Labor, and they rendered fine service. I think from the way the new Secretary of Labor has started out and the way she is handling this situation, if she continues, she will prove the equal of any of her predecessors.

She did not ask for this. Why? I will tell you why she did not. She had these fine men of the service here in Washington last week. There were called in from points throughout the United States chiefs from every station. They were called here and talked with the officials. These chiefs are men who draw $5,000 or $5,500 a year. They are competent men, men of education and experience. Many of them have two or three hundred assistants under them. They know more about this than a little committee would know. If this committee wants to go around and investigate conditions, why do they not do like old Judge Box did when he was a prominent member of the committee, make the trips and pay his own expenses, or, like Mr. Johnson did, make the circuit and pay his own expenses, or like I did, make such trip as they wish and pay their own expenses. They will find the same thing we found.

Mr. SABATH. When was it these gentlemen paid their own expenses?

Mr. JENKINS. I made the statement that they did. That is all I know about it. I do not wish to yield further.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to be serious about this matter. If you want to make an investigation, make an adequate one. Call up the Immigration Service and ask them what help they need. Talk to the Democrats in the Labor Department and ask what they need from the standpoint of immigration, and they will tell you that what they need first is to recodify the law. Time after time they have sent to the Immigration Committee requests for assistance to recodify the law and rewrite the law so it will be clear and understandable, but never since I have been here has anybody asked for any money for anything like this. The bill should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, after the House had by a decisive vote stricken out the enacting clause and killed the McReynolds resolution that sought to spend $48,500 on attending a so-called "Institute of Agriculture" in Rome, Italy, which, after all, was a junket proposition pure and simple, and then after the Senate had placed this $48,500 junket as a rider on an appropriation bill, and the House last Saturday, June 10, 1933, reversed its former position and voted this Rome (Italy) junket of $48,500 by a vote of 150 to 118, I lost confidence on what might happen in a vote on this Dickstein resolution; hence, in the interest of the taxpayers of the United States, I made a horse trade with our colleague from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

I agreed with him that if he would offer an amendment to his resolution providing that no more than $2,000 could be expended on the investigation it provided for, and that if he would promptly on the convening of next session give us a hearing and a vote on my bill to suspend all immigration to the United States for 5 years, I would vote for his investigation of the smuggling of aliens into the United States that has been going on for so long.

Under the provisions of his resolution, unless safeguarded by the amendment I demanded, there could have been spent on his investigation $100,000 or $200,000 or even $500,000, so I thought it was wise, to begin with, to cut off its fangs and to circumscribe it with a safe and sound limitation, so that not more than $2,000 could be spent under it. And the gentleman from New York accepted my proposition and has placed the amendment I demanded in his resolution, so that only $2,000 may be spent under it.

And the horse trade I made was an excellent one for the people. Because the gentleman from New York is Chairman of the Committee on Immigration. Without his help we are not going to get any bill favorably reported out of his committee to suspend all immigration. For years I have had a bill pending before the Committee on Immigration to suspend all immigration to the United States. During one year and another I have been able to get a hearing on the measure, and I have in each instance presented to the committee unanswerable evidence showing the justice and absolute necessity of such a measure, and that American heads of families would never be properly protected, and that there would never be sufficient jobs for Americans, until we stopped all immigration for at least a sufficient number of years for us to assimilate the foreigners we already have here, but it was always impossible to get such a bill reported to the House by such committee. The former chairman of the committee made many protestations of being in favor of stopping immigration, but he would never allow such a bill to be reported.

Again, on December 8, 1931, I introduced in the last Congress a bill (H.R. 4514) to prohibit the immigration of all aliens into the United States. Although I made endeavor after endeavor, I was never able to get such a measure reported. During the previous year I had, on December 12, 1930, introduced a similar bill, H.R. 15075, but could not get it reported, although I had promise after promise from the then chairman of the committee that he was in favor of stopping immigration, and that some day he would report such a measure and pass it.

Just as soon as this special session of the Seventy-third Congress convened, I introduced, on March 9, 1933, the bill (H.R. 109) to prohibit the immigration of all aliens into the United States for a period of 10 years, and that bill was referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] is chairman. As a part of the consideration for my horse trade, he has promised that as soon as we meet in the regular session next January he will give us a hearing on this bill, and that he will give the Members of the House a chance to vote on it. I know that the Congress will pass this measure if we can get it out of the committee. I also know that we will never get it out of the committee unless it is the wish of the chairman. And I know that every laboring man in the United States is vitally affected and interested in stopping all immigration for at least a period of 10 years.

So by making this trade with the chairman of the committee, we gain two very important and most valuable advantages for the American people, the first being to limit the expenses of this investigation to $2,000, by having the resolution thus amended so that not more than $2,000 can ever be spent under it, and the second advantage being that in January we will get a hearing before the committee and a chance for the Membership of this House to vote to stop all immigration of aliens into the United States for 10 years.

For years, also, I have been trying to get a law passed to require all aliens in the United States to be registered, and to force the undesirables and all others who refused to be naturalized to leave the United States, and to severely penalize all ships and companies engaging in smuggling, denying to them the privilege of docking at our ports.

I wish it were so that at this very hour we could prevail upon the chairman of this committee [Mr. DICKSTEIN] to call up and pass, under suspension of all rules, the bill to stop the immigration of all aliens into the United States for at least 10 years. Such a bill ought to be passed at this session before we adjourn.

There ought not to be an alien permitted to enter this country for the next 10 years, and especially until we put every American back to normal work. [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman think the passage of this resolution will get his bill out of the gentleman's committee? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has promised me that he will bring in such a measure and allow the House to vote on it at the next session, but I am urging him to do it now. Before we adjourn we ought to stop all aliens from coming here.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am surprised at the watchdog of the Treasury being willing to pay $2,000 to get his bill out of the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. It would be worth $2,000,000,000 to American laborers and their families if we could stop immediately all aliens from coming here.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. I will tell you exactly what I had in mind when I made my trade with the Chairman of the Immigration Committee. My purpose was to stop an expensive junket. Every Member here knows that I am against all junkets. I have been fighting against all junkets here for the past 17 years. I have never yet been on a junket. I have never yet spent one dollar out of the Treasury on any kind of a trip. I have been over much of the United States, and have checked up Government business in many parts of this Nation, and even over in old Mexico, but I paid every dollar of the expense out of my own pocket, and it did not cost the Government one cent. And it was to stop a possible expensive junket that I made the trade with the author of this resolution. It, under its provisions, authorizes this proposed committee to make investigations not only all over the United States but also in Cuba and the other islands adjacent to Florida. It also gives this committee authority to employ stenographic and clerical help, and assistants and investigators, with no limitation as to the number of each, but that is left entirely to the discretion of the committee, which also is given the power and authority to pay all of such employees unlimited salaries as large as it desires, and to have printing and binding done, and to require the attendance of witnesses, who have to be paid so much per day with mileage allowance, and to pay all traveling and "other" expenses.

Under such provisions contracts could have been made morally obligating the Congress to pay out huge sums of money, and there could have been spent, if we had not limited it with my amendment, as much as $100,000 or $200,000 or even $500,000, as other investigating committees have spent heretofore, in past history of the Congress. So I felt that it was safe and sound and absolutely necessary to have a limitation placed on the amount that could be spent, so I made the agreement with Chairman DICKSTEIN, that he would amend the resolution, as he did, providing that not more than $2,000 could be spent under it. So whether or not the resolution passes it is properly safeguarded, and I have secured rights most valuable to the people, and I am going to keep faith with the chairman and am going to vote for this $2,000 investigation.

As to these Chinese that have been smuggled into the United States, I am not in favor of paying out the tremendous expense it has cost us to deport them. I am in favor of stopping it in another way. Why, the Department of Labor spent $288,000 to deport 2,200 Chinese (in round numbers). That ought to stop.

I will tell you how I would stop it. I would penalize severely every ship that engaged in smuggling, and deny it the right to dock at our ports. Then I would send these smuggled Chinese out to Occoquan and put them to work and make them do gratis all of the laundering for Washington and the Government, so that our Government and the people here would not be robbed any more by these laundry monopolies that daily overcharge people here. Laundries charge more in Washington than in any other city in the United States. For an ordinary plain shirt with soft cuffs and no collar Washington laundries charge 20 cents, when practically everywhere else in the United States only 15 cents is charged.

I would send the smuggled Japs out to Occoquan and put them in a chain gang making ice, so that the poor people of Washington would no longer be robbed by the ice monopolies of Washington which charge 2½ times as much for ice in Washington as ice is sold for in Waco, Tex., and in Austin, the capital of Texas.

And I would put the smuggled Mexicans to work on the highways in the United States and make them wish a thousand times that they had not violated our immigration laws by crossing the Rio Grande unlawfully. As one Member I have all the information I want. I am ready now to pass proper laws to keep all aliens out.

And if we cannot do it before then, we can pass a law in the next session to stop all immigration for 10 years. Every Member here ought to do what I am going to do in the next session with the chairman of this committee. I am going to be after him continually; I am going to be ding-donging him from morning until night, every day and every week and every month until he brings a bill in here and passes it into law to stop all immigration to this country. I am going to worry the very life out of him until he brings in a bill that will make all aliens register, and until he brings in a bill that instead of spending money to send them back, will put all smuggled aliens to work here in a chain gang until they will want to go back home, and go at their own expense.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman enumerates many requirements he will exact from the chairman of the committee——

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Naturally, the chairman must be in good physical condition to do everything that the gentleman from Texas is going to ask him to do, and in order to be sure that he is in good physical condition, the gentleman wants him to have a joy ride to Cuba. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I am against all junkets and against all joy rides. And I have succeeded in getting a most valuable amendment on this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But now the gentleman is voting for one.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not objecting to the gentleman from Missouri or others voting against this bill. But I must keep faith with the chairman, who has assured us of valuable rights for the people. And I have a limitation on this bill that properly safeguards it, and I say that it is a valuable right secured for the people when you can put such a limitation on the bill. For I know from experience that such bills as this do pass here in this House, and I have fixed this measure so that if it does pass it will be as harmless as possible, for not more than $2,000 can ever be spent under it. And the gentleman from Missouri must not forget that on last Saturday, June 10, 1933, this House by a vote of 150 to 118 passed a junket measure to spend $48,500 on a useless and valueless most foolish junket to Rome, Italy, in the name of farmers, when the farmers of America would like to have that $48,500 kept in their Treasury. And in thus passing that $48,500 junket to Rome, Italy, this House reversed itself; because not long before, by a record vote, it had struck out the enacting claims and killed that bill. And this $48,500 junket to Rome, Italy, was placed back in an appropriation bill by the Senate, and we took a separate vote on that item here in the House last Saturday when I tried hard to kill it the second time.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time, 3 minutes, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, every time a resolution to investigate comes before the House we find a conflict of opinion such as has developed in this debate. Some men take the floor and attack every resolution of this nature as a wasteful, extravagant raid upon the Treasury of the United States. Then, too, there are Members who explain the many advantages resulting from work of this nature.

Every committee of the Congress would be in a better position to pass on legislation if he were familiar with the work of the department of government involved. When the subject is important, when legislation is required, when Members are willing to offer their service without cost, then such resolutions as we now have before us should be considered.

Look at the splendid work that has been accomplished throughout the history of Congress, particularly the work of investigating committees. I ask you to look up the record. Look at the investigation that turned the searchlight of public opinion on the great oil scandals. Where was the bureaucrat you talk about? The Department of Justice, the Bureau of Investigation, what did they do? It was the Senate investigation committee created by act of Congress that developed that situation and brought the offenders to justice.

Read your history. Never since the administration of Andrew Jackson has there been courage surpassing that of the Senate committee now investigating the investment bankers of America.

They dared to investigate the greatest money power in the world. Today, by reason of the passage of a resolution, the Senate of the United States is investigating the powerful House of Morgan, and the saving of billions of dollars will, I dare say, result to the people of the United States.

Better banking laws, more severe tax laws will be enacted because of this investigation.

I want to say to you it is all right to condemn resolutions of this kind, but in some of the foreign countries representatives of the people are allowed to go from one end of the land to the other during the recess of Parliament in order that they might observe the results of the enforcement and application of the law. It is a question of whether you want to place your faith in bureaucrats or trust to the integrity and honor of legislators. Surely you will agree with me when I say the cooperation of both will bring about better results. We want this committee to come to Buffalo. We want them to come and investigate the deportation situation there. We want them to observe the rigid application of the Canadian immigration laws which forbid American workers to enter Canada, while Canadian citizens are employed in large numbers in our country. The Department in the past has not been able to remedy these conditions. Give this committee an opportunity, and I feel certain that much good will result. When there is sufficient reason for the investigation and the cost is both nominal and limited we can well afford to support resolutions of this kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired, and the question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were 77 ayes and 57 noes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-one Members are present, not a quorum. This is an automatic call. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 194, nays 134, answered "present" 1, not voting, 101, as follows:

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DOUGLASS, who, if present, would have voted "aye." I voted "no", and I withdraw my vote of "no" and ask to be recorded "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AIRSHIP "AKRON" DISASTER

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, by the direction of the committee appointed by the House and the Senate to investigate the Akron disaster and the need for dirigibles, I present the following report, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York presents a report on the Akron destruction, and the report will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered printed.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have these recommendations printed in full in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to have the report of his committee printed in full in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Inasmuch as this report is not a unanimous one, and that it is to be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, until that committee takes some action I think it should not be printed in the RECORD, for the reason that the report might be changed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. DELANEY. May I suggest for the benefit of the gentleman from Oklahoma that 5 of the Members of the House have signed the report, 3 Members of the Senate have signed it, 1 Member of the Senate has agreed to the report as given by this committee, and 1 of the Senators has indicated that he desires to file minority views. It seems to me, in view of the fact that Members are interested in this report, that it can do no harm to have it printed in the RECORD for their information. I am very glad to have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs for their future consideration.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to ask the gentleman from New York whether the report of those two investigators from the Department of Justice who investigated the alleged sabotage on the Akron has been made public?

Mr. DELANEY. The report, as far as we could without going into the secrets of this investigation, is contained in the report which I have filed.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What the gentleman from New York has in mind will probably be in the testimony and hearings and would not be in the report.

Mr. DELANEY. It will be in the hearings, which will be printed very shortly. All that will be carried out in full.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What is the object of having this printed in the RECORD? Is it not very long?

Mr. DELANEY. These are the recommendations to which I refer. The report itself is quite voluminous.

Mr. SNELL. Then the gentleman intends to ask only that the recommendations be printed?

Mr. DELANEY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And those are short?

Mr. DELANEY. About a page and a half. I do not ask to have the whole report printed.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. In view of the fact that all the major nations, with the exception of one, according to the information which I have, in the interest of safety and to prevent the loss of life, have stopped constructing ships of this type and magnitude, and also in view of the fact that the consensus of opinion on the part of the public is not favorable to them, I think the report ought to go to some committee where it can be thoroughly examined. Then, if that committee wants to take action, it ought to be taken, but I do not think that we ought to give publicity to a report when we know the source from which it emanated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report has already been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I object.

REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and to include therein a statement made by myself to an organization in this city several week ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave recently granted me for extension of remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, I am submitting herewith my remarks to the National Organization of Women for Prohibition Reform, delivered upon the occasion of their annual banquet at the Mayflower Hotel, in the city of Washington, on April 4, 1933.

For 14 years since I became a Member of Congress I have voted for every measure designed to carry out the provisions of the eighteenth amendment. The result of the efforts to enforce this provision of the Constitution, as I have learned them throughout the Nation, has convinced me that the problem of liquor control in this country is essentially one that must be solved by the States. Statutory national prohibition has been declared a failure by both the Democratic and Republican Parties, by the American Legion, the American Federation of Labor, the American Medical Association, and the American Bar Association. Every fair-minded citizen must therefore recognize the eighteenth amendment as a Nation-wide remedy must be supplanted by some other method. Already 14 States have voted for repeal since the twenty-first amendment was submitted by the Congress, and no doubt 36 States, the required number to amend the Constitution, will likewise vote for repeal.

The measure of enforcement has grown less as the years have passed, even though we have had many changes in the personnel of the executive branches of both Federal and State Governments, from county sheriff to President—each sworn to uphold the law—since its adoption. Assuming for the sake of argument that as many as 13 States will not vote for repeal, who can predict future success for the eighteenth amendment? If it cannot be enforced, is it not only unwise but a waste of public funds to retain the eighteenth amendment as a part of our Constitution?

REPEAL OR NULLIFICATION

A very positive and decided sentiment for repeal means nonenforcement, because no law can be enforced without the support of strong, healthy, public sentiment. The American people now recognize that they are presented with the question of repeal or nullification. Every good citizen desires to see the provisions of the Constitution of the United States carried out in full. The people of America infinitely prefer the repeal of the eighteenth amendment rather than have it nullified. If an overwhelming majority of the American people are opposed to the eighteenth amendment, it follows that the interests of good government demand its repeal.

No one can claim that the eighteenth amendment has been reasonably successful even in the Southern and so-called "dry States", but assuming it has been successful, the people of those States may continue any prohibition laws they desire and at the same time vote for repeal of the eighteenth amendment with perfect consistency. The Federal Government will continue to aid in preventing the shipment of liquor from wet to dry States, and this is as far as the Federal authorities should be called upon to go.

IT IS A QUESTION OF LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

The people of my State are a thoughtful and tolerant people. They believe their police regulations should not be interfered with by any other State. They believe the views of the people of Illinois, for example, involving the police regulations of that State should not be enforced upon Alabama against its will. They must likewise feel that the rule of conduct of their own personal life, habits, and tastes as involved in the question of prohibition or any other similar question, should not be enforced upon the people of Illinois. The question, after all, is one involving the rights and dignity of the governments of our sovereign States.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE DEMANDS REPEAL

Everyone respects the views of a sincere and practical prohibitionist, the type of men and women who are really concerned with the promotion of temperance. The American people, however, are sick and tired of the professional reformer, who for selfish or political purposes, is advocating the retention of the eighteenth amendment in the Constitution. I do not advocate the return of the saloon to my State, nor am I predicting what might happen in that State after the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, but I know my people have the intelligence and the capacity to deal with the liquor traffic in the most effective way.

I believe they do not wish to continue the annual expenditures of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in continuing a futile effort, but will, without emotion, without prejudice, and with a view of regaining the lost ground in the cause of temperance, vote to strike from our fundamental law a provision which has brought on confusion, added much to lawlessness in the Nation, and made hypocrites of millions of our best citizens. Such conditions are unworthy of the American people. As between repeal and nullification, I stand for repeal. Temperance in America demands repeal.

Madam Toastmaster, ladies and gentlemen, coming from the heart of the South and from a State which more than 25 years ago banned the sale of liquor, I venture the prediction that a majority of Southern States, if not all of them, will join Michigan and Wisconsin in a veritable procession of the States of this Union in their onward march to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The people are ready now to correct the grievous error of its adoption.

With characteristic idealism, impulsiveness, and oftentimes boldness, the American people have startled the world with their attainments. We must confess, however, that we have not always acted with calmness and prudence in our efforts to settle all our social, economic, and political problems. Our failure to deal in a practical way with the evils of the liquor traffic, a practical problem, is the outstanding example of recent years, and probably of all time, of a lack of matured deliberation in an effort to settle one of the serious problems of our day and generation. We have failed to deal temperately with temperance.

PEOPLE THINKING MORE ABOUT GOVERNMENT WILL CORRECT THEIR MISTAKES

The American people are ready to correct the social and economic evils of the past and guard against those of the future. These days of distress are challenging the best thought of the Nation, and men and women everywhere are taking more interest in their Government. They are scrutinizing the acts of men in public life, analyzing as never before the "whys and wherefores" of legislation and demanding more than ever that public office shall be a public trust. The American people are determined to rid the country of conditions growing out of those sumptuary laws which have encouraged graft and corruption in high place, given both financial and political power to a criminal class, enlarged the boundaries of the underworld, added strength to the strangle hold of organized crime, and made of good citizens hypocrites and criminals. These are some of the results of Nation-wide prohibition statutes growing out of the effort of those good men and women who seemingly believed that we could legislate out of man his taste, or legislate into him a code of morals.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT LEGISLATIVE INTEMPERANCE

Nation-wide prohibition sentiment reached its peak from 1917 to 1919, and the moral phases of the question gained emphasis under the mental stress of war and the aftermath of war. The lines of divided sentiment were tautly drawn in 1919, and for years thereafter the chief issue throughout the Nation became that of "wet or dry." Believing the National Government could enforce any law applying uniformly to 120,000,000 people in 48 States, with their varied habits and tastes, many good people urged that the final chapter in a successful struggle for temperance in America could be written into an amendment to the Constitution. Then for the first time in our history a mere police regulation became a part of the fundamental law of the land. The adoption of that amendment was the severest blow ever dealt to the rights and dignity of the States of this Union. With due deference to those then clothed with authority and who thought they were serving their country best, the adoption of the eighteenth amendment was not farsighted statesmanship—it was legislative intemperance.

AMENDMENT CANNOT BE ENFORCED AND SHOULD BE REPEALED

Despite harsher and more restrictive laws, such as the "5- and 10-year law" and the extension of the 3-mile limit to 12 miles, and so forth, the more such laws we have passed, the more money we have spent for enforcement, the more difficult the problem has grown. Since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment we have had four Presidents, while in every State the executive and enforcement agencies from constable to governor have changed many times, each official charged with enforcing the law and all sworn to uphold the Constitution. Yet no statutes have ever been so flagrantly violated as those designed to prohibit the sale of alcoholic beverages. It is not surprising that today millions of people, including many total abstainers, who have studied conditions impartially, believe that as a Nation-wide remedy for the evils of the liquor traffic, the eighteenth amendment is a failure and can never be enforced. In the name of decency, honesty, and economy in government, as well as in the name of temperance, the eighteenth amendment should be repealed.

Admitting that in certain States the prohibition laws have been reasonably enforced, the fact remains that State laws in those sections, evidently supported by healthy public sentiment, would have been enforced equally as well and much more successfully without aid of the Federal statutes. The question is whether better results for real temperance can be obtained by the continuation of the present system of national enforcement or by the return of this problem to each State where it properly belongs and should have remained under our theory of a democratic form of government. This is the question which addressed itself to the intelligent membership of your organization as well as the other mothers, wives, sisters, and sweethearts throughout the Nation who are urging a "new deal", if you please, in our laws designed for the promotion of temperance.

TEMPERANCE CAUSE SET BACK MANY YEARS

Before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment advocates of temperance, after a century's struggle, met with much success as the years passed dealing with that question through the constituted agencies of the various States. There were, of course, violations of the laws; but many States, either by referendum or by legislative enactment, had actually banned the liquor traffic, and in every State there were laws further restricting the sale of liquor. Upon the adoption of the amendment and its auxiliary statutes much of the ground gained in the battle against the liquor evil was lost and the cause of temperance set back many years. In 14 of our sovereign States by an actual vote of the people enforcement laws have recently been discarded, to say nothing of the deliberate refusal on the part of other States to cooperate in Federal enforcement.

FAILURE IN ITS PROMISES TO PROTECT OUR YOUTH

The limitations of this hour will not permit a rehearsal of all the impractical and uneconomical phases of Federal enforcement, together with the evils which have grown out of it. An impartial investigation of actual conditions throughout the Nation today will disclose, instead of a sober youth with no taste for liquor, not only young men but, more appalling, young women have turned to the drink habit, one of the social evils practically unknown before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. The cost in dollars of the experiment would have been justified, had it protected, as promised, the youth of America; but millions of our youth resent the eighteenth amendment and all the hypocrisy which has grown out of it.

MILLIONS OF GOOD WOMEN DISSATISFIED WITH CONDITIONS

It is no wonder that you were aroused, and with those leading spirits, such excellent women as Mrs. Sabin and her coworkers, threw yourselves into the front lines of the fight for prohibition reform. You saw, despite the vast expenditure of public funds for enforcement, conditions under which so many of those high and low, sworn to uphold the Constitution, were "winking" at its violations. You saw liquor consumed in the home, in the presence of children who knew the laws of their land were being violated, even around the hearthstone, the very place where our youth must be taught the real meaning of temperance. You saw the "speak-easy" with its "stolen sweets" environment not only supplanting, but outnumbering the old barroom. You saw conditions under which one criminal and his gang plied his illicit liquor trade to the extent of $70,000,000 in 1 year, without the slightest hindrance from the hand of the law. He paid $30,000,000 for protection. That criminal finally went to the penitentiary, not because of violation of the liquor law, but because he failed to pay his income tax. You saw conditions under which the lives of innocent men, women, and children, ranging from the life of a United States Senator to those in humbler life, including two little children at play on the streets of New York, ruthlessly snuffed out, in this scheme of enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. Despite the congestion of our United States courts, the construction of bigger and better jails, crowded to overflowing, a constant flow and consumption of alcoholic liquor continues generally throughout the land. Yet we find many good citizens in our Nation still maintaining that the eighteenth amendment and its auxiliary statutes constitute the only solution to the liquor problem.

DISTRESSED FEDERAL TREASURY DENIED REVENUES, YET EXPENDING MILLIONS FOR ENFORCEMENT

The revenues from taxes on alcoholic beverages have been denied the Public Treasury, and have gone into the pockets of the beer baron, the bootlegger, and the racketeer by the hundreds of millions of dollars annually, while we spend from the Treasury millions annually to carry on a futile experiment. This money is needed today for balancing the National Budget, for the employment of good men, able and willing to work, but forced to beg bread for their little children. Visualizing these untoward conditions, the members of this organization, following the injunction of the great Apostle, "Be ye temperate in all things", banded themselves together as missionaries to preach and teach true temperance, and as militant patriots to strike down the withering hand of hypocrisy that is sapping American morals and undermining the forces of law and order.

TASK INCOMPLETE AND NEVER-ENDING

While felicitations and congratulations are in order, my dear ladies, upon the duties already performed, your task is but one third completed. The second step is to carry your fight for reform to the various States in an effort to see that the eighteenth amendment is repealed under the orderly processes of the laws provided, rather than continue to face a deliberate refusal to enforce the amendment, which means its nullification. The enforcement of any law depends upon public sentiment. Do not forget the pendulum of public sentiment swings rapidly in America, and should our people disregard the evils incident to the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors, and fail to prevent them, we may return to conditions in the future equally as bad as those of today. You must continue your crusade for temperance in America.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY PLEDGED TO RETURN PROBLEM TO STATES

I would not violate the proprieties of this occasion by discussing politics before a nonpolitical organization. I hope you will pardon me, however, for feeling some pride in the fact that the Democratic Party, through its platform and its candidate for the Presidency, declared itself in favor of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The leadership in both parties, realizing the futility of enforcement, declared for repeal, and many Republicans, like my friend Senator WADSWORTH, have advocated and voted for a direct repeal, but no other construction can be placed upon the attitude of the Democratic Party and its pledges than that of urging the return of the temperance problem to the sovereign States of the Union, where, I repeat, it properly belongs, and should have remained, fighting in each State a return of the evils of the old saloon.

No citizen, wet or dry, should object to a submission of this question to the people of his State, and wherever a majority of the citizens of that State decide to remain dry, they are entitled to and should have the united support of every other State, as well as the National Government—in interstate shipment—in their effort to enforce State laws. Likewise, in those States where public sentiment is against the national prohibition law, which means no enforcement, the majority of the people of such States should assume the responsibility and deal with the liquor problem in their own way.

SUBMISSION TO CONVENTIONS SECURE MORE DIRECT EXPRESSION OF PEOPLE'S WILL

Both political parties declared for the submission of the question to conventions in each State rather than to legislatures. For the first time in the Nation's history such a method of amending the Constitution is being adopted. Such a method in its last analysis is more of a referendum and is desirable because it will more nearly secure the direct expression of the people better than the old method of submission to legislatures chosen in many instances upon issues in nowise related to the question submitted by the Congress involving an amendment to the Federal Constitution. If the submission of the proposed new amendment to conventions in the States, in preference to the legislatures of the States, should prove in actual practice as effective as it seems in theory, there is good reason to believe that hereafter other proposed changes in the organic law of our Republic will be considered by State conventions. The plan of submission is unique and, in many respects, a far-reaching experiment. Irrespective of our views for or against the national prohibition amendment it appears incumbent on all of us to afford this system of ratification by conventions the most thorough and eminently fair trial.

BACK TO FUNDAMENTALS

In our effort to repeal the eighteenth amendment, we are but seeking to return to the first principles of democratic government. We are seeking to have the citizens of my State and your State accord to the citizens of every other State the right to administer their own affairs and attend to their own business while we enjoy the same privilege. The eighteenth amendment was a great mistake. Let us continue our efforts to correct it. "Keep the faith; fight the good fight", and your reward will be found in a better and happier America.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein an address made by the Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, today before the Economic Conference in London.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH] to incorporate that same address.

Mr. RANKIN. If so, I will withdraw my request, Mr. Speaker.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on the roll call that was just concluded I desire to state I was detained from the Chamber on official business pertaining to my district. Had I been present, I would have voted "no."

FLAG DAY

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1½ minutes.

Mr. LAMNECK. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know what the gentleman is going to talk about? Is it the International Conference or war debts?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, this is June 14, and I want to put in the RECORD a few remarks, and a very few, relative to Flag Day, something that I believe has a deeper meaning in America.

Mr. LAMNECK. I do not object.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the majority leader what is the program for the balance of the afternoon?

Mr. BYRNS. It is the purpose to take a recess, subject to the call of the Chair, as soon as these unanimous-consent requests are acted upon.

Mr. SNELL. Are there going to be any more speeches?

Mr. BYRNS. Not on one subject, at any rate. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would make his motion immediately.

Mr. BYRNS. I will as soon as these requests are taken care of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]?

Mr. HARLAN. Reserving the right to object, pending that I should like to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 7 minutes at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from West Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that only one unanimous-consent request may be pending at one time.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] to address the House for 1½ minutes? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, today being June 14 there is in the National Capital and throughout all sections of this country, official observance of Flag Day. In connection with the observance of this day I should like to call to the serious consideration of the Members of this House the fact that there is in America at this very hour an organization known as "The Young Pioneers of America", sponsored by the Communist Party of Red Russia, and each morning little boys the size of this youngster who sits beside me this afternoon place their hands to their foreheads and pledge allegiance to the red flag, not to the American flag. I believe it is worthy of the attention of the Members of this House today to say to all America and to the world that there are lying tongues abroad in this land; that there are false prophets walking up and down America, telling us that the interests of the home, the church, and the school, which you have fostered and which you believe to have made this country great, are not right. As one Member of this House speaking to the others, I want to see that American flag continue to wave from every public building in this land, with not a stripe erased nor a star obscured. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. May I inquire what the regular order is right now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is a motion by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. I am prepared to make it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. FISH. To extend my own remarks.

Mr. BYRNS. On what subject, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. FISH. My own remarks.

Mr. BYRNS. I object if I cannot get the information I have asked.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to the fact that unanimous consent has been granted all Members to extend their own remarks.

Mr. BYRNS. That is true, Mr. Speaker, as to a previous order; but I object to this request unless I know the subject matter which the gentleman wishes to discuss. I do not think the gentleman should refuse to answer the question that I asked.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to extend his own remarks?

Mr. FISH. I certainly do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule that the gentleman from New York, under a previous order of the House, has that permission.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, may I submit this: The gentleman has that right under a previous order, but the gentleman is making a second request now, to which I undoubtedly have the right to object. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent, and I object to the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from New York making an additional request to that already granted?

Mr. FISH. Well, I already have that. I am willing to make the additional request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman has the right to object.

Mr. BYRNS. Reserving the right to object, upon what subject does the gentleman wish to extend his own remarks?

Mr. FISH. I am going to extend my remarks on the Republican attitude and viewpoint on this International Conference.

Mr. BYRNS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 7 minutes on the question of industrial allotment and foreign trade.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I object and demand the regular order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. BYRNS. I withhold it for a moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on my own bill and my own remarks before the Public Lands Committee and to add to them the reports of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture on that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained, regretfully and reluctantly, to object.

RECESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 32 minutes p.m.) the House stood in recess at the call of the Speaker.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 8:15 o'clock p.m.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, further insists upon its amendments nos. 7, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 30, 34, 43, 44, 45, and 46, and agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 47, with an amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, personally I had hoped very much that we could dispose of this matter tonight. I believe it would have been to the best interest of the country and the Congress if we could have voted on it tonight and then sent the bill to the President for such action as he may choose to take, dispose of the matter tomorrow and adjourn tomorrow sine die.

I do not know whether the failure to vote is going to delay the Congress for another day or two or not, but I am going to say this, that every possible influence I can exert is going to be put forth tomorrow to keep down debate and not get into a general discussion upon this matter which has already been liberally discussed.

I take it every Member of this House will come here tomorrow to vote one way or the other and fairness demands they have an opportunity to read the amendment of the Senate, which has been adopted within the last hour. Under these circumstances I think we had better, since there seems to be almost a unanimous demand for it, take an adjournment.

I do not want to see any Member taken advantage of, and some feel that if an adjournment is not had they will not have an opportunity to think it over. I am sure we want to be fair with everybody. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not want to be in the attitude of opposing any move my leader makes. I think every gentleman on this floor has his mind made up as to what he is going to do. I shall follow my leader.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman from Alabama that several of us in an informal conference agreed that we would vote tonight, but when we came in on the floor the sentiment seemed to be almost unanimous that we adjourn over and we changed our plan to meet their wishes.

Mr. BLANTON. Move to take a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat that there are many, many Members who say that it is only fair to them that they have an opportunity to read in the RECORD tomorrow the amendment of the Senate upon the subject of veterans' compensation. I think, in justice to so many of these gentlemen who have expressed this wish, the House should not refuse to give them the few hours necessary to think it over.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. An hour or two hours ago a number of Members of the House felt pretty well assured that there would be no business tonight, that there would be no vote. This will be one of the most important votes they will be called upon to cast.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 5661. An act to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of banks, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 554. An act providing for per capita payments to the Seminole Indians in Oklahoma from funds standing to their credit in the Treasury;

S. 1650. An act amending section 74 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 147);

S. 1872. An act to extend the times of commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the French Broad River on the proposed Morristown-Newport Road between Jefferson and Cocke Counties, Tenn.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 5755. An act to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes.

CONFERENCE REPORT—INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1934

Mr. WOODRUM presented the conference report on the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this conference report, as the Membership of the House understands, has, even within the last hour, been acted on by the Senate.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUSBY. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the gentleman from Tennessee has yielded to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUSBY. I think all the debate has been on one side on this question. I think the regular order ought to be demanded and these speeches cut out, that the Members ought to go home or vote on the proposition.

Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order, strictly.

Mr. BYRNS. I am making this motion in the interest of orderly procedure.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GAVAGAN (at the request of Mr. KENNEDY of New York), indefinitely, on account of illness of mother.

To Mr. KEMP, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the conference report has not been printed, and, therefore, cannot be considered tonight.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GOSS. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. I make the point of order that the gentleman's point comes too late.

The SPEAKER. No; the point can be raised at any time.

Mr. GOSS. A roll call cannot be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, but the roll call has not commenced.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 231, nays 125, not voting 74, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 207

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I introduced Joint Resolution 207. I am sorry that under the present parliamentary situation growing out of the short time remaining before the adjournment of Congress it will be impossible to have this resolution considered.

The resolution is sufficiently self-explanatory in purpose and needs little elucidation. Last week the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation announced that his body had extended a $50,000,000 credit to China, $40,000,000 of which will be used to buy cotton and $10,000,000 to buy wheat. The statement said, "Shipment will be largely in American-flag vessels." But inquiry discloses that such a statement is uncertain in meaning and extent, if not actually misleading. A contract has been made between the Reconstruction Corporation and the Republic of China, acting through her Minister of Finance, T. V. Soong, and her American economic adviser, Dr. Arthur Young, formerly of the American State Department. The contract does specify that one half of the tonnage shall be shipped in American ships and, I believe, that all of it shall be thus shipped, if American ship operators will tender the same price as foreign tramp operators. As to the one half which is supposedly guaranteed to American ships, nothing is said as to rate; and as American rates necessarily are higher than foreign tramps, it may easily develop that the "one-half guaranty" is somewhat of a 'joker", if the getting of this one half is dependent on the Americans' meeting prices of their cheaply operated foreign competitors.

Mr. Speaker, I apprehend, from such inquiry as I have been able to make, that it was not without difficulty that our Government officers managed to get a promise from their Chinese borrowers that one half of the tonnage should go American. Our oriental friends seemingly felt that as they were to pay the freight bill additional to their $50,000,000 loan there should be no restriction on the means of shipment; that they should buy their freight space wherever it is cheapest, which we all know would not and cannot be American ships. It may well be that our American representatives did their best in this matter, according to their viewpoint, especially as the law does not mandate them to require American ships. I do not undertake to unfairly criticize them. But I do propose, to the best of my ability, that there shall be no repetition of such a situation, and that, so far as may prove possible or practicable, American shipping shall be protected in the Chinese deal more fully than is now the case.

Mr. Speaker, we have been striving for many years to advance our merchant marine. We have lines of ships, most of them now in private hands, encircling the globe, and we are providing assistance by the Government to maintain and improve these lines. It is axiomatic, and a fact frequently shouted by the ship operators, that what they need above all forms of assistance, is patronage by shippers and travelers. In plain patriotism, our exporters, importers, bankers, and others in international trade should extend a friendly preference to American ships, where they are rendering equal service; and, in most cases, they are rendering equal or even superior service. If it is the decent duty of private citizens thus to support the merchant marine, most assuredly it is the solemn duty of the Government itself to bend backward in doing so. Yet it is little short of amazing that in not one but three instances involving Government financing in the export or import market the leverage which the Government could employ to force the tonnage into American ships is not availed of. Sometime ago the Farm Board or its agencies exchanged American wheat for Brazilian coffee. No provision was made for the utilizing of American ships, and I understand that not 1 pound was carried in either direction excepting in foreign ships. Later the Farm Board disposed of about 25,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour to China, more than one half million tons, at a time when famine and disaster confronted her. Did American ships get this movement? No; that friendly preference which a borrower in distress might easily extend was totally ignored; the American agencies likewise ignored the control which they might, and, I think, should have exercised. The Chinese impersonally called for world-wide bids on the transportation; and, of course, it went to a bidder who let the tonnage out to foreign cheaply operated ships. Now, we have this deal with the Chinese, where it appears they have condescendingly agreed, in uncertain language, to let us have one half the tonnage. If China operated a merchant marine, I think I should cheerfully concur that she should have the other half in her own ships. But she has little or no overseas shipping; and I submit that it is passing strange that she should struggle for, and insist upon, the right to pass one half, or perhaps more, along to ships of countries other than the United States.

I believe there is no one anywhere who reasonably could contradict this thought: That neither England nor any other country in the world would for one instant extend Government resources to facilitate a trade with another country, excepting upon the condition that her own vessels be used. I submit that any country in like situation, failing to make such provision, is recreant and negligent.

In the present deal with China I think there will be about one half million tons of wheat. That, I suppose, is likely to move through Pacific ports, so that our friends from the West who have been diligent in building up their shipping should have a natural interest in seeing that American ships capture all this movement. I understand the cotton will amount to about a quarter million tons, which normally would move out of Gulf ports. A splendid American line of freighters to the Orient has just been taken over by private interests, and they are entitled to the great support which this tonnage would give them. I believe that the total freight bill of both the cotton and wheat, at present American rates, would approximate less than 5 percent of the amount of the loan, and it seems not unreasonable to expect and to demand that the borrowers give the American merchant marine the benefit of this patronage. The amount of the freight bill is not so great that there is much chance for a big saving through use of cheap foreign ships, yet it is of material consequence to the American lines, who are required to maintain their scheduled sailings under all conditions. They should not be handicapped by competition from foreign tramps who render no regular service and, in fact, are interlopers.

There is also this important point to remember: This is not strictly a private type of commercial transaction. The 1932 law especially stipulated that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might make loans such as these, only when such transactions could not be financed "in the normal course of commerce." The Government here is clearly doing something to aid China in procuring her needs, which China cannot facilitate through normal channels. If it is proper for China to seek out and accept the help and cooperation of the United States, it is equally fair and proper for the United States to demand and obtain China's consent that our shipping exclusively shall benefit. It will be noted that in my proposed resolution there is provision that exception be made as to American ships whenever the Shipping Board shall certify that conditions justify such exceptions. Certainly China—and other borrowers—may rely upon our Shipping Board for fair treatment in determining these points.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that several days ago the Chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee introduced in the other branch a bill (S. 1845) covering this same general situation, especially as to China. But it appears that that bill will not be pressed, since it was found that the Chinese contract had been signed. My resolution should convey to all concerned the emphatic feeling by Congress that there must be none of these loans made unless they specify American ships; and while, of course, we cannot do anything legally affecting the Chinese contract, I think the expressions of Congress may influence both the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Chinese representatives toward amending their contract so as to insure American ships as the resolution outlines. China has come twice to the United States for help and cooperation, and no doubt will come again. Let us acquaint her definitely of the feeling by Congress as to the spirit which should govern her transactions, and those of any other country.

FOLLOWING THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, there are two things that stand out in bold relief when one contemplates the session of Congress now approaching its end: First, the willingness of the legislative branch of the Government to grant broad powers to the Executive; second, the cooperation given to the party in power by members of the minority. Both are indicative of a new attitude, which may mark a basic change in governmental practice just as vital as the changes brought about from time to time by constitutional amendment.

In the past it has been the practice in this country for legislatures to guard their prerogatives jealously. The word jealously is used advisedly, for often the reason for the reluctance of the Congress to trust the Executive with power has been not so much fear that the Executive would abuse the power given as apprehension lest increase in the power of the Executive would result in diminution of its own importance in the scheme of government.

The centering of power in an individual, or in a compact group dominated by an individual, has always been deemed necessary in time of war. It is perhaps because it is generally acknowledged that the present economic situation presents a crisis no less serious than has attended any period of armed conflict that there is a willingness just now to "let the President do it." Similar situations abroad have resulted in the establishment of dictatorships in Italy, Germany, and other lands. The success of Mussolini gave the idea of centralized government a tremendous impetus.

There has been no dictatorship set up in America. But there has been a recognition that in solving the problem of the depression, conditions change so quickly that there must be lodged somewhere the power to adopt new expedients almost overnight, and that, obviously, no Congress, of two Houses, with a total Membership of 531 men, representing conflicting interests and differing ideas, even if in session continuously, could meet such a situation adequately. When the country is in danger, when it is attacked on many fronts, there is no time to await the decision of a debating society. There must be no haggling about details. There must be action—prompt, vigorous, and decisive.

Is there danger to our democratic institutions in the present practice of giving the Executive wide discretionary powers? I can see no such danger. Certainly, there is none when such powers are granted by a Congress which reconvenes automatically at definite intervals, without having to await being convoked by the Executive. Certainly, there is none when those powers are granted for a brief and fixed period, and cease absolutely at its expiration. Certainly, there is none when the Executive, and the Members of the legislative department as well, serve for short terms, their successors being chosen in elections conducted by and in the various States, over which the Federal Government exercises no control.

It is the peculiar genius of our dual system of government that it affords a double protection against usurpation. The Federal Government guarantees to each State a republican form of government, and the States in turn have complete control over the elections, the very holding of which insures the maintenance of the Federal Republic. The scuttling of democracy, which is comparatively easy in a country where the sovereignty of the people is expressed through one national government, therefore, could not be accomplished here except by armed revolution, unless the States acquiesced.

There is nothing, then, that need cause apprehension in the most loyal supporter of the Constitution that the grants of power in broad and general terms, instead of by minute direction, in the legislation passed by the present Congress constitute an impairment of the Constitution. Rather they strengthen the Constitution by proving its adequacy, by demonstrating that it is a living thing—not like the framework of a house, which must be torn down when the house is outgrown, but rather like the framework of an organism, which grows with and accommodates itself to the growing structure of which it is a part.

I have said that the present session has also been unique in the generous liberality with which the members of the minority have supported the party in power. It is perhaps idle to speculate as to the reasons for this almost unprecedented exhibition of political generosity. In fact, I suspect it is error to call it generosity. Certainly there was nothing in the attitude of the Democratic Members when they withheld from the late Republican administration support of some of the very policies which the present Democratic President has espoused to cause Republican Members of the present Congress to feel cooperative.

However gratifying it would be to one who still clings to the theory of perfectionism to believe that we have arrived at the time when political parties work together because they love each other, I fear that to say so would too much strain the credulity of a people who have long despaired of seeing miracles happen again. If political spears are ever beaten into hooks, they will not be pruning hooks.

It is something else than good will that explains the present disposition of Republicans in Congress to go along with the Democrats. First, so much of what the Democrats have advanced was recommended by a former Republican administration that Republicans in Congress would stultify themselves if they refused to support it.

The last Republican President sought to balance the Budget; the Democrats said it could not be done. Now, with the help of the Republican minority, they are doing it.

He sought to reduce pensions moderately; they said it must not be done. Now they are doing it drastically.

He asked legislation to protect the public against reckless and dishonest banking; they evinced only passive interest. Now, with Republican help, they are passing belated banking legislation.

He wanted to reorganize the structure of the Federal Government; they vetoed his recommendations. Now, without objection from Republican Congressmen, a Democratic President is effecting the reorganization.

He proposed unemployment relief through the adoption of a program of self-liquidating public works; they checkmated his effort by sponsoring instead a pork-barrel measure that would have placed a palatial post-office building in every crossroads village. Now, supported by Republican votes, the Democrats are starting a well-conceived and intelligent public-works campaign.

One reason, then, why the Republicans have gone along with the Democrats is that the latter have adopted so much of what until March 4 was a Republican program.

Another and perhaps more compelling reason is that the Republicans have realized the need for a unified and cohesive Government during the period of emergency, and have been willing to submerge party considerations in order to safeguard national interests. A man may love both his party and his country, but he would be a poor patriot if he did not love his country more than his party. Even although the Democrats did not in the last 2 years always show a disposition to distinguish carefully between partisanship and patriotism, the Republicans must show that they can subordinate party to country now; for if they do not, we may all finally find ourselves without either party or country.

The people have confidence in Franklin D. Roosevelt. He is a virile, forceful Executive; a leader with power to stir the people's imagination. As President, he belongs no less to the Republicans than to the Democrats. Good Republicans will not lag behind loyal Democrats in supporting him. They owe this duty, for in him the faith and hope of a stricken, suffering people are centered. If he fails, the reconstructive forces in the Nation lose their place of focus. If he is ever discredited those who are striving to rebuild America lose their rallying point. So we of the minority party are willing to follow the leader, not as whipped slaves in cringing obedience, but as free men who cherish individual opinions and convictions, but are willing, temporarily, to subordinate lesser things in order to attain the major objective, which is to bring back those conditions of living without which there can be no assurance of permanence for the free institutions of our country.

THE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to Senate amendment 33 on page 59 of the independent offices appropriation bill as it passed the House.

It will be recalled that section 8 of this bill is the so-called "retirement section" and deals with separations from the service.

Paragraph (b) contains the language as passed by the House, and is as follows:

> In making reductions of personnel due regard shall be given to the apportionment of appointments as provided in the Civil Service Act.

The Senate amended it by striking out paragraph (b) and inserting the following language:

> Reductions of personnel shall be made with regard both to efficiency and to apportionment of appointments by States as now provided by law, but when new appointments are made hereafter under Civil Service regulations, and there are persons on the eligible list who are residents of States which at the time are below the quota of Civil Service appointments allotted such States by law, preference in selection and appointment shall be given to those eligible persons who are residents of States having less than their Civil Service quota.

It will be noted that the original paragraph (b) as it passed the House only dealt with reductions of personnel in the Government service. I sponsored and favored that amendment. It should have been retained in the bill. Now, the first part of the Senate amendment to paragraph (b) deals with reductions of personnel but adds "efficiency", and by adding this word really nullifies paragraph (b) and makes it ineffective.

Civil Service status is determined by the Civil Service Commission, whereas efficiency is determined by the heads of bureaus and departments, and if the word "efficiency" is added to paragraph "b", as provided in the Senate amendment, it would render the paragraph entirely ineffective.

The new language in the Senate amendment deals with new appointments and is intended to modify and amend the third paragraph of section 2 of the act of Congress of January 16, 1883. The language is as follows:

> But when new appointments are made hereafter under Civil Service regulations, and there are persons on the eligible list who are residents of States which at the time are below the quota of Civil Service appointments allotted such States by law, preference in selection and appointment shall be given to those eligible persons who are residents of States having less than their Civil Service quota.

This is an effort to amend the act of Congress of January 16, 1883. Let us again examine the third paragraph of section 2 of the act of Congress approved January 16, 1883, which is as follows:

> Third, appointments to the public service aforesaid in the departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census.

This act requires that appointments shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories upon the basis of population as ascertained by the last preceding census, whereas the Senate amendment above referred to carries out the act of January 16, 1883, only when and if there are persons on the eligible lists who are residents of States which at the time are below the quota of Civil Service appointments allotted such States by law. In other words, if the Civil Service Commission fails and refuses to hold examinations and there is no eligible list from the several States, then the Commission is not required to follow the act of January 16, 1883. It gives the Commission an excuse not to follow this act.

I made every effort as one of the conferees to retain the House provision and strike out the Senate amendment. When I found this could not be done, being outvoted, the conferees agreed to eliminate both the House and Senate provisions from the bill. Now what is the situation? It leaves the act of January 16, 1883, above referred to, in force. This act is mandatory. It requires all appointments to be made in the Federal service in the District of Columbia in proportion to the population of the several States. The House provision, as contained in paragraph (b), only applied to reductions in Federal employees in the District of Columbia. However, the Senate amendment would have nullified paragraph (b) by inserting the word "efficiency." The Senate amendment also had the effect of amending the act of January 16, 1883, with reference to new appointments.

It is the duty of the Civil Service Commission to keep lists of eligibles from which selections may be made at any time. There are approximately 33,000 Federal employees in the District of Columbia. Three or four nearby States have always had more than their allowance. I have inserted this list in the RECORD several times. This list shows that the act of January 16, 1883, has not been complied with. In the last few days the Washington newspapers, having received information that paragraph (b), inserted by the House was eliminated, are elated and seem to indicate that a victory has been won. However, let me remind the Members of the House and the people of the country that a House resolution has been passed authorizing and directing the House Committee on the Civil Service to make a thorough investigation of this entire question. This committee has met and is perfecting plans for the investigation. You may rest assured as to future appointments that the Members of the House will be alert and will see to it that the other States shall have their full quota of Federal appointments in the District of Columbia. Not only will the Civil Service Commission be investigated by the House Committee but each year when the Commission comes to Congress for its appropriation this investigation will be renewed and it will result in the act of January 16, 1883, being enforced.

While, of course, I favored paragraph (b), which was the House provision, let me repeat that it only applied to reductions in the number of Federal employees. The most important thing is the retention of the third paragraph of section 2 of the act of January 16, 1883, with reference to new appointments. While we regret that the House amendment was not retained, the Washington press may not be so elated by the striking out of both House and Senate provisions, because when the Committee on the Civil Service of the House is through making the investigation recently authorized, and when this question is kept fresh during each session of Congress, you may rest assured that the Members of the House will not be content if this provision of the Civil Service law is not complied with.

The District of Columbia, Virginia, Maryland, Iowa, and Vermont are together entitled to 2,005 appointments. They have 16,033, an excess of 14,026, or approximately one half of the 33,000 Federal employees in the District of Columbia.

With the permission of the House, I am again inserting the table showing the quota to which each State is entitled:

THE ECONOMY BILL AND ITS EFFECT ON THE VETERANS

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, before the Seventy-third Congress adjourns and passes into history, I wish to make a statement concerning the so-called "economy bill" passed in the early days of this session, its effects on the disabled veterans, and my reasons for voting against it.

Since the passage of this bill and the development of the injustices that it imposes upon many veterans of this country, under the new rules and regulations issued by the Veterans' Bureau, the rights of the disabled American war veterans have been discussed all over this country. In some quarters his patriotism has been impugned. I resent these implications. It is true there are some veterans, as there are always some in every group, who try to take advantage of the generosity of their Government, but it is my opinion from contact and personal knowledge that the veterans of this country as a group ask only for justice.

I readily admit that some have received and are receiving now benefits that they are not entitled to. But should vicious propaganda because of this condition be allowed to poison our minds against deserving cases? Should those who were disabled be caused to suffer therefor? In this hour of financial distress in our country the pendulum influenced by poison and propaganda has swung too far the other way, and the disabled veteran is unjustly paying for it.

This bill was presented to Congress on the heels of the most vicious propaganda ever circulated against the ex-soldier of any country. The Economy League and the United States Chamber of Commerce, supported mainly by subscriptions from the immensely wealthy, had saturated the American public with the general idea that the rank and file of American veterans were trying to fleece their Government. It was these same interests that yelled loudest that the boys of America be sent to Europe in 1917. They called those boys heroes then, because they were being sent to foreign soil to help secure the private debts that England and France and other foreign countries owed to them. They profited in millions then. They do not wish to pay anything now to the disabled veterans who secured their millions for them. When the war was won they still called them heroes for a day, but now they spend part of their ill-gotten gains by advertisement and propaganda to do a grave injustice to those who have come back wounded or afflicted and to rob the dependents of those who died in the service of this country and the dependents of those whose bones rest on foreign soil.

No one has greater admiration for President Roosevelt than I. It has been and is now my desire and intention to uphold his hand in his efforts to restore this country to prosperity. It has been my pleasure, with rare exception, to vote for the entire program that he has presented to Congress in an effort to place this country again on an even keel; but, feeling as I do, I could not conscientiously vote for the economy bill as it was without amendments. I for one have never doubted the sincerity of the President in his statements that he would not do injury to any deserving veteran. I know that his heart beats to help all phases of physical suffering and sorrow. I have never for one moment thought that the President would knowingly and voluntarily do an injustice to an American war veteran; but I also know that the multiplicity of the duties confronting him in the crisis facing our country, with all the problems of relieving unemployment, with his plans for farm relief and the relief of the home owner, with all of his reorganization plans for our Government, with his honest desire to balance the Budget, and with every nerve and every faculty busy every day in consideration of the many problems facing our people, it is impossible for him or any other man under the sun to consider and to study the effect of this legislation as it applies to every disabled veteran. If it were possible for this matter to be settled by his individual hand and heart, I believe that justice would be done the disabled American veteran. However, this will not be done. It will be necessary for the President to delegate this authority to the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, advised by the Director of the Budget, and events have shown that their sympathy does not lie on the side of the disabled veteran. I believe the time will come when it will be my pleasure to defend the President's sincerity of purpose against the charges of some of those who are supporting this measure today and who will tomorrow be placing the blame upon the President with the claim that they did not know what the effects of this act would be.

It is true that this country is facing a great financial crisis. I am one of those who think that the expenses of every department of this Government must be cut in order that the Budget may be balanced. I am one of those who think that the American war veteran should take his cut, along with all other beneficiaries of the generosity of our country; but I am not one of those who think that the Budget should be balanced by the taking away of compensation granted by a grateful Government for disabilities received by soldiers in the service of their country.

The Democratic caucus itself decided by a majority vote that the veterans' appropriation should not be cut over 25 percent, with a view to placing the cuts where they should be without placing them where, in justice, they should not be placed. The law, as it was passed, in many instances cut the benefits now being received by actually service-connected disabilities as much as 50 percent. It places a great hardship also upon the dependents of those who died in the service. It denies hospitalization to many disabled veterans, when the hospitals to provide this treatment have already been provided by a grateful Government. It will place upon the shoulders of the States and the municipalities the expense of providing care for many disabled and incompetent veterans who should by right be wards of the Federal Government.

Heretofore legislation had taken a charitable view toward that class of disability known as "presumptive service-connected." In many of these cases, on account of the nature of the disability, absolute proof could not be shown that the disability was suffered in the service, due to the fact that tuberculosis, nervous disorders, and certain other ailments as a rule did not develop noticeably until some time after the inception of the ailment. The veterans therefore were allowed a presumptive period of service connection for a few years. Now in most cases this presumption will only be allowed for 1 year, and the result is that, since the war ended 14 years ago, the veteran is now not able to prove service connection.

As for the Spanish-American War veterans who served in a war when no service records were kept, when medical protection was not provided, when the services of supply were inadequate, this act practically places that veteran in the position that he will, 30 or 35 years after the war, be forced to present proof that his disability was incurred in the service, long after the possibility of providing this proof has disappeared with the years and failing memory. That is not justice.

For the reasons I have stated, and for many others I have not the time nor the ability to express, I voted against this bill and also voted for the two liberalizing amendments which came from the Senate and which were presented to the House later in the independent offices appropriation bill.

In my race for Congress last summer I promised the war veterans of my district nothing except a fair deal. That I intend to give to them insofar as my ability extends—no more, no less. I do not hesitate to credit those who voted for this bill with honesty and sincerity of purpose; but if I had voted for this bill, feeling as I do about its unjust effects upon disabled war veterans of our country, I would be a traitor to them and to my own conscience.

REPUBLICANS PREDOMINATE ON MORGAN LISTS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, my attention has frequently been attracted recently to statements in Republican newspapers which have been so worded as to give the impression to readers that Democrats, rather than Republicans, predominated in the lists of the "preferred customers" of J. P. Morgan & Co., recently made public by the Senate investigating committee.

Because this is exactly the reverse of the truth, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few comments on the subject. Of all the hundreds of names contained in these lists, no less than 90 percent were those of pronounced Republicans! Let us keep the record straight in this matter.

In striking contrast to the publication of the name of a former Republican President—the late Calvin Coolidge—the name of our great Democratic President—Franklin D. Roosevelt—was conspicuous by its absence. Absent from the list also was the name of the previous Democratic nominee, Al Smith.

Prominent, however, in the list of Republicans were the names of a member of President Hoover's Cabinet—Charles F. Adams, former Secretary of the Navy; the late Senator Dwight W. Morrow, a former Hoover amassador to Mexico; United States Senator Hamilton F. Kean, of New Jersey; former Senator George Wharton Pepper, of Pennsylvania, and R. B. Mellon, a brother of Andrew W. Mellon, the former Hoover Secretary of the Treasury and later ambassador to Great Britain.

The number of Republicans on the bench whose names adorn the now famous "preferred-customers" lists of the Morgan company is little short of amazing. If the large city Republican newspapers had been fair, they would have emphasized this.

The Republican judiciary was represented on the Morgan lists, among others by Owen Roberts, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court; Robert von Moschzisker, chief justice of the Pennsylvania State Supreme Court; and John W. Kephart, also a justice on the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. The Morgan interests must have felt rather "secure" so far as any possible litigation before this Supreme court of Pennsylvania was concerned.

Two former Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, both Republicans, who were listed, were S. Parker Gilbert and Charles D. Hilles.

The Republican National Committee was conspicuously represented in the list by the names of Joseph R. Nutt, its treasurer, Charles D. Hilles, former chairman and member of the executive committee of the same organization; Daniel Pomeroy, of New Jersey, a vice chairman; and Henry Roraback, Republican national committeeman for Connecticut.

Names of others in the lists who are Republicans and also identified with the greatest corporations of the Nation, are: W. C. Teagle, president of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey; W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad; Samuel M. Vauclain, president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works; Walter S. Gifford, president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.; Clarence H. Mackay, president of the Postal Telegraph Co.; C. E. Mitchell, former president of the National City Bank of New York; Myron C. Taylor, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation; A. H. Wiggin, former president of the Chase National Bank; George F. Baker, Jr., director of the United States Steel Corporation; Guggenheim Brothers, the copper magnates; Anthony D. Biddle and D. Graham Craig, Morgan's Philadelphia representatives; Silas Strawn, former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce; and Marshall Field, Chicago merchant. Still others of the Republican faith included in the lists were Gerard Winston, Robert E. Olds, E. Edmund Machold, Edgar Rickard, former Republican State chairman from New York, Thomas S. and Thomas W. Lamont, George F. Allen, Arthur M. Andersen, Dominick & Dominick, Claude K. Boettcher, and so forth, and so forth, the whole number of Republicans running up into the hundreds.

Of the very, very few Democrats appearing in the long lists of names, let us consider that of John J. Raskob, former chairman of the National Democratic Committee. It is well known that Mr. Raskob has financial holdings in many American business enterprises; that he never pretended otherwise, and that it would be but natural that the Morgan company would include him among its favored customers. But in view of the fact that all his life he has kept his political and financial affairs as two separate and distinct interests, that he has frequently advocated policies not in alinement with those of the House of Morgan, it is perfectly apparent that the inclusion of his name on the preferred lists certainly did not influence him to alter his views on public questions.

The same is true as regards W. H. Woodin, the Democrat who is making such a fine record as Secretary of the Treasury. His firm had large business dealings with the Morgan Company, and at the time these lists were prepared no one had the slightest idea—Mr. Woodin himself perhaps least of all—that he would ever hold a public office. So it is obvious that his name was not included with any idea of influencing him as a public official but only for purely business reasons.

In all events the number of Democrats as compared to Republicans in these Morgan lists was as 1 to 10, or, more likely, 1 to 25. Yet some of the large city Republican newspapers, with the brazen effrontery that is so often characteristic of them where politics are involved, have sought to make it appear that it was principally Democrats that were named.

This misrepresentation has been so deliberate and willful that I have felt it should be pointed out and publicly condemned.

It is and always has been a historical and arithmetical fact that the Republican Party is the party of Wall Street and special privilege, and that the Democratic Party is the party of the masses, standing squarely for equal rights for all and special privileges for none. The Morgan lists proved conclusively the preponderant affection of the Wall Street crowd for Republicans.

In many cases secretary-treasurer of local farm-loan association could also act as secretary-treasurer of local credit association. TAINTING AMERICAN PUBLIC OPINION—ACTIVE HITLER PROPAGANDA IN THE HALLS OF CONGRESS DISTORTS FACTS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the general leave granted Members for extension of remarks at the close of the session, I desire to place in the RECORD the following. The contents of this article has been prepared for me by Mr. Walter Hart Blumenthal, associate editor of the American Hebrew and Jewish Tribune, a scholarly gentleman and a fierce champion of the truth, one whose writings I have always enjoyed and whose works I have always admired.

When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] a few weeks ago, on the floor of the House, quoted from the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, everyone was too astounded at his ignorance of the facts to reply. Everyone; that is, except myself, since I subsequently took occasion to point out the "aberrations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania."

The debate into which Mr. MCFADDEN interjected his bigotries had to do with the currency question and gold repeal. He asserted that the legislation was "foretold by a writer in the Dearborn Independent several years ago when that paper published the so-called 'Protocols of Zion.'"

He quoted at some length from the "Protocols" which among other things, according to the Pennsylvanian, predicted that—

When the crash comes the Gentiles will have the paper and the Jews the gold.

Is it not true—

Asked Mr. MCFADDEN—

that in the United States today the gentiles have the slips of paper while the Jews have the gold and the lawful money? And is not this repudiation bill a bill specifically designed and written by the Jewish international money changers in order to perpetuate their power?

It would seem unbelievable that these forgeries known as the Protocols of Zion should still be cited in one of the great parliamentary bodies of the world—cited and believed in by the citer. Yet not only is this so—years after the fabrication of the so-called "Protocols" was proved—but this alleged plot of the Jews of the world is still reprinted and circulated in booklet form.

Especially in Germany, editions continue to be circulated. For years the book has been distributed, especially in Germany, in enormous numbers, and translations which had appeared in many languages previous to the conclusive proof of forgery are still handed about. Moreover, the fake "sages of Zion" are quoted by Jew-baiters in innumerable writings, just as though they were valid documents.

Although 12 years have passed since the falsity of the "protocols" was proven in the London Times by its Constantinople correspondent (in articles published August 16–18, 1921), a ninth German edition of the Secrets of the Sages of Zion was published in Munich in 1929 and has been constantly used by the Nazis to foment falsehood and hatred against the German Jews.

As a matter of fact, that this bogus collection of documents consisted of unmitigated falsehoods and that it was a plain concoction had been shown by the eminent Jewish scholar, Lucien Wolf, in an article in the London Spectator in 1920, and by Dr. Salomon Reinach in the Jewish Tribune of Paris of the same year.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], perhaps could not be expected to know this, although it is difficult to understand his ignorance of the fact that Henry Ford, in a letter dated November 1, 1927, addressed to Louis Marshall, of New York, as president of the American Jewish Committee, apologized to the Jewish people and retracted all the anti-Jewish falsehoods that had been published in his paper, the Dearborn Independent, and in his book, The International Jew. Ford sought to have withdrawn all foreign editions and translations, but new German editions of his book and of the forged protocols on which his book was based, are still being circulated.

Not only were the articles of Lucien Wolf and Salomon Reinach reprinted in current issues of the American Hebrew of New York, but leading newspapers of that day quoted releases from that publication.

The protocols were alleged to be the secret plans of the Zionist Congress held in Basle in 1897. They first came to the attention of the English-speaking world by a pamphlet called "The Jewish Peril", which was soon seen to be a political tract like many others that had appeared in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The alleged author of the Russian original of The Jewish Peril was Prof. Sergyei Nilus. It was a rehash of several earlier works, chiefly a fanatical screed by a German named Hermann Goedsche, who, in 1868, had been dismissed from the Prussian postal service for forgery.

At that time there was considerable agitation against the Freemasons, and Goedsche fabricated a booklet which held Masonry and Judaism accountable for the ills of the world, and more particularly set forth the alleged designs and machinations of the Jews to secure domination over all the nations of the earth. In order to make his fantastic notions seem realistic, he introduced the public to a supposed secret assembly of the "elect of Israel", which he said was held once in every century around the tomb of a mythical "Grand Master Caleb, the Holy Rabbi Simeon ben Jehudah."

Goedsche's document describes a sort of protocol, which is addressed by a chief rabbi (really a fictitious character), who expounds the plan of Simeon, handed down from generation to generation, by which the Jews are to work with gold and the press for the subversion of monarchy and Christianity. They are to act, as Goedsche's forgery has it, as a universally disturbing and demoralizing force, and, in particular, they are to seduce and stir up the proletariat to political revolution, so that eventually they may establish the Jewish universal monarchy on the ruins of Christian society.

This fantastic document, which passed almost unnoticed at the time it appeared, was seized upon in the early eighties by the more irresponsible elements of the anti-Semetic movement then in process of formation by Trietschke and Stöcker and widely circulated as a broadside. It was reprinted in France as late as 1911, in connection with similar forged material concocted by Jew baiters. A copy of this was used by the repudiated monk, Nilus, who added some of his own brew to the cauldron of hatred and amplified Goedsche's handiwork. Nilus also had a motive of his own, for he was a participant in the Russian Revolution of 1905, having been a Czarist henchman for some time in a police bureau in Moscow.

In denouncing the Jews as the instigators of the Bolshevist revolution, itself a slander, the Czarist Party cooked up this fable with Nilus as the unsavory chef. He bolstered his story with details about having discovered the original manuscript of the protocols in Switzerland or elsewhere. The whole thing, from the first word to the last, is utterly baseless, stupid, and clumsy; the elders of Zion are imaginary; the plot to conquer the world is a silly device, conceived by certain crack-brained individuals to advance their own political ends. The so-called "protocols of the wise men of Zion" are unadulterated forgeries used as the basis for anti-Jewish propaganda in Europe and—alas—in the United States.

Nilus, the perpetrator of the fake protocols, as cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was commonly regarded as a madman. He was a brain-clotted mystic, a well-educated Russian, whose pronounced eccentricities made him what alienists call a borderland type.

Let it not be supposed that such literary fabrications as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion are few. On the contrary, they were quite common in times now happily gone. In Europe false literature was a weapon commonly used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in political and religious controversies. Even in our own country there have been instances, such as the pamphlet largely circulated during the Civil War, which purported to have been an authentic vision of George Washington in 1777 in which he saw and set down the vista of American history for a century ahead. Its purpose was to encourage the people to resist the Confederacy, and it was accepted as veracious by many readers. It narrates how the country is to be imperiled by the black demon—slavery—divided by the powers of darkness—war—triumph over these powers, and so forth. In fact, it was reprinted as authentic in the New York Magazine of Mysteries for 1910.

So numerous have been such impostures that an entire work, entitled "Literary Forgeries" by Farrer, appeared in London in 1907. Mr. Walter Hart Blumenthal, in two extended articles in the American Hebrew, January 21–28, 1921, gave a presentation of such forgeries other than the so-called "protocols" that were then being circulated by foes of the Jews.

Anti-Semitism, however, has not depended on exploded fulminations such as this absurd concoction of a splenetic brain. Distortions of fact are rife with regard to the Jews of Germany. It is asserted on the one hand that they are capitalists controlling German industry. It is alleged on the other hand that they are Communists desirous of Sovietizing the Reich. These two assertions are mutually contradictory. Capitalists are usually content with a status quo; Communists are usually an impecunious lot who desire to get a share of things by a redistribution of wealth. The truth is, of course, that there are some Jewish capitalists and some Jewish Communists, just as there are some Christian capitalists and some Christian Communists.

German Jew baiters declare that it was the Jews who made Germany lose the war. As a matter of fact, 12,000 and more German Jews were war casualties in the ranks of the Reich. Nothing could more clearly destroy the nonsensical idea that the Jews of the world are banded together than the fact that in the Great War they fought and died in the armies of every country—fought and killed one another—just as in the Civil War in the United States Jews fought on the Confederate side and on the Union side, and in more instances than one were actually brothers. That does not look like a conspiracy to dominate the world.

What is more insidious than any cooked-up charges against alleged Jewish conspiracies is the underhanded propaganda now going on by Hitler agents in America, who presumably are not devoting themselves to their dubious cause out of sheer rancor against the Jews. Public opinion in America is being corrupted by these propagandists; even the Halls of Congress are not immune. Every Senator and Congressman recently received an 11-page mimeographed article, that was prepared by one T. St. John Gaffney, and was labeled "The facts in the case of the German National Socialists Against German Jewry and its political and economic control of the country."

Gaffney's confidential assignment is to contact American Federal officeholders, particularly Members of Congress, and if he can it is his job to hoodwink the State Department. It is easy enough to point out the conceded forgery of the stale and silly protocols of the Elders of Zion which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] cited from the floor of Congress on May 29. But it is not so simple a task to show up the falsities of a cleverly presented document such as Gaffney put into the hands of every Member of the Senate and House not long ago. It would require as much space to analyze and answer Gaffney's distortions as he takes for his Nazi propaganda.

However, it would suffice if Members of Congress were familiar with the fact that Gaffney was long ago discredited, and under President Wilson was removed as American consul general to Germany. Although it cannot be shown that Gaffney is a paid German agent, the inference, in the light of his record, is plain.

According to the New York Sun of September 26, 1915, Americans caught in Germany at the outbreak of the war had complained to the State Department of Gaffney's partisan attitude. It was said that he showed such intense sympathy with the German cause as to make him offensive to many British subjects in Germany whom he was officially required to aid, the United States having taken over the consular and diplomatic interests of Great Britain.

In the New York Times of September 29, 1915, it was stated that the State Department had decided to ask for the resignation of T. St. John Gaffney, United States consul general at Munich.

From the New York Times of August 30, 1916, it appears that Gaffney went back to Munich after spending some time in the United States and returned to the country in August 1916, when he gained a great deal of notoriety by attacking the United States Government's policies on shipboard. To the disgust of a number of passengers, he openly approved the Zeppelin raids and the sinking of the Lusitania.

A year later, according to the New York Tribune of February 19, 1918, Gaffney was dropped from membership in a Republican club in New York City, ostensibly for nonpayment of dues. A member of the war committee of the club, however, said that the club was satisfied that since April 1917 Gaffney had been traveling between Berlin and Stockholm as a German propagandist.

As was pointed out in the columns of the American Hebrew in the issue of June 16, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] stated:

> It is clear that Gaffney has been engaged by the Hitler government to defend its actions.

A perusal of his pamphlet will convince any fair-minded citizen that—because of misstatement, undisguised intolerance, and exaggeration—it is not worthy of any consideration.

Unfortunately, sinister propaganda such as Gaffney's cannot be so lightly dismissed. To say that "it is not worthy of any consideration" overlooks the influence it may have with some of the Senators and Congressmen to whom it was sent and who may not be in a position to refute its fallacies and distortions. It sounds plausible, on the face of it, to point out, as does Gaffney, that while the 564,379 Jews of Germany, according to the latest 1925 census, constitute less than 1 percent of the population, this small element dominates German commercial and artistic life in what is alleged to be a sort of parasitic control and contamination, and the falsity of the statement must be shown.

Gaffney asserts that what has occurred under the Nazi terrorism is merely a "political housecleaning not a religious or racial persecution." It is almost incredible that this henchman of the double cross should have the audacity to state in his screed that "Hitlerism as an anti-Semitic force is one of the fictions of our day." In answer to that, one merely needs to refer to the National Socialist official program, which specifically disenfranchises German Jews as non-Aryans. The factual record of the persecution of Jews in Nazi Germany was set forth in the "White Book", which has just been issued by the American Jewish Committee, and which is documented in a manner to convince any fair-minded American. Even those unfamiliar with the facts must be given pause by allegations of this unsavory spokesman of Hitlerism when he declares "the revolution in Bavaria was entirely Jew-made."

He does not point out that whereas there are 564,379 Jews in Germany today, there were, in 1910, 603,811 German Jews. He does not point out the remarkable fact that, of this number, 96,000 Jews served in the German Army. His contention that the Jews dominate Germany does not point out that the last Reichstag had only 1 Jewish member among 608 deputies, with 12 others of Jewish descent; that the last Prussian Diet had 2 Jews and 2 others of Semitic descent out of a total of 423 members.

In every paragraph of the Gaffney statement lurk misstatements and manipulations of fact. Fortunately, the German census of 1925, which is the latest, refutes most of the figures of Gaffney, and other authoritative sources are available, such as the Statistisches Jahrbuch for 1932. Indeed, the willful distortions of Hitler hirelings such as Gaffney can be dismissed by the well-informed with a single brief quotation. The core of his contention that the Nazi policy and enactments are "not a religious and racial persecution but a political shake-up" is refuted by an unimpeachable American source. The Foreign Policy Association, in a bulletin published as long ago as January 21, 1931, stated that—

> Hitler's anti-Semitism forms the connecting factor and fundamental basis of his whole program.

This unassailable fact is borne out by the Nazi official platform of 25 points that preceded Hitler's elevation to the chancellorship, and by the official decrees and measures against the Jews that have followed his coming to power. These are printed in the newly released White Book issued by the American Jewish Committee and are literal translations of the statutes now in force.

The American spirit is revolted by injustice and religious persecution whenever and wherever these occur. American leadership and enlightened groups of American clergy, physicians, attorneys, and other civic figures have manifested their detestation of the abhorrent acts of the present German regime. It is well, however, that they be informed of the growing insidious propaganda—so un-American in its nature—that is now infesting our shores. Based on a spurious so-called "Aryanism", which will not pass muster with any unbiased anthropologist, the present Teutonic cult will vainly seek to sway American opinion to sympathy with the benighted policy that now prevails in the German Reich. The hard-won liberties of mankind are imperiled by the medieval tyranny that has been enthroned in a Hitlerized Germany. It behooves American leadership to be on its guard against the poison of propaganda that is seeking to taint American public opinion.

PERSECUTION OF JEWISH PEOPLE BY HITLER AFFRONTS LIBERTY-LOVING PEOPLE EVERYWHERE

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, as Congressman at large from Ohio, I protest against Hitler's persecution of Jews in Germany. This is not a matter of concern to the Jewish people of Ohio only, nor is it a matter of concern only to the Jewish people of our country. This senseless and cruel persecution of Jews by the present Nazi regime in Germany concerns the entire world. It is an affront to liberty-loving people everywhere. I say no word of reproach to the German people as a people, but I desire to protest, with all the vigor I am able to command, this unwarranted, cruel, senseless, and stupid persecution and oppression of peaceable and law-abiding citizens of Germany. Persecution of Jewish people by Hitler and his Nazi followers tramples underfoot principles of racial, religious, and economic liberties for which our forefathers fought.

The American delegates to the World Economic Conference should absolutely refuse to enter into any arrangements or agreements with the present Government of Germany until and unless it makes a radical change in its treatment of its Jewish citizens.

If you say we should not interfere in the internal affairs of an independent and sovereign nation, I answer that there are millions of loyal and worthy Jews who are citizens of this country who have contributed and are contributing to our present supremacy as a nation. These people pay taxes and help maintain our Government by their resources. It is wrong for our Government to help the Hitler government financially, or in any manner, even remotely, under such circumstances. Our Government was founded by people in search for religious liberty. We should, in the Halls of Congress and elsewhere, fight those insidious forces that seek to substitute prejudices for liberty. Unreasoning prejudice is a most serious menace. The very first amendment to our Constitution, written on the demand of men who won the war for independence, asserts that the Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. We should still fight on for a principle so dear to all lovers of liberty. Any distinction among peoples because of religions is intolerable.

It seems unbelievable that in any nation termed civilized and enlightened such persecutions could be tolerated. An outraged world should hale Hitler before the bar of public opinion and to the oblivion he deserves. Present persecution of Jews in Germany is an indictment of civilization itself. In this twentieth century of civilization, so-called, we behold a dictator rampant and mad with power in Germany—that land of culture, art, science, music, and statesmanship. In that country, the home of Ludwig, Remarque, Prof. Albert Einstein, the well beloved, and so many others whose names are household words, Hitler, the autocrat and dictator, has astounded the world by his cowardly persecution of Jews.

Liberty-loving people should oppose intolerance in whatever form it raises its hideous head, and whether clothed in a white sheet or a brown shirt. In Spain and in Mexico, Catholics are mistreated. In Germany, Hitler seeks to make Jews third-rate citizens or to drive them out altogether. The Jewish people as citizens of Germany for a thousand years helped build the Empire, and have been helping to rehabilitate Germany since the peace of Versailles. Hitler, the Austrian, became a citizen of Germany but a year ago.

I am a friend of the German people. No racial group, no people anywhere in the world properly have a quarrel with the German people. Our protest is against Hitler and his regime which has betrayed and cowed into submission law-abiding men and women of Germany. If Jews of Germany are doomed, then Germany as a great nation is doomed.

It is a great moral wrong for our country, until this situation has been changed, to give any help to the Hitler government of Germany, directly or indirectly, in any manner. By doing so, our Government, through its taxing power upon all our people, including the Jewish peope, would be compelling the Jews of this country to help support and maintain the Hitler regime. In the event economic agreements are entered into by our delegates to the World Economic Conference, to have those agreements effective, the people of our country, through our Government, must give to them sanction and support. We must not even indirectly or remotely help carry on persecutions in Germany, which are of an economic nature, using religion as an excuse.

The followers of Hitler, under his leadership and with his sanction, have been systematically taking from the public libraries books of Jewish authors and burning them. This is stupid, disgraceful, and outrageous. The Hitlerites, in their arrogance, stupidity, and brutality, are boycoting and mistreating a racial group of 600,000 men, women, and children. Of this racial group, 12,000 of the flower of their young manhood laid down their lives for their fatherland in the World War. In addition to 12,000 Jews in the German Army who were killed in the World War, many thousands more were wounded in action fighting for the fatherland. Ninety-six thousand Jews served in the German Army during the World War, offering their lives as sacrifices for Germany.

The lessons of history are that in every nation where intolerance raged and where Jewish people were systematically persecuted, that country has fallen into decay. We speak of the glory that was Greece, and of the empire that was Spain.

America should not be silent in the face of the outrages and persecutions of Hitler. This inexcusable degradation of a patriotic and law-abiding group excites the indignation and horror of fair-minded people everywhere. It pushes the German nation down into the depths and darkness of the Middle Ages. It violates the feeling of brotherhood and justice that peoples of the world have patiently and painfully built up.

Throughout the world, wherever Jewish people have made their homes, they have been loyal to that country and devoted to its institutions. In America, as in Germany, they have contributed their full part to make our Nation great and glorious. The Revolutionary patriots went to Leviticus when they inscribed on the Liberty Bell, "Ye shall proclaim liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof."

In our own time, 300,000 young men of Jewish faith left their comfortable homes and loved ones in America in response to a grave national duty and joined the glorious crusade for the safety of the world, and in 1917 and 1918 took their proper and prominent part as members of the grandest Army ever gathered together under the bending sky of God. They were my comrades in arms.

As a Member of Congress, I add my protest against the acts of Hitler and his regime in persecuting enlightened, patriotic, and loyal Jewish citizens who ask nothing except to continue to serve devotedly, patriotically, and sincerely the country in which they live.

Whereas at the first session of the Sixty-eighth Congress it was resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), that the following article be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —

"1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

"2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article, except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by the Congress":

Therefore be it

Resolved (if the house of assembly concur), That the Legislature of the State of New Jersey does hereby ratify the above-recited proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the secretary of state be required to transmit forthwith a copy of these resolutions and preamble to the Secretary of State of the United States at Washington, to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Thomas A. Mathis, secretary of state of the State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that there has been filed in my office on June 14, 1933, Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 4 as passed by the Senate of New Jersey on June 5, 1933, and duly attested by the president of the senate and passed by the house of general assembly on June 12, 1933, and duly attested by the speaker of the house of general assembly, the same being a ratification of a "Concurrent resolution ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States empowering the Congress to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age."

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal at Trenton this 14th day of June A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] THOMAS A. MATHIS,
Secretary of State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a petition of several citizens of Shreveport and vicinity, in the State of Louisiana, praying for a senatorial investigation relative to alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the South Jersey Federation of Veterans, of Camden, N.J., endorsing House bill 5755, the national industrial recovery bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the American Museum of Natural History, of New York City, N.Y., protesting against the proposed abolition of the Alaska Game Commission and endorsing the present administration of the commission, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Middlesex County Board, Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, at Perth Amboy, N.J., opposing the cancelation or further reduction of war debts owed to the United States by foreign nations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have noted in the RECORD and appropriately referred a memorial to the Congress signed by Mr. James A. Davis and approximately 590 other members or friends of the Aurora Chapter of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, of Aurora, Colo. The memorial protests against drastic cuts in veterans' compensation, reduced hospitalization for deserving patients whose disabilities are traceable to military service, any change in the former presumptive provisions of law with respect to veterans, and any statutory declaration treating November 11, 1918, as the date of termination of the World War, since service men were under war-time regulations after that date.

The memorial of James A. Davis and sundry other members and friends of Aurora Chapter No. 3, the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, of Aurora, Colo., presented by Mr. COSTIGAN, remonstrating against drastic cuts in veterans' benefits, reduced hospitalization, etc., was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORT OF THE INDIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 326) referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 146) thereon.

FOURTH DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 6034, being the fourth deficiency appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and lays before the Senate the conference report, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 9, 11, and 12.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, and 10, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$1,460"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 2, 5, 6, 7, 13, and 14.

SAM G. BRATTON,

KENNETH MCKELLAR,
FREDERICK HALE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. P. BUCHANAN,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
W. B. OLIVER,
W. A. AYRES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BRATTON. I move that the Senate agree to the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am particularly interested in amendment numbered 9, providing an appropriation of $300,000 out of the money that is left over from the feed and seed loan appropriation of last spring for the use of the Secretary of Agriculture in loaning to counties to aid in the work of the control and eradication of grasshoppers.

Mr. President, we have a real emergency in North Dakota. I have a telegram from the Governor of the State saying that 30 counties are affected and must have Federal aid, because, as a result of the drought from which the farmers have suffered during the past 3 years, they have no money with which to buy poison and bran with which to exterminate the grasshoppers.

The farmers in that section have a good prospect for crops this year. They have borrowed out of the crop production loan appropriation a little over $2,000,000, and, of course, the farmers have given mortgages on their crops to the Government for the payment of those loans. Now, in some 28 or 30 counties, more than half of the State, the grasshoppers are so thick that the report is that they will clean up anywhere from 30 to 50 percent of the grain in those counties. If that should happen, and if they cannot get an appropriation or assistance from the Government to enable them to fight the pest, the security on these Government loans is not going to amount to much.

I secured a similar amendment for the same purpose in the farm credit bill which was passed on Saturday, but the item was cut out by the House conferees, as it has again been cut out by the House conferees in this deficiency bill.

I wish also to call attention to another amendment in this bill. I refer to the amendment which provides for an increase of $3,000,000 to be loaned through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to cities where there had been destruction by fire or other disaster. That amendment was left in the bill providing $3,000,000 of loans to cities to rebuild. I have no objection to that; they should have it and are entitled to it under present hard conditions; but when the farmers need a little money—$300,000 is all that we ask for, to fight the grasshopper pest to protect the crops on practically all of which the Government has a mortgage—it seems to me rather strange that the House conferees would allow the $3,000,000 item to go through and strike out the $300,000 item.

Mr. President, the statement was made by some of the Members of the House that the conferees on the part of the Senate did not make any particular effort to retain this amendment in the bill. I should like to ask the chairman of the conference committee, the Senator from New Mexico, what the situation was in regard to these amendments in the conference.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I shall be glad to do so. When this amendment was reached the conferees on the part of the House stated that this question came before the House two or three times last year; that the situation in the Northwest was more acute then than it is now; and that, despite that fact, the House voted affirmatively against an appropriation for this purpose. They took the position that they would not concur in this amendment, and, of course, they were fortified by those votes in the House. With that situation confronting us, and after discussing the matter, the Senate conferees receded. I will say to my friend from North Dakota that it was my confident belief that under the circumstances the House conferees would not yield on the amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am glad to have that explanation from the Senator from New Mexico. The statement about the situation being more acute last year than this year is not correct. Perhaps the grasshoppers covered a much larger territory last year, but the situation this year is more acute where the grasshoppers are infesting the country, because of conditions generally being worse than they were a year ago. After we were turned down last year in the matter of procuring an appropriation, the counties themselves in most cases raised money to fight the plague and succeeded fairly well, but in some 28 or 30 counties of North Dakota, and also in some counties in Montana, South Dakota, and western Minnesota, this year the complaint still exists. The counties have gone the limit. In the northwestern part of our State they have had no crop practically for 3 years.

Mr. BRATTON. The senior Senator from North Dakota has endeavored earnestly on repeated occasions to obtain loans for the purpose referred to. I want to commend him for the diligence with which he has endeavored to obtain relief for the farmers in his State. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota whether the House voted on this question two or three times last year?

Mr. FRAZIER. Last year in the regular agricultural appropriation bill there was a provision for an amount to be used for fighting grasshoppers. The conferees on the part of the House objected to it. It was sent back, as I recall, three times, and I think they finally voted on it in the House a year ago.

Mr. BRATTON. The conferees made reference to that vote. My memory is that they said they had voted on it twice, though I may be in error about that. At any rate they referred to the fact that a record vote was taken on it in the House, and in view of that fact they took the position that they could not accept the amendment.

Again I want to commend the Senator from North Dakota for the earnestness and diligence with which he has sought to obtain relief for the farmers in his State.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's kind words, but they will not do the farmers much good when their crops are being eaten up by grasshoppers. My earnest desire is to get some money to loan to those counties to enable them to fight the grasshoppers. The Governor has said it would mean the destruction of several hundred thousand acres of wheat and more than a million-dollar loss for the farmers this fall. The president of the Agricultural College of North Dakota states that at least 28 counties are infested from 15 to 50 percent. In practically all cases the counties are absolutely unable to furnish the money to buy the poison and other ingredients that are necessary to use in fighting this pest.

The Governor of North Dakota wired to the President, and the President referred the telegram to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture went through his records and found that there was no money available for this purpose. He wired back to the Governor of North Dakota that they might have some men out of the reforestation camps to spread the poison, but said there was no Federal money available for that purpose. The Secretary of Agriculture kindly agreed to take up the matter with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and see if some money could be obtained from that source, but up to date nothing has been accomplished.

It would seem, therefore, that this amendment is the only way to take care of the situation. The State president of the Farmers' Union organization of North Dakota is in the city. He also makes the statement that the grasshoppers are a real menace this year and will likely wipe out the crops in practically the whole northwest quarter of the State. It is absolutely necessary to have this money to fight the grasshoppers. Unless something is done along this line it means a cleaning-up of the farmers in pretty nearly half of North Dakota where they have had poor crops for 3 years in succession. It means they are going down and out. They are discouraged, and that is the sad part of it. They have been organizing the farmers' holiday movement during the past few months.

A wire yesterday from the president of that organization complains that through the barnyard loans that have been made during the past few months, the money from the clips of wool of the sheep that are security for the loans, all goes in payment of the mortgages, and farmers cannot have any of that money to buy groceries and other necessities of life. I took it up yesterday with the Department and they referred it to their attorney. The attorney wrote me this morning, saying that under the contract the wool must go for the payment of the loans, and they cannot do anything about it. He said it might be possible that they could get further loans.

Mr. President, the farmers are not in a mood to stand this situation much longer. It is a sad commentary on existing conditions when American farmers are ready to take their shotguns or rifles or any other available weapon on their shoulders and go out to fight for the protection of their homes and families. They believe they have been treated unfairly and unjustly and that the Government is responsible for conditions as they exist today.

A few days ago we passed the industrial recovery bill. In that bill provision was made for the fixing of prices of products which the industries of the Nation sell, the prices for manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers. Under the provisions of that bill a price can be set upon those products based upon cost of production plus a fair profit, with fixed penalties for violations. What was done here by the United States Congress, by the Senate itself, when the farm bill was up a few weeks ago? When the farm bill came before the Senate a cost-of-production provision for farm products was adopted. It went to the House and was stricken out there because it was said the President and the Secretary of Agriculture were opposed to it. That matter then came back for a vote on the floor of the Senate when the conference report was under consideration, and the action of the House was concurred in. Cost of production for farmers went out of the bill. But when the industrial bill comes up before the Senate authorizing the administration to make investigations and to fix prices and to sell manufactured products at a price based on cost of production and a fair profit, then the Senate and the House and the President all approve it.

It is very well to do something for industry, to give them cost of production, to give them what they want, to give the cities plenty of money to rebuild where they have suffered from calamities of various kinds. That is all right; but, Mr. President, the people who produce the wealth of the Nation, the food products and the food of the Nation, are not being given the same consideration that is given to the business interests of the Nation by the Congress. Our farmers are not getting a square deal at the hands of Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the Congress has been very liberal during the past 3 years in dealing with agriculture? The Senator will recall that one of the soundest men we have had in the Senate since I have been here was MAGNUS JOHNSON, former Senator from Minnesota. He was a hard-fisted farmer, a man who knew the soil, a man who knew the problems of agriculture. He begged the Senate to cease its gratuities and loans to the farmers. He said the curse of the country, particularly agriculture, was that too much money had been loaned. The Senator will recall that his own President, President Hoover——

Mr. FRAZIER. O Mr. President, I do not take the blame or the responsibility for anything President Hoover did. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] yesterday said the President in the White House now has the same views as the former President.

Mr. KING. I am not responsible for the utterances of the Senator from Virginia, although I say very frankly that his utterances in this body are such that almost any man could be proud of them.

President Hoover, after consulting with the leading representatives of the farmers, evolved with their aid and their support the so-called "farm bill." That was to aid agriculture. That was to aid cooperative organizations throughout the Nation, and cooperatives were formed, and loans were made to the farmers, the woolmen, the stockmen, the agriculturists of all kinds in all parts of the United States. Approximately $400,000,000 was to have been expended for and in behalf of agriculture. In addition to that, other laws have been enacted granting relief to farmers. Loans have been made to them. Recently we appropriated $100,000,000 to aid them in purchasing seed. Last year a large appropriation was made to aid the farmers in purchasing seed. Prior to that, for a number of years preceding, loans had been made, and loans have been made to the farmers so that their farms today, unfortunately, are mortgaged heavily. I think the Federal Government, by and large, has dealt very generously with the farmers of the Nation.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, of course the Government has been generous in some ways. There have been seed loans, to be sure, but it is an indictment of our whole system, that because we have had a crop failure for a year or two the farmer should be obliged to come and ask for Federal aid.

The Senator from Utah talks about the Farm Board and the Farm Marketing Act. It will be remembered that the Farm Board tried to stabilize the price of wheat. They succeeded for some time in keeping the price of wheat up around 75 cents a bushel when it was 20 to 30 cents lower in Liverpool than in the United States. They kept the price above the Liverpool market most of the time the Board was functioning. They tried to stabilize the price of wheat and a good deal of money was used, but all at once they backed up and stopped buying on the market to stabilize the prices.

Why? It was because a group of grain men from the great milling and grain centers of the country came to Washington and, with the aid of Julius Barnes, who was at that time president of the National Chamber of Commerce, lined up the National Chamber of Commerce against the Farm Marketing Act and the Farm Board. They went to the White House. Nobody ever found out, so far as I know, what happened at the White House, but the result of it was that the Farm Board were called off, and they had to back up on their efforts to stabilize the prices of wheat and cotton. Still the Farm Board and the Farm Marketing Act are given the blame of being a failure and for the expenditure of a lot of money. They did lose some money, but I am satisfied that if the Farm Board had been allowed to continue and had been given a free hand, they would have made a success of the Farm Marketing Act.

Mr. President, I should like to amend the Senator's motion to adopt the conference report by providing that the conference report be recommitted. It seems to me that it is absolutely foolish on the part of the United States Congress to turn down a small loan of $300,000 to help the farmers in their existing problems. The grasshoppers are destroying the crops and the security which the Government holds is thereby being eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion of the Senator?

Mr. FRAZIER. To substitute for the motion of the Senator from New Mexico a motion to recommit the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that under the rules where one House has approved a conference report, it cannot be recommitted.

Mr. FRAZIER. Then certainly the conference report ought to be rejected, and sent back in that way.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not move to reject the report because of the exclusion from the bill of a small appropriation which the Senate incorporated within it. I do desire, however, in behalf of the people of the District of Columbia, to express regret that the conferees receded from the amendment which was offered to the bill appropriating $2,500 for an investigation by the Public Utilities Commission of housing conditions and rentals in the District of Columbia.

Briefly let me state the purpose to which the appropriation was to be devoted.

Recently the District Committee of the Senate made an investigation of rental conditions in the District of Columbia. It was contended by many residents of the District that the housing conditions were unsatisfactory, that rentals were too high, that mortgage foreclosures were being made not by court decree but under the strict foreclosure system, and that no opportunity for redemption was given under the laws in the District of Columbia.

The committee made a rather thorough investigation and submitted a report, which included recommendations. Because of the fact that this session was called to deal with important national and international problems, the committee has had no opportunity to submit measures in harmony with the recommendations referred to or to offer other measures dealing with the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I think everybody in the District is greatly interested in the investigation which is being made; but, so far as I have been able to observe, there was never anything brought before us in the shape of a bill to remedy the situation. It did not do much good to be reminded every morning in the columns of the papers that we were all paying twice as much rent as we thought we ought to pay when no remedy was suggested. What has the committee done in the way of bringing relief to this situation?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, after the report of the committee to which I have referred, a subcommittee was appointed to study the recommendations made and formulate such measures to carry into execution, so far as possible, the recommendations of the subcommittee as it might deem proper and necessary. I may say that I think the stress of business during this session, and the fact that it was called, as I stated a moment ago, to consider measures of an extraordinary character submitted by the President, has prevented action by the subcommittee; I acquit them of any dereliction of duty in failing to submit measures for the consideration of Congress. It is quite likely that when we meet in January measures will be submitted. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] a few days ago submitted a resolution to aid in the execution of some of the recommendations of the committee, and as a companion measure I offered a bill appropriating $2,500 to aid the Public Utilities Commission in continuing the investigation as to rents, in order that when we meet in January additional data will be available to the District Committee to aid it in preparing bills for the consideration of Congress.

The appropriation of $2,500 was to enable the Public Utilities Commission to employ an individual to receive complaints, to examine into housing and rent conditions during the summer, and to keep current the data which may be helpful to the District Committee. The Senate passed the resolution carrying an appropriation of $2,500 for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. That was incorporated in this bill?

Mr. KING. It was carried in the bill, but was stricken out in conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I should like to ask the Senator another question. Either as chairman of the committee or as a member of it, has he or any subcommittee or subcommittees of the District of Columbia Committee gone into the legal phases of the question to ascertain what, if any, authority Congress has to pass legislation that shall arbitrarily reduce rents in the District of Columbia?

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think he uses rather too strong a term when he says "arbitrarily." I suppose he means "legally." The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has given a great deal of attention to this subject, and he takes the position that Congress has plenary power to deal with the question of rents in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORRIS. During the war, as I remember, we passed some legislation on this subject applying to the District of Columbia. As I remember, the courts held that that was constitutional, although it was fought on that ground in the courts. Am I correct?

Mr. KING. It is my recollection that the case did not reach the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it went to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. KING. My memory may be at fault in that regard.

Mr. NORRIS. And I believe they held that we had the authority. If that is true, I do not see why the committee should delay so long, or why any investigation really would be necessary to pass the proper legislation that would give relief.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will yield, I will ask my friend from New York to answer that question, because he followed that phase of it before the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this matter has been of great interest to me for years. We had problems like this in New York when I was commissioner of health, and we ventured there to pass certain rent laws which went to the Supreme Court and were sustained.

I have no doubt at all that in the District of Columbia, under the Constitution, Congress has the same power that it has over forts and lighthouses, and, of course, over territory. When I first came into the Congress about 10 years ago we had a joint commission of the two Houses to study the rent question in the District, and at that time it was the view of eminent lawyers like Judge Hammer, of North Carolina, and other members of the committee that we had the power to regulate rents in the District.

I was very much disappointed, as a member of this latest committee, that the legal talent representing the Public Utilities Commission and the people's counsel both took the position that we could not do this. I dispute with all the strength I have that we are so helpless in the District of Columbia that we cannot go very far in the matter of regulating rents. It is conceivable that the rents in the District might be made so high that actually Government would break down, because the employees could not afford to live here; and, to my mind, it is unthinkable that the Congress is helpless in the face of an intolerable situation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If we can pass a law here which authorizes the National Government to go into my State and take charge of a private concern doing an intrastate business and conduct it, is there any possible doubt that we can take charge of the District of Columbia, and do anything which the wisdom or unwisdom of Congress suggests?

Why talk about the Constitution at this time after what we have assumed to do at this session? True, the Supreme Court may bring us back to the fundamental principles upon which this Government was founded and under which we have grown to our present greatness. Let us hope so.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree with the Senator. We have a precedent for almost anything along that line.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt again?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the Constitution, Congress was given jurisdiction over a district that was afterward selected, and now constitutes the District of Columbia, and that was designated as the seat of the National Government. If we had an unfriendly Government in the District, and Congress had no power to interfere with it, it would be possible for them absolutely to nullify the acts of Congress, not in relation to the District but in any other respect. That would make it impossible for Congress, if they wanted to go to the limit, to transact the business of the Nation; and I always conceived that the reason why the power to control this District was put in Congress was as a matter of national protection. I do not believe that the law that applies ordinarily in a State constitution to a city has any application to the condition as between the National Government and the District. I think that was really decided by the Supreme Court.

The point I am trying to raise is, Why go over it all again? If the committee thinks it is necessary and the Congress thinks it is necessary to pass a law to protect not only Congress but all of the officials of the National Government, who must be here and cannot help themselves, and if we have that authority, why is it necessary to spend a lot of money and 2 or 3 years' time to investigate?

I take it that the law, if we should pass one, would be one that was supposed to be just by Congress in passing it. It would not do an injustice to anybody. I cannot understand why it is necessary for the committee to take 2 or 3 years' time to bring in a bill that will do justice both to those who own the property and to the people who have to live in the property.

Mr. KING. May I say to my friend from Nebraska—I will yield to the Senator from New York in a moment—that the appropriation which we sought was not so much for further investigation as it was to keep current information concerning rental and housing conditions in the District and to establish a sort of a liaison officer between the landlord and the tenant. As evidence of the wisdom of such a course, permit me to refer to conditions affecting the chairman of the committee. Scarcely a day passes that I do not receive complaints from tenants in regard to controversies with landlords or appeals for and in securing rent reductions. Obviously, it is not within my power to afford relief. I cannot visit every landlord, although I will say that I have communicated with several for the purpose of securing relief for tenants. The committee believed that if the Public Utilities Commission were given authority to receive complaints, to keep current the questions that are cognate to this matter, to have some person possessing tact and diplomacy and common sense, much good would be accomplished, and many landlords and tenants would be brought into accord.

One other observation: The Senator stated that he believed that the object of establishing the District of Columbia was so that the Government would have some place where it would be supreme. Pertinent to that remark, I may say that when I was in Germany a few years ago when the Ebert Constitution was in force I was talking with officials of the Government, and one of the associates of the President said that our Government occupied a more favorable position than did the Government of Germany in this, that the seat of government in the United States was under the control of the Federal Government, whereas the seat of the German National Government was in Berlin, which was not controlled by the National Government; that the Federal Government of Germany depended upon the police of Berlin for general protection.

Our fathers were wise in selecting a place for the National Capital over which Congress should have exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not see how anyone who knows the history of the designation of a district as the seat of government could fail to believe that the Congress has exclusive jurisdiction and exclusive power within this District. It will be recalled that the Congress was meeting in Philadelphia after the Revolutionary War, following the armistice, waiting for the treaty to be signed in November, and that the soldiers became greatly discontented because they were not paid. Senators will remember the difficulty Washington had at Newburgh. A company of soldiers actually marched into the seat of government in Philadelphia and told Congress in so many words exactly what they thought of them. There have been groups in modern times desirous of doing the same thing. When Congress attempted to get protection it appealed first to the mayor of Philadelphia and could get no relief, then appealed to the Governor of Pennsylvania and could get no relief; so Congress went over to Trenton, N.J., to continue its deliberations where they might get protection. I say this without any intention at all to offend my friends from the State of Pennsylvania.

Many of the men who were in that Congress were afterward members of the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and I can quite understand how they said, "We will have one place where the Congress shall have exclusive power." So they gave exclusive jurisdiction over the proposed seat of government to the Federal Government, as is provided in the Constitution.

Personally I have no doubt, not so much as a result of my own research, which would be of small consequence, but upon the testimony of eminent lawyers, that there is this power. I have no question at all but that the Congress can exercise this power, within reasonable limits, within the confines of the District of Columbia and give protection to the people here.

We sat in the hearings this time for a long period, and, as I said before, I had served on a previous committee 10 years ago investigating the same subject. There is no doubt at all but that the rents in many of the apartment houses in this District are excessive, and it is a burdensome thing to the employees of the District. When we have chosen, because of the need of economy, to reduce the wages of these employees, we ought to see to it that there is protection for them and that they have decent rentals.

I was disappointed when I read the conference report and found that this particular item had been omitted, but I have no doubt that our conferees did the best they could to retain it.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the amendment was in order because the Senate had passed an authorizing measure during this session. The Senator is familiar with the fact that the House conferees take the position, however, that they will not accept an amendment unless the House has acted on the authorizing legislation. In harmony with that attitude, they took the position this time that they could not accept the amendment; and while I recognize the force of everything the Senator from New York and the Senator from Utah have said, we were confronted with that situation.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume, too, that was the reason why the appropriation for the Pan American Medical Congress failed; it was for the same reason?

Mr. BRATTON. Yes.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not want to talk about the fight on the grasshoppers, but since we have appropriated money for nearly everything else anybody has asked us to appropriate for, I see no reason why we should not help the Senator from North Dakota to fight grasshoppers. Nor do I desire to discuss particularly the question of regulating rents. As we have undertaken to regulate everything else, we might try that. Why should we consider the Constitution any longer? We used to say that it did not amount to anything among friends. I do not think it amounts to anything among enemies now, so far as the Congress is concerned, or appears to be concerned.

I desire to say a few words about the reorganization order of the President of June 10.

When I first entered upon my duties in this body I was impressed with the need for reorganization of the activities in the executive branch of the Federal Government in the interest of economy in public expenditures, in the interest of increased efficiency in the discharge of the public duties entrusted by law to those in charge of such activities, in the interest of greater dispatch in the conduct of the public business, and in the interest of elimination of duplication in personnel, office equipment, rent, and other such expenses. After checking my ideas against those of others in whom I had confidence I introduced in the Seventy-first Congress a number of bills to effect some of the needed reorganizations and I offered a number of amendments for the same purpose to the legislative economy bill which became the act of June 30, 1932.

These bills encountered opposition on the part of the services to be reorganized and I did not press them for the reason that in the legislative economy bill which became the act of June 10, 1932, there was conferred on President Hoover requested authority to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government, but this authority to him was coupled with the limitation that his reorganization could be set aside by a resolution of either House of Congress. President Hoover sent to the Congress certain Executive orders effecting certain reorganizations, but they did not go into effect because of a resolution passed by the other House.

There have been bills in the Congress from time to time since the first administration of Grover Cleveland to reorganize certain branches of the executive service, but these bills have encountered the determined opposition of the Federal employees affected thereby and many interests outside of the Government have rallied to the support of their projects in the Federal service. We know that the force of such combined opposition has been and is such that little headway can be made in the Congress in the reorganization of the Government services. All of these factors aided in the passage of the resolution setting aside the reorganization orders of President Hoover after the Congress had conferred on him the authority to make the reorganization, though it must be admitted that for the most part his orders were for shifting of bureaus, with little, if any, attention to reorganization of the work of the Government along unifunctional lines.

Knowing as we did the forces hostile to any reorganization, we conferred on President Roosevelt similar authority to that conferred on President Hoover, but without the limitation that such authority could be rendered nugatory by a resolution of either House of the Congress. We provided in the Treasury-Post Office bill for the fiscal year 1932, the act of March 3, 1933, Public, No. 428, that such reorganization could not be set aside except as the result of an act of the Congress, which means that if the President is steadfast in his purpose, a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress is required to set aside such reorganization as he may make under the authority conferred on him. That is, any bill which we may pass to modify or render nugatory his reorganization orders will doubtless meet with his veto, and to overcome the veto there will be needed a two-thirds vote of each House.

Having granted this authority to the President after repeated demonstrations that the forces inside and outside of the Congress were sufficiently potent to prevent any reorganization under legislative authority, why should Members of the Senate complain when the President exercises that authority? We gave him that authority in the confident expectation that he would exercise it. We may complain that he has waited until a few hours before adjournment to send his reorganization orders here, and without criticizing the President for such delay it is my judgment that any feeling about this phase of the matter should not influence this body in the consideration of the merits of these orders. We know that since March 4 the President and his advisers have been exceedingly busy with attempts to bring back some measure of economic recovery to the country and this has been a stupendous task. He has stated in his message that his delay in sending here his reorganization orders for the few services now included therein has been due to the press of other duties and I, for one, am willing to concede that the record amply supports him in his explanation of the delay.

Also, I am willing to concede that there may be honest differences of opinion as to the merits of some of the proposed consolidations and eliminations made in this particular reorganization order. This entire subject is a controversial one and, as I have stated, it was solely because of such controversies that the Congress has been unable during many years to effect reorganization by statutes for that purpose. Perhaps I would not make all of the changes which the President proposes to make in this order. Other Senators might approve what I would disapprove and disapprove what I would approve. However, I do not hesitate to state that in my opinion the President has done an excellent job thus far under the authority which we have given him in the law and that the consolidations and eliminations which he has made in this order should make for genuine and substantial economy and efficiency in the expenditure of public funds.

Let me illustrate. The President proposes in this order to consolidate all of the disbursements of public funds under the Treasury Department. Will anyone say that such a proposal is not in the interest of economy and efficiency? We now have upward of 2,000 disbursing officers in the continental United States. We have in New York City, in Philadelphia, in San Francisco, in New Orleans, and in fact in practically every city of any consequence in this country as many disbursing officers as we have activities in such cities. We have more than 100 disbursing officers in the city of New York alone. The Post Office Department has several there; the Army has several; the Navy has several; and so on down the line for the Departments of Labor, Justice, Agriculture, and so forth. Not only that, but as we know the departments and independent establishments of the Government are generally divided into bureaus and divisions, and many of these suborganizations of the departments and establishments have their own disbursing officers. When I say "disbursing officers" I mean a man or woman who actually signs the checks, with frequently a number of assistants, clerks, stenographers, offices, rent for quarters, and all of the incidental expenses connected with such offices.

A few months ago the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a list of the numerous agencies of the various departments and establishments of the United States located in some of the foreign capitals. He did not list all of them. It is a significant fact that each one of those separate activities in foreign capitals has its own disbursing officer, though he may and frequently does perform other duties. However, this does not overcome the duplication in expense for handling separate accounts on the books of the Treasury Department, in the General Accounting Office, and in the departments.

Mr. President, we actually have more clerks in the various departments and establishments of the Government engaged in so-called "administrative examination" of these accounts before they are transmitted to the General Accounting Office for audit and settlement in accordance with law than we had in the entire Government for the first 60 years of its existence! As a matter of fact, there was a period of nearly 50 years in our history—from 1817 to 1865—when we had no such administrative examinations of accounts. I am not going into the merits of an administrative examination of the accounts, except to invite attention to a statement made by Amos Kendall in 1835, when he was Postmaster General, which was recently quoted by former Senator and now Circuit Judge Kenyon, of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, in one of his opinions in the Lambert Lumber Co. case to the effect that the checking of accounts by subordinates of the head of a department making the expenditures was worthless for the purpose of preventing illegal and unwise expenditures.

Aside from this tremendous duplication of expense which will be saved under the reorganization order by the substitution of one or two disbursing officers with their assistants, where we now have dozens in the larger cities, a much greater object will be gained. It will no longer be possible for a spending agency of the Government to incur obligations not in accordance with law and the terms of the appropriations and then force its subordinate to draw money from the Treasury to pay such obligation on pain of dismissal from the service or denial of earned promotion. We should not now be confronted with bills for the relief of disbursing officers when they have made illegal or erroneous disbursements of Federal funds. The Comptroller General has recommended such a reform each year for about 10 years, and he has pointed out in his annual reports to the Congress that practically every year he had collected erroneous payments made by disbursing officers substantially equal to the expenses of his office and that there were many other such expenditures which he could not collect because the people who received them were dead, out of business, had become bankrupt, and for other similar reasons.

It is to be expected that the Treasury Department disbursing officers will make no such payments. The contracting agencies of the Government will have to show them before the payment is made that the obligation was legally incurred, and some purpose will now be served by the laborious activities of the Congress in placing restrictions and directions in the law for the expenditure of public money. In my judgment this represents a real constructive reorganization along needed unifunctional lines. Incidentally, I may say that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] introduced at the last session of the Congress a bill to make such a reorganization of the disbursing services of the Government; that hearings were held on the bill by the Appropriations Committee of the Senate; that the principle thereof was endorsed by the then Republican Secretary of the Treasury, by the Director of the Budget, by the present Comptroller General, and by the present Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. It has now been endorsed by the Democratic administration, and is in no sense a partisan matter.

Again, the President proposes in the order to consolidate the now scattered agencies engaged in the defense of suits against the United States and in the prosecution of suits on behalf of the United States. Possibly many Members of this body, as well as numerous people outside, may be under the belief that all along such activity was in the Department of Justice by virtue of the terms of the 1870 act establishing that Department.

I confess that I thought so, too, until I had studied the matter rather carefully and found that as the result of subsequent statutes this was not true in all cases. For instance, in the matter of tax claims for and against the Government we have attorneys in the office of the General Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue engaged in the trial of cases for and against the Government in the district courts of the United States and before the Board of Tax Appeals; we have the Bureau for Defense of Suits against the United States in the Department of Justice engaged in the defense of such suits in the Court of Claims; and we have another bureau in the Department of Justice, formerly under Mrs. Willebrandt and more lately under Mr. Youngquist, engaged in defending before the various circuit courts of appeal and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia the appeals from the Board of Tax Appeals, and, of course, we have the Solicitor General conducting such cases in the Supreme Court of the United States. In addition, we have the attorneys of the Bureau of Internal Revenue defending mandamus and injunction proceedings in the courts of the District of Columbia against the officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Is there any wonder that there are many conflicting decisions in the courts in internal-revenue cases and that the overhead expenses for attorneys are tremendous in the collection of the revenue? There ought to be but one directing head as to all such litigation, in the interest of uniformity in the presentation of issues to the courts, in the interest of efficiency in the presentation of such issues, and in the interest of economy in expenditures for salaries and expenses of attorneys. As a matter of fact, there should be reforms in the judicial procedure for the presentation of such cases.

What is true of internal-revenue cases is in a large measure true of the vast volume of litigation with the veterans concerning their war-risk-insurance policies, which is now divided between the Veterans' Administration and the Department of Justice, and in numerous other fields which I need not stop to mention. Furthermore, a mistake was made in 1870 in the creation of the Department of Justice by the transfer to that Department of the solicitors of the various departments. This mistake has been corrected from time to time as to all of the solicitors except the Solicitors of the Treasury, Commerce, and Labor. This order corrects it as to these three remaining solicitors, nominally under the Department of Justice but actually appointed on the recommendation of the heads of the departments concerned and performing work for such departments. The court work of the Solicitor of the Treasury, the only one of the three who has any such work, has been retained in the Department of Justice, where it properly belongs.

Then, too, this order places under the Department of Justice the insular courts for the Virgin Islands and for the Panama Canal Zone, as well as the district court for China. There is no more reason why the Virgin Island court should be under the Department of the Interior, the Panama Canal Zone court under the War Department, and the district court for China under the State Department, than there is that the district courts of the United States should be under those departments. Why should not these courts be under the Department of Justice for administrative purposes along with the district, circuit, and other Federal courts of the United States and the district courts for Puerto Rico, Alaska, Hawaii? Probably the President overlooked the United States court for Guam, which should have been included.

There probably can be no objection of any merit on the part of anyone to placing these courts under the Department of Justice for administrative purposes along with the other courts which have been there since their establishment, or since the establishment of the Department of Justice, nor to the retransfer to the departments concerned of the three solicitors who have continued to remain administratively a part of the Department of Justice while actually a part of the departmental machinery to which attached. There should be no sound objections to the consolidation in the Department of Justice of the litigation work now performed by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Veterans' Administration, and other administrative agencies of the Government, though here again I think the President should have consolidated with the internal-revenue litigation the customs litigation, which is now under a separate assistant attorney general with offices in New York City. However, that is a detail that can be added later if there be no sound objection to it.

Another major consolidation of great importance made in the order is the consolidation of purchasing agencies of the several departments of the Government under a procurement division in the Treasury Department. We have tried this for a number of years on a limited scale with the general supply committee of that Department, which has purchased office supplies, and so forth, common to two or more departments for the entire Government service here in Washington and for such of the field services of the various departments as voluntarily availed themselves of such facilities. This general supply committee system has worked well, but unfortunately it has not worked uniformly. The Treasury Department, notwithstanding it had the general supply committee, built up over a course of years its own supply division. The Departments of Agriculture, Interior, and some of the other departments, including the Department of Commerce, did the same thing, with the result that in many cases these supply divisions of the various departments making purchases on behalf of their particular department exceeded in size and expense for personnel the general supply committee itself. A number of these supply divisions of the respective departments are now located in the new Federal warehouse alongside of the general supply committee.

The reorganization order not only proposes to consolidate these purchasing activities but to enlarge them by compulsorily including the field services of the various departments and independent establishments. Not only will this eliminate the tremendous duplication of overhead for personnel but it will tend toward uniformity where uniformity is possible and will prevent various purchasing officers of various departments competing in the market with each other. We had to have a similar consolidation during the World War for the War and Navy Departments under the War Industries Board, and it was found highly desirable, but as soon as the pressure of the war disappeared these departments reverted to their prior procedure. As a matter of fact, a number of the departments have built up and maintained separate contracting and purchasing agencies for their separate bureaus.

Shall we continue with the existing system or lack of system? Shall one department of the Government continue to reject the low bid for the delivery of automobiles, for instance, because the spare tire is mounted on the back of the car instead of being mounted on the fender, while another rejects the low bid because the spare tire is mounted on the fender instead of being mounted at the rear? This has actually happened. Shall we have one department refusing to accept the low bid for the delivery of the same kind of refrigerators as are in use in the White House because they are not good enough for that particular service? Shall specifications continue to be drafted so restrictive of competition that only one manufacturer of shingles can meet them and thus secure all of the business of that particular service, to the loud complaint of, and discrimination against, other manufacturers of shingles?

All these things and many others have happened under the existing lack of coordination and consolidation in the purchasing on behalf of the Government. The President will make it possible to build up a purchasing system for the entire Federal Government comparable to the purchasing systems in use by such well-managed industries as the Ford Motor Co., American Tobacco Co., and so forth. Instead of being condemned for doing those things, he ought to be highly commended, and I do commend him.

These three major consolidations, unification of the disbursing system under the Treasury Department, unification of the purchasing system under the same department where it was in the days of Alexander Hamilton as the result of experience during the War for Independence, and the unification of the litigation in the courts under the Department of Justice, as concerns the now outstanding exceptions of internal-revenue cases and Veterans' Administration cases, represent real accomplishments along unifunctional lines. These are no mere shiftings of bureaus within departments; they follow the procedure of any well-managed industry of placing like duties under one head even though they may serve a number of different divisions of that industry. Too long have the different departments and establishments of the Government refused to cooperate with each other and have conducted themselves in some instances as if they belonged to different governments instead of different divisions of the same executive branch of the same government, and all charged with the performance of their duties as efficiently as possible with the least expense to the taxpayers of this country. These departments will begin to realize this fact under these three major consolidations.

The other consolidations and eliminations are of minor character. In my judgment, all of them are desirable and necessary in the interest of economy and efficiency. I hope that the President will add to the activities of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, transferred to the Interior Department, certain other vocational activities of the Federal Government, such as the Bureau of Home Economics of the Department of Agriculture, the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor, and similar educational work. He has time to do this, and these matters will doubtless be given consideration before we return in January. The United States Shipping Board should have been abolished years ago and its duties transferred to the Department of Commerce. This board, with its Merchant Fleet Corporation, has been the cause of great losses of public funds.

I am exceedingly well pleased with what the President has done in this reorganization order. True, it is only a beginning, but it is a real beginning.

I might say, however, Mr. President, that I am in entire accord with the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] relating to vocational education and similar matters. I think it would probably be unwise to make the very great cut proposed in those appropriations before giving the matter further consideration, as some of the States have already made their plans and those plans would be very seriously interfered with if there should be such a great cut at this time. I think it might well be deferred until Congress shall meet next January, when we can give to the matter further consideration.

I am usually for cutting expenses, but it seems that every time we cut expenses in one place we increase them somewhere else, with the result that when Congress adjourns each time we have larger appropriations than we had at the beginning of the session. I think that has been true for a number of years, and we will have to find some way to remedy that situation. We cannot retain various departments, bureaus, and establishments without making the necessary appropriations to carry them on. Some day I hope a Congress or some President or someone having authority will awaken to the idea that the only way to bring about economy is to start—and that we cannot do it by moving one activity over to another place or just shifting things around.

It seems to me that in the condition in which the Government is at the present time we ought to do something that will bring some real relief. I think if we would abolish the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Labor, and a number of other establishments, departments, and bureaus—absolutely abolish them—and say they are at an end, at this time, because we do not have the money with which to pay for carrying on their business—if we could do that, I believe the people of the United States of America would lift their heads and say that at last they had a competent administration and that it was going to do something. I said last winter that the departments of the Government and governmental establishments and bureaus were Frankensteins; that they could not be killed off; and so far there has been very little done along that line. I think the reorganization order of the President is a step in the right direction, and yet it is rather a short step.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Recalling the last statement of the Senator, in view of the promise which the Democratic Party has made that there would be effective reorganization and drastic economies, does he think that a proposal which contemplates a saving of only $25,000,000 meets the platform pledges and promises of the Democratic Party?

Mr. LOGAN. I said it was a step in the right direction but a very short step. I said more than a year ago—in fact, a year ago last February, I believe—that the expenses of government could be reduced 25 percent, and that the saving as a result thereof would amount to a billion dollars. It can be done, but it cannot be done by reducing expenditures $25,000,000 and increasing them $100,000,000 in some other direction. It seems to me we are making so many appropriations now that all of our talk about balancing the Budget and offering it as an excuse for many of the things we have done is without any real substance. We are not balancing the Budget. We appropriate money every day that we stay here. We are appropriating money without any hope of raising the necessary revenue to repay. We have no money. The resources of the Government are dried up, the revenues of the Government are drying up, and still we go on in a wild orgy of making appropriations day after day, hoping probably that something will happen and that business will be restored. We cannot restore business that way. We cannot bring back any degree or any very great degree of prosperity by attempting to pay for it with money that we appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States. It simply cannot be done.

All of our great public-building program will probably result in our building many things and spending billions of dollars for things for which we have no need at all, and as soon as it is over we will be right back where we were. We are teaching the people to lean on the Government. We are going to help them in every way. We are going to give them money out of the Treasury. They have leaned so long that they have forgotten how to stand on their own legs. I wish we could do something that would make the people understand that there cannot be happiness or prosperity until men learn to stand on their own feet and fight their own battles.

We are changing our form of government from what it was in the days of the fathers to something that we know not what it is. We are trying to do something which has never been done in any nation in the world. I believe it was old Job who propounded the question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" No one seems to know; but there is one thing we do know, and that is that when a nation dies it never lives again as the same nation.

We have reached the point where the situation seems to be rather desperate, and now we are attempting to move off of the old foundation and leave the Constitution entirely out of consideration, to forget all about State lines, to forget all about individual effort and the rights of individuals, and to have a great supergovernment located in Washington.

We are going to take over rents here in the District of Columbia and regulate them. It is said we have a right to do it, because the Federal Government has exclusive control over the District of Columbia. If the Federal Government had exclusive control over the District of Columbia, it should have said to men, "You cannot acquire property here unless there are certain provisions in the contract which will allow us to regulate the rent." But they have been allowed to acquire property without reservation, and how are we going to regulate their income, because when we take their income we take their property.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say. I do not know where we are going. I do not know where the end will be. There is danger ahead, and danger signals are all along the way. It is very easy to sit here in Washington and say everything is all right because people tell us everything is all right. There is very little improvement in conditions. Whether that improvement will continue or whether we will sink deeper into the gloom no man can say at this time. We are hoping that something may be accomplished which will make the people lift their heads and look their fellow men in the face and go out and fight again. The individual citizen has quit fighting.

I think all honor should be accorded the President of the United States for the fight he is making, but he can accomplish nothing unless something can be done that will make men fight as they fought in the old days—fight for the property they build, fight for liberty and the right to happiness, to stand up and fight for it, and not go running to a government somewhere, the Federal Government or the State legislature, and say, "I am helpless, I am in need, I am in want, and you must give me something." It would be better to let them perish than that they should continue a policy of that kind.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

SUGAR TARIFFS AND BOUNTIES

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, for years Mr. H. E. Miles, the capable and widely respected chairman of the Fair Tariff League, has urged intelligence and integrity in tariff making. He has never failed to recognize that effective tariffs are essentially equivalent to cash bounties. From time to time in published articles he has stressed certain advantages to producers and the public of cash bounties over tariff bounties. At this hour, when our farm relief bill contains provisions for cash bounties on basic agricultural commodities, it is particularly appropriate to make available, and I therefore ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, a recent article by Mr. Miles in which he discusses conclusions he has reached on American tariffs and bounties on sugar.

The article is as follows:

OUR "11-TO-1" SUGAR TARIFF—CONSUMERS ARE TAXED $291,000,000 TO GET $27,815,000 OF TARIFF PROTECTION TO HOME GROWERS—$11 OF TAX TO $1 OF PROTECTION—EVERY ONE HURT EXCEPT THE ISLANDS UNDER OUR SOVEREIGNTY THAT ARE DOUBLY BENEFITED—A 4-TO-1 TARIFF AND BONUS WOULD INCREASE GROWERS' PRICES 60 PERCENT; SAVE CONSUMERS $100,000,000; CHECK EXCESSIVE FREE IMPORTS; AND SAVE CUBA AS PRESENT CONDITIONS REQUIRE

By H. E. Miles, chairman Fair Tariff League

A highly dependable statistical agency has recently prophesied that the Tariff Commission will recommend a reduction of one half cent per pound on Cuban raw; that is, to a tariff against Cuba of 1½ cents.

This would be simple justice to Cuba and to consumers, who would save some $73,000,000. However, it would not, probably, in the least affect the heart of the problem, the approaching destruction of our home growers through the increasing imports from the islands. It would only moderate the islands' profits.

Quotas for the Philippines and Cuba will not help, because they would give a "scarcity" monopoly to home growers and their refiners on one fifth of our consumption for which western refiners would charge the highest prices they dared. With this domestic monopoly the refiners of imported sugar (now under investigation by the Department of Justice for price fixing) would naturally conspire, with a huge increase in the price of imported sugar.

Only governmental control and fixing of prices could prevent, and this is not contemplated, unless, perchance, through the new powers of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Meantime Cuba is ruined, beggared, and in revolution, with armed guards in every passenger car. Our home growers are almost as badly off. The islands are prospering out of proportion.

Some of our growers' best friends are in fear of free sugar, because the growers offer no solution, as 22 of their friends in the Senate did in 1930 when they tried to get a combination of a duty plus a bonus to continental growers.

Is it not unfair that the present tariff requires our consumers to give the islands twice the protection they need? An unwarranted grant to the islands is a blow to home producers. It is encouraging a strong man to destroy a weak one. No one cares what this duty is if it is just to all concerned. I only emphasize that the lower it is, if just, the better for everyone in the States, and every penny of the bounty goes into a farmer's pocket.

For example, with a 1-cent tariff American growers would get one half of it, or, on the basis of 1931–32 production	$13,907,000
In addition a bonus of 1½ cents per pound, sugar content	31,723,000
Total bonus plus tariff	45,630,000
Present gain to growers from the tariff	27,815,500

Can you imagine better fortune? It would increase the price of beets 60 percent. It would please consumers by a saving of $100,000,000. It would check the Philippines decidedly, while leaving them prosperous. It would save Cuba and increase her import duties to about twice what would be required to pay the bounties. Who could complain? Contrast this with the present situation as disclosed in the following tables.

With the price of raw sugar in New York Harbor subject to duty, June 15, 1932, 1.335 cents, or 47 percent above the 1932 average, it might be difficult to justify a 1½-cent bonus to some people, because this 47-percent increase applies to beets and is a big total. If the bonus were only 1¼ cents, it would give growers $40,000,000, or only $5,300,000 less than a 1½-cent bonus, and their income, including the increased international price, would be greater than the $45,630,000 above estimated.

Note that an increase of one-fourth cent per pound, $7,946,000, in a direct bonus to home producers would cost consumers only $6,300,000, while the same increase through a customs tariff would cost consumers $63,000,000, because it would apply to all imports.

Change the figures, if you will, and you won't materially change the results. The above figures will give domestic growers decidedly more than the present tariff plus their possible gain under the new law that enables the Secretary of Agriculture to lift 1932 prices to 1926. On the other hand, to lift them in this way under the present tariff—i. e., from 92 cents raw in New York in 1932 to $2.59 in 1926—would cost consumers some $241,000,000, and four fifths or more of the new levy would be sent overseas. Of this $241,000,000 home growers would get only $22,000,000.

Adding this new tax to the present tariff would make consumers pay sugar taxes of approximately $532,000,000 to get $47,000,000 to continental growers. How long would they stand for this?

The bonus would not increase consumers' prices, as Alexander Hamilton insistently proclaimed in preferring bonuses to protective duties. The bonus method costs exceedingly little compared to the tariff method, especially on sugar.

Surely Congress will no longer fear the word "bonus" now that it is indirectly about to give billions as a bonus to farmers (without using the word, however) and is about to do the same for manufacturers and wage earners.

The present sugar tariff—Profit and loss to States and Nation

(Basis: Average price, 1932, Cuban raw, 92 cents per 100 pounds in New York subject to duty, and 80 cents in Cuba)

Value of United States crop, international basis:
Beets	$22,719,000
Cane	2,871,000
Total, beets and cane	25,590,000
Tariff bonus to United States:
Beet growers [1]	24,695,000
Cane growers	3,120,500
Total to United States growers	27,815,500
Tariff bonus to island possessions, for private use	116,000,000

Bonus to islands is four times greater than to home growers and increasing twelve to fifteen millions annually, with slight increase to home growers.

Tariff revenue to Government, for public use, $73,176,000.

Tariff revenue to Government decreasing about fifteen millions annually.

Cost of tariff to consumers, $291,000,000.

[a] Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, Montana, and northwestern Nebraska.

[b] Michigan, Ohio, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Kansas, South Dakota, and Washington. Michigan produces 43 percent of all the sugar beets in this area, value, international basis, $1,595,000 in 1932. The other States produce so little that they are not shown separately, but as "Other States", value of crop $2,080,000.

[c] Michigan slightly over one fourth of 1 acre per 100 acres of tillable land. The average per farm growing sugar has been said to be about 3 acres. The average acreage per farm growing sugar in the other States is negligible. For instance, in Ohio, the second greatest producer, in 1929, only 1 acre in 600 of the crop lands was in beets. Among the larger producers, 4 farms on a total of 27 acres raised 208 tons. 2 farms on a total of 1 acre raised 9 tons. The tariff bonus costs the States in this group $43,768,000. It cost the farmers $12,063,000. The value of the crop, international basis, was $2,080,000.

[d] This was the value, international basis, at Atlantic and Gulf ports. To get it grown in the United States consumers were taxed $291,000,000.

All the sugar grown in the United States in the form of sugar beets and sugarcane in the crop year 1931–32 could have been bought, delivered in Atlantic and Gulf ports in the form of raw sugar, for $25,590,000.

Great quantities were so bought from Cuba, delivered in New York, with unlimited offerings. The average price for the year was 92 cents per 100 pounds. This netted the producers in Cuba 80 cents per 100 pounds. The tariff tax of 2 cents per pound equaled 250 percent. (For about 30 days it was over 400 percent.)

The tariff brought into the Federal Treasury $73,176,000. It costs American consumers $291,000,000.

It costs this huge sum because the buyers of Cuban sugar had to pay the tariff of 2 cents per pound (which was, of course, added to consumers' prices), and the producers of duty-free sugar at home and in our island possessions added the 2-cent tariff to their prices because they had only to meet Cuban competition. The Cubans, for instance, sold in New York for 92 cents per 100 pounds subject to the duty. The islands sold for $2.92 and pocketed the difference. Home producers did likewise.

For each dollar of sugar tax or bonus that went to home producers, about $5 went overseas, because, as commonly estimated, and in the average year, five sixths of our requirements comes from overseas.

From the standpoint of protection, the $291,000,000 of tariff tax or bonus paid by sugar consumers was simply to get $25,590,000 worth of sugar grown in the United States.

For each $1 worth grown in the United States, at the international price, consumers paid a bonus of $11 and paid for the sugar besides; that is, they paid a bonus of $291,000,000 to get $25,590,000 of sugar grown here, and paid also the $25,590,000 for the sugar. This when 40 years' experience has resulted in a relatively negligible production and at a profit to home growers little if any better in ordinary years than from other crops that got no considerable bonus from the public.

Prices were low in 1932, but so were production costs, because of reduced wages, etc.; also, the grower's share in the profits of refining, and east of the Mississippi many factories were in the hands of creditors' committees or receivers that operated them upon payment of little more than running expenses.

Profits in 1932 were greater somewhat than on other crops that got no substantial benefit from the tariff and suffered shrinkages from every quarter, particularly because their export markets were mostly closed and the home market glutted. The sugar growers, on the contrary, sell only in the States with an unlimited market and the sugar bounty their main dependence. Not only did the bounty not shrink but it was worth more in purchasing power by about 30 percent. Note also that it was about 30 percent harder for consumers to pay than in prosperous years.

HIGHER PRICES

Higher prices will not help from the national standpoint, nor will they help growers materially.

With the country off the gold standard and Congress enacting inflationary and farm-relief measures to raise prices greatly, raw sugar advanced in New York April 21 to $1.25 per 100 pounds. This may seem good to sugar growers, but the prices of all their purchases and their costs of production must rise proportionately, as they should. Also, in particular, the prices of all major crops rose proportionately. Wheat rose in New York from 52⅝ cents January 3 to over 90 cents, or 45 percent; corn from 38½ cents March 2 to 51¼ cents April 20, or 30 percent; cotton from 5.9 cents February 1 to 7½ cents, or 27 percent.

From the standpoint of the national economy there is a great difference between the rise in sugar prices and in these other crops.

The sugar increase will give farmers gross only one half of an extra $9,000,000 in sugar prices, with the other half going to refiners who should not receive half. And to get the $4,500,000 of gross increase to our growers (to be dissipated in higher costs), our consumers must pay about $45,000,000 and must send the difference overseas.

Surely this does not better conditions materially, nor American farmers generally, who (on a per capita basis) pay one fourth of the sugar bonus at a cost of seventy-three millions.

In sharp contrast to this situation, every dollar of price increase on wheat, cotton, corn, pork products, and the like goes directly to American farmers, with no accompanying bonus tax of consequence, and with hundreds of millions of dollars coming from abroad from the increase in prices on our exports.

Surely with all of the special assistance that the Government is now to give our farmers to increase prices of all major crops, our sugar growers will yield to the public interest to the extent of shifting, if need be, their less profitable sugar lands to other crops that will pay substantially as well.

A better solution would be such a revision of the sugar tariff as 22 Senators tried to get in 1930, a revision calculated to save consumers $100,000,000 annually and increase growers' prices 60 percent, as suggested above.

Distribution of the 1932 sugar tax of $291,000,000

Beet growers	$24,695,000
Cane growers	3,120,000
Total beet and cane	27,815,000
Refiners of above	27,815,000
Philippines	40,000,000

Puerto Rico	$35,000,000
Hawaii	40,837,000
Virgin Islands (estimated)	400,000
Total to islands $116,615,000, increasing rapidly, 46 percent in 2 years.
Duties on imports	73,176,000
Minor adjustments	4,957,000
Total consumers' tax, raw basis	250,000,000
Pyramiding in manufactures of sweetened foodstuffs [1]	41,000,000
Total sugar tax	291,000,000

It is to the consequence shown above that the American public has paid a tariff tax of about $291,000,000 annually and possibly $3,000,000,000 since 1890, when sugar beets were first cultivated under a bonus of 2 cents a pound in the McKinley tariff. And acreage has not increased much in many years.

The table tells only part of the story. The bonus to home growers has increased only some $3,000,000 since 1923, since which time it has risen from $40,000,000 to the islands to $116,000,000 in 1932, with tremendous increases each year and no let-up, because the islands can produce about as cheaply as Cuba and there is enough unused land in the Philippines to meet all our requirements.

On the other hand, our tariff has brought Cuba to the verge of anarchy and revolution and our Government wondering if it must not intervene.

Sugar revenue and Cuba—Revenue collected

1926	$145,000,000
1927	130,000,000
1928	118,000,000
1931	98,473,000
1932	73,176,000

Had the present tariff been as low as in 1926–28, the revenue would have been eighty-six millions in 1931 and sixty-four millions in 1932. Thus corrected, the table shows how fast revenue is declining and the islands are replacing Cuba in our market.

The decline in revenue may be halted in 1933 because of a pest of locusts in the Philippines. The table indicates a decline to around $55,000,000 in the next good year and nothing 5 to 7 years hence.

One fourth of our entire tariff revenue used to come from sugar. Now it is rapidly vanishing, as those who are most interested in the home industry, and all informed persons said it would when the tariff was raised in 1930.

The loss in revenue measures Cuba's loss in our market, and the increase in production in the islands. Meantime, Cuba sells at great sacrifice and the islands at great profit. Despite Cuba's sacrifice, she has lost considerably more than half her trade with us in 6 years. Meantime, home producers relatively have been at about a standstill, without much profit and bemoaning their early extinction.

Whatever is the amount of the Government's revenue from sugar, it is properly an offset to the consumers tax of two hundred and ninety-one millions because the duty is used for public benefit. It has not been offset in calculations here presented because its future is so uncertain that the reader can as well make his own allowances.

OUR ISLAND POSSESSIONS

The rapidity with which the islands are gaining control of our markets is shown by the increase in production in the Philippines in the last 2 years, from 782,322 tons of refined sugar in 1930–31 to 982,776 tons in 1931–32, and 1,100,000 (estimated) in 1932–33 despite a pest of locusts. It was to meet this development that Congress increased the tariff from 1.76 cents to 2 cents in the present tariff.

The cost of production is believed to be almost as low in the Philippines as in Cuba. Soil, climate, and some other conditions are ordinarily much the same.

If costs are higher somewhat in Hawaii and Puerto Rico, it is partly because profits have been so great as to bring into cultivation marginal lands and, in Hawaii, the tunneling of mountains, etc., to bring in inaccessible areas.

It is under these conditions and the bounty of Congress that Cuba sold in New York for 92 cents per 100 pounds (80 cents in Cuba) and the islands at $2.92 because their sugar was duty free. They could have cut their price 50 cents, to $2.42 at good profit and killed Cuba because she could not sell at 42 cents in New York and 30 cents in Cuba.

[1] One sixth of our sugar is used in the manufacture of confectionery, preserves, sweetened breadstuffs, etc. The manufacturers of these add 25 percent or more to all their costs in making their sales prices. Then wholesalers add 20 percent or more; then retailers 50 percent or more. This pyramiding of prices is here estimated at the minimum of 100 percent total. It is somewhat indicated by the difference between refined sugar at 4½ cents a pound and candy at 30 cents to $1 a pound at retail.

[2] Ohio, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Kansas, South Dakota, and Washington. Production is so small in these States that it is not shown separately by Willett & Gray or others. In Ohio, the largest producer, only 1 acre in 600 of crop lands was in beets in the prosperous year, 1929.

[3] This $25,590,000 is the total value of the American sugar crop at the price at which sugar was freely purchased at Atlantic and Gulf ports at the average price of 92 cents per 100 pounds, raw basis. It was grown because of the encouragement of a so-called "protective tariff rate" that cost consumers $291,000,000.

Sugar growing is of considerable consequence to some farmers in the Mountain States and in Michigan. No consequence elsewhere unless in Louisiana. It is grown because of a tariff bonus that costs consumers about $11 for each dollar's worth of sugar here grown and makes its growing a little more advantageous than the growing of other crops, in the judgment of a few farmers.

These farmers in the Mountain States and in Michigan grow considerable sugar, but many farmers in our best district, Colorado, won't grow sugar beets because they say that in no 10-year period since beet growing began in 1890 have beets paid as well as some other crops.

In all but 5 of the 15 States the farmers in each State have contributed more to the sugar bonus than the States' crop was worth at our seaboard. All told they contributed to the bonus $20,659,000, against a crop value of $25,590,000. The farmers of the Nation contributed $74,000,000.

The citizens in the sugar-growing States contributed nearly $83,000,000 to the bonus.

To the nonproducing States the sugar bonus is, of course, a complete loss. To Missouri, for instance, $8,470,000; to Illinois, $17,800,000; to New York, $29,000,000, or more than the total value of the crop; to New England, $19,000,000; to Philadelphia, $1,950,000; New York City, $7,000,000; Detroit, $1,567,000, and almost exactly the value of Michigan's crop, though the growers got more than twice this because of the bonus. The State of Michigan contributed $11,299,000 against her crop value at seaboard of $1,595,000. Chicago's loss was $3,400,000. The total loss of nonproducing States was $208,000,000, or seven times the value of the 1931–32 crop, international basis.

FOURTH DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I should like to have a record vote on the adoption of the conference report. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bachman	Barbour	Bone
Ashurst	Bailey	Barkley	Borah
Austin	Bankhead	Black	Bratton

Brown	Erickson	Long	Sheppard
Bulkley	Fletcher	McAdoo	Shipstead
Bulow	Frazier	McCarran	Smith
Byrd	Glass	McGill	Steiwer
Byrnes	Goldsborough	McKellar	Stephens
Capper	Gore	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Caraway	Hale	Metcalf	Thomas, Utah
Carey	Harrison	Murphy	Thompson
Clark	Hatfield	Neely	Townsend
Connally	Hayden	Norris	Trammell
Copeland	Hebert	Nye	Tydings
Costigan	Johnson	Overton	Vandenberg
Cutting	Kean	Pope	Van Nuys
Dale	Kendrick	Reed	Wagner
Davis	King	Reynolds	Walcott
Dickinson	La Follette	Robinson, Ark.	Walsh
Dieterich	Lewis	Robinson, Ind.	Wheeler
Dill	Logan	Russell	White
Duffy	Lonergan	Schall

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that amendment numbered 9, which was stricken out by the conferees, provided that $300,000 out of the balance left over from the feed and seed loan fund might be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in loans to counties for the eradication and control of grasshoppers.

In practically all of these counties which are infested by grasshoppers the farmers borrowed money through this same fund for seed, and gave mortgages on the crops. The amendment is a protection to the Government on the mortgages it has on these crops. It seems to me it is absolutely foolhardy to reject this loan from a business standpoint, especially in view of the fact that another amendment, numbered 14, in the same bill, put in the bill on the floor of the Senate, carrying $3,000,000 for the purpose of loaning money to cities which have had some disasters, is left in the bill.

Mr. President, I should like to have a yea-and-nay vote on this question. I believe that if it were put up to the House of Representatives they would pass it. It is true that last year they voted it down, but the conditions now are entirely different. The personnel of the House, too, is different from its personnel last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to say that I agree whole-heartedly with the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. The importance of this matter cannot be overestimated for a great part of North and South Dakota and certain parts of Minnesota.

There is no need of making any extended argument on the subject. The arguments were presented to the conference committee and to the Senate before. This amendment should be retained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
June 14, 1933.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate nos. 5, 6, 7, 13, and 14 to the bill (H.R. 6034) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 2 to said bill, and concur therein with the following amendment: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert:

"Salaries: Eight privates at $1,620 per annum each, fiscal year 1934, $11,880; one half of such privates to be selected by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House."

Mr. BRATTON. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment no. 2.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on today, June 15, 1933, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 554. An act providing for the per capita payments to the Seminole Indians in Oklahoma from funds standing to their credit in the Treasury;

S. 1650. An act amending section 74 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 147);

S. 1813. An act providing for the sale to Joe Graham Post, No. 119, American Legion, of the lands lying within the Ship Island Military Reservation in the State of Mississippi; and

S. 1872. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the French Broad River on the proposed Morristown-Newport road between Jefferson and Cocke Counties, Tenn.

THE WORK AND ACHIEVEMENTS OF SENATOR GLASS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles relating to the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], one appearing in the Christian Science Monitor and the other in the New York Herald Tribune. They seem to me worthy of a permanent place in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor]

WATCHING THE WORLD GO BY—CARTER GLASS—UNIQUE, ABLE, COMBATIVE, UNYIELDING

By Willis J. Abbot

Senator CARTER GLASS, who has been steadily tilting at Mr. Pecora and Senator COUZENS during the course of the Morgan investigation, is one of the most unusual and interesting men in the upper House of Congress. By profession a journalist, and the owner of two papers in Lynchburg, Va., his career since he was about 40 years of age has been mainly devoted to politics. He has served in his State senate, in the House of Representatives, in the United States Senate, and as Secretary of the Treasury during the Wilson administration. Not a college-bred man, he sports a Phi Beta Kappa key, doubtless conferred upon him as an honorary distinction, as are also his various degrees of LL.D. from Lafayette, Washington and Lee, and the University of North Carolina. Well along in his seventies the Senator is one of the hardest-working men in the upper Chamber, and the natural fires of his intellect, and I might even say of his combativeness, are in no way abated, for Senator GLASS is always willing to enter into the most vigorous personal controversies in support of the things he believes to be right.

So ardent, for example, is he in his antagonism to the methods being followed in the inquiry now in progress in Washington into the affairs of the Morgan concern that opponents have bestowed upon him the sneering title of "chief counsel for the defense." It just happens that his convictions as to the right of individuals to be protected in their privacy against mere sensational prying on the part of senatorial committees seemed to operate for the protection of the Morgan firm. But no man in public life in the past has advocated more financial reforms antagonistic to the entire Morgan policy than has CARTER GLASS. He has every right to be aggrieved by the effort of some to make him out as a mere defender of the bankers today, but in all probability is utterly indifferent to what is being said about him. There are few men in public life who care so little for publicity and so little for popular applause or criticism. As a result of this attitude of intellectual indifference he probably gets more of both than any man in the Senate, unless it be the spectacular HUEY LONG.

It was along about 1918, if I remember rightly, that I saw CARTER GLASS, at that time not very widely known, accomplish the most extraordinary conversion of a hostile audience to his point of view that I have ever witnessed or could possibly conceive of. It was in the big ballroom of the old Waldorf-Astoria. The occasion was the meeting of the New York Economic Club to discuss the plan of the Federal Reserve, which was then in its earlier stages, and bitterly opposed, as everyone recalls, by the whole banking community of the metropolis. Frank Vanderlip, then at the very height of his success as a banker, led the attack on the Federal Reserve plan. Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, himself a banker, and largely associated with the formulation of the Federal Reserve Act, was to lead in its advocacy, with GLASS as an assistant, and decidedly not a "headliner."

The audience, one of the most brilliant that I have ever seen gathered on such an occasion, was distinctly hostile to the Federal Reserve plan. It was made up mainly of New York bankers, brokers, Wall Street people, together with their wives and members of their families. The great ballroom was crowded. Vanderlip, opening for the attack, was cheered to the echo. Senator Owen made, as he always used to make, a most scholarly and convincing speech. It was an admirable plea, adapted, one would say, to reach the consciousness of people trained in the intricacies of high finance. At its close he came into the box where I was sitting and told me that he had been asked to close the debate later.

But then GLASS got up. He looked then, as he always does, like a reasonably prosperous farmer, caring little about the fit of his clothes or his personal appearance. He began by questioning his own capacity to instruct or to influence so brilliant a representation of high finance as was before him. He spoke colloquially, in the vernacular, without the slightest effort at oratorical effect. His illustrations were racy of the soil. Anybody could comprehend what he was talking about. I do not think he had spoken 10 minutes before he had the audience eagerly listening to every word. In half an hour they were so thoroughly at his command that when his time expired they insisted that he should go on.

At the end of his speech there was practically a unanimous roar of approval and commendation. There was no need for Owen to close. Vanderlip himself admitted that the day was won for the Federal Reserve. Never in the long experience of attendance upon debates of this character have I seen so complete and absolute a victory won by an unpretentious champion and wrested from a hostile and unwilling audience.

His great success as the formulator and defender of the Federal Reserve Act perhaps created in the mind of the Senator a certain feeling of proprietorship of that admirable piece of legislation. It is he that always construes it, and denounces what he thinks to be the failure of those intrusted with its administration to act thoroughly in accord with its spirit. There is a feeling in the Senate, too, that no measure for banking or currency reform can possibly secure the influential adhesion of GLASS unless it originated with him. That feeling, and a certain acidity of comment when dealing with adversaries, have perhaps militated against his popularity in the body of which he has been so long a Member.

Men revere and admire rather than love him. He defers as little to his constituents as he does to his colleagues. When his keenly analytical mind has blocked out a course of conduct nothing can cause him to diverge from it.

Today his apparent position of defender of the Morgan firm is going to cost him heavily in popularity, but I do not believe he will give a thought to this. His mind is centered upon the course which he believes to be right, and no personal consideration will lead CARTER GLASS to swerve to one side or the other.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, May 28, 1933]

THE CARTER GLASS CURE—SENATOR GLASS, CHAMPION OF STABLE MONEY AND ADVOCATE OF THE COLD-WATER CURE FOR BOTH STOCK AND CURRENCY SPREES, BOLTED PARTY LEADERSHIP TO OPPOSE INFLATION AND WAS REPUDIATED; BUT HIS CREED WILL BE OFFERED TO THE WORLD AGAIN AT THE ECONOMIC PARLEY NEXT MONTH

By William Hard

CARTER GLASS, senior Senator from Virginia, has at this moment a unique importance because he is the most eminent embodiment of the resistance to those inflationary measures which characterize the national administration and which apparently will characterize also the approaching International Monetary and Economic Conference at London.

"Inflation" is a word of many meanings; but perhaps they can all be roughly and rudely compacted into the general statement that an inflated economic condition is one in which the economic process exhibits a corpulence or flatulence which subsequently usually requires it to resort to a "spa" for drinking the waters of liquidation and reduction.

The banquets which precede the visit to the "spa"—which is often disparagingly called "a depression"—have always been peculiarly obnoxious to CARTER GLASS. He detested them when he arrived in the Congress of the United States as a Member of the House of Representatives in 1902. He detested them in 1913, when, as Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, he was highly influentially fixing the phrases and the meanings of the Federal Reserve Act. He detested them in 1929, when they had not yet filled their convivial consumers with any surfeit, any nausea. He detested them in 1932, when, because of that detestation, he crossed swords with President Hoover. He detests them now, when, for the same reason, he crosses swords with President Roosevelt.

Mr. GLASS is a Puritan. Mr. GLASS is a dry. Mr. GLASS is against all sprees, all flings, alcoholic or economic. Yet our virtues do, indeed, always permit us somewheres a compensatory outbreak. Mr. GLASS' flings are verbal.

His first memorable speech in Washington was in 1913 in a Democratic caucus of the House. The objective of the caucus was the formation of a united Democratic front for the support and passage of the Federal Reserve Act. Objections to the act had been voiced by the "right wing" of American thought in regions such as Wall Street. Objections to it had been voiced by the "left wing" of American thought in regions such as "the corner store" and "the bend of the creek."

Mr. GLASS has always found himself revolving rapidly on his heels to fight now the "magnates" and now the "hill billies." He fights the "magnates" because they want to manufacture money in the course of speculation. He fights the "hill billies" because they want to manufacture money in the course of legislation. He is a conservative in money matters against both the "right" and the "left", against both the so-called "best people" and the so-called "people." This habit of his, if it conduces to a certain loneliness, conduces also to a certain grandeur.

The oddness in him is that this grandeur is accompanied by a verbal vivacity which creates an effect as of quicksilver running about on an impenetrable stone surface. He is our own public man who is both granitic and mercurial.

In the Democratic caucus of the House in 1913 he spoke granitically for quite a while. He was unaccustomed to addressing his fellow Members. He had been among them for 11 years. He had not, however, spent those years talking. He had spent them studying, meditating. Now he talked rather ponderously, rather frigidly. It was only little by little that he gathered warmth. Gathering it, he became more emphatic, more emotional, more aggressive. Presently he had arrived at his natural pugnacity.

At that point one of his partisans in the caucus shouted:

"Give 'em hell, Carter."

Then came the first of Mr. GLASS' historic Washingtonian verbal flings.

"Hell?" said he. "Why use dynamite when insect powder will do?"

In that caucus Mr. GLASS definitely introduced himself to Washington in his double capacity as a cold-water cure for money madness and as a vial of vitriol for adding pain to the recovery.

A few days later, in the House itself, he again expounded the fundamental reason—as he conceived it—for the creation of the Federal Reserve System. He expounded it in the course of a vivid attack upon the "great bankers." He said:

"The whole fight of the great bankers is to drive us from our firm resolve in this bill to break down the artificial connection between the banking business of the country and the stock-speculative operations at the money centers. The Banking and Currency Committee of the House has gone to the very root of this gigantic evil. In this bill it proposes to cut the cancer out. The avowed purpose of this bill is to withdraw the reserve funds of the country from the congested money centers and to make them readily available for business uses. The great bankers, however, do not want existing arrangements disturbed. They desire to perpetuate a fictitious, unscientific system, sanctioned by law but condemned by experience—a system which everybody knows encourages and promotes the worst description of stock gambling."

Such was, and is, Mr. GLASS' conservatism—and radicalism. It opposes "stock gambling" by the urban speculator. It opposes currency gambling by the agrarian reformer. It opposes gambling, chance taking, blue-sky flying, extravagance, excess, inflation wherever—and in whatever form—it finds it.

The Senator may perhaps be excessive in his opposition to excess. What is here attempted is not a proof of his philosophy. It is a portrayal of it.

Obviously he did not invent this philosophy for current use. It has been his ever since his emergence—20 years ago—into national fame. It is now considerably overborne among us by a contrary philosophy. It remains nevertheless a vigorous struggler for survival. It thereupon deserves—both in itself and in consequence of Mr. GLASS' distinguished and determined advocacy of it—a respectful consideration.

The basic principle of this philosophy is wholly Jeffersonian. It embraces simplicities. It rejects artificialities. It especially rejects them when fostered by governments. It therefore shrinks from governmental nationalistic uprearings of altitudinous tariff duties.

Mr. GLASS' anti-speculation views and his anti-inflation views are nourished in the same Jeffersonian soil out of which he derived his early—and late—antitariff views. If, at the International Monetary and Economic Conference in London next month, there is an earnest effort by the Roosevelt administration to reduce the tariff duties of the world, Mr. GLASS will be among those most vehemently applauding.

However, he might thereupon say that people who are opposed to the governmental artificiality of class-serving tariff duties should—in pursuit of consistency and also in pursuit of the success of their own philosophy—oppose likewise all other governmental artificialities of similar intent and effect.

It is precisely there that Mr. GLASS represents a very steady adhesion to Jeffersonianism; and it is precisely there that many of his fellow Democrats represent a frequent departure from it.

Mr. GLASS expressed his opinion of them in characteristic language in 1926, when the first of the recent numerous bills for granting "relief" to farmers through direct or indirect governmental taxation of nonfarmers was under consideration in the Senate. He then said:

"The tariff robs the farmer, according to the doctrine which has been proclaimed from the Democratic side of the Chamber. Now we propose to let the farmer rob the beneficiaries of the tariff and, incidentally, rob everybody else. It is a dual system of robbery, united like the Siamese twins. The Democrat who subscribes himself to such a doctrine will presently find himself on the probation bench of the Republican Party, cushioned with the fleece of the wool schedule of the Republican Payne-Aldrich Tariff Law, bouncing on the springs of the Steel Trust, hat in hand, awaiting the time of his admission to the status of that type of zealot who always exceeds the original apostles of a gospel."

It is plain, then, that back of Mr. GLASS' views on money and banking—or harmoniously abreast of them—are his views on economics in general and on governmental functions in general. In his Federal Reserve Act he was not aiming at governmental management of the economic process. He was aiming only at what might be called the establishment of governmental "law and order" in the money and banking field and at thus granting to the economic process a truer liberty, a safeguarded liberty, for the development of its own activities and its own destinies.

His present contentions in this national and international crisis must be studied in the light of his utterances in the period preceding the crisis. He then maintained that the Federal Reserve System was being used—improperly—for the artificial enlargement of speculative credit, for the artificial enlargement—that is—of an excrescence upon the natural economic process.

In the Senate, in the early part of 1929, when the speculative surge in Wall Street was at its crest, Mr. GLASS said:

"The high money rates in our money markets are such that not only are commercial enterprises and industrial businesses heavily taxed for their essential credits but even States and communities have been obliged to defer necessary public improvements because they cannot get accommodations at reasonable rates; and they cannot get them because the gamblers have run away with the money market in New York. By every influence—by threats and otherwise—that New York crowd has been trying to compel the Federal Reserve Board to raise its commercial rediscount rate. An outstanding director of the New York Federal Reserve Bank—the president of the largest bank in the Western Hemisphere—defied the board and publicly avowed that his obligations to the stock gamblers were superior to his obligations as a sworn officer of the Federal Reserve System. The Federal Reserve Board should have kicked that fellow out of his position before noon of the day upon which he made that announcement."

In other words, Mr. GLASS saw in the speculative credit inflation of 1929 the inherent peril of that moment of pompous prosperity. He saw it as a cause of evil. He lived to see certain other varieties of credit inflation recommended as remedies for evil.

He proceeded—during the depression—to make some concessions to such recommendations. He made concessions in—for instance—the Glass-Steagall law and the Glass-Borah rider to the home-loan bank law. He again made concessions in supporting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law. In those measures—put together—there were deliberately intended governmental expansions of credit and of currency, outstripping all normal expansions based on full gold reserves and produced by business activities. Mr. GLASS denounced and derided a great many of the methods thus undertaken, but he gave them at times the sanction of his vote, and even of his name, out of a spirit of tolerant cooperation with experiments overwhelmingly demanded. It was perhaps in recollection of those days that he whimsically—and amid the amused astonishment of his fellow Senators—remarked last month on the Senate floor:

"I do not want to be obstinate. People think I am obstinate and dictatorial, but I am not. I am the most amiable member of the Banking and Currency Committee."

In any case—amiably or otherwise—Mr. GLASS in the course of the depression proceeded also to write his new Federal Reserve reform bill and to prepare himself to write the money-and-banking clauses of the Democratic national platform of 1932.

In his Federal Reserve reform bill he proposed, and proposes, to inflict almost violently drastic punishments upon any "undue" diversion of Federal Reserve credit into speculative channels. The latest edition of the bill states:

"Each Federal Reserve bank shall keep itself informed of the general character of the loans of its member banks with a view to ascertaining whether undue use is being made of bank credit for the speculative carrying of, or trading in, securities or commodities. The chairman of the Federal Reserve bank shall report to the Federal Reserve Board any such undue use of bank credit by any member bank. Whenever, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, any member bank is making such undue use of bank credit, the Board may, in its discretion, suspend such bank from the use of the credit facilities of the Federal Reserve System."

Such was, and is, Mr. GLASS' attitude toward credit. He expressed it further—and also expressed his attitude toward currency—in certain famous clauses of the Democratic national platform of last year. Those clauses were:

"We advocate further restriction of Federal Reserve banks in permitting the use of Federal Reserve facilities for speculative purposes. * * * We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards."

Thus established as the accepted monetary Mentor and Nestor of the Democratic Party, Mr. GLASS authoritatively—on November 1, 1932—pronounced the last campaign's most resolute and resonant attack upon the monetary policies and assertions of the Hoover administration. Among other things, Mr. GLASS said:

"The newspapers report that Secretary Hurley of the War Department has openly proclaimed from the public rostrum that should the Democratic Party succeed at the November election, 'the United States will be driven off the gold standard.' For the sake of decency it must be hoped that Mr. Hurley did not say it. If he did say it, he was guilty of a dangerous calumny."

Mr. GLASS further—in that same speech—said:

"We Democrats will not employ Lydia Pinkham political pills or psychological poultices as a cure for the maladies of the country. We shall not rely upon transient devices and mere temporary remedies for serious situations; but, holding fast to sound Jeffersonian principles and applying tested orthodox processes, we shall hope to rescue the Government and the country from the unendurable confusion into which Republican maladministration has thrust us."

In that confidence Mr. GLASS came to March 4, 1933, and the inauguration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. At once, then, he came also to a crossroads. A signpost there sent the new President away on a new path. Another signpost there pointed Mr. GLASS toward his old principles. He admired and loved the new President. He was devoted—he was even dedicated from birth—to the Democratic Party. His party, his President—they were certainly most dear to him. He stood at the crossroads, ruminating—and raging.

The Congress met on March 9. The emergency banking bill was introduced. Mr. GLASS loyally supported it. He supported it with all the loyalty that was consistent with a simultaneous savage asseveration of its obnoxiousness to his principles.

"I say to you, Senators", he exclaimed, "that this bill is the least objectionable of all the multitude of suggestions that have been presented.

"It broadens", said he, "it broadens the currency and credit facilities of the Federal Reserve System in a degree that is almost shocking to me.

"Under this bill", he continued, "when the member banks of the Federal Reserve System shall have exhausted their eligible paper they may bring their own paper, their 'cats and dogs', if you please, to the Federal Reserve bank and have them discounted."

The new currency authorized by the bill, concluded Mr. GLASS, "does not require any gold basis. * * * I am coming to have less and less respect for a gold reserve which is not used when it is needed."

One could thereupon, even in the press gallery, almost hear Mr. GLASS a few moments later in the Democratic cloakroom discharging lava and ashes into the amazed Democratic air and ejaculating his most horrific oath, which is "Dad bum it."

Yes. "Dad bum it." That is the peak of the profanity of this violent Methodist man.

For some 7 weeks thereafter Mr. GLASS remained at the crossroads inhabiting his Democratic reservation but fulminating his Jeffersonian principles.

He saw the Reconstruction Finance Corporation expanded by the Democratic administration in its lendings of public money to private enterprise. He had already, under the previous Republican administration, assailed the "profligacy" of this Corporation and had seen in it "a clear portent of the burden which the taxpayers of the country will on pay day be compelled to endure."

He saw the Democratic administration put an embargo upon exports of gold. "There was never any necessity", he remarked, "for a gold embargo", thus by implication approving the policy pursued by the previous Republican administration when it said to the foreigners, "If you want any of your gold that's here, come any time and get it."

He saw the Democratic administration forbid exports of gold even under special license to meet obligations of specific pledged faith. He saw it do this in opposition to the views of the Federal Reserve Board. He saw it do this without even any consideration of the views of the Board. He saw the Board, which he had created to be our supreme nonpolitical monetary authority, unconsulted and disregarded in monetary matters by the political authorities of the country.

He saw the Democratic administration bring into the Congress a bill for three concerted credit and currency "artificialities." More Federal Reserve credit through more open-market purchases of Government securities by the Federal Reserve System. More paper money unbacked by gold. And the making of a gold dollar with less gold in it than had been promised in payment to lenders of money when they lent.

Mr. GLASS talked with his staff in his office in the Senate Office Building. They had some nice plans for high appointments for fine friends under the Democratic administration. They endeavored to sprinkle cold patience upon the warmth of Mr. GLASS. "You talk like politicians", said Mr. GLASS. Their rueful response was: "One statesman is enough in an office—and sometimes too much."

The next day Mr. GLASS, in the Senate, delivered the speech which took him from the reservation into the wilderness.

He addressed himself to the 3-way inflation bill incorporated into the farm relief bill. His fellow Senators had gathered themselves together into the Senate Chamber in most unusual numbers in order to listen to him. Many of them were delighted to hear him express their views—and attack their votes.

"This bill", he said, "degrades the Federal Reserve System into being a service agency of the Treasury Department. * * * The history of inflation has been recorded. Today we are flying right in the face of all human experience. * * * My colleagues talk about serving the public. What public? The men who work for a wage, the neediest of all classes of the public, the clerks and the stenographers and the professional men and the workingmen, constituting in the aggregate half, yea, more than half, of our laboring population, will be the people to suffer under this unbridled expansion. That is what it is; because the rein is so loose that the steed will never stop until he goes over the precipice, killing his rider."

With those words, Mr. GLASS, old, sick, could stand on the floor no longer.

"Mr. President", he said, "I find that I must desist. It is painful to disagree with the occupant of the White House, whom

I love and respect. It is painful and I may have regret, but I shall never have to make apologies for acting upon my convictions."

On the succeeding day, in the Senate, the inflation amendment to the farm relief bill was overwhelmingly "agreed to." Three Democratic Senators disagreed. Rightly or wrongly, pedantically or discerningly, as the blind worshipers of a day gone by or as the farsighted adherents of a day yet again to come, they lonelily lifted their voices to say, "No." They were: BAILEY, of North Carolina; BULKLEY, of Ohio; and GLASS, of Virginia.

Their philosophy was crushed in Washington. Will it be exterminated in the International Monetary and Economic Conference in London? Or will it there rise again to esteem and to power? Those are the questions which Mr. GLASS now, in fact, poses not only to his country but to the world.

The International Monetary and Economic Conference has a brain with most emphatically two lobes. Operating one of these lobes it envisages a reduction of economic barriers between countries and a retreat toward the courses of nature in trade. Operating the other it envisages new credit devices and new currency devices by central banks for the so-called "stabilization"—which, in reality, is the speculative enhancement—of prices. Let trade follow nature and let prices obey artifice; that is the contradiction which the International Monetary and Economic Conference contains within its own agenda.

To that contradiction many thinkers oppose a philosophy of complete and consistent artificial governmentalism in trade and in finance and in all else. To it Mr. GLASS opposes his philosophy of Jeffersonian simplicities throughout the whole of the world's economic life—simplicities and, as he sees it, reliabilities and integrities:

One can imagine him exclaiming:

"Shall governments continuously interrupt and pervert the world's trade with capricious tariff manipulations?" "No."

"Shall governments continuously interrupt and pervert the world's trade with capricious credit and currency manipulations?" Again, and for exactly the same reasons, "No."

Economic manipulations produce instabilities. Monetary manipulations produce instabilities. They produce, in each instance, the thing of all things (to Mr. GLASS) most detestable: a speculative world.

Today, at the very first crooking of the finger of a beckoning inflation, Mr. GLASS sees about him a vivid speculative market in commodities and in stocks. He sees an active bidding for profits on market jumps. It does not rejoice him. It is precisely what in 1929 he called the harbinger of ruin.

Meanwhile he sees, or thinks he sees, a corresponding decline in the desire for long-time, abiding investments.

Speculation in place of investment! Speculation in place of normal, natural commerce and industry! That is the foe that Mr. GLASS conceived himself to be fighting when he was a youthful challenger. That is the foe that he still fights as an elder statesman.

And why? Because for him there is more in it than economics. For him it is also—and first—morals.

"To me", he said in the Senate on April 27 of this year, "the suggestion that we may devalue the gold dollar 50 percent means national repudiation. To me it means dishonor. All the legalistic arguments which the lawyers of the Senate, men of eminent ability and refinement, have made here have not dislodged from my mind the irrevocable conviction that it is immoral."

Here are simplicities indeed! Here is a man who thinks that the repudiation of a national economic promise—especially when that repudiation may be directed against foreigners—is simply nationally morally wrong and that thereupon no public or private good can come from it. Here is a man who thinks that no anesthetic for economic agony can be successfully purchased at the price of the patient's soul.

It is quaint. Let us say that it is also an inapplicable spiritual phantasy. I interestedly notice, though, the reverence that surrounds the man in whom it flames. It surrounds him in Washington, and it surrounds him in Virginia.

Mr. GLASS says that if nobody is going to heed him in Washington he will just—Dad bum it!—go back to Lynchburg, Va., and stay there. He might. He might stay there and do nothing all the way to the end of his present term in the Senate—nothing except excoriate the Senate. And then Virginia would reelect him to the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday the House passed House bill 3344. This bill amends the Federal Farm Loan Act. It has relation to one county only in the United States. The amendment is only a line and a half in length to an existing section of law. It permits the Federal land banks to make loans on farms in Osage County, Okla.

The trouble in the past has been that the mineral rights of these lands were withdrawn and reserved for the benefit of the Indians; and, because the mineral rights could not be mortgaged to the Federal land bank, the Federal land bank officials would not make loans in that county although the county contains some of the best lands in my State.

The House bill adds this line and a half to existing law:

Provided, That the first-mortgage loans shall be made without regard to the mineral rights therein.

This morning an effort was made to poll the Banking and Currency Committee; but, owing to the fact that Members were on the floor, only the following Members could be reached: The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Inasmuch as it is impossible to have a meeting of the committee, and inasmuch as it is very desirable to get this bill through if possible, I ask unanimous consent that the rule requiring the reference of the bill to a committee be waived and that the bill be laid before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the Senators named are in favor of the measure?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. They have endorsed the bill; yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the bill does not need to be referred to a committee under the rules, and the Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The bill (H.R. 3344) to amend section 14, subdivision 3, of the Federal Farm Loan Act, was read twice by its title, considered by unanimous consent, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14, subdivision 3, of the Federal Farm Loan Act (39 Stat.L. 372) is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Third. To accept any mortgages on real estate except first mortgages created subject to all limitations imposed by section 12 of this act, and those taken as additional security for existing loans: Provided, That the first-mortgage loans shall be made without regard to the mineral rights therein."

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5767) to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I was discussing this carpetbagging measure yesterday when the conference report upon the independent offices appropriation bill was brought in; and, at the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], I yielded the floor for the consideration of that report. I shall resume this afternoon the argument I was submitting at that time, if it is the purpose to attempt to proceed with this legislation in the closing hours of the session.

I think it is a thoroughly futile operation, because the opposition to this measure is so widespread, not only upon this side of the aisle but also upon the other side, and many of us have such a deep and abiding conviction on the subject, such a profound feeling that the pending proposal is an insufferable and indefensible affront to a free people, that there can be no conclusion within at least several days of debate. If, however, it is the purpose to persist in attempting to obtain the consent of the Senate to such an offensive measure, I shall proceed for a time with the discussion, and subsequently the discussion can be carried on by others.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. What was the division in the committee over this measure?

Mr. VANDENBERG. One of the interesting things about this matter is that, although we are proposing to take away a fundamental, 30-year-old right belonging to the Hawaiian people, there never has been a moment's consideration of the bill in the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. I do not speak critically of the chairman of the committee, the able Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], in this respect, because he had no time to submit the bill to the committee. He merely polled the committee upon the proposition that the bill might be laid before the Senate without recommendation. Many of us declined even to permit it to come in without recommendation; but it is here on a poll of the committee, without any hearing, and with a partial consent of some of the members that it could be brought in without recommendation.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator know how many of the members of the committee agreed that the bill should be brought before the Senate without recommendation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not; but, Mr. President, I ask the Chair whether the reported bill does not show the endorsement upon the back of those members of the committee who agreed to its report? If so, I ask that the list be given for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is not on the desk. It will be brought in, however.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the whole action was based upon a very brief message from the President recommending it, was it not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is correct. I may say further to the Senator from Massachusetts that the only thing before the Senate on the subject is a 10-line message from the President of the United States, in which he speaks in a general way about the advisability of permitting him a free hand to name a governor who may not be involved in any of the local factionalism in the islands.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is aware of the fact that there have been whispering rumors of indirect evidence being brought to the attention of the members of the committee that conditions there required this legislation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, Mr. President; and I intend to discuss that very fully. I do not think what the Senator refers to as whispering evidence——

Mr. WALSH. "Rumors", I say.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Or gossip, or rumor, or whatever it is—I do not think that is any remote justification for tearing up the organic law, which is a virtual contract between the Government of the United States and the people of the Hawaiian Islands in respect to the key right which they possess; namely, to have a governor of their own native residency to head their own local government.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. In behalf of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and myself, may I ask the Senator from Michigan what he understands to be the reason or justification offered for this particular change which he says is so dangerous?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am afraid I may not be a fair witness to paraphrase the excuses that are offered in behalf of this legislation, because it is so utterly offensive to every feeling of propriety and equity and democracy that I have in my being; but I will do the best I can to tell the Senator what it is claimed by way of justification should permit the President to seek a deserving Democrat from somewhere in the continental United States for this position.

Mr. LEWIS. We were asking whether the Senator from Michigan might not be suffering from an indignation caused by a contemplation or imagination as to what he thinks are the reasons behind this bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not sure what I am suffering from in that aspect. I know I am not suffering from any misunderstanding of the net result of the bill, which is to rob these people of their inherent rights, contracted to them in an organic act 30 years ago, and preserved ever since. Whether or not the reasons for this proposed legislation are imaginary, I do not know. I think they are.

As a matter of fact, there was a very complete investigation of conditions in Hawaii last year by a very high official of the American Government. I refer to Assistant Attorney General Seth Richardson, who a year ago was sent to the islands by order of the United States Senate at the very time when untoward circumstances, which we all regret and which none of us condone, were bringing the islands into disrepute. The Assistant Attorney General came back with his report, and it has been submitted, and it is available as a Senate document. It is Document No. 78, of the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, and it is a complete analysis of the situation. I defy you to find a single word in the document which asks for any change in the status of the governorship or which attributes those difficulties to the governorship. I defy you to find a single word in the document and in the report which indicates that the choice of a mainland governor will in any degree contribute to a liquidation of these difficulties, whether imagined or otherwise. On the contrary, the report is shot through with compliments to the inherent respect for law and order which possesses the people of the Hawaiian Islands.

The chief recommendations of a specific nature that are submitted in respect to the situation are recommendations for a closer-knit authority beneath the Governor, to wit, in respect to the police officers of Honolulu and in respect to the prosecuting officers of the subdivision of government in which Honolulu is located. I am coming to that in detail subsequently, but in a general way that is the best answer I can give to the Senator from Illinois in respect to the thin presumptions which are offered us as to why it is so necessary now to go outside of the islands in order to get a Governor.

Mr. President, when the debate was interrupted yesterday, I adverted to the fact, collaterally, that this Democratic "carpetbag" Governor movement unfortunately seemed to be threatening to communicate itself even to the District of Columbia, because I submitted to the Senate an article from a local newspaper which indicated at least a tentative purpose to import from Omaha, Nebr., a man to be a member of the Board of District Commissioners, officials who have the same general relationship to this District that governors would have to their States. I protested yesterday that "carpetbagging" is bad enough in Hawaii, but that it certain becomes completely indefensible when brought into play in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in a moment. I undertook to quote alleged direct statements from one whom the paper defined as the chief patronage dispenser of the new administration in respect to that purpose. I am very happy to read in the paper this morning the following sentence:

Mr. Farley—

He was the distinguished gentleman identified by yesterday's paper as the chief patronage dispenser of the new administration and the gentleman who was in charge of this "carpetbagging" prospectus.

Mr. Farley replied to Senator VANDENBERG's speech with a statement that none but genuine residents of the District would be considered for appointment as District Commissioners.

I want to welcome that belated statement and to congratulate Mr. Farley upon making it, and to accept the net result without further comment. Now I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. In view of the fact that the law relating to the District of Columbia requires that the appointment of District Commissioners shall be confined to residents of the District of Columbia, and in view of Mr. Farley's statement this morning that he anticipates no change or recommended change in basic policy, it occurs to me that the Senator from Michigan, with his usual fairness, would not only want to commend Mr. Farley's statement, but that he would want to go further than that and beg Mr. Farley's pardon for the inference and for the reflection he cast upon Mr. Farley yesterday in assuming, from a mere newspaper article, that Mr. Farley had any intention of doing what the Senator from Michigan claimed yesterday he was about to do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his compliment to my fairness, and I want to be scrupulously fair. I think Mr. Farley has shown a very commendable decision in respect to the announcement made yesterday evening and published this morning. But the Senator will have to pardon me for the necessity of still believing that there was a purpose, if it could be done successfully, to "carpetbag" the District of Columbia, and I think the publication to this end which has repeatedly appeared in the press of the District without any denial on the part of our able friend, Mr. Farley, justifies the conclusion most emphatically that the matter was under consideration.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope the Senator will not think I am flattering him when I say that, insofar as the opinion of the Senator from Maryland has any value, I think the Senator is one of the ablest and most useful Members of this body, and in spite of the fact that we are all human, and inclined to partisanship, he usually keeps within reasonable bounds. I am not going to take further issue with the Senator from Michigan on the question which he has raised, except to say that I must note, in line with the commendatory remarks which I think it deserves, that I think his present statement is somewhat an exception to that very enviable record.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it is necessary for the Senator to take that exception in vicarious defense of the attitude which I feel perfectly confident his party administration held until last evening or this morning in respect to the possibility of "carpetbagging" the District of Columbia. I realize that there is a law relating to the District which prohibits the naming of a nonresident as one of the District Commissioners, and I said upon yesterday, when I was discussing the matter, that I realized the existence of that inhibition, but I wondered whether, on the heels of this proposal to "carpetbag" the Hawaiian Government, we might not find ourselves confronted at the eleventh hour with a similar proposal to legalize the "carpetbagging" of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will believe me when I say that basically I am with his proposition that the Governor of the islands, wherever it is possible, had best be a resident.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am sure the Senator believes that.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sure the Senator will take at its face value the statement of the President in which he says that there is no effort or purpose on his part to depart from a well-grounded and well-intentioned principle of local self-government; that the President has said in his message to Congress that it is only because his survey of conditions in the Hawaiian Islands has made it apparent to him that the best interests of the Hawaiian people themselves will be served at this time by granting the President the latitude to look in the widest field for a nominee to fill this important post.

Of course, every logical exception can be taken to that view, but I am sure the Senator from Michigan will concede that President Roosevelt has one thing in mind, and that is the welfare of all the people in the Hawaiian Islands. He may be in error; there is room for difference as to the wisdom of the enactment of this measure to be effective even temporarily, but the President has caused surveys to be made, the reports of which have come to the White House, and I am frank to say that I am supporting this amendment myself, only as a temporary proposition, because the leader of the United States at this time has requested the Congress to give him this power, not as a departure from permanent policy but in the interest of the people in the Hawaiian Islands; and only because of unusual circumstances, of abnormal conditions, has he asked for this power at this time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if I can remember the various points raised by my able friend, I want to comment upon each one, because in each instance I think we find ourselves in rather complete fundamental agreement.

In the first place, I know that my friend the Senator from Maryland would be one of the last men in this Chamber to depart in any degree from the philosophy of home rule, not only because that is inherent in his own philosophy but because he comes from a State where that is a basic principle, and he is intimately related in his political philosophy with a State executive who is probably the outstanding apostle in this land of home rule. I refer to Governor Ritchie. I am sure that the Senator's philosophy is that of home rule, and that it is with utter reluctance that he departs from it this afternoon.

Second, I entirely concede the good faith of the Executive. Not even by indirection would I wish to reflect upon the good faith of the Executive. He is my President as well as the President of the Senator from Maryland. I simply feel, with profound conviction, that he has been misinformed in the present situation, and I want to do him the kindness of helping to save him from an error which I am sure he would subsequently regret.

If the President has made a survey which develops facts which justify the proposition now at the bar of the Senate, those facts have not been authenticated to me as a member of that committee of the Senate which ought to take jurisdiction over a matter of this nature.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right at that point for just an observation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator appreciates the difficulty in which the Senator from Maryland to a lesser degree and the President of the United States to a major degree are in reference to saying anything upon the floor of the Senate which might in any way be construed as a reflection upon the people in the Hawaiian Islands. If information has been adduced which would show any degree of lawlessness in the Hawaiian Islands, it is not very pleasant to stand on the floor of the Senate and make a remark which would indict a whole people. It is very difficult, I am sure the Senator will agree, for one to guide this bill, more or less, without exhibiting in a public way certain facts which might to some extent influence Senators.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, Mr. President, that is true; but I would not want that implication to stand without this further comment: That, in my judgment—and it is based upon somewhat intimate information—it would be unfair to leave the inference that there is something which could be said which would entirely justify the proposed legislation, because in my view there is absolutely no justification, even in this alleged emergency, for the particular proposition to which we are asked to give our consent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the matter to which the Senator from Maryland makes reference—that is, the indicting or impeaching of the people of Hawaii—seems to me to be the most serious objection to this bill. The bill is based upon the fact that for some reason or other those people are no longer capable of furnishing a man in Hawaii fit to be Governor of the islands. That seems to me to be an attempt to draw an indictment of an entire people, a thing Edmund Burke said he did not know how to do.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not think it can be denied that much of what the Senator from Idaho says is well founded, and I realize that it would be very difficult to present this matter in detail without appearing to attempt to indict an entire people. But I think this much might be said: The Hawaiian Islands at the present time have a business structure which permits four or five of the largest and wealthiest families in the Hawaiian Islands more or less to dominate the economic life of the islands. Then, too, the islands are divided up in racial classifications in a most unusual way. As a matter of fact, I know of no other place on the face of the globe where there are so many different races combined as in the Hawaiian Islands.

Added to those two facts is the third fact, that last year a very unhappy occurrence took place in the Hawaiian Islands, and conditions at that time were very strained. Indeed, even upon the floor of the Senate and in the House of Representatives, Members of this body and of the House rose and, with very little information, made remarks which perhaps had best been left unsaid at that time.

Subsequent to that affair, there has been, I am advised by authority which I do not think can be questioned, a division of the people more or less along racial lines, and because of the tie-up of business due to the racial divisions there, it is very difficult for a person of the islands at this time to fit into the peculiar situation which now exists there.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think I have the floor. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I say that I got lost in answering the Senator from Idaho, and I did not mean to intrude?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am afraid I shall get lost if I do not get the floor back pretty soon.

Mr. CONNALLY. I grant that triangles are usually most unfortunate, whether they are social or otherwise. [Laughter.]

What I wanted to suggest was that if we selected a local man he would have to be identified, more or less, with one of these controversial and diverse groups.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me to conclude with an added sentence, that is absolutely the case. It is doubtful whether, except under very favorable conditions, any one man in the Hawaiian Islands can bring to the office of Governor impartiality, a detached point of view, and a knowledge of the situation which exists there without involving his own personal fortunes and equations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to comment on that particular thought.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator if he will not yield to me to call for a quorum.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not at the moment.

Mr. KING. I wish the Senator would.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will shortly. I want to reply to this particular observation.

I want to say to the Senator from Maryland that if there are factional divisions in the islands today—and I agree that there are—it is my judgment that no superimposed Governor can be the constructive focus for unified progress. On the contrary, an imported, superimposed Governor, brought in in nullification of the organic act, is more calculated to be the hostile focus for unified and intensified resentment.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wanted to say to the Senator from Maryland that a very great Democrat once said that democracy involved the right to make mistakes as well as to do the right thing; and if the Hawaiian people have made mistakes, no one can correct them except themselves, if we are going to adhere to the doctrine of local self-government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is very courteous, and I do not want to infringe too much on his time, but I should like to indicate some of the relations in the Hawaiian Islands of a business nature.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not want to yield for an indefinite statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I had better wait and not infringe upon the Senator's time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bulow	Dieterich	Johnson
Ashurst	Byrd	Dill	Kean

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, at the time the quorum was called we were discussing the question whether or not an available citizen of Hawaii may not be found by the President of the United States for appointment as Governor to succeed the able Governor Judd. The implication brought to us that there is no available individual who can qualify within the terms of the organic act in respect to residency, I assume, means there is no available Hawaiian Democrat, because I know there are many available Hawaiian Republicans, whom even I could name to a considerable number. But it is inconceivable to me, Mr. President, that anyone should undertake to support the claim that there is not today an eligible, dependable citizen of Hawaii, a citizen within the meaning of the organic act, available for the governorship. It seems to me that any such presumption is denied by the long line of very able Governors, a line which has been interrupted only occasionally by questionable Governors. It seems to me it is denied by the excellent administrative record of Governor Judd, the incumbent executive.

The Senator from Maryland assures me that there is no truth in the oft-printed story that this effort to qualify a carpetbag Governor from the mainland was for the purpose of putting Judge Ben Lindsay into Honolulu as the Governor. The Senator has assured me that there is no justification for that repeated story. Well, I confess that it would have seemed like very much of a paradox, if not a nature fake, to have chosen free love's first friend as the reforming Governor of the moral situation in Honolulu. [Laughter.]

I do not know what continental Democrat is contemplated for this carpetbagging post at Honolulu in the event that the consent of the Senate for a change in the organic act can be secured—a consent which I do not think is going to be given—but I am unable to believe, I repeat, that there is not ample and adequate Hawaiian citizenship within the terms of the organic act to provide a continuation of the fine line of Hawaiian governors who have served the Territory since the organic act was originally written.

Mr. President, I have visited the Hawaiian Islands within the last 2 or 3 years, and I made a somewhat intimate study of conditions there. At that time there was unrest and there was impatience, but there were other affirmative qualities and characteristics to which I think it is only simple justice that someone from the mainland should bear testimony. My able friend, the Senator from Maryland, speaks about the racial difficulties and the racial divisions. I suppose Honolulu is one of the most cosmopolitan cities in the world in that aspect. Unquestionably there is a racial problem. We have racial problems, too.

I went to the so-called "Royal School", which is one of the principal grade schools of Honolulu, where once a week an Americanization ceremony or service is performed, participated in by little children of more than one color and of more than one race, which was the most inspiring, significant, and monitory lesson in successful racial amalgamation under the American flag that I have ever seen anywhere, and I doubt if a parallel exists elsewhere under the flag.

This weekly service, this weekly ritual, was created originally under the auspices of a very able educator. My recollection is his name was Cyril Smith. At any rate, visitors to the islands, who now rarely fail in the course of their pilgrimage to contact this Americanization service in the Royal School, always have the same reaction. I repeat that it is the finest thing of its sort, the most instructive example of effectual Americanization, leadership, and labor that I know of anywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States. They can give us lessons in this respect. They do not need us to teach them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I have been told that the main purpose of the bill really relates back to the fact that there are five candidates over there for the governorship, or, rather, there are five prospective Democratic candidates, and they cannot get together. If we are going to wait for the Democrats to get together, we are going to have more trouble picking somebody here in the United States than they are in Hawaii.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his very pertinent observation. Of course, I have heard the story, too, that one of the impelling motives is an inability of native Hawaiian Democrats, who now taste victory for the first time in a generation, to agree upon a division of the spoils. But certainly it would be a travesty for us to permit an internecine patronage row in the Democratic Party to be used for the crucifixion of fundamental Anglo-Saxon and American rights in respect to home-rule authority and jurisdiction, as is contemplated, as I view the situation, by the pending measure.

But I agreed with my able friend the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] when we started this discussion that we would proceed on the theory, which I entirely accept, that the President's recommendation is submitted in the complete good faith that he considers it necessary in respect to the situation which he there confronts. I want to continue to argue the matter upon that hypothesis.

I was speaking about the racial war which the Senator from Maryland has indicated is one of the reasons why something of this revolutionary nature must be done. The Senator has also referred to social conditions. One of the great social problems in the islands is the problem of leprosy. I visited the leper colony. I visited the leper orphanage. Again I want to testify—and I think we owe it in justice to the fair name of Hawaii and her forward-looking citizens that the testimony should be given—that nowhere in this world to my knowledge is there a more remarkably successful social-service enterprise than in the Hawaiian treatment of its own leper problem.

If the Senator from Maryland were to join me this afternoon in a visit to those leper colonies, he would come away, as I did, completely filled with an emotional appreciation of the fact that there is local government in the Hawaiian Islands which not only is unafraid in the face of a difficult social problem but which is amazingly successful in its treatment of the challenge. I resent the implication that a people who can meet social problems of this nature so effectually for some unspoken reason must be robbed of their birthright.

We hear about dangerous days in the Hawaiian Islands. That is one side of the picture. On the other side of the picture is a very beautiful and a very pacific hospitality.

We hear about hymns of hate. On the other hand, Mr. President, the haunting melodies of Aloha and the Song of the Islands are a part of the native character. There is nothing belligerent or criminal or vicious about it. It is as sympathetic a nature and as easily led in the right way as any human nature in this world.

We hear about an island hell. On the other hand, this is the paradise of the Pacific.

Mr. President, Hawaii has no one to stand upon the floor of the Senate and plead for it. Even under the organic act it is not allowed a spokesmanship here in the Senate. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why I feel particularly impelled to join the movement which undertakes to say that this bill shall not pass. It does have an official spokesman yonder in the other body, the House of Representatives. He is a distinguished spokesman for the Democratic Party in Hawaii also, I think it is fair to add. He stood upon the floor over yonder at the other end of the Capitol with tears in his eyes and with tears in his voice pleading that this thing should not be done; that this outrage should not be perpetrated upon the people of his island. I think he would know, Mr. President, if there was any dire need for this thing which we are asked to do in the name of some unspoken menace. I think probably he is committed to the welfare of his own people even more sincerely than any of us could even pretend to be.

There is no doubt in my mind that if the Delegate from Hawaii felt there was any remote threat to the safety of life and property and to the public welfare in the islands, he would be the first to demand some change by way of correction. But the voice that we hear in the Congress speaking officially on behalf of the people of Hawaii, speaking first as the result of a Democratic nomination, second as the result of a Democratic election which was gained in the campaign in which he traversed the islands assuring the people that their home-rule rights were safe in the hands of the Democratic Party—a spokesmanship now which represents the united people of Hawaii in this crisis—that spokesmanship begs that the organic act shall not be torn asunder in this alleged passing emergency for the sake of carpetbagging the governorship.

Mr. President, the decision we are asked to make in licensing Hawaiian carpetbagging may not mean very much to us. It is merely a passing incident in the climax of a busy session. But it means a very great deal to a subordinate unit of our Government when an American Territory is deprived of its contractual and its traditional rights. I submit that it means a great deal more to us than appears upon the surface because involved in it is something more than the mere temporary status of the next Governor of Hawaii, because in it is the question of the good faith of the United States in respect to the organic act which has been upon the books for 30 years and which, from the very moment of its inception, has had for its keystone the warrant of a Governor who is a resident of the islands themselves.

(At this point Mr. VANDENBERG yielded for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 63, and for a statement by Mr. STEPHENS, which appear elsewhere in the RECORD under appropriate headings.)

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, now we will return for a little while to the consideration of the carpetbag bill. This would be a strange session of Congress, indeed, if it were to be marked by action which frees the Philippines and enslaves Hawaii. The two things are simply totally incompatible and inconsistent. It seems to me that, in a political sense, to deprive a Territory of its Governor under the terms of its own organic act is the very symbol of slavery.

We were speaking a little while ago about the fact that Hawaii has conducted itself and its affairs and its government in a fashion which does not warrant any such affront or any such invasion. The exhibits which defend that conclusion are legion.

Mr. President, the last time I looked at the figures the treasury of the Hawaiian Islands had a balance of $4,236,000. I respectfully submit that if there is one State or Territorial treasury with a balance in it we had better leave it in control of those who have been efficient enough to create a balance and not put that balance to the jeopardy of the average mainland governor.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the people of the Hawaiian Islands have been carrying and bearing and paying their full share of every tax that has been assessed by the Congress of the United States for 30 years upon continental United States. The Senator from Maryland when this debate opened undertook to pretend that there was some sort of a parallel between a Territory and a possession; he undertook to draw an analogy between the status of a Territory and the status of a possession. There can be no such analogy; it is utterly erroneous and utterly unfair to pretend that there is an analogy. The citizen of a Territory is what might be termed a "paying" citizen; he is subject to all the same forms of taxation as are the rest of us. The citizen of a possession, on the contrary—and I refer, for example, to the Philippines—makes no tax contribution whatsoever to the main Treasury of the United States, and there can be no analogy, I repeat, as between two such conditions.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps I am asking too much, but I was wondering if the Senator would yield to allow me to present a matter which will occupy but a moment or two, with the hope that it may be acted on by the House? I find there was an error made in the securities bill by the draftsmen and others in connection with that measure whereby the District of Columbia was left out.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in just a few moments. I want to develop this particular thought to its conclusion.

I repeat that the citizens of Hawaii have been constant taxpayers on precisely the same basis as any citizen of Maryland or Michigan or California or any other State of the Union throughout these 30 years. Indeed, Mr. President, the amazing fact is that a balancing of the books as between Hawaii and the Federal Government shows during the first 30 years of this relationship that Hawaii has sent $175,000,000 to Washington, while the Federal Government has spent upon Hawaii in activities which might properly be charged to the Territory about $33,000,000, leaving a Federal net profit, if that term is permissible in discussing a question of government, of some $149,000,000 in taxes received from the islands.

Mr. President, when we are dealing with a subordinate unit of our Government which not only has borne a full share of the tax burden with those of us who live upon the mainland but which also has paid into the Federal Treasury in the 30 years of our relationship nearly $150,000,000 more than we in turn have spent upon it, I respectfully suggest there is presented to us a challenge which cannot be lightly brushed aside when we are asked to deal with those people and with that subdivision of government in the status literally of a vassal state.

Contemplating, Mr. President, that tax relationship, contemplating the organic act, which for 30 years has guaranteed local self-government to the extent at least of a native resident as Governor, against that background, I submit when the Congress is asked without any submission of a show of supporting evidence, summarily and out of a clear sky, to impair and nullify the warrant in the organic act for local residency as measuring the eligibility of the Governor, that the citizens of Hawaii would be well entitled to ask us to read a few sentences from our own Declaration of Independence. This is an old-fashioned document, Mr. President.

Mr. LONG. And an out-of-date one.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Probably it is entirely out of date and may have no relationship to the "new deal" at all; nevertheless, I find therein in connection with the recital of the wrongs against which our people undertook to revolt a few sentences which, while not literally applicable to the situation which we are asked to correct in Honolulu, nevertheless, has its exact implication. Here is one of the things about which our forefathers complained:

He—

"He" being the King; we do not have a king; we call him something else—

He has erected a multitude of new offices and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people.

Well, the pending joint resolution does not represent a multitude of swarming officers, but it represents the key officer, who is to be sent upon a carpetbagging basis to administer gubernatorial responsibility which, under the organic act, should rest by contract and by solemn agreement in the hands of a Governor who is a bona fide resident of the islands.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield when I have concluded this suggestion. Reading again from the Declaration of Independence:

He—

has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution and unacknowledged by our laws.

That has literal application—

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution and unacknowledged by our laws.

That precisely describes the pending action which Congress is asked to take, if it ever takes it.

Again defining one of the causes of complaint which drove us to make this Declaration, the King is criticized—

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments.

That applies literally, Mr. President, at least in respect to the key position of Governors in the islands, because it is proposed to abolish the most important key-right that the citizens of the Hawaiian Islands enjoy in respect to the guaranty that their Governor shall be one of their own neighbors and one of their own citizens; and it does alter fundamentally the form of their government, because the fundamental factors of any government is altered when an outside carpetbagging chief executive is brought there in the place of a local chief executive.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I note by the population statistics of the Hawaiian Islands that 143,754 persons out of 375,211 all told are Japanese. Assuming that these Japanese are citizens of the United States, which is true of a majority of them, and that they are about 40 percent of the population of the islands, I am wondering if the Senator's philosophy of local self-government goes to the extent that he feels that a Japanese would be more representative than any other person that might be selected, and that a Japanese should therefore be selected by the President as Governor of the islands.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; I do not agree at all with any such suggestion. Indeed, with great respect to the Senator, I think the question has implications in it that are something of an affront to these people. There is a racial melting pot upon the islands, certainly. There is a racial problem, certainly. I do not deny for a moment that the Senator from Maryland is justified in saying that we must contemplate the racial problem through serious, critical eyes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but the Senator——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment. But, Mr. President, there is an ample number of citizens in the Hawaiian Islands who rise completely above any remote fear of suspicion that the Senator from Maryland may conjure, who know more about the thing he is trying to talk about, without knowing anything about it at all, than could any imported Governor who never saw the place until he landed at the wharf.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has just read from that immortal document known as "the Declaration of Independence." It seems to me some place in that document there is a statement that all men are created equal, ordained with certain unalienable rights, and so forth. Certainly the Senator is not going to quote from that document and then contradict his own philosophy by the same document, is he?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I fail to follow the Senator. I do not blame him for trying to change the subject and to broaden the contemplation so that we cease to remember that his purpose at the moment is to carpetbag the governorship of Hawaii. That is the only thing we are talking about.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I am just trying to find out if we ought not to take care of those people out there in line with what the Senator has said. Assuming that 40 percent of the population, in round numbers, are Japanese, what finer principle of local self-government could there be than to select the Governor from the majority race in the islands, meeting the philosophy of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator can carry that philosophy to any extreme he wishes. We recognize in this country one rule of citizenship. It makes no difference what the racial root may be, one rule of citizenship applies. It applies under the same flag in Hawaii. I decline to be drawn into any effort to subdivide racially American citizens by sovereign right, every one of them, for the purpose of supporting the Senator's effort to inject an external Governor into the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, the Senator by that remark and by refusing to be drawn into a discussion of this kind, after he himself has said that our whole basic structure is one of no racial line, infers by his answer that he would favor the appointment of a Japanese citizen of the United States as Governor of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator may draw his own conclusion. I suppose the Senator from Maryland would rise now and in similar philosophy say that because there are more Negroes in Mississippi than white men, there ought always to be a Negro Governor of Mississippi.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; that is what the Senator from Michigan has been saying.

Mr. VANDENBERG. On the contrary. The Senator is saying that any American citizen is entitled to be Governor of Mississippi if he qualifies as a citizen of Mississippi. In the same analogy he is saying that any American citizen who is a citizen of Hawaii, whether his roots be Japanese, Chinese, Polynesian, or Maryland, is entitled to be Governor of the Hawaiian Islands, if he otherwise qualifies and is acceptable to the President of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield further?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Gladly.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has been laying down the proposition that those people live in complete amity, that everything is beautiful in the Hawaiian Islands. He describes the leper colony. He describes the school which was a marvel of patriotism and citizenship.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator from Maryland deny any of it?

Mr. TYDINGS. He was for local self-government carried to the *n*th power, and I only want to find out whether or not, in view of the wide territory he took in, there is any limitation. Now I find there is no limitation, that he is for local self-government by a group of Hawaiians who happen to come within the Caucasian race.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has completely misstated what I said. I will state it so the Senator cannot misstate it. I am in favor of a Governor of Hawaii who is a bona fide resident of Hawaii and a bona fide citizen of the United States. I decline to inquire into his religion, his race, his parents, his creed, or his politics, or the color of his hair.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then if there is a bona fide resident of the Hawaiian Islands who is a citizen of the United States, all other things being equal the Senator has no objection whatsoever to his being a Japanese by racial derivation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If he is appointed Governor by the President of the United States, and there is no objection against him except of racial root, he is entitled to be Governor. I should like to know whether the Senator objects to that answer.

Mr. TYDINGS. I certainly do. I am not in accord with that philosophy. I think there must be by some equation limitations even upon that theory of local self-government, and the Hawaiian Islands are a very pronounced exception.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thought we started out on the basis that Thomas Jefferson said, "All men are created equal."

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Michigan started out on that basis.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I did not mention Jefferson. The Senator from Maryland brought him out. Since we are on Jefferson and Jeffersonian principles, I should like to go a little farther in that direction.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question before he takes up Jefferson?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am going to take up the Jeffersonian party, not Jefferson. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any contention here or any fear expressed that if the joint resolution is defeated we are going to have a Japanese appointed Governor of Hawaii?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No.

Mr. NORRIS. That relieves me very much.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not unless the Senator from Maryland insists upon it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Gladly.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask the Senator from Michigan if he believes that Mr. Jefferson told the truth when he said that all men are created equal?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think he thought he did.

Mr. GLASS. I think if he were living now he would change his mind. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am sure he would; and if he were living now and were to come to Washington and inspect some of the legislative structure that has been built under the auspices of his party during the last 100 days, I think he would turn usually to the Republican side of the aisle to find Jeffersonian principles exemplified, with occasionally an exception in such able and faithful Jeffersonians as the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I think he would not walk on the same side of the road with many of us on either side of the Senate Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. But now let us come back to carpetbagging. I have referred to the fact that the organic law is a contract with the people of the Hawaiian Islands. I think perhaps I ought to refresh the recollection of Senators regarding that particular situation.

These islands were annexed to the United States in 1898. The organic act was adopted in 1900. Section 5 of the organic act provides that "The Constitution and all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within said territory as elsewhere in the United States." Thereby the Constitution became the constitution of the islands and the laws of the United States became the laws of the islands.

Section 4 provides that all persons who are residents of the Republic of Hawaii on August 12, 1898, "and all the citizens of the United States who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for 1 year, shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii."

Note this language, referring to the Governor:

> He shall be not less than 35 years of age, and he shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii.

Therefore no one could be Governor unless he had resided in Hawaii for 1 year or more until 1921, when that particular section was amended. In 1921 section 66 of the act was amended by inserting, after the provision that the Governor shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii, a requirement that he shall have resided therein 3 years next preceding his appointment, in lieu of the 1-year residential requirement.

Mr. President, there was a reason for that change from 1 year to 3, and it is a very significant thing why and how the change happened to be made in 1921. The principal reason was that L. E. Pinkham had been appointed Governor and he was not a bona fide resident of Hawaii at the time of appointment. He had been in the Philippine Islands and China gathering up coolie labor for some of the sugar plantations, and when he was appointed Governor he brought with him—and I am now quoting the language of one of the California Members of the House who is intimately related to the problem—"a lot of carpetbaggers, with resulting misrule and dissatisfaction." In other words, the requirement for the 3-year residency was written in 1921 for the specific purpose of trying to erect a further barrier against the precise type of carpetbagging which we are now asked to justify in the pending legislation. This is not a "new deal." It is an old deal, a repudiated deal.

So there is the organic act; there is the fundamental contract between the American people and the citizens of Hawaii; and it is that contract which, for some undisclosed reason, we are being asked to nullify and reject in respect to this fundamental right in the closing moments of this session, without any adequate or conclusive inquiry.

There are some other contracts in existence, Mr. President. It has been said a good many times on the floor of the Senate that the platforms of political parties are contracts. If any Senators upon this side of the aisle intend to vote upon this bill in the light of the obligation that binds them in the literal terms of their Republican Party platform, I should like to read them the following language. I am quoting from the recent Republican Party platform of 1932:

> We believe that the existing status of self-government which for many years has been enjoyed by the citizens of the Territory of Hawaii should be maintained, and that officials appointed to administer the government should be bona fide residents of the Territory.

There is no question about what that means.

Mr. President, apparently nothing was said in the Democratic platform of 1932 regarding the Hawaiian situation. They were undertaking to write a condensed platform, and I think they set a magnificent precedent in that respect. They could not deal in detail with everything which it heretofore has been the practice to cover almost ad infinitum, ad nauseum, in these poltical platforms; but that does not mean that there is not a long and continuous line of Democratic precedent which, I respectfully submit to my colleagues across the aisle, challenges any invasion of this particular home-rule right in Hawaii except as there is an absolute commanding reason to do it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator spoke a moment ago of "the recent Republican Party platform." Did he not mean the "recent platform of the Republican Party"? [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator can take his own choice. In either event, whether it be before or after the fact, the Republican Party and the Senator from Maine are committed to bona fide residency as the prime requisite in the selection of a Governor of Hawaii.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very gladly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am induced to make this suggestion because of the suggestion made in the recent interruption. Evidently we are trying to get somewhat technical. Does the Senator mean now by his language that the Senator from Maine is not a member of the Republican Party? The Senator said "the Republican Party and the Senator from Maine." [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. I spoke inclusively, and I wanted particularly to identify the Senator from Maine, so that if he should wander at all in his political attachments in the next 24 hours he would know where he could find the home plate. [Laughter.]

Now, let us see what the long-standing Democratic commitment is upon this subject. I repeat that it seems to me this carries a serious challenge with it. We can start back in 1904, which is one of the first chances the Democratic Party had to speak in respect to this matter, when the situation was comparatively new and when there had not been developed so large a body of Hawaiian citizenship which might qualify for the governorship within the language of the organic act:

> We hold that the officials appointed to administer the government of any Territory * * * should be bona fide residents at the time of their appointment for the Territory * * * in which their duties are to be performed.

There is no question about what that means.

Here is another sample—the platform of the Democratic Party adopted at St. Louis in 1916:

> We favor granting to the people of Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico the traditional territorial government accorded to all Territories of the United States since the beginning of our Government, and we believe that the officials appointed to administer the government of these several Territories should be qualified by previous bona fide residence.

That is 1916. We come up to 1928; and these three examples ought to suffice. In 1928, at Houston, the Democratic platform said:

> We favor the development of Alaska and Hawaii in the traditional American way through self-government. We favor the appointment of only bona fide residents to office in the Territories.

There cannot be any doubt or equivocation about the construction to be put upon that.

Mr. President, every commitment that has been made by either political party in the United States for the last 30 years is at war with the proposal which is pending at the bar of the Senate. Every letter and every bit of the spirit of the organic act, which virtually amounted originally to a treaty between two Republics—the Republic of Hawaii and the Republic of the United States—every scintilla of it is at war with any proposition suddenly to precipitate a carpetbagging governor upon them.

Mr. President, every fundamental element of Anglo-Saxon fair play, and every traditional American theory of home rule are at war with the proposition which is brought to us seeking to win our consent to the destruction of the key authority in respect to home rule in the Hawaiian Islands. I submit that in spite of all the temporary difficulties which they may have had, and in spite of any difficulties yet remaining, we are not entitled to invade that fundamental right upon any such flimsy pretext.

We have serial troubles in our own United States, Mr. President. The Senator from Maryland speaks about racial difficulties. We have, upon occasion, very serious racial difficulties in States within our own continental country; but when we have them we do not promptly propose to take their governorship away from them and give them an absentee overlord. There is lawlessness in the United States upon more than one front. There are rackets in Chicago, and rackets in Detroit and elsewhere, and outlawry—literally outlawry—in connection with them; but I have not heard anybody suggest that we should rob those sovereign States of their governors, or their right to be governed by one of their own citizens, just because of these transient difficulties.

Ever so often there is a disclosure in New York of rotten, filthy government under the auspices of Tammany Hall. Mr. President, if upon the heels of every such disclosure as that we were to take the governorship away from the people of New York, I doubt if there would have been many minutes in the last 100 years that they would not have been ruled by someone from the outside. No; that is not the way it works.

Inasmuch as the citizens of Hawaii—not citizens of a possession, but citizens of a Territory—have every right that you and I possess under the flag and meet every responsibility and every duty that you and I confront under the flag, inasmuch as they are absolutely equal copartners with us in our Americanism, I submit that we are not entitled on the summary spur of an expedient moment, without any showing of adequate need for the offense, to tear up the most fundamental thing in the organic act and to superimpose a carpetbagging government upon the people in the Territory of Hawaii.

SUSPENSION OF SECTION 18 OF EXECUTIVE REORGANIZATION ORDER

During the delivery of Mr. VANDENBERG's speech,

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I observe the presence of the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] at the moment, and therefore call up the matter to which I am about to refer.

A few days ago I introduced a joint resolution (S.J.Res. 63) disapproving section 18 of the Executive order of June 10, 1933, relating to the organization of executive agencies. The joint resolution called for the abolition of section 18 of the Executive order sent to the Congress by the President on last Friday. That section refers to vocational education, agricultural experiment stations, and so forth. At the time I brought up the matter the Senator from Arkansas thought there would be a chance of coming to an understanding with respect to the matter. In an informal conversation yesterday I understood the Senator to say the President would be willing temporarily to suspend the Executive order until 60 days after the convening of Congress in January.

The joint resolution which I have introduced provides for a permanent abolition of the Executive order referring to those agencies of the Government. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has a joint resolution pending suspending temporarily the order until 60 days after the beginning of the next session of Congress.

I am willing, in conformance to the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas and the President of the United States, to accept the proposal and will offer a modified form of joint resolution to conform to the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho, which calls for temporary suspension of the Executive order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall make no objection to the submission of the joint resolution. I should like to have it read.

Mr. McNARY. I ask to have it read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 63) temporarily suspending section 18 of the Executive order of June 10, 1933, relating to the organization of executive agencies, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of title IV of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933, as amended, the provisions of section 18 of the Executive order providing for certain regroupings, consolidations, transfers, and abolitions of executive agencies and functions thereof, transmitted to the Congress on June 10, 1933, and printed in House Document No. 69, Seventy-third Congress, first session, shall be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the convening of the next session of the Congress, and for 60 days thereafter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I see the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon present this as a substitute for his other joint resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. That is the joint resolution I proposed a few days ago, modified after conference with the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BORAH. This covers four propositions.

Mr. McNARY. It covers section 18, which embraces the four activities of these agencies of government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the only suggestion I have to make to the Senator from Oregon is an amendment in the nature of a correction. I think the words in the second written line should be "are" instead of "is", the language being:

The provisions of section 18 * * * be and the same is hereby suspended.

I think it should be "are hereby suspended."

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let me say that this language has the effect of preventing section 18 of the President's Executive order from going into effect until 60 days after the meeting of the next session of Congress, which will afford ample opportunity, first, for such revisions as the President himself may desire to make with regard to section 18; and, second, it will afford an opportunity for the Congress to pass finally upon the question as to whether the section, either as it now is or as it may hereafter be modified, shall go into effect.

I shall not make any objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, before the joint resolution is passed I desire to ask a question of the Senator. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Oregon to one feature of this consolidation which particularly affects the Senate and the House, and really ought to be included in the resolution of suspension.

The Senator will recall that in 1916 Congress created what is called a Public Buildings Commission—that is, a Commission composed of Members of the Senate and the House, the Architect of the Capitol, and others—for the purpose of keeping the control of the public buildings here in the District within the Congress, rather than turning them over to the executive branch of the Government.

Under this Executive order the Public Buildings Commission has been abolished as a legislative organization and transferred to the Department of the Interior. I happen to be a member of it. It is of no consequence to me personally, because it only involves a lot of work, and gives no honor whatever; but other members of the Commission, who have been on it a great number of years, seem to feel that it is not properly within the scope of this reorganization Executive order, because it is not strictly an executive function at all. It is a legislative function, because it is created by Congress, and it is under the control of Congress. I think it ought to be included in this suspension, in order that we may look into the matter between now and the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator from Texas in what section this is found?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is under section 2—National Parks and Buildings.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should have no objection to that being included, but I am very much afraid we will get so much in this joint resolution that it will encounter trouble in the House.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that this Commission has only one clerk. That is all the expense it involves. If we put it in the Interior Department, it will probably have 3 or 4 or 5 clerks.

The only expense to the Government of maintaining this Commission is the employment of one secretary. The important thing is that the present organization of the Commission leaves Congress in control of the public buildings here in the District and the space within those buildings, and does not turn them over to the executive branches, which are extravagant of space and extravagant of money and everything else.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not regard the amendment suggested by the Senator from Texas as of controlling importance. I shall not make any objection if the Senator from Texas offers that as an amendment to this joint resolution; and it has been suggested to me by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and by others that the language embraced in section 2, namely, "the national cemeteries of the War Department which are located within the continental limits of the United States", might very well be inserted in the joint resolution. I do not wish to offer these amendments if the Senators who propose the joint resolution object to them; but, if there be no objection, I express my willingness to consent to the amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not quite sure of my attitude with regard to that matter at this time. May I have the assurance, or is the Senator from Arkansas in position to give me the assurance, that the passage or acceptance of this joint resolution will be controlling with the President?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is my information that the President of the United States has so written his Executive order that he is at liberty, at any time he chooses, to modify it. According to my understanding, he is content that the provisions of the joint resolution of the Senator from Oregon or that of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], suspending section 18, may be put into effect, with the understanding, of course, that he may see fit to modify the section to which those joint resolutions refer.

Mr. McNARY. That brings up the point I desire briefly to develop. This Senate joint resolution, of course, requires cooperative action by the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. And if adjournment should occur today, it is possible that action could not be had.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. If I thought the President would be satisfied to accept the expression of the judgment of the Senate. I would modify the joint resolution and make it a Senate resolution, relying upon his acting upon that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have not discussed that matter with the President, and I should not feel warranted in seeking to bind the President further than that I feel at liberty to say that it is my opinion that the President does not object to suspending the order as to section 18, if that be urged by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McNARY. That is the understanding I obtained from the discussion of the Senator from Arkansas. I am not trying to place him in the attitude of speaking directly for the President; but if I believed the President would suspend the operation under section 18 until 60 days following the convening of Congress in January I should be willing to rely upon that as a sufficient record, or I should be willing and should be happy indeed to simplify the situation by making this a Senate resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not understand that a Senate resolution has any force or effect in such a matter.

Mr. McNARY. Not at all. I am not claiming for it anything other than that it is a mere expression of the Senate on the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would not want this to be a Senate resolution, because, if the President is going to accept this, he will accept it as willingly in the form of a joint resolution passed by the Senate as he would in the form of a Senate resolution passed by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is what I was about to remark when I was interrupted. I do not understand that there will be any difficulty about the matter; but I should not like to state that the President, upon the passage of a Senate resolution, would feel bound by the resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of that situation and the necessity of acting promptly by messaging this joint resolution to the House, I would rather not have any amendments offered to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption? The Senator from Arkansas has called attention to that unfortunate part of section 2 which transfers all the national cemeteries to the Department of the Interior. The Senator from Arkansas is exactly right about that. Senators can imagine what preposterous confusion would result when they consider that no one is entitled to be buried in those cemeteries until the War Department has searched its records and found his military status, and when he is buried a military party of pallbearers and escort has to turn out for the funeral—and they average nine a day over here in Arlington—and then, when the headstone is put up the War Department has to prescribe what goes on it. The rank and service of the man, and all that, has to be put on it. Everything is done by the War Department, and it will have to continue to do it; and we shall get into the most terrible confusion if the Interior Department tries to administer it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think I can say to the Senators who are primarily interested in this joint resolution that it is not my opinion that the incorporation in the joint resolution of "national cemeteries of the War Department which are located within the continental limits of the United States" will make the slightest difference with regard to the passage of the joint resolution in the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will accept that amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I am wholly in accord with the views expressed by my colleagues from Pennsylvania and from Arkansas, except that I do not want to complicate this proposition by adding too much luggage when we only have probably a day, and not more than 2 days, for action.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Senator is entirely right about it. If I thought any controversy would arise about the national cemeteries, I would not consent to their inclusion.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I am willing to have that incorporated.

Mr. REED. The Senator says he is willing to accept it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the following amendment to be inserted at the proper place in the joint resolution:

Also, that portion of section 2 which relates to national cemeteries of the War Department which are located within the continental limits of the United States—

And so forth.

If the Senator from Texas wishes to offer an amendment, I suggest that he do so now.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have an amendment.

Mr. McNARY. May it be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Oregon accepts the amendments that have been proposed?

Mr. McNARY. I have accepted the amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania a moment ago, the language of which was stated by the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair assumes that the Senator has a right to modify his joint resolution.

Mr. McNARY. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the joint resolution, the following words:

and that part of section 2 providing for the transfer of the Public Buildings Commission to the Department of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator also accept that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is my understanding that that is a legislative commission.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments offered from the floor to the proposal of the Senator from Oregon will be considered as amendments to the original proposal; and, without objection, they are agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I merely wish to make an appeal to the Senator from Arkansas. I am so vitally interested in section 18 of the order that I wish to make a personal appeal to the Senator to do all that he can, consistently and properly, to assist in getting action upon this joint resolution in the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have an invariable rule; I never assume responsibility for action in the body at the other end of the Capitol, nor do I attempt to influence action there. I think there are sound reasons for that policy. However, I can make this statement, that whether the resolution passes the House or not in my judgment is not likely to make very much difference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is very gratifying.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not mean, of course, to cast any reflection on the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The statement might be misunderstood. What I mean is, that I have talked with the President about the matter, and he feels that if there is a sentiment in the Senate that section 18 ought to be suspended, I would be justified in consenting to it, in view of the conditions as to time under which the Executive order reached the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood perfectly that the Senator did not refer to the House, but referred to the President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Executive likely will respond to the purpose of the resolution, whether it actually becomes effective or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was because my understanding was that that was the import of the Senator's statement that I expressed my whole-hearted gratification that the Senator was in a position to make it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD sundry telegrams concerning the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MADISON, WIS., June 11, 1933.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Just received wire from Wright, "Executive order abolishes board and transfers functions to Interior, also provides for 25-percent reduction in all appropriations, including extension work and land-grant colleges." Result of cut in Federal aid will disintegrate work in Wisconsin. Abolishing board takes administrative from sympathetic control.

GEO. P. HAMBRECHT.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 12, 1933

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

President's Executive order, June 10, cutting vocational education appropriations 25 percent and transferring board strongly opposed by labor. Have matter put over to next Congress if possible.

JOHN KLATT,
Business Manager Sheet Metal Workers' Union.

APPLETON, WIS., June 12, 1933.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Elimination of Federal Board for Vocational Education as recommended in Executive reorganization order will seriously wreck Wisconsin vocational program. Use your influence to delay this order until we have an opportunity to be heard. Perpetuation of our program is at stake.

H. G. NOYES.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 12, 1933.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Rehabilitation and vocational education work will be thoroughly disorganized by the proposed action under the President's Executive order of June 10, which transfers functions of Federal Board to Department of Interior and cuts appropriations 25 percent. Vocational education work is drop of oil applied directly on squeak in machinery. It is public work, self-liquidating, and of the kind the Government is trying to promote. Why wreck one successful piece of work when endeavoring hastily to construct another? This order should be laid over until the next Congress.

R. L. COOLEY,
Director of Vocational Education.

GREENBAY, WIS., June 14, 1933.

The Honorable ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Senate Chamber.

DEAR SIR: One thousand five hundred Wisconsin vocation educators protest most emphatically the Executive order abolishing the Federal Board for Vocational Education. Party opportunism and political and personal pinch hitting are exacting a heavy tribute from 100,000 youths and adults in Wisconsin vocational schools at the present time. The same fundamental principles and basic reasons which established the Federal Board for Vocational Education in its inception as an administrative unit in cooperative education obtain as peculiarly today as they did in 1917, save that the present social and economic distress of the working-learning groups augment and emphasize anew the permanency and full force of those principles. Vocational-education people everywhere—and I know that I am voicing not alone my own personal opinion and feeling in this matter—deprecate, resent, and denounce the above action of the President, and will hold the political leaders concerned to a full accounting of their duties and responsibilities to their constituents back home. This is no idle threat. The right of the working people to a free education is inviolate and will be preserved. As a representative of the Wisconsin Vocational Education Association, I ask you, therefore, in all seriousness and candor to uphold the present administration and set-up of the Federal Board without reservation or compromise.

Remaining, I am very sincerely yours,

L. H. WOCHOS,
President Wisconsin Vocational Association.

SHEBOYGAN, WIS., June 14, 1933.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate:

One hundred fifty veterans attending our local vocational school respectfully ask your support in keeping present status of Federal Board for Vocational Education. This school depends on Federal Board for guidance, and any change would disrupt our local situation.

EX-SERVICE MENS PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION.
KENNETH CRANE, President.
VERNE PERRY, Secretary.

GREENBAY, WIS., June 14, 1933.

Senator LA FOLLETTE:

I urge you to oppose recommendation to abolish the Federal Board of Vocational Education. It will impair the future of students who cannot afford a college education, as well as adults.

F. J. TIMMERMAN.

MADISON, WIS., June 12, 1933.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D.C.:

Your Executive order to abolish Federal Board for Vocational Education and transfer its functions to Interior Department, also reducing all Federal aids 25 percent will result in material disintegration of vocational and rehabilitation programs now set up in behalf of our working people, rural and urban, employed and unemployed. Abolishing Federal Board takes administration out from under sympathetic control. On behalf of the working people of America I sincerely hope you may see your way clear to rescind that part of your Executive order which in effect would deprive hundreds of thousands of our working people of educational and rehabilitation courses.

GEO. P. HAMBRECHT,
State Board of Vocational Education.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 13, 1933.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.:

Very much surprised to learn of the abolition of Federal Board for Vocational Education and cut of 25 percent in vocational funds. I cannot believe that this is the President's wish, but rather that of Mr. Douglas, who, as an enemy of vocational education, sees an opportunity to destroy education for working people. If ever the country would back a filibuster I believe it would now. Many destructive things are being done under the disguise of economy. The enemies of vocational education never sleep. If this order goes into effect, it is the death knell of vocational education as far as it being effective in the lives of working people.

J. E. TEPOORTEN,
Director Cudahy Vocational School.

GREENBAY, WIS., June 13, 1933.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.,
United States Senator, Washington, D.C.:

I understand that President Roosevelt has recommended the abolishment of Federal Board for Vocational Education. I urge that you oppose this move, which will impair the future of the unemployed youth and adult.

M. J. KETTER,
General Superintendent, Hoberg Paper & Fibre Co.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have received a large number of telegrams similar to the one which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and I ask to have two of these communications inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BROOKLYN, N.Y., June 15, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND:

The faculty of the Brooklyn Industrial High School for Girls respectfully urges you to support measure to withdraw the President's Executive order of June 10 transferring functions of the Federal Board to Department of Interior and reducing vocational and rehabilitation appropriations 25 percent until Congress has time to give due consideration to the proposal.

FACULTY.

DUNKIRK, N.Y., June 15, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND:

Members these organizations urge your opposing President's order reducing vocational appropriations. Such action considered hasty at this time.

DUNKIRK CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
DUNKIRK MERCHANTS EXCHANGE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to object to these amendments of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Oregon, who are better informed as to the situation than I am, but I do not feel that the President had in mind anything except section 18.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is entirely true, if the Senator from Michigan will permit me to state just a word in his time. I have not discussed either of these amendments with the President, and it is upon my own responsibility entirely that I am assuming to consent to the amendments.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I want to say a word about Senate bill 1930, introduced by me.

Mr. BORAH. The resolution has not yet been disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that the resolution of the Senator from Oregon has not yet been acted on.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is very appropriate that the Senator from Vermont should make his remarks now, as he has an amendment covering the same subject matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I rise only to observe that I have introduced a bill relating to the same subject matter, but that in the present parliamentary situation I shall be content to go along with the pending joint resolution and support it, particularly in view of the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas.

I want to make just this observation, that though this joint resolution does not fully represent my views regarding the powers of the President, and the exercise of them under the authority which the Congress gave him, nevertheless I believe it expedient to go along with the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Idaho in this matter and not raise any objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to offer an amendment to the proposal made by the Senator from Oregon. I cannot, however, permit this joint resolution to pass without indicating my grave doubt as to the wisdom of transferring in their entirety the functions and the responsibilities of the Shipping Board to the Department of Commerce.

The Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation have a multitude of duties and responsibilties. There are many operative functions of both which I think might well be transferred to the Department of Commerce, but the Shipping Board is a regulatory body, having quasi-judicial functions. It has a wide range of authority over water rates in both interstate and foreign commerce. It has jurisdiction, and it acts, when it exercises that jurisdiction, in a judicial capacity, over rates, rebates, discriminations, preferences and practices of water carriers and all manner of questions of that sort. It is utterly inconceivable to me that those authorities can properly be transferred to and be exercised by an official of the Department of Commerce.

I have grave fear that whatever of value there is in the present law with respect to the regulation and control of rates and practices of steamship companies in both our interstate and in our foreign commerce will be lost by this wholesale transfer. I fear we shall, by this transfer, render ineffective a large body of law designed to control water carriers and to protect shippers. I want this expression of my views to be of record.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am deeply interested in having favorable action on the joint resolution of the Senator from Oregon. I think it is of the highest importance that this Executive order, insofar as section 18 is concerned, should be suspended.

I find the educational authorities of Kansas gravely disturbed over the order. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a telegram I have received from F. D. Farrell, president of the Kansas State College, in which he says that this order would seriously impair the ability of colleges to help in national agricultural readjustment.

There is a similar telegram from President W. A. Brandenburg, of the Kansas College, at Pittsburg; also a letter from Dr. R. A. Pearson, chairman of the executive committee of the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, and another from Mr. C. M. Miller, director of the State Board for Vocational Education of the State of Kansas. I ask that all these communications be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., June 13, 1933.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER:

Hope you will support action to reject or postpone President's proposal to reduce Federal appropriations to land-grant colleges. Proposed reductions, now that States have made drastic cuts, would seriously impair ability of colleges to help in national agricultural readjustment.

F. D. FARRELL.

PITTSBURG, KANS., June 14, 1933.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D.C.:

Executive order abolishing Federal board and reducing Federal aids to vocational education and all land-grant college activities disastrous to educational program in Kansas beyond description. Concerted movement on all forces to induce President to withdraw his eleventh-hour and unexpected order. If effort not successful, hope Executive order is either defeated or legislative action preventing confirming. Kansas needs your help in this matter.

W. A. BRANDENBURG, President.

ASSOCIATION OF LAND-GRANT COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES,
June 13, 1933.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Referring to our conversation regarding the section in the President's reorganization order which relates to Federal appropriations to land-grant institutions:

The proposed reduction of 25 percent in these appropriations will save the Government approximately $4,000,000. Support of one of the most effective agencies of relief in these trying times will be reduced by that amount, when enormous sums of money, running high in the millions, are being provided for new activities, most of them temporary, to combat the wide-spread effects of the depression. It is proper to raise the question as to whether the sum of $4,000,000, or two or three times that amount, expended on a new and more or less experimental activity will produce as much relief to deserving citizens of this country as would be provided by the money that is now to be cut off.

The land-grant institutions—one in each State—are a going concern. They have been performing in a highly successful way for a long time the duties called for by both Federal and State laws. The benefits of their work are always greatest in times of national economic stress. It was so during the World War. It has been the same during the past 10 or 12 years when agriculture has been suffering continuously. Without the assistance given by these institutions the agricultural situation today would be far more deplorable than it is. The people who are in charge of the land-grant institutions know intimately agriculture throughout the entire country. To cut off about 25 percent of the effectiveness of this organization seems like a fanciful type of saving. The crippling of the work will affect many farmers and, in turn, many other occupations and the national welfare.

President Roosevelt himself said only a few months ago in reference to the work of the land-grant institutions, "I think it would be nothing short of a disaster if any of this work were seriously curtailed. Particularly in these times when farmers are having such a desperate struggle to maintain themselves I think it supremely important that they should have the benefit of the expert advice that colleges, experiment stations, and extension services are able to give them, and it is equally important that we should continue to hold out to their children opportunities for an education that will make them something more than field drudges."

As a thorough believer in agricultural education and in agricultural research and extension work, the President made this unqualified statement. At the same time he approved equally the "lesser schools of agriculture", such as are being conducted under the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

We believe the President expressed not only his own best judgment but the best judgment of the great majority of intelligent people. We do not think he has changed his mind, but it is difficult to reconcile his emphatic preelection statement with the action now indicated, unless it is that he has been wrongly advised. For the sake of the millions of people who are depending on land-grant institutions for advice and help, we hope the President's order will be held in abeyance, so that our work will not have to be severely curtailed at this critical time.

Very truly yours,

R. A. PEARSON,
Chairman Executive Committee.

STATE BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION,
Topeka, Kans., June 13, 1933.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: You will have received my wire protesting against the Executive order which transfers the functions of the Federal Board for Vocational Education to the Department of the Interior and reduces appropriations for vocational education.

If I had asked it of the people interested in vocational education, several thousand telegrams would have reached you by this time protesting against this order, for Congress has had no opportunity to give consideration to the proposal and cannot know the far-reaching effect of the order.

To transfer the functions of the Federal Board for Vocational Education to the Department of the Interior cannot but seriously interrupt the work that is being done by that Board. Those engaged in vocational education for the past 15 years are thoroughly committed to the principle of a Federal Board for Vocational Education on which the major industries of the country have representation, for vocational education under a representative board is kept flexible so as to meet the needs of workers in these industries.

It has been the universal experience that where vocational education is administered by the academically minded traditional type of school administrator, it has become stereotyped and inflexible. The educational needs of the workingman are lost sight of. Kansans who are familiar with the vocational-education program are unanimous in urging that you help preserve a Federal Board for Vocational Education on which the major industries of the country are represented.

Education has a large part in any program of emergency relief. In many States, including Kansas, the State board for vocational education has assisted in relief programs to the limit of available funds. They stand willing to do so now. To withdraw funds from this program which is organized so flexibly as to render really worth-while educational service to unemployed as well as to employed groups, and at the same time to appropriate millions of dollars for use in heretofore untried emergency-relief work is not economy. It is extravagance of the worst sort. There can be no justification for it.

You will be rendering education in Kansas a real service if you oppose the Executive order referred to above at least until Congress has had opportunity to give the matter careful consideration.

Sincerely yours,

C. M. MILLER, Director.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, we are very much interested in Idaho, and in the West generally, in the joint resolution which has been under consideration. I should like to have inserted in the RECORD a telegram from the Governor of Idaho in regard to this matter, as well as a telegram from the president of our State university, giving in some detail an analysis of the situation in that State and a statement of the effect of the Executive order.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOISE, IDAHO, June 14, 1933.

Hon. JAMES P. POPE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

President Roosevelt's order of June 10 places Federal Board for Vocational Education in Department of Interior and cuts appropriation for vocational education and rehabilitation 25 percent will seriously cripple vocational work in Idaho. That part of the order affecting vocational education and rehabilitation should be eliminated.

C. BEN ROSS, Governor.

MOSCOW, IDAHO, June 13, 1933.

Senator J. P. POPE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Have just received word that Executive order has come from President reducing Federal appropriation for teaching research and experimentation in land-grant colleges 25 percent. Feel that I would not be doing my duty as president of University of Idaho if I did not protest against this reduction as being excessive and therefore unjust. I hope that this Executive order will either be disapproved or negatively received by the Senate.

Regards,

M. G. NEALE,
President University of Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of title IV of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933, as amended, the provisions of section 18, the portion of section 2 which relates to national cemeteries of the War Department which are located within the continental limits of the United States, and that part of section 2 providing for the transfer of the Public Buildings Commission to the Department of the Interior, of the Executive order providing for certain regroupings, consolidations, transfer, and abolitions of executive agencies and functions thereof, transmitted to the Congress on June 10, 1933, and printed in House Document No. 69, Seventy-third Congress, first session, shall be, and the same are hereby, suspended until the convening of the next session of the Congress and for 60 days thereafter.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution temporarily suspending section 18 and portions of section 2 of the Executive order of June 10, 1933, relating to the organization of executive agencies."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I thought it would be unfair to the Senator from Oregon to offer any more amendments to his joint resolution; it might have jeopardized its chances of passage. But I hope before leaving Washington to be able to make an appeal to the President to consider again his action in taking all of the military procurement from the Army and Navy Departments and putting it in the Treasury Department.

As we all learned to our cost in the last war, the purchasing authorities of the Army cannot be too closely tied to the combatant part of the Army. In military purchases the important thing is promptness and readiness to serve the combatant branch. Economy, while always important, is secondary to the efficiency of the purchasing department in other respects.

It would make for great disorganization to endeavor to conduct a war with the Treasury doing all the purchasing for the Army and the Navy. In case of war, those purchasing powers would have to be put back into the military departments.

If this Executive order went into effect in its present form, it would mean that when war came and the transfer back to the military departments was made, there would be no trained personnel there to assume this function again. From the military standpoint, with which the President is himself so experienced, and on which he is, I believe, entirely sound, I think he himself will see that the transfer from those two departments is unwise.

Then, too, in another respect the order does some very striking injustices. Section 8 of the order consolidates the Bureau of Internal Revenue with the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol. That of itself does not sound very important, but when we turn to section 21, under "Definitions", we find that the term "abolished agency" means any agency which is abolished, transferred, or consolidated. Consequently, the Bureau of Internal Revenue is an abolished agency. Then, if we go back to section 19, we find that "all personnel employed in connection with the work of an abolished agency"—which includes the Bureau of Internal Revenue—"shall be separated from the service of the United States, except that the head" of the agency, subject to the President's approval, may, within 4 months, reappoint any personnel.

The result of that is that this Executive order dismisses from the Government service all of the 12,000 employees now in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, 3,500 of them in Washington and 8,500 in the field. How it can make for good government or for economy or for efficiency to fire the entire personnel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue is beyond my comprehension. I doubt whether the President, in signing the order, realized that it would have that effect.

I hope the Senator from Arkansas and others who are close to the President may, if they see fit, call the attention of the President to those two matters.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I understand it, the Senator from Pennsylvania does not offer any amendment.

Mr. REED. No; I am not offering any amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall not attempt to discuss this subject or to reply to what has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania in the time of the Senator from Michigan. The points raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania relate to some of the largest and most important provisions in the Executive order. Of course, there is no objection to the Senator presenting the matter to the Executive himself, who will, I have no doubt, make such further study of the matter as he might find necessary.

Mr. REED. The Senator will understand that I am making these suggestions most respectfully and not in the way of criticism. I am not attacking the order; I am merely pointing out these things.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that, but I do not understand that the last feature of the order to which the Senator has referred has altogether the effect the Senator from Pennsylvania has attributed to it; but I will not trespass further on the time of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I merely want to express my gratification at the passage of the joint resolution. The four items embraced in section 18 were extremely important items from the standpoint of the West. They were items, generally speaking, in which the State matched funds with the National Government in one particular undoubtedly, and in the others, I think, as well. The reduction at the moment would have been very unfortunate, indeed. When I read the order casually when first presented, I thought that was the fact. Subsequently the figures were furnished me indicating it quite clearly. So the joint resolution which has been presented, introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and assented to by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is very important from the standpoint of the West; and, indeed, it is most gratifying that it should have been passed.

I had one letter as well concerning the cemeteries of the War Department, but upon that I do not desire to dwell. There are other matters in the Presidential order which, I think, as has been suggested, may be taken up with the Executive, and as he reserves the power at the end of the order I have no doubt that upon representations to him which will be of a persuasive or convincing character he will act as he might deem appropriate and will do what shall be just, because the latter part of the order, if Senators will recall, reads:

> Provided, That in case it shall appear to the President that the interests of economy require that any transfer, consolidation, or elimination be delayed beyond the date this order becomes effective, he may, in his discretion, fix a later date therefor, and he may for like cause further defer such date from time to time.

I have no doubt there are various activities that are included in this order which ought to be presented to him which the limits of time and the multiplicity of his duties, and ours as well I might say, have precluded us from presenting in the formal manner in which this joint resolution presents the items embraced by it. I simply rose to express my gratification, as I suggested, that the joint resolution regarding section 18 had been passed.

RETIREMENT OF SENATOR STEPHENS FROM SPECIAL COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING HARRIMAN NATIONAL BANK

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I desire to occupy only a moment to make a very brief statement.

Some time ago the Senate adopted a resolution submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] providing for an investigation of the Department of Justice in the matter of its activities in reference to the Harriman Bank of New York City. The chairman of the committee [Mr. ASHURST] appointed me chairman of the subcommittee. Several hearings were held, and it was found necessary to go to New York City to complete the investigation. Due to the fact that we were so much engaged here, no member of the subcommittee desired to leave during the session, so that the hearings have not been concluded. The investigations will be carried on. For personal reasons I am very anxious to go to my own State. I could waive those reasons, and would do so, but I have a very substantial reason for the action I have taken.

Under a resolution offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] a special select committee was appointed to investigate labor conditions in the Mississippi River flood-control projects. I am a member of that subcommittee. The chairman informed me a few days ago that as soon as Congress adjourned he desired to begin that work. Of course, I am very anxious to attend the hearings of that particular committee. Learning this, I went to the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. ASHURST] and asked him to take my place as Chairman of the Harriman Bank Investigating Committee and conclude its work. He has very kindly agreed to do so. I simply want to make this explanation so that my reason for resigning from the first committee mentioned may be known.

After the conclusion of Mr. VANDENBERG's speech,

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5767) to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], with his usual thoroughness, has covered his side of this controversy in a most comprehensive way. Indeed, as I listened to his address I was reminded of an incident which occurred to me during the World War.

One dark night, while I was a considerable distance from the front, a soldier rushed by me headlong. I yelled at him to stop. He stopped and came back to where I was standing, and said, "Did you say 'Stop'?" Then I saw that he was a colored soldier. I said, "Yes." There had been some shooting going on up at the front, and he was facing in a direction opposite to that from which the explosions were coming at the time I accosted him. I said, "Yes; I said 'Stop.' Do you realize that you went by me without saluting?" He said, "Who are you?" I said, "I am an American officer." He said, "Great Lord! Have I run back that far?" [Laughter.]

The Senator from Michigan started at alpha and called every letter in the alphabet until omega was reached, working in symphonies from the Declaration of Independence and various other extracts which were extraneous to this matter. I know the Senator from Michigan well enough to know, and he knows himself well enough to know, that with the critical condition in the Pacific Ocean, with the critical condition in China, even though the citizen of the Hawaiian Islands and American citizen, forsooth—and I say this with no reflection upon the race—happened to be a Japanese preeminently qualified, he would under no circumstances endorse that man for Governor of the Hawaiian Islands; and when you concede that, where has your local self-government philosophy gone?

Local self-government is all-encompassing. The minute you cut the perimeter, all the inside of it escapes to the outside.

The Hawaiian Islands present the most complex race problem on the face of the earth. I say with pride and pleasure that up to very recently the antagonisms which might have existed have been absent, and there has been a degree of stability in government and amity and tolerance among the various people who compose its racial derivations which is noteworthy and which might be emulated even in the United States.

What are those racial divisions? The largest division is that of the Japanese, who have a population of 143,754. They are all excluded. The Senator from Michigan will not stand on this floor and say that he would advocate the appointment of a Japanese resident citizen of the United States as the Governor of the Hawaiian Islands. If he will advocate such a thing, I will give him a chance to do so now, for fear I have misconstrued his thought.

The third largest division is that of the Chinese, who have 27,313. The Japanese and the Chinese together make up nearly one half of the total population of the Hawaiian Islands. The rest of the population is scattered through the following: Asiatic Hawaiian, Portuguese, Puerto Rican, Korean, Filipino, and a very few of the Caucasian race. Those races make up the population. So that local self-government, boiled down, comes down to one thing only. The philosophy of those men on the other side of the aisle, almost to a unit, in selecting and applying the principle of local self-government, consists in the selection of one of the 18,000 either pure blood or almost wholly pure-blood Caucasians who inhabit those islands. Where is local self-government gone when only one tenth of the population of the Hawaiian Islands can ever hope to have a governor selected from their group? It is a fetish; it does not exist; it is made out of thin air, and will not stand up even before the tilting of Don Quixote. It is a windmill. There is no basis for local self-government in it. Standing out there, as those islands do, many thousand miles from the western coast of this country, fortified, as they are, as a naval base, with conditions of unrest in Asia, if for no other reason at all the 122,000,000 people who live in the United States are entitled to some consideration in the handling of this important problem. That is the listening post, the outpost, the military and naval center of any future drama, or romance, or tragedy, which might be written upon the blue waters of the Pacific.

When our President asks us, forsooth, in this important place, to give him a free hand, to get the very best governor he can find in this country to fit into the ramified conditions of that particular post, who is going to say him nay if we really revere our own country, and look for the protection of its future and the integrity of its people?

Mr. President, there is not a man in this Chamber, not one, who would stand upon this floor and say, "If there is a Japanese resident citizen of the United States in the Hawaiian Islands who permanently should wear the mantle of governor, I think he should be the governor." If there is such a man here, let him stand up now and declare himself. I do not hear any voice lifted. I do not see any Senators rising. If 40 percent of the resident citizens of the United States are excluded from this honor, where is the local self-government?

Some day we may have need to weigh well conditions surrounding the Hawaiian Islands, which, thank heaven, in this hour we do not seem to want to weigh very deeply. What objection can there be? The people of the Hawaiian Islands do not elect their governor. If they elected their governor, that would be one thing; but they have no more voice over the election of their governor than the Senator from Michigan has over the election of the Governor of Maryland. He is appointed, and what appointed official ever came under the mantle of local self-government? Local self-government means the right to govern yourself, and any people who have their governor appointed for them have not even color of title to local self-government.

Does the Senator want to let them elect their governor? Will he support a measure which would convey to the people of the Hawaiian Islands the right to elect their governor from one of their own? I would be interested in hearing the answer to that question, because then we would know that the combination of the Japanese and Chinese in the islands could select the governor, and would the Senator be satisfied to carry his beautiful philosophy to that point? Of course he would not. Brought to the test, he would say, "No; I do not think the conditions and the influences and circumstances which surround the Hawaiian Islands warrant as wide a departure from experience and history at this time." That may be off in the future, a century or a half a century or a decade or two decades, but no man here on this floor will advocate that the Governor of the Hawaiian Islands shall be selected and elected by the people of the Hawaiian Islands. There is not a man here who will rise and defend that. Where is the local self-government in the face of these observations?

I do not hear anybody advocating that. I have not seen any bills offered to accomplish that result. I do not know of any party which has gone on record as advocating that result. I know why those provisions are written into the Democratic and the Republican platforms just as well as the Senator does. The politicians write them in the platforms so that they can get the gravy at home. That is the way we pay them off for coming to the conventions. That is the way both parties pay them off, by giving them a little soothing sirup, to take back home a little patronage, so that they may name the governor from one of the ruling groups in the islands, who, in turn, will dispense whatever patronage there is without too wide a regard, in cases, for the welfare of the islanders themselves.

I had not intended to go into this matter, but this is interesting. An examination, from a source I will not disclose, but connected with the Government; not a recent one, but an authoritative investigation, nevertheless, shows that practically the entire economic life of the Hawaiian Islands is in the hands of five families. It is hard to find a citizen in those islands who has resided there for any length of time who is not the attorney for or directly or indirectly supported through the ramifications of these various industries there. That is all right. I am not saying that is a crime. No doubt these men were simply good business men, and as their affairs grew and their riches increased, they expanded their activities. But, be that as it may, it does not make any difference whether the Democrats are in control or the Republicans are in control, a small, organized group and clique are going to run the affairs of the islands.

Every commentator upon affairs in those islands mentions that fact. There are about five large families who control the sugar and the pineapple business and the fertilizer business of the islands.

What does the election of a resident Governor mean under those circumstances? It means the perpetration of a very small oligarchy in control of the entire economic life of those islands; and if economic influences are not more wide-spread than political influences and not closer and more intimate to the life of the people, then I should like to know what is closer and more intimately entwined with their welfare. If that is so, I submit that generally any Governor who is a resident and citizen of the Hawaiian Islands is likely to be so enmeshed in the interests and backgrounds of the ruling clique in those islands that he could not render a fair and impartial administration of affairs as Governor. He could not move without running into some economic influence with which he has had contact in a favorable way in the past. I am only telling the truth; that is all. I could read here the names of the corporations and the names of the stockholders, and show that four or five families control all of the basic operations in the Hawaiian Islands. When there is an oligarchy of that kind who names the Governor, where does any fine-spun philosophy of local government lead us?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the statement made by the Senator, undoubtedly true, is a very startling reminder that the same condition exists in the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. There are four or five large financial institutions which in one way or another control practically every activity in the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. There is no question about that; and think of the hypocrisy of a political party denouncing that kind of control in our own country and voting to perpetuate it in another.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me, as I look at it, that the argument made by the Senator, while a very imposing and impressive one, is not an argument in favor of this bill. What good does it do if people get out of the clutches of four or five corporations there and get into the clutches of one or two corporations here?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is right, if that happens; but I am hopeful that the President will take one who will not be within the clutches of either group—who will be in a position when he goes to the Hawaiian Islands to render equal and exact justice to all the elements concerned.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is postulating his argument now upon a statement which, with all due respect to him, I do not regard as accurate. I have made a great deal of investigation regarding the Hawaiian Islands. I know them well. My father lived there 12 years, and my information is that more than 52 percent of the stock of the companies to which the Senator refers is owned by people in the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Hawaiians were a homogeneous people, or even if they were not a homogeneous people, if there were only a few racial divisions; and if, notwithstanding those many racial divisions, such a degree of tolerance, such a degree of civilization, such a degree of humanity, such a degree of understanding obtained that citizens were elected or appointed to office without any division as to race or creed or color or what not, that would be one thing. But, as I have already pointed out, nearly half of the people of the Hawaiian Islands are of the Chinese or Japanese race, and nobody here contends that in this beautiful scheme of local self-government those people should receive the same consideration in the appointment of a governor that is accorded to one of Caucasian blood.

If that be the case, and if history shows that all of the economic life of the islands is held in the hands of four or five people, and that they have the power almost of life or death over the islands, and that they have selected practically all of the Governors heretofore selected in the islands, where does this beautiful theory about violating the rights of mankind come in at all? It is just simply nonexistent. It is a mirage, it is delusive, it leads us on in the promise of cool water when we are treading the desert under the sun, and when we get to what we think is the water all we find is that the beautiful mirage was but cactus reflected in the sky. That is all there is to this.

What is the practical situation? The President of the United States asks what? He sends a message to the Congress saying, "Because of peculiar conditions existing in the Hawaiian Islands at this time I should like to have my hands untied, to be free to select as Governor of the Hawaiian Islands the best man I can find, either in the islands themselves or upon the mainland." That is all he asks. The people of the Hawaiian Islands do not have the right to select their Governor now; he is appointed. No right is being taken away from them at all. They have no more voice in the selection of the Governor than I have in the selection of the Archbishop of Canterbury; not a bit. So let us get back to the practical, cold, common-sense, hard facts in this equation. Are we going to deny the Chief Executive the right to select from the largest field available the best man he can find to fit into this particular equation, on the one hand, or, on the other hand, with all these racial derivations, with all the likelihood of racial antipathy, with economic control in the hands of a few, are we going to compel him to make his selection solely from among those who are residents and citizens of the Hawaiian Islands? Lo and behold, even that selection carries only a 3-year residence.

It is assumed, from the eloquence of the Senator from Michigan, that the man who is going to be selected from the Hawaiian Islands was conceived there, was born there, educated there, and, praise God, will die there. As a matter of fact, under the law as it now exists he only has to be there 3 years; and so, if 3 years ago there was a prophet in the United States who foresaw the Democratic victory and wanted to become Governor of Hawaii, all he had to do was to go out to the islands at that time and he would now be just as eligible for appointment to the governorship of the Hawaiian Islands as would be a man who was 65 years old and who had spent every day of his life there.

I ask that we give the President the authority which, after viewing the situation from all its angles and ramifications and taking into consideration all the conditions which exist in the islands, he has requested, namely, that he be permitted the right to select as Governor of the islands the very best man he can find either in this country or there to discharge the very exacting duties of Governor of those lovely islands.

AMENDMENT OF SECURITIES ACT

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, we have passed the Securities Act, which everybody concedes to be a very valuable piece of legislation, but the draftsmen apparently omitted one or two phrases which ought to be in the act, and which escaped the attention of the conferees. I am going to ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill which will correct that error, so as to have the law apply to the District of Columbia. As at present framed it does not seem to do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, is the Senator from Florida asking unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill to which he refers?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, without any prejudice against the Senator's bill, I shall be constrained to object to his request, because I am unalterably opposed to the unfinished business. If the Senator wants to introduce his bill, and have it considered, I shall be very glad to support a motion to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not want to ask that. I could not have the nerve to ask that the unfinished business be laid aside in order to take up something else, except by unanimous consent. The error to which I refer simply means that the law does not apply to the District of Columbia, when everybody intended that it should.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it is very important that the Senator's bill should be passed, and I hope he will move to proceed to its consideration, because the omission of the language to which he refers, applying to the District of Columbia, would leave a very great gap in the Securities Act. So I trust the Senator, impressed with the importance of remedying this mistake, will move to proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has asked unanimous consent to introduce, and I shall be very glad to support his motion with whatever feeble efforts I can offer in that direction.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator from Florida will yield to me, I desire to say that I think the Senator from Wisconsin "doth protest too much." [Laughter.]

Mr. FLETCHER. I think I see what the Senator from Wisconsin desires, and I cannot prefer my request in the shape he suggests. I want, however, to correct the broad statement that the Securities Act does not apply to the District of Columbia. It does apply to the District of Columbia except in paragraph 2 of section 3, where the words "District of Columbia" were omitted by oversight. Of course, I should like to have that correction made. I am told that if the Senate would pass the bill which I desire to introduce, and make the correction, it could be made in the House now; but if it cannot be done, it cannot be done; that is all. However, I ask unanimous consent that I may introduce the bill.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1955) to exempt securities issued by banking institutions organized under the laws of the District of Columbia from the application of the Securities Act of 1933, was introduced and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, sometime ago an unfortunate occurrence took place in Hawaii, and, as a result of conditions arising out of that occurrence, it seems that this bill has been brought forward for our consideration in the hope that the people of Hawaii may be better served by selecting a Governor outside the islands of Hawaii. As I said a few moments ago, it seems to me that this bill must be regarded as an indictment of the people of Hawaii, as a judgment to the effect that they are not capable of local self-government even to the extent which they now enjoy. From the record which I have examined and the reports which have been made with reference to conditions in Hawaii, I do not feel that we ought to take from the people of those islands the right to have one who is a resident of the islands appointed as Governor. It may not seem to us to be a very serious matter, but we know it has come to be considered a most serious matter by the people of Hawaii. They regard it, as I have said, as a condemnation, as a passing of judgment upon them, and adjudging them incapable of furnishing a Governor from the islands.

Especially, Mr. President, do I think that no sufficient opportunity has been afforded to the Senate to be advised as to the conditions which seem in the minds of some to justify this proposed legislation. There has been no hearing before any committee; as I understand, there has been no report; as I further understand, there is no agreement upon the part of the committee itself; and it is a too serious matter, so far as the people of Hawaii are concerned, to be disposed of in any summary way. Infinitely better would it be that they be afforded an opportunity to supply the President with the name of someone living in the islands suitable and possessing the requisite qualifications than that by the enactment of this bill we should deprive them entirely of the opportunity to do so.

Such things as happened in Hawaii happen in every community, and especially in communities made up as is the Hawaiian community. They can never enjoy self-government unless they purchase it through their actual experience. There is no such thing as self-government except it be acquired through experience, ofttimes bitter experience. In other words, as a great Democrat once said, the right of self-government implies the right to do unwise things as well as wise things. People will fail and make mistakes, and from those mistakes will spring a wisdom which is invaluable to them in the development of their capacity for self-government.

It would have been a most unfortunate thing indeed for the Colonies of the United States had they been judged as to their capacity for self-government by what occurred between the time the treaty of independence was signed and the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. There is scarcely a period in the history of the development of any people so chaotic, so condemnatory, of what seemed a capacity for self-government as the period from 1783 to 1789. Had it been within the power of some superior agency, such as here found, to have withdrawn the right of local self-government, it would undoubtedly have been done. And yet, out of the fearful experience from 1783 to 1789 really came the Constitution of the United States. Without that experience, without those years of teaching, there is little doubt that the Constitution of the United States would not have been framed and could not have been adopted.

The people of Hawaii have had their experience, as most all people have, and the mere fact that a situation was created there a few months ago such as seems almost incredible in some respects, is, in my judgment, no reason whatever for taking away from them the right to furnish a Governor from their own islands. It has aroused them to greater effort in government.

The Delegate from Hawaii, speaking upon this subject in the House a few days ago, said:

> I am forced to believe that the President has been misinformed regarding conditions in Hawaii, for on no other assumption can I understand his request. Certain it is that the people of Hawaii do not favor such a move, for on Monday there was read into the RECORD of the Senate, and appears on page 3875 of the RECORD of May 22, a concurrent resolution passed by the Territorial legislature vigorously opposing any change in the residence qualifications of Hawaii's Governor.

Mr. President, I have had a letter from a gentleman long a resident of Hawaii. I do not feel free to put it in the RECORD because there are many things in it which I take it he would not desire to have printed, but he takes the view as expressed by the Delegate that the people of Hawaii by a vast majority are opposed to the measure now before us. That fact ought to be taken into consideration. The sentiment, the feeling, the convictions of the people of Hawaii are that they are being deprived of something which is justly theirs as a free people, which has been guaranteed to them by the organic law of the islands, which they have long enjoyed, now to be taken from them after years of experience. This they regard as in every sense a judgment of incapacity and of condemnation.

For that reason alone we ought to hesitate to pass this measure because after all the success of any Governor, it makes no difference from whence he comes, the success of government in Hawaii must depend upon the contentment, the happiness of the people of Hawaii and their faith in the Government of the United States. We ought not to take a chance in spreading among the people of Hawaii dissatisfaction and a want of confidence which an act of this kind will inevitably bring.

Mr. President, I have no intention of doing other than to express briefly my opposition to the measure. I should not have said anything at all had I not received this letter from one long a resident of the islands. I feel that I am expressing the wishes of a great majority of the people of the islands. I sincerely hope this measure may not pass.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, as I stated the other day when the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], in charge of the joint resolution, attempted to call it up for consideration, I have never had the privilege of visiting the Hawaiian Islands. Therefore I must confess at the outset that I do not have the advantage of first-hand information, nor am I able to testify, as did the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] as to the actual conditions there to be found. I think, however, it is fair to say that this legislation has not had the proper and careful consideration which a measure affecting so directly the interests of the people of the Territory of Hawaii should have had prior to its presentation for passage in this body.

Some Senators may remember, and I am sure the members of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs will certainly remember, that at the short session of Congress several important bills affecting the Hawaiian Islands were introduced and referred to the committee. The introduction of those bills created apprehension among the people of Hawaii that the measures would be given consideration at the short session of Congress. The then chairman of the committee, the former Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Bingham, finally announced that the measures would not be taken up for consideration by the Senate committee during the short session. As a result of that official statement, citizens of the islands who had intended to appoint a commission to come to Washington to testify concerning those measures and to present the case of the people of Hawaii decided to abandon their trip because of the expense involved.

As has been so well stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], Senators should bear in mind the significance which the people of Hawaii attach to this particular piece of legislation. As the result of an unfortunate crime, a terrible crime which occurred in the islands, the people there believe that on the mainland of the United States a false impression has been created concerning them and their ability for self-government. It was, in my judgment, largely because of that feeling that they had determined to send a commission here to present, from their point of view, the situation insofar as their government and insofar as crime, its detection, prevention, and punishment were concerned. They believed that they could present a case on behalf of themselves and their fellow citizens which would eradicate from the minds of legislators the prejudice which they feared had been created as the result of this crime.

To pass this joint resolution now without giving those people a hearing I can only characterize as a piece of lynch law. It is contrary to every concept of fairness and equitable treatment which should govern this great and powerful Nation in treating with the people of Hawaii.

I wonder if Senators realize that there has been no hearing upon the measure, that as a matter of fact, as I understand it, there has been no real consideration given to the measure by the members of the committee? I understood the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] to say that the committee had been polled upon the measure and that the report of the measure to the Senate and its consideration now depend upon a poll made upon this important piece of legislation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The poll not only was incomplete, but it merely sought permission to report the joint resolution without recommendation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, every Senator knows how polls are obtained in the closing hours of a session of the Congress. A page boy or the clerk of the committee rushes up to a Senator, who is harassed by other and perhaps what he considers more pressing matters, shoves a paper at him and says, "Will you sign this? The chairman would like to get it reported out to the floor." No real consideration is given to legislation under those circumstances. If I had my way about it, there would be a provision in the rules of the Senate to prevent legislation being considered under such circumstances except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to the able Senator that as a member of the committee I can testify there was no meeting held and no hearing accorded upon the measure. I understood from the chairman of the committee that a meeting would be held at 2 o'clock on a given day for the purpose of permitting those who cared to address the committee with respect to the measure, both for and against, full opportunity to do so. I notified the Delegate from Hawaii and he appeared at the time indicated, with other men of intelligence, character, and culture, ready to express their position and the position of the people of Hawaii.

For some reason the meeting was not held. No other meeting was held. No consideration whatever was given to the bill; and if it was reported, as it was, it was reported in the manner just indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin. I certainly did not sign it. I do not think I had the opportunity to sign it. I know that other Senators were approached, and some of them signed; and, so far as I am advised, some did not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In any case, Mr. President, Senators well know that the Senate has been working under terrific pressure for the last week or 10 days. Last week, I think, we were in session 3 consecutive days for 12 to 13 hours a day. Under those circumstances, I submit to Senators that merely upon the taking of a poll a piece of legislation of vital importance in the eyes of the citizens of Hawaii should not be brought before the Senate and jammed through under whip and spur in the closing hours of the session. I think if we were to pass this bill under those circumstances it would be a blot upon the record of the United States Senate.

If it is the policy of the administration to make this change in the organic law of the islands, then let the matter be introduced at the next session. Give notice to the people of Hawaii. Permit them to send their representatives here to speak for their citizens. Then if, after a full and careful hearing and a deliberate consideration by the committee it still is the determination of the administration to pass this legislation, let it come to the floor of the Senate, be debated upon its merits, and a determination taken by the Members of this body. But I say here and now, Mr. President, that I am so convinced of the injustice which is being done, I am so convinced of the unjustifiable nature of the procedure in connection with this legislation, that insofar as I am physically able to do so I shall prevent action upon it at this session of Congress.

Amendment of the organic law of the Hawaiian Islands is a serious, a momentous step from the point of view of the people who are residents of those islands. It must be remembered that this is a Territory, Mr. President. The organic act was adopted after the negotiations had taken place which were necessary to make these islands a Territory of the United States. I do not contend that it stands upon the same ground as a treaty, but I do say that it is only one step removed from a treaty in its solemn obligations upon the contracting parties.

I recognize that Congress retained plenary power to repeal the organic law, to change or to alter it in any respect. Nevertheless, I do not think I am going too far in urging upon the Senate that action should not be taken lightly; it should not be taken without careful consideration in attempting to modify in so important a respect the organic law of this Territory.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator has been well within the realms of moderation in referring to the matter which he has just discussed. It seems to me that when two independent and sovereign nations enter into an agreement under the terms of which there is a consolidation, the smaller ceding its territory and its sovereign rights to the other, and immediately, as a part of the transaction, as a part of the res gestae, a bill is passed by the larger nation under the terms of which the smaller independent nation, weak as it was, is to have the right to have the Governor selected from its own Territory, it really is a part of the treaty; and a breach of that organic act becomes a breach of a solemn agreement between two sovereign powers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator for his suggestion; and in that connection I wish to read briefly from the remarks of Representative GIBSON, to be found on page 5016 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 5:

> Mr. Speaker, Hawaii is located 2,100 miles west of the mainland. Its government was formerly a monarchy with a long line of kings and queens. The people overthrew the monarchy and Hawaii became a republic. When it became a republic application was made to join the United States. A committee was formed, made up in part of citizens of Hawaii, and an agreement arrived at as to the basis of joining the American Nation.

In other words, these islands are not a possession which came to us as a result of conquest. These islands are not a possesion which came to us as the result of acquisition by purchase. These islands are a Territory of the United States as the result of a voluntary act taken upon the part of a sovereign people; and as a result of their application to become a Territory of the United States negotiations were entered into and the organic law is the result.

A committee was formed—

made up in part of citizens of Hawaii and an agreement arrived at as to the basis of joining the American Nation. This was covered by a resolution adopted by the Congress of the United States.

Its relation to the United States and its status are fixed by the organic act. The organic act provides, among other things, that the Governor shall be a resident of Hawaii. At first he was required to be a resident for 1 year. In 1920 or 1921 it was changed to 3 years. Since that time one of the requisites has been that the Governor be a resident of Hawaii for 3 years.

I desire to point out, in connection with the statement I made concerning the scant consideration which this measure received at the hands of the Senate committee, a statement by Representative GIBSON describing the meager consideration which it received in the House of Representatives. He says:

It is proposed by this bill to permit the appointment of any citizen of the United States, of 35 years of age, and with other qualifications. I am opposed to it. In the first place, no good reason was shown to the committee for the change.

That is, the House committee.

Not a word of testimony was brought out except the message of the President, in which he asked for a temporary suspension of the provisions of the organic law. I am opposed to it because it is opposed by the people of Hawaii, by the business men, and by the legislature. I am opposed to it because no investigation has been had to determine whether this should be passed or not. I am opposed to it because it breaks faith with the people of Hawaii.

Representative SNELL, the minority leader in the House, interrupted Representative GIBSON:

Mr. SNELL. Was there any information before your committee except that contained in the message of the President of the United States why this should be done?

Mr. GIBSON. Not any in favor of the passage of the measure.

Mr. SNELL. There was no investigation of any kind?

Mr. GIBSON. None whatsoever.

Mr. SNELL. I am a little surprised that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] should bring in a bill advocating carpetbag government in any Territory or in any part of the United States. That is the last place I would suppose it would come from.

Mr. President, what is the situation concerning this measure? Admittedly, it had no hearings in the House of Representatives. No testimony was taken. No arguments were presented. The bill was reported out from the House committee, and after a fight they finally secured a rule, and it was passed through the House of Representatives. It came to the Senate. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] did not even call a meeting of his committee. He took a poll; and it has now been developed, by statements made by Senators, that the poll which he took was not a complete poll.

I do not know how many Senators' signatures are attached to the measure at the desk, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], long a member of this committee, has stated that he did not have an opportunity to register his position upon this measure through the poll. There were no hearings in the House; no testimony was taken in the House; no arguments were presented for its passage. It passed the House. It was referred to the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. The chairman of the committee did not even dignify the measure by calling a meeting of his committee. He took a poll, or had someone take it for him. They went to enough members of the committee to get a majority, and then the bill was reported to the Senate of the United States and taken up without there even having been a written report from the chairman of the committee or from the majority of the committee.

Mr. President, in the face of that record, will the Senate of the United States proceed to break this long-established relationship with the people of Hawaii, through the organic act, by a substantive amendment of it?

I cannot believe that Senators will vote to take any such action in the face of the record.

Mr. President, with reference to the manner in which the Hawaiian Islands became a Territory of the United States, I wish to quote briefly from the remarks of Representative ENGLEBRIGHT, to be found on page 5019 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 5:

Mr. Speaker, it is well to remember that the Territory of Hawaii was not acquired by conquest or purchase but was the result of the meeting of minds of two independent governments, resulting in an agreed annexation.

Annexation was first officially considered in 1854, when a treaty with that as its objective was drawn up and signed by the officials of both nations, but failed of ratification by the United States Senate, because it provided for the admission of Hawaii as a State. The drafts of the treaty show that attempts were made to persuade Hawaiian officials, especially the king, to accept the status of a Territory, but this they refused to do. This treaty failed of ratification, but the project of annexation was kept alive. The United States often demonstrated its interest in and a protecting attitude toward Hawaii.

President Abraham Lincoln said of Hawaii in 1864 in a letter to Elisha Allen, Envoy Extraordinary from the United States to Hawaii:

"Its people are free, and its laws, language, and religion are largely the fruit of our own teachings and examples."

This is a strong statement of the attitude of the United States at that time toward the government created by the people of Hawaii. It certainly was not contemplated by President Lincoln to annex Hawaii and give it a less free government than it then had or now has.

In 1875 a step nearer to annexation was taken by the two countries by a reciprocity treaty, which was signed that year and went into effect the following year.

The island government remained in the hands of the natives of the island under a monarchial form until 1893, when a successful revolution, headed by Sanford Ballard Dole, overthrew the monarchy and caused the establishment of the republic. Negotiations for annexations were at once opened by both countries along the lines similar to the treaty of 1854. President Harrison, in his message transmitting the treaty to the Senate, February 15, 1893, said:

"Only two courses are now open—one the establishment of a protectorate by the United States, and the other annexation, full and complete. I think the latter course, which has been adopted in the treaty, will be highly promotive of the best interests of the Hawaiian people, and is the only one that will adequately secure the interests of the United States."

The treaty contained the following phrase:

"Especially in view of the desire expressed by the said government of the Hawaiian Islands that these islands should be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof."

It is evident from these treaty stipulations, and from statements made by the Presidents of the United States and several Secretaries of State that both Nations agreed that Hawaii, if annexed, was to become an integral, incorporated part of the United States; that the people of Hawaii had demonstrated their ability to govern themselves; and that after annexation the people would be more free, secure, and self-governing than they had been in the past. Indeed, this was one of the objects of annexation.

Almost immediately after the inauguration of President McKinley another important treaty was negotiated and signed June 16, 1897. The treaty said: "These islands should be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof." As a result, Hawaii was annexed by joint resolution of Congress approved July 7, 1898.

The Hawaiian Islands are not merely a foreign possession of the United States, but are an integral and incorporated part thereof, and have been so defined by decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

Following annexation the United States initiated in the islands the usual American form of government, and it is modeled after the governments of most of the American States.

For more than 30 years the Territory has been operating under the American form of government, happily, patriotically, and successfully.

At this point Representative ENGLEBRIGHT was interrupted by Representative HOOPER.

Mr. HOOPER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that in the island of Hawaii, an island the size of the State of Rhode Island, there has been but one murder in the past 25 years?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I understand that to be the fact.

The Territory, through taxation, raises money to defray all ordinary expenses. It supports excellent public schools for its 90,000 children who are subject to compulsory education along strictly American lines. Its university is attended by 2,000 students.

The various activities of the Territory are maintained just as the States carry on such activities, and cost about $12,000,000 a year. In the middle of the year 1932, while many of the States and municipalities on the mainland were in difficulty, Hawaii struck a balance and found that with all bills paid she had $5,000,000 in cash on hand and $5,000,000 more in liquid bonds. In addition to her Territorial taxes, it was shown that during the previous year Hawaii had also contributed to the Federal Government $5,375,000 in income and custom taxes. A balancing of the books between the Territory of Hawaii and the Federal Government showed that during the preceding 30 years it had sent to Washington $175,000,000, while the Federal Government had spent upon activities that might be properly charged up against the Territory about $32,000,000, leaving a net profit to the Federal Government of some $149,000,000 in taxes received from the islands.

Mr. President, this is the record under the existing organic act, and under the past administrations in the Territory, a record of which I think the people of Hawaii have a right to be proud, which the Senator from Maryland asks the Senate to disregard and instead to enact a statute which every self-respecting citizen of the Territory of Hawaii regards as an insult.

I continue to read from Representative ENGLEBRIGHT'S remarks:

Thus the islands have not been an expense to the Government of the United States but have yielded a direct handsome cash profit. The record of self-government that Hawaii has made in more than 3 decades of Territorial life, from every aspect, has been an enviable one. It is safe to say that its institutions compare favorably with those of the half dozen more progressive States on the mainland. Within the short period of 30 years it has developed itself into one of the most important subdivisions of the United States.

At this time to change its organic act, to change its form of government, to set up a dictatorship over the islands in violation of the spirit of the treaty negotiations, in violation of the spirit of the articles of annexation without giving its people a chance to be heard, and in opposition to the expression of its legislature, and over the protest of its duly elected representative here in this House is an autocratic and an un-American procedure.

The Senator from Maryland may attempt to hide the essential issue involved in this measure behind war clouds which he puffs upon the horizon in the Pacific, but I submit that he cannot get away from the irrefutable argument of Representative ENGLEBRIGHT that action upon this measure under these circumstances would be absolutely unjustifiable, and would put a stain upon the record of the United States Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 19 and 43 to the bill and concurred therein; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 10, 16, 30, 34, 44, 45, and 46 to the bill and concurred therein severally with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18, and 21 to the bill; that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47 to the bill; that the House requested a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments still in disagreement, and that Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. BOYLAN, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. TABER, and Mr. THURSTON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

That section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1928, entitled 'An act to amend the salary rates contained in the compensation schedules of the act of March 4, 1923, entitled "An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services"', as amended by the act of July 3, 1930, be further amended by adding thereto the following: 'Provided, That in all cases where since December 6, 1924, in such adjustment the position occupied by an employee has been or shall be allocated to a grade with a maximum salary below the salary received by the incumbent the rate of pay fixed for such position prior to such allocation may be paid after the date of the enactment of this act so long as the position is held by the incumbent occupying it at the time of such allocation, and the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to allow credit in disbursing officers' accounts for all payments heretofore made at such higher rates.'"

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment, before the period, insert " : Provided further, That the contractor shall not be allowed any profit in connection with the restoration of such earthquake damages."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of line 1 of the matter inserted by said amendment insert:

" SEC. 19. Section 36 of the 'Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933', approved May 12, 1933, is hereby amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 36. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is.' "

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18, and 21 to said bill.

That the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47 to said bill.

That the House request a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. BOYLAN, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. TABER, and Mr. THURSTON be the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 10, 16, 30, 34, 44, 45, and 46.

Mr. McNARY. Does that include the Cutting-Steiwer amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. No; I will explain the situation as I go along.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I have an understanding from the Chair that I will not lose my rights under the rules in yielding to this privileged matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be so understood.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, these are amendments as to which there is no controversy between the two Houses. They were legislative provisions which had to be submitted to the House for consideration. They were agreed to tentatively by the conferees during the original conference. So I have moved that these amendments be agreed to en bloc.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Now, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments nos. 11, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18, and 21. Those are amendments which are in dispute between the two Houses, one of them the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the others amendments involving totals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 47, which is the amendment discussed at length in the Senate and which involves the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate agree to the conference requested by the House and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. HALE, and Mr. STEIWER conferees on the part of the Senate.

COMPENSATION OF VETERANS—THE ECONOMY ACT

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter I recently received disclosing another instance of wrong done a veteran under the so-called "Economy Act", otherwise known as "An act to maintain the credit of the United States."

Every Senator and House Member has been deluged with appeals of like nature, all of which has led Congress to regret that it delegated its powers to the Executive to make regulations through a large staff of employees and clerks unfamiliar with the true facts of each case and often unsympathetic with the welfare of the veteran.

It is unfortunate to call the measure an act to maintain the credit of the United States as though the credit of our Nation depended on doing injustice to its defenders.

I hope that Congress will insist on regaining the right to make specific limits in the reductions to veterans at this time, and that when it convenes again it will go further and recall all rights given the Executive in the so-called "Economy Act", and set out to do its own legislating as the Constitution provides, instead of leaving it to the President to make our laws.

The veterans elected us to protect them in their rights for defending our country; we should be derelict in our duties if we failed them in this, their hour of need.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FERGUS FALLS, MINN., June 9, 1933.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am attorney for a World War veteran, named Edward K. Mills, who is clearly entitled to maintain an action on his war-risk insurance policy. He is a pitiful object, and will be soon, if he is not now, a definite object of charity. He suffers from what is commonly known as sleeping sickness, and the doctor advises me, on the history of the case, that there is no question but what this condition is traceable to the gassing and mumps which he contracted while in service abroad. The record and the facts of the case demonstrate that he did feel unwell when he was discharged and gradually got worse, so that on January 1, 1920, he became so affected by this disease that he was asleep for 72 days. He has tried ever since to recuperate and to work, but his sickness has prevented him from engaging for any length of time in that effort. In 1927 or 1928 he went to Alaska, apparently under the advice of doctors and in the hope of getting better in that climate. He stayed there until December 1, 1932, and had made plans for starting an action to have his insurance recognized, but he had to leave Alaska so as to be back here on December 1, and about a month ago his counsel in Alaska, about to be appointed judge of that Province or Territory, turned the case back to him and he employed me. The veteran is now a resident of this county, his relatives and friends are poor, and I started an action.

It now develops that the Government refuses to admit service on account of the provisions of the so-called "National Economy Act." This monstrous thing, known as the "National Economy Act", section 17, title 1, says: "All laws granting or pertaining to yearly renewable term insurance are hereby repealed", and section 5 of the same title seems to provide that "all decisions rendered by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under the provisions of the title, or the regulations issued pursuant thereto, shall be final and conclusive on all questions of law and fact, and no other official or court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, by mandamus or otherwise, any such decision."

Under this law, as I understand it, since March 20, 1933, the date of its enactment or signing by the President, no action upon war-risk insurance policies can be commenced. This I was not aware of when the action was begun.

It is very difficult to believe that the Congress of the United States, representing the people of the country and assembled to protect their interests, and particularly the interests of the veterans who defended our country in time of war, let themselves be led into such unjust and iniquitous legislation. This is merely an instance showing the effect of this legislation. I presume there are thousands of like cases. These veterans have patriotically endeavored to get along as best they could, in the hope, as in this case, that they would not be reduced to the necessity of availing themselves of the act as it was originally. In other words, save themselves from the necessity of bringing action in court to determine their rights. Now they discover that Congress and the President of the United States, in the name of "national economy" and "to maintain the credit of the United States Government", subtracts, without any resulting consideration, valuable rights which former laws vested in these veterans. If the veterans do not rise in arms against such legislation and "economy", I shall be very much surprised. In any event, the conscience of the people at large must be outraged when they understand the situation.

With reference to this particular man, unless we can get something done for him, he will be in a short time, but for years, unless death intervenes, a definite object of charity in our county.

The object of my letter is to apprise you of a practical situation so that if possible you may in this particular session, get an amendment through that will restore the right of these veterans to sue in the United States courts to recover the rights, such as they may have. There is still time to correct this grievous injustice, I hope.

I want to say to you and to all others that might get in touch with this practical problem, that this injustice is not creditable to you. I am positive that you have done all you could to prevent this kind of "economy" which transfers the discharge of a national debt with respect to these veterans to local communities which are now already distressed and who must contribute by means of the income tax to the maintenance of a Government primarily liable.

I remain, respectfully yours,

ERIKSSON LAW OFFICES,
By L. ERIKSSON.

THE AGRICULTURAL SITUATION

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two letters in regard to the farm situation.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN APPEAL FROM THE FARMERS OF AMERICA

To FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, President of the United States.

DEAR MR. ROOSEVELT: Feeling that the seriousness of the farmers' condition has been misrepresented to you, I have been requested by the members of our Watonwan County (Minn.) Farmers' Holiday Association to state to you our feeling in regard to the new farm bills just made law by you and the present Congress. We farmers are not satisfied with these new bills. We are both disappointed and angry. Angry because, after having petitioned for 4 bitter years for legislation embodied in the Frazier bill, which we know would give us the help we need, once more organized greed has defeated us and thrust upon us another experiment of their own making. We are indeed angry. We do not like the new mortgage refinancing bill. And we have no confidence or faith in Secretary Wallace's scheme to raise farm prices. We do not think it will work out successfully. It cannot, because we know that the cause of our marketing difficulties is not overproduction. His idea is but one more costly experiment, and we have had enough.

But the refinancing of our mortgages is the problem of greatest importance. This bill is a part of your "new deal" for agriculture. As such, your "new deal" is destined to fail. If it fails to relieve and help us farmers, you and the Democratic Party will fall with it, because the solution of the farmers' problem has become the crucial test for every political party.

We do not wish you to fail. That is why we are appealing to you once more. We demand that our own farm bill, the Frazier bill, be reconsidered and supported by you.

It is but just and fair that we state to you why we do not like the new mortgage refinancing bill. It is also just that I, as spokesman for the organized farmers of this county, should state my qualifications as a critic of the present farm-loan system and the new mortgage bill. I am a woman farmer, having owned and operated my own farm for 44 years. During the last 9 of those years I have carried a heavy Federal loan on my farm, and have gone through all the bitter experience of threatened foreclosure and loss under the present vicious system. I know whereof I speak. I wish to state in no uncertain terms that the present Federal Farm Loan System is the biggest swindle ever put over upon the American farmers by the bankers of this country. I also wish to state that the methods and practices of the land bank of St. Paul toward its farmer borrowers, have in many instances been despotic and tyrannical. And your new mortgage bill has not removed these evil features of the farm-loan system.

It will still be a great swindle under the new bill. Our objections to the present loan system may be summed up as follows: Too high interest rates, too much banker control, and unjust terms to which we are compelled to submit.

Under the new bill the interest rate has been reduced to 4½ percent. That is still too high in contrast with the low rates the United States Government has given other countries and foreign countries. It is also still too high in contrast to the vast debt already stacked up against the farmer. We are told that our buying power must be restored to us in order that the great army of unemployed may go back to work—work created for them by the big amount of new things the restored farmer is expected to buy. Herein lies the fallacy of the new farm bill.

How can we farmers pay 4½-percent interest on nine billions of farm debt, pay up a vast sum of other debt outside of the mortgage indebtedness, which has been increasing and piling up against us for 13 years past—how can we do all this and still have enough left out of our incomes to buy sufficient manufactured goods to start all the factories operating and employing men again? Even with the time extensions granted on debts by the new bill, a gigantic task has been laid upon the back of the ruined farmer. We farmers, sitting here in our meeting hall, know that the new farm bills are not going to help us do all that is expected of us. The new interest rate is too high still. It will eat up the income of the farm and keep on destroying our buying power—the one thing so necessary to restore prosperity to this country.' We asked for 3 percent. Why couldn't we have it, especially since so much depends upon the restoration of our purchasing power?

Here is the answer—too much banker control of our lawmaking bodies. The old exploitation of the workers by the bankers will still go on. The bankers did not want us to have 3-percent interest rate. That would cut down their big profits, dividends, and salaries. That is the chief reason we farmers object to the Federal Farm Loan System. The Federal Farm Loan System is but a part of the Federal Reserve System, and it was the head of the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Reserve Board, that plotted our ruin in cold blood back in 1921 and robbed us farmers of some $4,000,000,000. Not satisfied with that dastardly crime, that board of bankers went one step further and declared all farm mortgages nonnegotiable paper. That master stroke completed our ruin. Farm prices crashed far below cost of production, and the value of our land dwindled to nothing. The Federal Reserve Board had sold the American farmers into financial slavery. After 13 years of bitter hardship and struggle for freedom, we are still in bondage. Your "new deal" has not—cannot free us.

Why? Because we are still under the dictatorship of the bankers who ruined us. The only relief they have offered us is the reduction of a pitiful 1 percent in interest and an extension of time. Just more credit! We do not want more credit! We ask for a chance to pay off our debts and be free American citizens! That demand is only simple justice. The Revolution of 1776 was fought for just that.

We asked for honest dollars and a square deal. We didn't get it. That is why we are sending this final appeal to you before we take our own business in our own hands. In the Frazier bill we demanded a reform of the Federal farm loan system as now practiced. But our demands, our petitions, our prayers, have all been in vain. We have been ignored in Washington. Against our will, we have been made the victims of experiment. Hoover promised us relief. What did we get? Just another experiment—the Farm Board. We farmers did not ask for the Farm Board. We asked then, as now, for honest money and a square deal. We do not believe in price fixing. We believe that if we are given honest money handled by the United States Government instead of by a group of special-privilege bankers, our markets will adjust themselves. We will see to that. Never has the American farmer been allowed the legislation he has asked and worked for. Never has he been permitted to choose for himself. Others, greed blinded, indifferent, or ignorant of the true farm situation, have always chosen for him, with disastrous results to all. But that time is past. The farmers of America are in revolt!

Your "new deal" for the farmer does not end the abuses practiced against him by the Federal land banks. In the Frazier bill we called for a reform of this vicious system. The Frazier bill gave the farmers representation and partial control on the Federal Farm Loan Board. As it stands today, we farmers have neither representation nor control of our own finances. The so-called "local boards of directors" are mere puppets. All power is centered in the banker-controlled land banks.

I wish to call to your attention a few of the abusive features of the present loan system. Chief of these is the "stock" clause. Every farmer must buy stock in the loan association to the amount of one half of 1 percent of the sum of his mortgage. This sum or "stock" is added to his mortgage principal so that he borrows just that much more than he needs and is compelled to pay interest on that additional amount. This stock is supposed to be refunded to the farmer when he pays off his mortgage. But the banks as well as the farmers got into such a precarious position that all stock in the land-bank system is now as good as forfeited. For the first 3 years the land banks paid the farmers interest—6 percent—on this stock. The farmers paid the banks 5½ percent. Now, the land banks have simply absorbed that additional money and the farmer has no come-back. We are told that this money has been used to meet defaulted interest and installments of fellow borrowers. Yet that is not the worst part of this stock feature of the Federal loan system. This "stock" is assessable in case the land banks get in so bad that that step becomes necessary. It is all a great, cruel swindle. We farmers have just been robbed of this "stock" money.

Another abuse practiced by the land banks against the farmers is the "penalty" levied on delinquent interest and installments. If a farmer cannot meet his payments when due, the land bank charges him 8 percent penalty on the sum delinquent. Can you see any justice or reason in this practice? If a man is unable to pay 5½ percent, how in the world can he pay 8 percent? And that interest upon interest, while the other 5½ percent on the principal is still going on at the same time. If this is not a swindle, what is?

Another objection we have to the present loan system is the small amount—just 1 percent—which is applied each payment date on the principal of the loan. Out of the 5½ percent interest rate, 4½ percent is claimed by the land bank as interest and only 1 percent is applied to cut down the sum of the loan. In the Frazier bill 1½ percent was to be taken as interest and 1½ percent was to be applied on the principal. Under the present system too much is claimed in interest and too little is applied on the principal. This is also true under the new reduced rate of 4½ percent. Such a system requires a lifetime of drudgery to pay off a mortgage. In fact, farm mortgages are seldom paid off. They become heirlooms in farm families. We do not wish to pass mortgages on to our children and grandchildren. Give us a chance to pay our debts. Will the time ever come in this land of the free (?) when the word "mortgage" is not tacked to the word "farm"? Banker lawmakers denied us the Frazier bill with its 50–50 payment plan. We demand it!

One more practice of the land banks which we farmers resent is this: They tell us to send money to them in whatever amounts we can and whenever we can to be applied on the interest and installment when the date of payment came. When that interest had become delinquent and we had not deposited the required sum with them, but only a part of it, they did not apply any of our deposit on the unpaid interest but charged us 8-percent penalty on the whole sum and held back our deposited cash until such time as we could raise the additional amount due. In the meantime they had the use of our money, without allowing us one cent for the use of it. At the same time they had failed to pay us a dividend on our "stock", as they were supposed to do. Is that justice?

We farmers also object to the expensive "field men" the land banks send out to inspect us and to examine and inventory everything we possess. These field men are in addition to the local secretary-treasurer and the board of directors. They do the work that these local officials do and can do, and receive $12 per day, a car, and expenses. That is bad enough, but many of these field men are inefficient, dishonest, and unqualified for the job. All this additional cost comes out of the farmer. Is it any wonder the land banks "absorbed" our stock money?

While speaking of costs, let me add that the land bank of St. Paul is one of the most magnificent and costly bank buildings in the Northwest. The taxes on it each year are enormous because of its costly material. We farmers paid for that, too. Graft? We are tired of it. It must end.

I am delinquent on my interest and installment. The field man came to see me about it. He said he could grant me an extension of time on this unpaid interest, provided I gave them a chattel mortgage on my crops and personal property or assigned to them a part of my monthly cream check. I said, "No!" If this valuable farm is not worth today the mortgage they were willing to put upon it 9 years ago, I will not put another penny into it. It was not my fault that the Federal Reserve Board back in 1921 deflated my property and knocked $100 per acre out of its valuation. I refuse to give them one thing more—especially my livestock and crops upon which I must depend for the sustenance of life. Then he said, "Well, if you could give us this additional—additional—security, we could reduce the penalty from 8 percent to 6 percent. If you cannot give this added security to the land bank, we must charge you 8 percent penalty." Tyranny? Wars have been fought for less!

In your new bill just passed and made law, delinquent borrowers like myself can be given a moratorium on the payment of the installments on the principal during the next 5 years, provided—provided they have kept their loans in good standing during the depression! If we farmers had been able to keep our loans in good standing while forced to sell our products at less than cost of production, you and Congress would not have had to pass a mortgage refinancing bill. It is farmers like me—who have found the load too heavy to bear, and we number thousands upon thousands—who need the refinancing legislation. Now we are discriminated against in favor of the man who doesn't need the help one half as much. More tyranny.

So much for the banker-controlled land banks. Suffice it to say in closing that the general feeling among the farmers toward the land banks is one of distrust, dislike, and contempt. We do not like the Federal loans and avoid them whenever we can. The new bill has not improved them. None of the vicious, unjust features have been removed. We don't want any more Federal loans.

One word about the new regional credit loans now being made. We have discussed them at our meetings. The final opinion of the farmers in regard to these loans is this—"just more graft." Bankers who couldn't run their own banks straight and square and got kicked out are now agents for these loans. They draw $5 per day and 10 cents per mile to go out and examine applicants for regional loans. These crooked, busted bankers are using this new loan system to refinance their own slim purses. They go miles out of their way to run up expenses. They value livestock and personal property of all kinds to suit the amount of the note the farmer owes some banker friend of his. The terms of these loans tie a farmer's hands so tightly he dares not spend a penny without asking permission to do so. Again, farmers are being exploited for the other fellow's benefit. More swindle. We farmers are in revolt. We want honest dollars and a square deal. You have not given it to us.

President Roosevelt, we farmers can stand no more. We will stand no more. We are in revolt against graft and dishonest money. We have no faith in the new price fixing bill. The new refinancing bill is a sorry disappointment. We asked Congress to grant us cost of production until we could recover from the severity of this depression. Just cost of production for a time. No wages. No profit. We asked that our mortgage indebtedness be scaled down to correspond to the present deflated valuation of our land. We did not ruin ourselves. Why should we be made to pay for that fiendish crime of the Federal Reserve Board? We are paying now with our very lives—our all. Yet we are expected to start factory wheels turning by buying all the thousand and one things we need and have been going without for several years—we are expected to pay an interest rate too high for the prices we will receive for our products. Upon our toil depend the welfare and the happiness of a great Nation. We are the key industry of the world. Yet we have been denied by our lawmakers the legislation we so need to help us in our mighty task—the bringing of new life and hope to a stricken people.

We did not ask for much. Just an interest rate equal to that granted other industries and foreign nations, a scaling down of our unjustly imposed debts, cost of production for our products, and a reform of the farm-loan system. Our lawmakers refused us 3 percent interest. Yet they are guaranteeing not less than 4 percent interest on land-bank bonds. Who buys those bonds? Bankers. They are still favored even in this great extremity. And we are still being exploited. We are taxed on everything we own—even the dog. On the other hand, land-bank bonds, bearing a Government guaranty for not less than 4 percent, are tax exempt. Why? Because bankers expect to buy them. So the old game will go on.

We are determined to not let it go on. We beg you to reconsider the Frazier bill—or one as good. We urge you to use your influence to give us the simple demands we ask.

We, the farmers of the United States, declare the new farm-relief legislation inadequate and unfair. If lawmakers will not grant us these sane and reasonable measures we need, we will act for ourselves.

SARAH E. WILSON,
Member of Farmers Holiday Association,
Watonwan County, Minn.

Headquarters at ST. JAMES, MINN.

LEONARD, MINN., June 1, 1933.

Hon. W. LEMKE,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LEMKE: I want to write you in regard to the farm-mortgage refinance plan and the Frazier bill.

We are very much disappointed in the failure to pass this bill on which we indebted farmers have placed so much hope and if passed would have been the most immediate and effective form of farm relief and a real help to the indebted farmers to refinance their mortgage debts.

In my opinion, the administration plan which is now accepted and ready to be put in operation offers very little help for the farmers who are burdened with heavy interest payment.

It may be of some help to some of those who already have a small Federal loan, but aside from these, very few can take advantage of this act.

If they cannot make their payment on old Federal or State loan, they cannot under this plan.

In the first place the interest rate is only a fraction of 1 percent lower than the present rate on State and Federal loans, and as a large percentage of the incumbered farms are mortgaged for all of their present value, and as the Government will loan only up to 50 percent of the value of the land and 20 percent of the value of the buildings, very few farmers can show up sufficient value to obtain a Government loan in an amount large enough to cover the old loans unless the creditors would be willing to take in many cases a substantial reduction in the face value of their mortgage.

Thus the adjustment of their mortgage debts will be entirely a matter of agreement between the creditor and debtor.

With the upgoing trend in prices on farm products which may possibly effect an increased demand and rise in value of farm lands, it is very doubtful that creditors will accept any settlement based on any reduction of the loans; it is more likely they would prefer to foreclose and take the farm. Then where is the protection for the farmer to save his farm and home which was promised in the new deal?

There are about 400,000 farmers who have Federal loans; according to the slight reduction in the interest rate, it will effect a saving of $52,000,000 in 5 years, or an average of $26 per year for every borrower.

This is certainly not going to put an indebted farmer on his feet; and with all the red tape and doubtful features connected with obtaining loans or refinancing under such plan, the "new deal" is no better than the old one.

A better and more simplified plan for refinancing the farm indebtedness without the issuance of bonds and without cost to the Government, which would have made possible a much lower interest rate, and which would have provided a protection for the creditor as well as saving the debtor, such as is embodied in the Frazier bill, is the only solution of this problem.

An advance in prices on farm products will to some extent lighten the debt burden, but that will take a long time and will not be of any immediate help, as many farmers are now so far behind in their payments on loans and taxes that it will take years to catch up, if they ever can. If prices on farm products go up, they may go down again in the future as they have in the past, and with no reduction of indebtedness and interest rates, the farmers will be in the same position, facing the same problems as they are now.

If the Frazier bill had passed, it would have saved our State and its rural-credit department hundreds of thousands of dollars, as the State of Minnesota now owns about 3,000 farms acquired by foreclosure; if this bill had passed, most of these farms would have been sold within a short time, as under such low rate of interest and long-time terms of payment it would have been cheaper and more preferable to own than to rent a farm; at the same time, it would have given those who are delinquent in their payments a better chance to redeem and also give the State a chance to cash in on a lot of its holdings instead of as now provide for supervision, pay insurance, and maintain upkeep on buildings at a large expense until the farms can be sold, and in many cases the rentals do not make up for the loss of interest, insurance, and upkeep.

As the prospect is now, the State will still have to take over many more farms. If these can be sold again later, it will be at a much lower figure than the amount of the loan, and a majority of these farms have not enough valuation to obtain a Federal loan large enough to pay off the State mortgage.

So our State legislature, Representatives in Congress, and farm organizations certainly had good cause for supporting and urging the passage of the Frazier bill.

I should highly appreciate your full and complete information in regard to future prospect of the Frazier plan if there is any hope of introducing the bill in its present form on any farm legislative program in the near future or next session of Congress.

In view of the universal support and urgent demand by legislative bodies and farm organizations from a large number of States for its passage and the failure of the administration plan to meet the requirement we needed and demanded, it should warrant another fight for its passage.

Kindly let me have your view on this important matter.

Thanking you for your kind attention and an early reply to my letter. I remain yours,

Very respectfully,

M. L. F. BLIX.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, at the time the Senate took a recess the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had the floor. I am informed that the conference committee will be ready to report on the independent offices appropriation bill in a few minutes. I move that the Senate take a recess until 7 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until 7 o'clock p.m., when it reassembled.

On the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

TREATMENT OF THE JEWS IN GERMANY

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, which I ask may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Without objection, the resolution will be received, and the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 103), as follows:

Whereas the United States Senate has learned with deep regret that the Jewish people of Germany have been, and still are, being persecuted by the so-called "Nazi administration"; that as a part of such persecution the German Jews have been deprived of their citizenship, of their right to hold office, to own or control newspapers, to practice law or act as jurors; Jewish doctors have been outlawed; boycotts against Jewish druggists, opticians, and dentists have been organized; universities have been closed to Jewish students; and Jews are prohibited by decree from leaving the fatherland whose present government is subjecting them to hitherto unheard-of oppression; and

Whereas the people of the United States hold sacred the assertion of the Declaration of Independence that all men are endowed with the unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and

Whereas the Jewish people of Germany have been notoriously and cruelly deprived of the exercise of such rights by the Nazi administration: Therefore, in the name of humanity and in behalf of justice, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States views with alarm and regret the persecution of the Jews of Germany by the Nazi administration, and solemnly expresses its sincerest sympathy for these afflicted people and hopes that they will be promptly restored to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizenship which they as members of one of the world's oldest, greatest, and most righteous races richly deserve.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, because of the existing parliamentary situation, I ask that the resolution may for the time being lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5767) to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before the recess was ordered, I was reviewing the historical background, which it seems to me is an important consideration in connection with the consideration of the pending bill. I was quoting from the remarks of Representative ENGLEBRIGHT. I continue the quotation, as follows:

Thus the islands have not been an expense to the Government of the United States but have yielded a direct handsome cash profit. The record of self-government that Hawaii has made in more than 3 decades of Territorial life, from every aspect, has been an enviable one. It is safe to say that its institutions compare favorably with those of the half dozen more progressive States on the mainland. Within the short period of 30 years it has developed itself into one of the most important subdivisions of the United States.

At this time to change its organic act, to change its form of government, to set up a dictatorship over the islands in violation of the spirit of the treaty negotiations, in violation of the spirit of the articles of annexation without giving its people a chance to be heard, and in opposition to the expression of its legislature, and over the protest of its duly elected representative here in this House is an autocratic and an un-American procedure.

I also wish to quote from the remarks of Representative MOTT:

Mr. MOTT. It is a proposal to repeal a portion of the organic act of Hawaii in order to permit the President to appoint as Governor of that Territory a nonresident.

I understand the appointment is to be made immediately. The appointee is to be selected from the continental United States. There can be no question about that. The President intends, if given this authority, to put it into effect at once and to send to Hawaii as Governor a person who is a stranger to the people of that Territory. This he intends to do without the consent of the people there and in disregard of the formal protest of the Legislature of Hawaii filed with the Congress.

Now, whatever of merit there may be to this proposal—and I leave the discussion of that to others if they know—the fact remains, and I do not see how it can be contradicted, that in passing this resolution you are repudiating a solemn covenant which was entered into by the Government of the United States and the Republic of Hawaii when the treaty of annexation was effected more than 30 years ago.

It is true the organic act of Hawaii is not a constitution, but it is the nearest thing that the people of a Territory can have to a constitution. The organic act of a Territory is the law which guarantees to the people of that Territory the kind and character of government under which they are to live; and the only fundamental difference between the organic act of a Territory and the constitution of a State is that the constitution of a State may be changed only by action of the people of the State themselves, while the organic act of a Territory may be changed without the consent of the people of that Territory by an act of Congress. I think on account of this fact Congress should be very, very careful in changing a fundamental portion of the organic act of a Territory which guarantees to the people of that Territory a specific right.

And now I wish to quote from the argument made by Representative ELTSE of California:

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in the name of justice, democratic liberty, and fair play in the new deal, I rise to address you.

The preamble to the Federal Constitution provides:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

With every breath I emphasize the purposes expressed in that preamble: (1) In order to establish justice; (2) insure domestic tranquility; (3) promote the general welfare; (4) and secure the blessings of liberty, we ordain and establish this Constitution.

Upon the voluntary request of the people of Hawaii, the islands were annexed to the United States on July 7, 1898. These people then sought, as they have ever since sought, the protection afforded by the Constitution, the laws, and the power and prestige of the United States. They have enjoyed that protection and 35 years of brotherhood and friendliness in the family of States and Territories comprising the Nation. They have felt secure under the mantle of justice and liberty which our Government threw over them. The Bill of Rights—the Magna Carta—guaranteeing the rights of these people is to be found in the organic act providing for the government for the Territory of Hawaii. This act was approved by the President on April 30, 1900. Section 5 of the original act provided:

"That the Constitution and * * * all the laws of the United States * * * shall have the same force and effect within said Territory or elsewhere in the United States."

Section 4 of the original act defined citizenship and provided, among other things, that all citizens of the United States who were residents there on August 12, 1898—

"And all the citizens of the United States who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for 1 year shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii."

Note that the residence required was 1 year.

Section 66 of the original act dealt with the Executive power, and provided that the Governor should be appointed by the President, and—

"Shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii; shall be commander in chief of the militia thereof; may grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against the laws of the said Territory. * * *"

Under this section no one could be Governor unless he had been a citizen for at least 1 year.

On July 9, 1921, section 66 of the act was amended to require and provide that the Governor—

"Shall have resided therein (meaning Hawaii) for at least 3 years next preceding his appointment."

The demand and necessity for this amendment requiring 3 years' residence instead of 1, as a prerequisite to governorship, was mostly occasioned by the extreme dissatisfaction growing out of the carpetbagging practices and misrule of former Gov. L. E. Pinkham. That gentleman was appointed by President Wilson, and it subsequently developed that he had not maintained a bona fide residence in the islands for the requisite time prior to his appointment, and that upon his induction into office he immediately proceeded to dispense patronage to his personal friends in a manner after the fashion of the worst carpetbagger of reconstruction days.

Congress has twice decided that the Governor of Hawaii should be appointed from among her own citizens. The people of Hawaii, through a concurrent resolution of its legislature recently passed, voice vigorous opposition to any change in the residence qualifications of the Governor. Notwithstanding, Congress is now asked to amend the organic act permitting the appointment to be made from among the citizens of the islands or from the entire United States. It is perfectly obvious that the appointment is to be given to a resident of the mainland, else the power would not be sought.

This Government which mantles the various States of the Union and the Territories is a democratic, representative government. Its essence is one of autonomy and self-rule. Are we now to say to the people of the Commonwealth of Hawaii, "You are no longer fit to rule yourselves—we shall take this power away from you." Are they to be told that the Constitution is just another scrap of paper; that in order to establish justice their autonomy must be taken away from them by the appointment of a Governor not from their own people; that in order to insure domestic tranquillity they must have an outside commander in chief of their militia, an outsider who alone can grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against their own laws? Are they to be told that the only way they can "secure the blessings of liberty" is to have a carpetbagger from the mainland appointed their feudal overlord?

My Constitution, the Constitution of the United States and of the people of Hawaii, in the words of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], may be dressed "with the silver buckles, the long stockings, and powdered wigs of 150 years ago", but it is still the living, dynamic Constitution of every liberty-loving citizen of the United States and of its Territories, not the least—the Commonwealth of Hawaii.

I now wish to quote from the remarks of Representative DIRKSEN:

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the people of Hawaii do not want the passage of this bill; the Chamber of Commerce of Hawaii is opposed to it, the Legislature of Hawaii is opposed to it, and the only thing that has been offered on the affirmative side in favor of this bill is a simple request of the President of the United States, without a single iota of fact or evidence to support it.

LINCOLN MCCANDLESS, the Delegate from Hawaii, has lived there for 51 years. His family is there, his brothers are there, his money and his property are there, and he has been a life-long Democrat, and if I were a consistent, loyal Democrat I would rather take the word of LINCOLN MCCANDLESS, the Delegate from Hawaii, on this matter than I would the President of the United States.

It seems to me that the demand of the President of the United States and the substance of the message are contradictory. So I prefer to follow the ideas of LINCOLN MCCANDLESS, the Delegate from Hawaii, whose interests are there and who loves Hawaii, who wants to see it prosper and wants to see progress made in the islands. In this particular matter I would rather follow him than I would the President of the United States. [Applause.]

I wish now to quote from Representative O'MALLEY. Representative O'MALLEY is a Member of the House from Wisconsin and a member of the Democratic Party. He said:

Mr. Speaker, I think this question is not one of patronage. I think the question goes deeper than that. It is a question of local self-government. I do not know what kind of Democrats they have in Mississippi and Ohio, but I cannot imagine that either of those gentlemen from those States who are on the committee would go around campaigning in their States opposed to local self-government.

In 1917 and 1918 we went to war, and one of the reasons was that we were told we were fighting for self-government by small countries. The kind of Democrats I have always known have favored local self-government, and I think this is entirely a question of local self-government. The people of Hawaii are entitled to a man in their own Territory. The last Congress passed a bill that would grant independence to the Philippine Islands, and now you are reversing yourselves in taking away independence from the people of Hawaii. A true Democrat, believing in the rights of people to govern themselves, cannot support a measure like this.

I now desire to quote from the remarks of the minority leader in the House on June 7, Representative SNELL, of New York. He said:

If this bill, affecting primarily the rights of the people of Hawaii, is indicative of the "new deal" the Democrats are going to give this country in the next 4 years, the Lord have mercy upon the average American citizen.

If there has ever been a rule that is absolutely inexcusable, I am sure this one is at the present time. This is a special session of Congress called for the distinct purpose of passing reconstruction measures of the President, measures that in some way it is hoped will rehabilitate this country and bring us out of the depression.

* * * * * * *

May I call the attention of the Members of the House to the Democratic platform of 1928. Hawaii was not mentioned in their last platform. I would like to read to the Members of the House what they said relative to Alaska and Hawaii in 1928. That statement reads as follows:

"We favor the development of Alaska and Hawaii in the traditional American way, through self-government. We favor the appointment of only bona fide residents to the offices in the Territory."

* * * * * * *

I also read the request of the President. He says he wants to appoint a forward-looking, experienced man. Would we expect the President of the United States to appoint any other kind of a man to an important executive position? • • •

Further on he said:

It takes special qualifications to fit a man to be Governor of Hawaii. He should be a man who knows the problems of the island. He should know the problems of the various races that make up that diversified population, and no man can know these problems except one who has been there for some time and has given himself to the work of the islands and in helping to solve their problems. When you bring a man from the continental United States who, perhaps, has never visited the islands, and ask him to be chief executive, you have done a great injustice to a very important part of our people.

While no reason has been given for it, there are plenty of reasons why it should not be done. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, every single inhabitant of the islands, every man, whether Republican or Democrat, is absolutely opposed to the legislation you are proposing to pass here today. It is not very often Republicans and Democrats unite on anything, but here is one time and one place where they are absolutely united. They want a man who is a resident of the islands to be appointed as chief executive over the islands. Further, we have absolutely gone back on our word when we made the original agreement with these people that the Governor of the islands should be a resident of the islands.

Mr. SNELL further said:

The gentleman from Arkansas, who presented this resolution, has spoken about the importance of these islands as an outpost of the United States. I appreciate well their importance to this country; but let me tell you, my friends, we better be very careful not to violate our agreement when they do hold such an important place in the defense of this country. When you consider their crime record ever since they have been a part of this country, no man has the right to point the finger of scorn at the present constituted government of the islands.

I maintain there has not been a word said anywhere about why we should do this, and it is simply a political move from start to finish against the solemn mandate of your own party in convention assembled.

It seems to me it is a rather anomalous situation to have this bill introduced providing for carpetbag government of Hawaii by a Member from Mississippi and the rule presented by a Member from Arkansas.

I wish now to quote from the remarks of Representative HOOPER:

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I know very well, of course, that nothing I can say here this afternoon will prevent the passage of this bill, yet I feel I should not let this occasion pass without at least giving my views of the reason this legislation should not become law.

Of all the amazing legislation which the House of Representatives has passed this year, this seems to me the most extraordinary. I do not speak from a political or partisan standpoint, but I deeply and earnestly feel that the House of Representatives in passing this bill today will commit itself to something which is justified in no way by morals or justice.

Mr. Speaker, Hawaii came into the Union under very particular circumstances. You could compare it with the way in which Texas came into the Union. The islands were not purchased, they were not conquered territory, they became a part of our Republic with the full wish and acquiescence of the inhabitants of that country, and in giving this acquiescence they relied on the good faith of the United States, on the promise of the United States to observe with them the compact by which they became a part of this Republic, and that compact is to be violated today. I do not know why it is to be violated. I am not imputing political motives to the President of the United States in asking for this legislation, but surrounding it all there is an air of the greatest mystery, an air such as surrounded a little while ago a bill that came down from the State Department to the House of Representatives—and for which I spoke upon this floor, and which was afterward passed—and when it was passed was repudiated, or practically repudiated, by the State Department.

I listened with the greatest of interest and earnestness to what the very able gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER] said here, and I am a warm admirer and respecter of his, but, Mr. Speaker, if the change in Hawaii's organic law is asked on account of a crime committed a year or two ago in these islands or on account of two or three incidents which have occurred since that time, we might very well look to ourselves, because I have been in the islands and I know something about conditions there. I know these islands are law-abiding, far more, I would say, than almost any section of the United States with which I am acquainted. In all the history of these islands there have been no such barbarous crimes as we have seen committed North and South, East and West, in this country of ours during many years past. If for the reason of that crime alone we are singling out a single incident against the people of these islands in order to justify ourselves in giving to them an alien Governor—alien, at least, in the sense of coming from continental United States—it is not a good reason. This is not a good excuse. These people are a law-abiding people. I was on the great island of Hawaii, large as the State of Connecticut, not long ago, and I do not know how exact this information may be, but I was told that in 20 years past there has been but one murder committed upon that island by a Filipino who had killed his employer, and who was promptly tried and sentenced for his crime.

The islands are, of course, as the gentleman from Arkansas said, of the utmost importance to the United States. Is it not of the utmost importance to us that we yield some respect to the wishes of their people, that we select from out of the great body of descendants of missionaries and other people of fine American stock who are living in those islands today a Governor who will know and who will have the opportunity of judging what is best for the people of this beautiful part of our country? [Applause.]

Mr. ELTSE of California said:

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I would appeal to you gentlemen of the House as I would appeal to a jury, and I would qualify you as I would qualify a juror by asking you if you will give fair and impartial consideration to the evidence. If there is no evidence, you, as jurors, should find against the petitioner. There is no evidence, and there was none before the committee.

These islands were, as has been stated, annexed to the United States in 1898. The organic act was adopted in 1900. Section 5 of the organic act provides that the Constitution and all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within said Territory as elsewhere in the United States. Thereby the Constitution of the United States became the Constitution of the islands, and the laws of the United States became the laws of the islands.

Now, section 4 provides that all persons who were residents of the Republic of Hawaii on August 12, 1898 "and all the citizens of the United States, who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for 1 year, shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii."

The gentleman from Mississippi said there was no contract or covenant with the people of Hawaii and that there was nothing in the organic act in relation to the qualifications of the Governor. Let me read from section 66:

"He"—

That is, the Governor—

"shall be not less than 35 years of age; he shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii."

Therefore no one could be Governor unless he had resided there for 1 year or more.

In 1921 section 66 of the act was amended by inserting after the provision that the Governor shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii the requirement that he shall have resided therein 3 years next preceding his appointment in lieu of the 1 year residential requirement.

There was a reason for the amendment of that act in 1921. The principal reason was that L. E. Pinkham had been appointed Governor and he was not a bona fide resident of Hawaii at the time of appointment. He had been in the Philippine Islands and China gathering up coolie labor for the sugar plantations, and when he was appointed Governor he brought with him a lot of carpetbaggers, with resulting misrule and dissatisfaction. That was the principal reason why the act was amended.

Now, it is proposed to allow the President to appoint someone from the mainland. It is perfectly obvious that the appointment is to be given a mainlander, else the power would not be sought.

The other day the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] referred to the Constitution of the United States as being dressed with the silver buckles, the powdered wigs, and long stockings of 150 years ago. Gentlemen, you have been stripping the Constitution of the United States every day since this session began. Here today you propose to further strip the Constitution of the United States as it relates to the people of Hawaii by appointing a man from the mainland, taking away its protection from the people of the islands.

The purpose of the Constitution of the United States was to establish justice. What justice is there in taking away from the islands their Governor? The purpose of the Constitution was to insure domestic tranquillity. How do you insure domestic tranquillity by appointing a man from the mainland? How do you secure the blessings of liberty to the Hawaiians by giving to the President the power to take away their Governor and appoint an outsider?

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to permit me to present a conference report?

"SEC. 20. The President is hereby authorized under the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, to establish such number of special boards (the majority of the members of which were not in the employ of the Veterans' Administration at the date of enactment of this act) as he may deem necessary to review all claims (where the veteran entered service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disability is not the result of his own misconduct), in which presumptive service-connection has heretofore been granted under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, wherein payments were being made on March 20, 1933, and which are held not service-connected under the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress. Members of such boards may be appointed without regard to the Civil Service laws and regulations, and their compensation fixed without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. Such special boards shall determine, on all available evidence, the question whether service connection shall be granted under the provisions of the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress (notwithstanding the evidence may not clearly demonstrate the existence of the disease or any specific clinical findings within the terms of or period prescribed by regulation 1, part 1, subparagraph (c), or instruction no. 2, regulation no. 1, issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress), and shall in their decisions resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof in such cases being on the Government.

"Notwithstanding the provisions of section 17, title I, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any claim for yearly renewable term insurance on which premiums were paid to the date of death of the insured and any claim for pension, compensation allowance, or emergency officers' retirement pay under the provisions of laws repealed by said section 17 wherein claim was duly filed prior to March 20, 1933, may be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration on the proofs and evidence received by the Veterans' Administration prior to March 20, 1933, and any person found entitled to the benefits claimed shall be paid such benefits in accordance with and in the amounts provided by such prior laws, provided that the payments hereby authorized to be made shall continue only to include June 30, 1933, and only one original adjudicatory action and one appeal may be had in such cases. Where a veteran died prior to March 20, 1933, under conditions which warrant the payment of, or reimbursement for, burial expenses, such payment or reimbursement may be made in accordance with the laws in effect prior to March 20, 1933, provided that claim for such payment or reimbursement must be filed within 3 months from the date of passage of this act.

"Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the decisions of such special boards shall be final in such cases, subject to such appellate procedure as the President may prescribe, and, except for fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, therein shall continue to October 31, 1933, or the date of special board decision, whichever is the earlier date: Provided, That where any case is pending before any one of the special boards on October 31, 1933, the President may provide for extending the time of payment until decision can be rendered. The President shall prescribe such rules governing reviews and hearings as may be deemed advisable. Payment of salaries and expenses of such boards and personnel assigned thereto shall be paid out of and in accordance with appropriations for the Veterans' Administration.

"Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the rates of compensation payable for directly service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, in receipt of compensation on March 20, 1933, be reduced more than 25 percent, except in accordance with the regulations issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to Federal employees, hospitalized cases, and cases of beneficiaries residing outside of the continental limits of the United States; and in no event shall death compensation, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, being paid to widows, children, and dependent parents of deceased World War veterans under the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, on March 20, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, whether the death of the veteran on whose account compensation is being paid was directly or presumptively connected with service.

"Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who served 90 days or more, was honorably discharged from the service, is 55 years of age or over, is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President, shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 per month."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in explanation of the conference report I desire to occupy but a few minutes of the time of the Senate.

The House recedes from its position opposing the amendment of the Senate which authorized the Attorney General to compromise insurance claims or cases brought by veterans under the Renewable Term Insurance Act. Ex-service men have insisted that the Attorney General should be given that authority in order that these cases may be disposed of. The Senate insisted upon its position, and the House receded.

The first of the other two amendments of importance in dispute between the two Houses is the Black amendment. The Senate receded from the Black amendment. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], who has demonstrated to the Senate his familiarity with the regulations and the laws affecting veterans, was of the opinion that under the existing law the President has the right to take care of the situation in great measure, and had a conference with the Senator from Alabama, at which I was not present, but as a result of which the Senate conferees receded from that amendment.

Senate amendment no. 47 is the amendment discussed by the Senate the greater part of yesterday. The Senate recedes, and the amendment presented to the Senate is the House amendment. Added to it is the amendment that I offered in the Senate yesterday, to which the conferees on the part of the House tonight agreed; so that amendment no. 47 represents the House compromise and the so-called "Byrnes amendment" added to the House compromise.

That, I think, is a statement of the items which were in dispute between the two Houses, and which have been agreed to by the conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not desire the floor. I rose to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina. He has just stated with respect to amendment no. 47, which was called the "Connally amendment" at one time——

Mr. BYRNES. Before we go to that, may I ask the Senator from Oregon as to amendment no. 15, the so-called "Black amendment", if I have made a correct statement of the Senator's position with reference to that amendment?

Mr. STEIWER. I think so, Mr. President.

Mr. BYRNES. If I did not, I should like to have the Senator inform the Senate as to his views on the subject.

Mr. STEIWER. I wish the Senator from Alabama were here, but I am quite certain that when he reaches the Chamber he will confirm the statement which has been made already by the Senator from South Carolina.

I want to address to the Senator from South Carolina a question of some little importance, I think, with respect to amendment numbered 47. I understood the Senator to say that that amendment now is before the Senate upon the House compromise, so called, plus the Byrnes amendment. Also, as I heard the clerk read at the desk, I thought I heard him read the Byrnes amendment. I ask now, by what parliamentary action has the Byrnes amendment been incorporated in the House amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, by the action of the conferees in agreeing to the amendment of the House with the Byrnes amendment. It is a question of legislation, and it was agreed to by the conferees.

Mr. STEIWER. Do I understand, then, that the House conferees are taking their amendment back to the House with the Byrnes amendment as an amendment thereto?

Mr. BYRNES. No, Mr. President; I do not so understand it; and I do not think the Senator from Oregon really is under that impression at all. In the conference, the amendment being legislation, the conferees agreed upon the amendment as it is now contained in the conference report.

Mr. STEIWER. It would follow, then, that the House must take action in order to express its agreement to the Byrnes amendment. Am I right in that understanding?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, there was disagreement between the two Houses on the subject of various amendments. A conference between the Houses was agreed to. The stage has now been arrived at where amendments are not before either House, but a conference report is before both Houses, which must be voted up or down.

Mr. BYRNES. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. The various preceding stages of amendments have been blotted out by the appointment of conferees and partial agreement on the conference report. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether that is correct or not.

Mr. BYRNES. That is a correct statement as I understand the situation.

Mr. STEIWER. I thank the Senator. I assume that is a correct statement, but I was somewhat perturbed because, so far as I could learn, the House has not up to this time agreed to the Byrnes amendment. That proposal has never been before the House. It was agreed to here yesterday afternoon as a perfecting amendment to the House amendment while it was under consideration in the Senate. Thereafter a substitute was agreed to, and the House amendment as perfected was not taken back to the House; but, as I understand it, the Senate amendment was taken to the House, a motion was made to recede and to concur, and that motion was defeated. Thereupon another motion was made, that the bill be sent back to conference. I think that is a correct statement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is my impression that the House instructed its conferees this afternoon to incorporate the Byrnes amendment in the House amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, that is a correct statement; and this amendment was legislation, so the conferees included in this amendment the so-called "Byrnes amendment." It is now part of the conference report, and will have to be acted upon by the House and the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, there is no amendment before the Senate. There is a conference report before the Senate, which includes the Byrnes amendment to the original House amendment. It does not make any difference how the Byrnes amendment got in there. The Senate has before it the one proposition of a conference report, which must be voted up or down, and that does include the Byrnes amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the House will have an opportunity to act upon it when the conference report is presented to the House.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, so far as the House is concerned, I understood that, by a roll-call vote in the House today, they disagreed to the so-called "Steiwer amendment"; that thereafter they instructed the House conferees to agree to the original House compromise plus the Byrnes amendment.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I want to interrupt the Senator there. By what legislative action did the House instruct the House conferees? I heard the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas and I know he believed it to be true, but I am told by Representatives who are here in this Chamber that that statement is incorrect, and that no legislative action of any kind was taken upon the subject.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was not in the House, of course——

Mr. STEIWER. Nor was I.

Mr. BARKLEY. And I do not know by what procedure it was done; but, aside from that, the area of difference between the House proposal, which is the so-called "House compromise", and the amendment which was debated yesterday in the Senate, offered by the Senator from Oregon, was sufficiently wide to enable the conferees to agree to the Byrnes amendment, regardless of any action on the part of the House.

Mr. STEIWER. I agree with that fully; and in the light of that statement I should like to ask my friend the Senator from South Carolina whether or not in fact the conferees did agree to incorporate the Byrnes amendment upon the House amendment, and to report the amendment as amended to the House and Senate?

Mr. BYRNES. There is no doubt about it; and the majority of the conferees signed the report exactly as the Senator from Oregon has stated it.

Mr. STEIWER. We may, therefore, imply the agreement from the signatures?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly. If the conferees signed it, I presume there is no doubt about the agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question. I think it is very important that we should know whether or not the House instructed its conferees, or whether the House allowed its conferees to go into a free and unhampered conference. I think that question should be determined right now.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, as far as my information goes, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico that in the conference there was no statement made as to any instructions to the conferees, but the whole question being before the conference, after a conference lasting for an hour or an hour and a half, an agreement was arrived at by the conferees of the House and Senate which is included in the report which has been sent to the desk. I did not inquire of the House conferees as to their instructions, as to what limitations, if any, were made, but the conference report was agreed upon, and the House will have to act upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I find upon investigation that, while the matter was discussed, there was no instruction given by the House to its conferees with respect to the so-called "Byrnes amendment."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CUTTING. If the Senator will be so kind as to favor me, my understanding is, then, that both sides were equally free to enter upon an agreement?

Mr. BYRNES. So far as my information goes, we were.

Mr. CUTTING. And that the agreement which was reached was to adopt the exact proposition which was defeated on the floor of this Chamber last night?

Mr. BYRNES. That is a correct statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from New Mexico, is it not true that irrespective of whether the House took any action on the so-called "Byrnes amendment" or not, or whether even the Senate did, the question at issue was, on the one hand, the House amendment, and, on the other hand, the Steiwer amendment, and any ground between those two would be a proper basis of settlement?

Mr. BYRNES. There is not the slightest doubt about it.

Mr. CONNALLY. And that is what the conferees did?

Mr. BYRNES. In a free conference, with the position of the Senate on the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and the position of the House, the conferees entered into a conference, as a result of which an agreement was arrived at, which agreement was expressed in the report which is before the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the status of the legislation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the parliamentary situation with reference to these amendments to be this: The House passed an appropriation bill, it was sent to the Senate, and the Senate put certain amendments on the bill, some of which were of a legislative character. The bill went back to the House, the House disagreed to the Senate amendments, and requested a conference, which request was acceded to. A conference was held, an agreement was reached on certain amendments, and the report adopted by both Houses, and a conference held on the amendments in disagreement.

Now the conferees have brought back a completed report. If the Senate agrees to it, the House must then pass on the conference report.

I think it will be found that that is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. This is the situation, as I understand it. An appropriation bill came to the Senate, the Senate added the Connally amendment, it went back to the House, and the House agreed to the so-called "House compromise" as a substitute for the Connally amendment. That action was brought back to the Senate, the Senate then substituted the Steiwer amendment for the House compromise, and that was the situation when it went to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct as to Senate amendment no. 47, which deals with the veterans' compensation.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate very briefly to explain some recent developments in the matter which is now before us.

On yesterday evening the Senate, by a vote of 51 to 39, agreed to the Senate substitute for the House amendment. That agreement was reached after extended debate. It was reached after some preliminary consideration of a motion to instruct the conferees of the Senate.

In the debate, at the time of its beginning and subsequently, and upon yesterday, many Senators expressed themselves with respect to this subject. In addition to the 51 Senators who voted for the Senate substitute there were 3 or 4 others who very frankly expressed their disapproval of the House amendment. They declared it to be wholly inadequate. They characterized it in different ways. They made it clear that they were not in favor of the House amendment.

A number of Senators argued against the substitute because they said the House amendment was all that could be gotten and that if they voted for the substitute, the bill would meet an Executive veto. In that fashion a number of Senators were dissuaded from supporting the Senate substitute. Nevertheless, it was agreed to in this body by an affirmative vote of 51 Senators.

The report was taken to the House of Representatives today and every Senator here knows the history of today's transactions as well as I. I will state, however, that the Democrats in the House held a caucus, and as a result of that caucus a party alinement was effected, and by that party alinement, and the support of seven or eight Republicans, the House declined to concur in the Senate substitute. Inferentially, their vote not to concur was a vote of insistence upon their own proposition. With that understanding, the bill went back to conference this afternoon.

At that conference, after some little discussion, it was decided that the Senate conferees would recede upon amendment numbered 47, which presently embraces the Senate substitute. In keeping with that action, the conferees have brought this report to the Senate.

The clerk in reading the report did not read the names of those Senators who signed it. I desire to state, for myself and for the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the two minority conferees for the Senate, that we declined to sign the report. It does not bear our signatures.

We are now confronted with the question of whether we shall accept the House provision with the amendment offered here yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. We are now asked to take the House language as amended; to take the same language the Senate has characterized as inadequate; the same language which we rejected yesterday by a vote of 51 to 39. We are asked to accept and approve a proposition that has not been strengthened in any respect at all.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wish to tell the Senator that he is mistaken. The conferees even took out the Dill amendment, and propose to give the Senator less than we voted down last night.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true, Mr. President, but the conferees in their omnipotence—and I use that word in a very cordial and good-natured manner—so far as I know, did not discuss the Dill amendment. If it were not an impropriety—and I think it is not—it is almost true to say they did not discuss the Byrnes amendment. The House conferees simply insisted upon the amendment of the House of Representatives.

I think I am right in saying that there has not been an "i" dotted or a "t" crossed, there has not been a correction made even in respect to formal language. There has not been an ambiguity clarified; there has not been one change made in that amendment from the time it was first formulated in conference between the President of the United States and an unauthorized House committee until this moment. It is, nevertheless, the formula that is written for us to take.

I regard it as an absolute repudiation of the sentiment expressed in this body some days ago when Senator after Senator rose in his seat and expressed his most heartfelt and sincere disapproval of the administration of Public Law No. 2. I regard it as a betrayal of the veterans of this country, because, Mr. President, the assurance that we started to give them of protection, that was promised to them by earlier action in this body, has been entirely abandoned, and we are sending this proposal back to the Executive with not one substantial limitation in it; not one substantial safeguard against drastic and ruthless cuts in the pensions of the veterans of our wars.

Public Law No. 2, which we call "the Economy Act", still stands. It is not impaired in any substantial respect. The authority to the Executive is not impaired; the limitations upon the Director of the Budget Bureau are not impaired. The right and authority of the Veterans' Administration itself to review cases and to cut pensions is not substantially affected.

I think I ought to express some exception to my own statement, because there is a degree of protection there for certain widows and orphans, and there is protection against a cut in the "rate of compensation payable", but the amount of compensation that is to be paid in the service-connected cases is not protected by this language. The rights upon the pension rolls of the presumptively connected cases are not protected. On the contrary, we know now that the 33,000 totally disabled cases, presumptively connected, on our rolls, 33,000 helpless crippled soldiers of our country, are sent to the reviewing boards for the express purpose of being removed from the pension roll. Within 3 or 4 months they will be removed—indigent some of them, sick all of them, helpless most of them—back to their communities, back to charity, and we by our votes, if we agree to this conference report, are going to make beggars of those American heroes. Somebody some day is going to be held responsible for that ruthless action. I shall not detain the Senate to discuss that further. I have made this statement because I want the Senate to know the exact situation as one of its conferees sees that situation.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I should like to ask if the Senator will not agree with me with reference to his statement that the Dill amendment and the Byrnes amendment were not discussed at length in the conference, that the conferees did discuss at length the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and the position of the Senate in regard to it?

Mr. STEIWER. The conferees did discuss at considerable length one line, on page 4, of the Senate substitute. They permitted me to express my views with respect to the construction of the words, "Rates of compensation payable to veterans." They listened very courteously to me, and I suppose we spent three quarters of an hour in our consideration of that phraseology, but the Senator will recall that outside of that one line, line 7, there was practically no discussion of the Senate substitute.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator will agree, will he not, that there was no desire expressed on the part of anyone in the conference to limit the discussion; but, on the contrary, the statement was made after three quarters of an hour or an hour's discussion that the question was understood by the conferees and a vote might as well be taken.

Mr. STEIWER. I think it is true, Mr. President, that the question was understood by the conferees. I tried to make it plain to them, and I think I did make it plain to them; I believe the question was understood by the conferees and that those conferees who signed the conference report did it with their eyes wide open, with full knowledge of what they were doing, and that they are bound to accept the responsibility that is going to result from the action which has been taken. I want to exculpate myself from that responsibility, Mr. President.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether he has ever discovered any parliamentary method by which one body of the Congress, standing alone, can impose its will on the other body of Congress and on the President of the United States? That is the situation with which we are confronted.

Mr. STEIWER. I am told that over the years the Senate nearly always has receded, and I agree with the Senator that one body of Congress is in a quite helpless position when it finds itself alined against the other body of Congress and, in addition, is opposed by the will of the President of the United States. That is especially true when the Congress enacts such a law as Public, No. 2, against which the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Oregon cast their votes. That is the law by which there was conferred upon the Executive powers which are absolutely legislative in their nature, and when the Congress conferred on the Executive the power to make rates, the power to make rules and regulations, to fix the order of proof, and to determine the effect of presumption—when they conferred those powers, I say they conferred upon the Executive all the legislative power they possessed upon that subject. I took occasion to say at that time that Congress would regret its action; that that power would never be recalled except by a two-thirds vote. The power has not been recalled, and it will not be recalled until the American people rise up in their wrath and cry out against the outrages that are being committed in the name of economy. I think the Senator from Missouri is quite right, that we are helpless.

Mr. CLARK rose.

Mr. STEIWER. Does the Senator desire me to yield to him again?

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Oregon will yield, I wish to say that I agree thoroughly with what he says about that proposition. He and I made up 2 of the willful 13 that voted against the economy bill; but we are facing now, Mr. President, a very practical situation. Having granted away the power to make these regulations, there is no power on the face of the earth that can override the bill of the President except a two-thirds majority in each House. I do not think the Senator from Oregon or any other Member on the floor of either body will say that we could muster two thirds of each body for the Steiwer-Cutting amendment. That being true, the matter having gone to conferees, the conferees as reasonable men, recognizing the situation, having agreed to take what the Congress can now get, so far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I shall follow the same course that I followed last night.

In my days in the Army I found that there was nothing that was more obnoxious to the soldiers than countermarching, when the commanding officer got off the line of march, and led his command off into the bypaths, the path back being four times as long as the march out. Now the Senate is in this position, that last night it marched up the hill knowing full well that tonight it would have to march back down again. So far as I am concerned, I do not like countermarching, and, therefore, last night, very much to my regret, I did not vote for the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, much as I am in favor of it; and I think the Senate might as well recognize the situation that by the passage of the Economy Act they put the whip in the President's hands and ought not to complain when he uses it.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. STEIWER. I will yield the floor in just a moment.

I do not want to debate at this late hour with the Senator from Missouri with respect to the question of countermarching, but I can assure him, for the sake of his own state of mind, that he will not have to countermarch, because he did not vote with the majority of the Senate last night; and if he proposes to stand with the President tonight, he can still vote against relief for his comrades in arms and he will not be in the position of countermarching. I will say, Mr. President, that, so far as I am concerned, I shall not countermarch, and I doubt very much if Senators who are sitting upon this side of the aisle will countermarch when the vote is called tonight.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon, whose position throughout this matter has been very consistent and with whom I have cooperated at every opportunity, if he really has any notion that whatever action the Senate takes tonight, if it still insists upon his amendment, will, in the long run, benefit the veterans of the United States?

I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether he does not know that, in view of the President's open statement of an impending veto, the House compromise is the absolute maximum we can get for the veterans of the United States, no matter what action the Senate may take?

Mr. STEIWER. If that be true, Mr. President, as the Senator implies that it is, it is because the Members of this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol have surrendered their independence of action and their several individual judgments to the President upon this question.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with the Senator as to that; but we did that last March on another bill, not on this bill.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this part of the discussion; I think it is of very little value in the consideration of the question before the Senate.

I feel under obligations to the Senator from South Carolina to refer to amendment no. 15. I note that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is now in the Chamber, and I think that he will coincide in what I am saying. The conferees did consider that amendment, which is the same amendment that caused the bill to be sent back to conference day before yesterday. We found that the House had voted against the amendment by a vote of something like 6 to 1, as I remember the figures, and we were advised that there was no chance to secure the adoption of the Senate's proposal. A substitute proposal was offered by a House conferee, and I am sure that they would have given it full and fair consideration if we had desired that they do so; but I reached the conclusion, as I am quite certain that the Senator from Alabama reached the conclusion, that there was nothing of value in the proposed substitute, and that it would be better for the Senate to recede entirely, inasmuch as it could not obtain an agreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Alabama having risen, I will yield the floor at this time.

Mr. BLACK. I simply desire to make a statement in regard to the amendment. I can make it now without asking the question of the Senator from Oregon which I had in mind.

I desire to state that I do not believe the House this afternoon voted 6 to 1 against the amendment. As a matter of fact, I was told by at least a dozen Members of the House that they did not vote against the amendment at all. I was told by them that they voted for the amendment with an amendment, which was read by some Representative from the floor. I understood them to say Representative WOODRUM.

With reference to the substitute to which reference has been made by the Senator from Oregon, I desire to state that I did see the proposed substitute. I would much prefer to have the law as it is. The substitute did nothing except further to restrict the rights of the veterans. It was not an expansion of their rights. It was a curtailment of their rights insofar as hospitalization is concerned, and certainly I was not willing myself to agree to a substitute which, instead of giving the veterans the right to go to a hospital, would further curtail their rights in that regard.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will pardon me, when I met him this afternoon I understood him to tell me the House had accepted the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I will say to the Senator that I did state that because I had been told so by five or six Representatives, who told me they voted overwhelmingly to accept my amendment; but later I was informed differently, and I went over to the House and found two or three conflicting stories. To be perfectly frank, from the confusion that existed there I judge they thought they had accepted it. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I desire to take 2 or 3 minutes of the time of the Senate on the conference report. I promise the Senate not to take any more. I wish to read from a book called "Looking Forward", which has been published recently. On page 101 of that book I find the following:

> There is little possibility of argument over the idea that a healthy people is the most valuable asset a State can have. It transcends in importance all material wealth. But the enlargement of service is a potent influence upon the cost figure. Aside from the $300,000 purchase of radium, the State spent for health activities about $3,200,000, more than twice as much as in 1922. Excluding institutional costs, the department proper cost $965,000 more in 1931 than it did 10 years earlier.
> Generally, that increase represents developments which have taken place since the time not many years ago when we decided that public health was purchasable. By spending certain sums of money we know that we can purchase for the whole population a larger degree of freedom from particular diseases, such as malaria, yellow fever, typhoid fever, and even tuberculosis.

I find that in a chapter entitled "Expenditure and Taxation", in a book recently published and written by the present President of the United States. I read that, Mr. President, for the reason that, insofar as the right to put the veterans into hospitals is concerned, no amendment is necessary. That right exists now.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the authority which is granted to the President to utilize facilities for veterans in the hospitals as set forth on page 2 of the Economy Act, section 6. It will be recalled that when the economy bill was up, on the last night of its consideration, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] had it in charge, but I called his attention to the fact that by striking out six words at the end of section 6 it would authorize the use of veterans' hospitals for the veterans of the Nation. I asked the Senator if he would accept an amendment to that effect.

This brought on considerable discussion, and it soon developed that there did not seem to be a Senator who believed that we should enact a law which would make it impossible to use the hospital facilities for veterans. After it became manifest, the Senator in charge of the measure, and who, I am sure, agreed that it should be the law, accepted the proposal and we struck those words from the bill. As it now reads, the President of the United States has the right to use the hospitals for all purposes as stated therein "and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries." In other words, in addition to the pensions provided in that title the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized to give treatment and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries. As the bill was originally written there was a limitation at the end of the provision which read, "except for service-connected disabilities."

I read this statement from the President of the United States in order to show that there reposes in him the power to utilize the hospitals of the country for the veterans. I read it in order that I may show from his own language that he has long since recognized that public health must be preserved. I have no doubt, since that matter has reached his attention through this fight, that he will issue the proper regulations to utilize the hospitals for the veterans of the country.

I believe, if we were to put it to a vote in the Senate tonight, there would not be a single dissenting voice. If we should say, "Let those who favor using the veterans' hospitals for sick soldiers rise to their feet", I believe there would not be one Senator who would remain in his seat.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will recall that soon after the passage of the economy bill there was a wide-spread rumor throughout the country which reached us here that many of the hospitals would be closed. Following that rumor I took up that matter with the Veterans' Administration and with the executive department having those hospitals in charge.

I was very much gratified to learn that no hospital up to that time had been closed and that it was contemplated to close not more than one and possibly not even one of the hospitals. I mention that to make the statement that it seemed inconceivable to me that the department of the Government having the matter in charge would take that attitude toward keeping the hospitals open and yet not utilize their facilities for the treatment of our ex-service men. I think what they intend to do is to utilize them to the fullest extent.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I did not see the Senator from Alabama this afternoon when he came to the Appropriations Committee room to confer with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and other conferees, but inasmuch as it has been mentioned and we have had a discussion about what took place, may I say that the Senator from Oregon called to the attention of the conferees, when I was presenting an argument in favor of the position of the Senator from Alabama, that under the existing law the President has the power to accomplish what the Senator from Alabama has in mind.

The law provides that in addition to the pensions provided in that title, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized, under such limitations as may be prescribed by the President and within the limits of existing Veterans' Administration facilities, to furnish the veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, domiciliary care where they are suffering with permanent disability, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric ills, and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries.

I must admit that when that provision was called to my attention I did not know such provision was in the law, but it does give to the President the power to utilize the beds in the hospitals for the treatment of veterans suffering from diseases of any character. I do not think any other construction can be placed upon the provision.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am going to vote for the conference report because I think it is all we can get, but I do not want to let the statement of the Senator from South Carolina go in the RECORD without the statement that I think a mere permissive authority to the present Veterans' Administration is not worth the paper on which it is written. If I knew a way in which the Senate of the United States could write a provision into the law to make it mandatory, as the Senator from Alabama proposes, I should like very much to do it. I believe as long as the President is being advised by the present Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, that a mere permissive authority is not worth the paper upon which it is written.

Mr. BYRNES. The question was discussed at some length. Of course, I regarded myself as under a mandate of the Senate to present the views of the Senator from Alabama. The conferees were of the opinion as to the position of the House that this power existed; that there were many other things involved in it because the amendment of the Senate would have permitted the hospitalization of some cases that were not entitled to hospitalization in the opinion of the Senator from Alabama, as I understood his views. The House insisted upon its position after the Senator from Oregon took the position that he did, and the Senate receded.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I have already used more time than I had expected to use, owing to interruptions.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he proceeds?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the President has the power to utilize these hospitals, as the Senator says. Likewise, the administration has the power not to cut the veterans as they have been cut. But the thing that has brought on the trouble at the present time has been the fact that the Congress of the United States placed the power in the hands of the administration to cut these veterans; and then, as I believe everybody on the floor of the Senate tonight believes, regardless of how they are going to vote, the Veterans' Administration have been cruel and inhuman in their treatment and the cuts they have made upon these unfortunate victims of the World War. It does seem to me that the President and the Veterans' Administration are making a very serious mistake in not permitting some definite legislation to be enacted preventing the misuse of these tremendous powers that have been given to the Veterans' Administration.

It was with a great deal of hesitation that I voted against the wishes of the administration on yesterday, because of the fact that I have a real affection for the President of the United States. I should have liked to go along with him; but I think the administration is making one of the most serious mistakes it has ever made, and I think the Congress of the United States ought to stand up and correct these abuses.

As far as I am concerned, after deliberate consideration of the matter, I desire to say that I am not one of those who are going to travel up the road and then travel back again. I am going to vote against this conference report.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I shall use only a few more minutes with reference to this suggestion. I should have finished already if it had not been that I have been interrupted. I desire to say just one or two more words.

It is true that the President has this right. Unless I am wrong, unless I have been wrong heretofore about the political philosophy and the ideals of social justice of the President of the United States, he will now, since this matter has been called to his attention, correct these abuses. I do not believe he will permit beds that were built to be used by sick soldiers to remain vacant, nor do I believe he will allow these beds to be diverted for the use of members of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

While I have that idea concerning the political philosophy and the conception of social justice of the President of the United States, I must frankly admit that I do not have that idea with reference to some of those who have been advising in connection with the administration of veterans' affairs. I do not think the matter of writing regulations for the veterans of this country should be left in the hands of those who, by their past experience and by their past history, have proved that they are unfriendly to the veterans who served in the World War.

Mr. President, since the President already has this power, and I admit that my amendment could have affected the matter by mandatory provisions only to the extent of $1,000,000; since I believe the matter certainly must now have reached beyond those advisers—something I have been unable to secure heretofore—and has reached the President, I believe that before a week is past—and I confess that I shall be gravely disappointed if this prophecy is not correct—the regulations will be changed, and that these beds which now are either unoccupied or used by civilians for whom they were not built will be used for sick veterans who were ready to serve their country in time of war.

Mr. President, with reference to the vote on this proposal, I voted for the Steiwer amendment because I believed it was the better of the two. I still believe it. I make that statement as one who does not believe in paying money as subsidies, either to large shipping interests, ocean mail contractors, or malingerers on the veterans' roll. I have no sympathy for those who get on the veterans' roll by fraud, who do not deserve to be there. I have the utmost sympathy for the veteran who has fought for his country and who has been wounded in battle, who has a service-connected disability; and I mean to continue to vote, every time I have the opportunity, to treat him generously and well. I think I was one of eight Senators in this body who voted originally against the non-service-connected pension. One of the reasons why I did it was because I believed it was not rendering a service to the veterans. I did not think then the bill should be passed. I thought it was too early in the life of the veterans; and I believe my judgment at that time has been confirmed by the experience through which we have gone.

If I thought it were possible, however, to stay here and enact the Steiwer amendment, I should vote against the conference report. Men must realize practical situations. It is not possible. It will do the veterans no good. It will but arouse further the antagonism which has been built up in this country until sometimes it seems that to have served your country in time of war brings on odium instead of honor.

I am not willing to be responsible at this time for continuing a useless and a futile contest. I give full credit to the honor, to the integrity, and to the fair motives of those who hold the contrary belief. I give the same credit to the President. I credit him with the same idea of absolute fairness in the position he has assumed with reference to these regulations.

Believing that the Steiwer amendment is better than the provision of the conference report, but believing that it is an absolutely hopeless and futile task to stay here and wage warfare until the veterans themselves are injured by the futility of the effort, insofar as I am concerned, believing it to be for the best interests of the men with whom I served in the Army, many of whom I know now to be in destitution and want—believing it to be for their best interests that we accept this, which is surely plainly the best that can be obtained at this session of Congress, I shall vote in favor of the conference report.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. What is the title of the volume from which the Senator read?

Mr. BLACK. Looking Forward.

Mr. NEELY. I hope it will not be considered an unpardonable transgression for me to say that I think that volume should be carefully preserved, because during the next 3 years it will afford more pleasant reading than any volume entitled "Looking Backward", which chronicles the heartbreaking tragedies in the lives of the disabled veterans which will be caused by the discontinuance or reduction of the compensation which they now receive from the Government.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I were the President of the United States, under the authority granted me by the Economy Act I would not dream of going as far as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has agreed to go, and cut 25 percent from the compensation of any veteran whose disability might be directly referred to service in the Army.

As I took occasion to state yesterday, I would cheerfully join with other Senators and Members of Congress in increasing taxes and dealing to the very limit of generosity with those men who were wounded, or whose disability may be referred to actual service in the Army.

I am a little puzzled to understand why there should be such obvious suspicion of the nature of the President of the United States. I have not been in communication with him on this subject, nor has he communicated with me; but, as I have known him for a score of years or more, there is no more warm-hearted, sympathetic, humane person on the face of the earth than Franklin D. Roosevelt. Why it should be persistently suspected that if this matter were left to his judgment and his humane instincts he would deal unjustly or harshly with the veterans of any war whose disabilities may be referred to actual service is beyond my conception, unless it finds its explanation in a partisan attempt to embarrass the President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I think perhaps some of that suspicion arises out of the fact that it is believed that the President has not been and will not be able to give very much personal attention to this matter. We know that some great wrongs have occurred, and we assume that they have occurred by reason of the fact that the President has not had an opportunity to deal with the matter in person.

Mr. GLASS. They may have occurred because the President has not had an opportunity to give personal attention to these matters; but it is inconceivable to me that the President will not give his personal attention to these matters, after what has transpired in both Houses of Congress, after the bitter controversy over this particular matter. I believe he will give his personal attention, and I believe he will do it to the very limit of his humane nature and his spirit of generosity toward those whose disabilities may be related to actual service.

Mr. BORAH. It occurs to me that if he does change the program, he will have to change some of his agents.

Mr. GLASS. Very well; then let him change some of his agents. I think if he regards it as necessary to be just to the veterans, he will change some of his agents. Therefore, it had puzzled me to understand the persistent suspicion of the President of the United States.

The conferees on the part of the Senate could have had no knowledge of what transpired in the House of Representatives except that based upon the representation of the conferees of the House. The conferees will recall that I distinctly asked the conferees of the House if they would agree to any modification whatsoever of the attitude taken by the House as expressed in its vote on the Steiwer amendment. I think the conferees listened very patiently for nearly 2 hours to the Senator from Oregon, who occupied four fifths of our time in undertaking to adjust the matter according to his peculiar views. There was telephone call after telephone call to those who will be charged with the administration of the law; and at no time could the Senator from Oregon get agreement from those who were consulted that his interpretation of the exact phrasing of the law was the correct interpretation.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GLASS. Cheerfully.

Mr. STEIWER. Can he tell us who was consulted aside from Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. GLASS. I know that the Senator from South Carolina called a man named Roberts, counsel for the Veterans' Administration. I know that he called Hines, the Director of the Bureau.

Mr. STEIWER. Is it the Senator's understanding that he talked to Mr. Hines?

Mr. GLASS. I do not know whether he did or not. I did not overhear his conversation.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will yield to me, I did not; but I did discuss the matter with counsel of the Veterans' Administration, Mr. Roberts; not with General Hines. The Senator from Virginia was right; I tried to reach General Hines.

Mr. STEIWER. I understood that.

Mr. BYRNES. And later spoke to Mr. Roberts as to our discussion about the interpretation of the language.

Mr. STEIWER. I understood that, and I understood that the Senator talked only to Mr. Roberts and to Mr. Douglas.

Mr. BYRNES. That is correct.

Mr. GLASS. At all events, I am sure the Senator from Oregon will admit that we sat with becoming patience for nearly 2 hours and listened to his construction of the exact phrasing of the language, and that we could not reach an agreement with him.

Mr. STEIWER. Will the Senator yield once more? Then I promise not to interrupt him.

Mr. GLASS. Certainly; as often as the Senator desires.

Mr. STEIWER. I want to advise the Senator that it may have seemed like 2 hours to the Senator from Virginia, but I was not in the conference 2 hours, and during the time I was there we discussed three or four amendments, and every member of the conference committee did quite a little talking. I have been more loquacious on this subject than I usually am, but I think the Senator will bear witness that I am not particularly loquacious.

Mr. GLASS. I simply undertake to acquit myself. I think the Senator did most of the talking. I am not saying that in disparagement of him, because he talks entertainingly, but on this occasion not convincingly. The only talking I did, I think, was of a very practical nature. The Senator will recall that I asked the conferees on the part of the House if they were unalterably opposed to any change in the attitude of the House, and they said they were. What else was there to do then but to reach an agreement, unless we want to continue here discussing this matter?

I confess readily and cheerfully, and with some amusement, that I may have thought that the time was a little drawn out, because I had heard the Senator from Oregon say everything on the floor of the Senate that he said in conference, and it seemed to me like a repetition of a contention with which others of us could not agree.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Was the Senator able to refute the arguments presented by the Senator from Oregon in the conference committee? If he was, I wish he would give the Senate the benefit of his views.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; I refrain from talking about matters with which I am not intimately connected. I never have done so in either branch of the Congress for 30 years.

It so happened that I was charged with banking legislation while this matter was pending, and it enabled me to wish off this awful job on my colleague the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. The Senator from Oregon made no argument which appealed to my judgment in the conference committee. If he had made a convincing argument, I would have taken his part, but he did not, and therefore I signed the report.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, the Senator first tells us that he has not given the study to the subject which would enable him to refute the arguments of the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. GLASS. If I have ordinary intelligence, the Senator from Oregon made no argument which appealed to me.

Mr. CUTTING. Then it is very strange that no Senator on the other side of the Chamber or on this side has stood up and tried to refute a single one of the arguments presented by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Texas engaged here for an hour yesterday afternoon in undertaking to determine the exact meaning of the text of this proposed act. I heard all of that. While I say I gave no intimate attention to this problem, it does not mean that I am so stupid that I cannot understand an argument that goes on in the Senate or in conference committee.

Mr. CUTTING. Is the Senator capable now of giving us the substance of that argument?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico must address the Chair.

Mr. GLASS. In substance, the argument on the part of the Senator from Oregon was that the text of this proposed act discriminated against veterans whose disabilities might be related to actual service, and the argument on the other side was that it did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. STEIWER. It causes me considerable pain to have to tell the Senator that that was not my contention at all.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator wants to confess that he did not know what he was talking about, I will let it go at that. [Laughter.]

I beg pardon of the Senate for taking any of its time at all. I feel rather culpable, because I am Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and chairman of this particular subcommittee, and I wished this job off on my colleague because I had other important matters to attend to.

I just want to say this in conclusion: The Senator from Oregon suggested that somebody was not willing to assume the responsibility for his action in the conference committee, and I want to assure him, for myself and my two colleagues on this side, that we are quite as willing to assume responsibility for signing the report as he is for assuming responsibility for not signing it. As I said a while ago, he has gone far beyond my own attitude if I had the decision of this matter.

In the matter of administrative economy, I would not cut one thrip off the allowance given to a soldier whose disability may be related to actual service. On the other hand, I would not give a penny to the hundreds of thousands who have been put on the rolls who may not relate their disability, if they have any disability—it is chiefly presumption and not disability—who may not relate their disability to actual service in the cause of their country.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Then, why on June 23, 1930, did the Senator from Virginia vote for a bill extending the presumptive period from 5 years to 10 years?

Mr. GLASS. Because, perhaps, I did not know as much about it then as I know now. [Laughter.]

I have already tried to indicate to the Senator that I have been all this session so absorbed with banking legislation of tremendous importance that I have not been able to give careful and intimate attention to other problems. I have given so much attention to that legislation that I have nearly lost my life in application to that particular work. But I want it distinctly understood that I signed this conference report, and I resent the suggestion that I do not want to assume responsibility for signing it. I do assume full responsibility for signing it, because the matter had resolved itself into a practical proposition; that is, whether we are to adjourn Congress, or are we to stay here with this interminable controversy between the two Houses of Congress and the President of the United States?

VICTORY OVER THE HELPLESS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the very peculiar situation with which we are presented. I would hesitate to offer parliamentary advice to the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who has been connected with the Congress for so many years, or to the distinguished Senator from Alabama, but they tell us we are confronted with a situation in which we can do no better for the veterans. They tell us that unless we get two thirds of the votes of both Houses we cannot accomplish anything against the President.

Mr. President, I assume the responsibility of saying that a majority of the Senate can have its way in this matter. I say that a majority of the Senate can put the Steiwer amendment in the law and keep it there if we have the manhood and the stamina and the courage of our convictions to stand where we ought to stand tonight. All we have to do is to put the amendment back onto this bill, and when the bill comes back with it taken out put it back on the bill, and every time the House of Representatives takes it off, yielding to the demands of the administration, all we have to do is to have a majority of the votes and again put it back on the bill. If the Government is to run, this amendment should go in the bill and become the law.

Mr. President, why did we suspend the rules here on motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]? In order to put legislation on an appropriation bill. Let us be fair about it. We did it because we knew the United States Government had to have money with which to run the Government. The only reason for putting this amendment on the appropriation bill was that we knew it was necessary that the administration get money enough to run the Government. When we put the Trammell amendment on the bill, we thought it would ride through and become a law, and it will, unless we consent that it be taken off.

Gentlemen argue that the President has such authority that he can veto action of the Senate of the United States, just or unjust, and that therefore we have to yield. I ask whether it is just, under the circumstances, with the enormous whip that has been placed in the hands of the administration, that we should see the widows, and the orphans, and the disabled veterans of the World War; the blind, the crippled, the armless, the legless, imposed upon because we have gone to the unlimited extent, to the unconscionable distance, of granting authority to an Executive against which we can now interpose no bar?

It is said that we made a mistake when we did that. It is said that the President makes a mistake when he uses the power. If the Senators of the United States intend to stand as I will stand, this legislation will be put into the law. We have 96 members here. If 48 out of the 96 will stand as I will stand, I will take the responsibility of saying that the Steiwer amendment will become the law, or I will walk out of the Senate and never try to hold another public office. Let 48 Senators vote as I am going to vote on this matter, and it will be the law, and stay the law, after we have voted it.

The Senator from Missouri intimates it is time to stop fighting, and I have every regard for the Senator from Missouri; he feels as I do about this matter. Many feel that it is time to quit fighting. We fought last night, it is said, we stayed up at night and got up early in the morning, and missed our dinner engagements, and missed everything in the way of entertainment that Washington affords, and therefore we ought to be willing now to give up this terrible fight.

Mr. President, there was once a fight made for America. Twice there was a fight made for America. When soldiers stood in the mud of the trenches up to their waists, and sometimes up to their shoulders, in the World War they were tired, bleeding, wounded, crippled, hungry. But suppose they had given up because they were tired and hungry, bleeding and wounded; where would the Senate of the United States have been tonight? We would not have been sitting here under the Stars and Stripes, Mr. President, if those men had given up because they were tired; yet we are told to give up their fight tonight because we are tired.

Mr. President, I have a very pitiful group of correspondence here from which I want to read just a few lines. I am not going to take up much time tonight. One of them comes here from Washington; and I want to say that I do not take the responsibility for one of these letters; but I will read from them briefly to indicate the temper of the people. This one [exhibiting] comes from my own city of New Orleans:

NEW ORLEANS, April 13.

I am a veteran at said hospital as a patient. I am James V. Kennedy, C 1-975-357, who lives at 5328 Laurel Street, city of New Orleans, La. I read in the papers that one of my buddies sent you his teeth.

And I want to state they were contained in a package which I received here, which, at the time, was the object of some laughter among us. One of the veterans wrote in and said, "since they passed this legislation, I will not need my teeth," and sent me a package containing his teeth, which was a joke, and we all laughed at it. But imagine the serious side of it. Here is a poor fellow who read about my having that set of teeth, and let me read you, who laughed at it, what he writes. Let me show you the serious side of it.

This is the third time I have been a patient here. The first time they extracted 23 of my teeth from November 9 to November 26, 1931; broke a plate I had and never did give me any back.

Honorable sir, will you please send me those teeth of my buddy's.

[Laughter.]

This is a terrible thing, Mr. President, if I do say it:

Honorable sir, will you please send me those teeth of my buddy's and let me file and fit them for my mouth, as I know I am going out of here and will need teeth to get along with.

Here is a man, a veteran of the World War, who has been in a hospital as the result of his injuries; they have had to extract every tooth he had in his mouth, and he is being turned out today, by the mercies of the Honorable Lewis Douglas and of one of the former employees of Bernard M. Baruch, without anything in his mouth to eat with, if he could get anything to eat; and the Senate of the United States is told to hurry, hurry, hurry, and get away in time. God help you to get away in time. Turn these veterans out on the mercies of the world! There is no time to talk; no time to help! We are called upon to hurry, because the administration demands it. Suppose they had been in a hurry, this man and others of his soldier comrades?

I have another letter, which is directed to a colleague of mine, and I have not as yet received his permission to use it, so I will not read it. However, here is one from Durant, Okla., dated June 7, 1933:

The ex-soldiers, farmers, and workers feel that you are one of the ones in the United States Senate that has humanity's interest at heart. The people are getting blood in their eyes. I was at an American Legion meeting last night in Durant. Believe me, they were plenty tough. If some of the Morgan and Mellon men would have been there, they might have spit out a few of their jaw teeth. They are mad over the way Congress and the Senate has done about these compensations and bonus. We are now sorry we fought to make the world safe for democracy. It means this to me: After I spend my last little compensation check, which will be July 1, I will have to take my three little girls, the oldest 12 and the youngest 8 years old, and hitch-hike it up and down the highways, stealing and bumming food, sleeping under Mr. Morgan's, Mellon's, and President Roosevelt's shade trees that they are having set out. I am not the only one that feels that way. Why should we have any respect for them? They do not care if we starve.

Part of this letter, Mr. President, is such that I cannot read any further, I am afraid. I have read a part of it just to show the sentiment. And I can only read a few of these letters without taking too much of the Senate's valuable time.

Here is one from Brooklyn, dated June 14, 1933:

DEAR SENATOR LONG: I am writing you this letter, Senator, as I must thank you for always fighting hard for us crippled vets and also for the workingman—

And so forth—

Honest, Senator, the Democratic Party ought to get rid of Frank Hines, director of the vets affairs. He is too hard-boiled and unjust to the vets who were injured in military service.

Men that were injured in France or became ill while serving in Europe get very little because they are always given fake diagnosis by the doctors of years ago. I myself was sent back from Europe a physical and half-blind wreck. I was given medical discharge and sent home to shift for myself. I was ignorant of my rights; I did not know where to appeal for help until another crippled veteran took me to the Vets' Bureau 2 years after I was discharged and put in a claim for my eyes and nervous trouble. I was paid for a while, then when I became totally blind in 1923, was told that my eyes were not of service origin, that they only made a mistake in diagnosis. Yet in 1918 they called it corneal-opacity.

God Almighty, Senator, do you see how the blind and crippled vets are humbugged by the likes of Frank Hines' office boys? Get rid of Hines and put a man there who is human and just. I am useless now for 15 years. I won't live long, but I don't want to be aggravated into death before my time, the way I have been. What I get really amounts to almost nothing.

The following letter is from Jetmore, Kans., and is dated June 5, 1933:

DEAR SENATOR: As a poor disabled veteran of the World War, I and my wife and seven children want to thank you—

And so forth—

I lost an arm and leg in the war, and I know what it is to suffer.

The people of this section of the United States are not going to forget, and we are not going to see our children and our women starve when there are other ways to get it. I and more than 20 of my friends have armed ourselves and our homes to be prepared for what we know is coming. We gave all we had for our country when she called us, and now our country owes us something to feed our babies on.

Mr. President, without in any respect approving such sentiments, this will give you a cross section of how the veterans of the World War feel, veterans who are crippled, who are blind, who are disabled, who have wives and children to feed and their own maimed, disabled bodies to care for, who are deprived of everything which they have been accustomed to spend for sustenance and a living.

Here is one from Harrisburg, Pa.:

I beg your pardon for writing these few lines, but if I did not write you, I won't have no other way of thanking some of you for the good fight you are putting up for the soldier boys on their pensions. I feel very sorry I won't be able to write thanks to the Senators of my own State, but you know they failed us—

He is somewhat mistaken; the Senators voted with him last night—

so I want to thank you and Senator ROBINSON of Indiana and all the other good Senators. You will never know how much your human-heartedness is appreciated. In this city now what do you think the boys are talking about? It is just this, that they will have another party to vote for by the next election.

I have a letter from Pocatello, Idaho, but there is nothing of particular importance in it.

Here is another letter from New Orleans, which is not out the ordinary, and I can avoid reading it.

I will now read one from Key West, Fla., dated June 5, 1933, and addressed to me.

Unfortunately I am forced to continue in physical torture the rest of my life from a disability brought on by poison gas and exposure. You may learn from my Veterans' Bureau record I have spent 8 or 9 years in hospitals, and a greater part of that time choking half to death, never able to lie down day or night. No one can even imagine this terrible torture I have to endure.

I hope Senators will notice that here is a man who is disabled so badly that he can go to bed neither in the daytime nor in the nighttime.

Hardly a day passes that I do not have to take hypodermics for this condition. Never able to associate with my friends in any gathering for any purpose without bringing on more suffering. One by one I have watched my buddies suffering with this same disease choke to death, and always thinking surely my time will be next, but still they are more fortunate than I, because they will not be here to depend on charity after July 1.

Last week I received a notice from the Veterans' Administration I would be cut from $100 to $20 monthly. I cannot hope to live on this amount without depending on charity. I should think that all Senators and Congressmen who voted for this bill to bring on this condition would bow their heads in shame when they return to their homes and see these disabled men line up in bread lines.

That is a typical case, Mr. President, the case of a man injured in the line of duty, poisoned by gas, who for a period of 9 years has never been able to go to bed during the daytime or during the nighttime, who has had his compensation cut from $100 a month to $20 a month. We know he cannot live on it, and yet we are called upon to go away and leave that kind of thing existing, as it will exist during the months to come. We are told that we cannot do any better. I tell you, Mr. President, that we can.

Here is another letter sent to me by the agent of a life-insurance company:

Last July I brought Schwam to his home here at Shreveport, placed him in his aunt's home here and she has been taking care of him with the assistance of a day and a night attendant. About 2 months ago, his aunt, who is 63 years of age, was stricken with rheumatism in addition to her high blood pressure and the situation is such that I have no place to put Schwam. The general hospitals here will not take a neurotic case.

Schwam's pay is being discontinued June 30 under the recent legislation.

His pay is being entirely discontinued—a man who has a day and a night nurse to take care of him, who has to have two assistants to take care of him while he is existing practically in a living hell, whose compensation is going to be entirely discontinued on the 30th day of this month, provided we get the Congress away from here! Hasten the adjournment of Congress that the pillage and murder and misery and destruction may continue to be inflicted on people whom the Congress sent away to fight the war for Democracy and who were brought back to this country to suffer under administrative rules prescribed under the heels of Veterans' Bureau autocracy! I will read the remainder of the letter:

And I made application with S. T. Taylor, acting manager of the Veterans' Administration facility at Alexandria, La., for hospitalization of Schwam. Mr. Taylor immediately advised me that due to the fact that Schwam receives his pay for 2 months longer he cannot be placed in a Government hospital.

I have a letter sent to me by the service commissioner of the American Legion of Louisiana. He said:

Frank Louis Roux, of Luling, La., called at our office a few days ago requesting our assistance in having his compensation restored, which was reduced from $67 to $8 a month under the provisions of the Economy Act.

I am advised by Comrade Roux that he received a gunshot wound on the Verdun sector on October 15, 1918, when he and six other members of his company were in a shell hole.

He encloses a photograph, which I am going to ask my friend the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], a distinguished surgeon, to examine. I want him to look at that picture. Here is another picture, and I should like to have him examine it while I read the balance of the letter.

A German shell exploded killing his six comrades and injuring him. Fortunately, he was lying on his stomach at the time of the explosion. He was in the hospital 7 months and was operated on eight times.

I am enclosing an actual photograph of the wound for the reason that a good many Members of Congress were no doubt of the opinion that the Economy Act would not reduce the compensation of those men who received gunshot wounds in service. The veteran advises me that you can show this photograph to as many Members of Congress as you desire.

Assuring you that the veterans appreciate your efforts in their behalf, with kindest regards and best wishes, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

LINDEN DALFERES,
State Service Commissioner.

Mr. President, I am not going to read from anything else I have here nor from any other letters. I would like to ask my friend the Senator from New York if he has had sufficient opportunity to examine the pictures to tell us what he thinks of the compensation of this man having been reduced from $67 a month to $8 a month?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should say it was very cruel indeed.

Mr. LONG. I have the pictures here and anyone else can see them who may desire. Here is a photograph of a man cut all over the back, operated on eight times, and his compensation is cut from $67 to $8 a month. The Senator from New York, a distinguished surgeon of this country, gives the answer that it is indeed very cruel to have this man's compensation reduced in the way it has been.

But we are told to go right ahead. My friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said we went up the hill and now we have to come down the hill. I am not one of those who are coming down the hill. I am going to vote to send this thing back to conference again. I am going to vote to reject the conference report. If the bill is taken back to conference and comes back here again, I am going to vote again to reject it. Then if it does pass and the President vetoes the bill, I am going to vote to override the veto.

If we do not succeed in overriding the veto, and he comes here with a joint resolution to continue last year's appropriations, I am going to vote to tack this thing on to the joint resolution, too. Never by my vote will any government get what it wants until it does justice to the veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War veterans.

Let me call attention to another thing that has been done: Last night when we voted 51 to 39, there was a Dill amendment in the bill proposing to give better treatment to the Spanish-American War veterans. My friend from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], I understood, voted for the proposal simply because the Dill amendment was attached to it. Tonight they come with the Dill amendment out of it that we voted into it last night; that is, we would not accept it last night without the Dill amendment. Last night we were unwilling to accept it even with the Dill amendment in it, and tonight they have taken the Dill amendment out of it.

Last night we were not even willing to accept the Byrnes amendment with the Black provision attached to it. The Black amendment provided that in the empty beds in the Government hospitals the veterans of the World War should be treated who now are without hospital treatment. But even that provision has been taken out.

Now, we have the bare proposition, with nothing in the way of compulsion, allowing the veterans of the World War to be subjected to the same treatment that they are now, and practically taking the Spanish-American War veterans off the rolls. Lo and behold, regardless of all that was said here yesterday, they have the temerity to come back with a pauper's oath attached to the Spanish-American War veterans' claims for compensation! They have actually had the courage, they have actually had the fortitude, to come back here with a nefarious, obnoxious, inhuman provision that before a member of the Spanish-American War army can get compensation up to as much as $15 a month he must take a pauper's oath and swear he is absolutely destitute and in need, and he has to prove it. That is what we are called upon to assent to here tonight, and to let this thing go hurly-burly on the wings of speed in order that we can get Congress out of the way.

Why does Congress have to adjourn? What is the hurry? Senators had better stay here if they know how the folks feel back home. [Laughter.] The best thing they can ever do in their lives is to stay right here. They will wish they were back here when they go home. What is the hurry? Why the great hurry? Why should anyone want to leave here? It is not hard for us to stay here. It is not hurting us a bit. We can stick it out here. A few more days will not hurt us. Someone has said that it is not desired to have any discussion of the war debts in Congress. It has been said that the economic conference over there might be disturbed. That is not going to hurt anything. They are not paying much attention to the delegates we sent over there, anyway. [Laughter.] They did not even send a hack down to meet them at the water front when they got there. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Chair must again admonish occupants of the galleries that they are here as guests of the Senate and that the rule of the Senate prohibits any demonstrations of approval or disapproval among the occupants of the galleries. The rule will be strictly enforced.

Mr. LONG. Our delegates went over there. One of them is even considered the prime minister of America—and that would have been his job if he had been in England. He got up early in the morning and dressed himself in morning clothes, with striped pants, and a high standing collar that he had to get on a stump to spit over, and if he walked off the side of the boat and thought "Where is the band", he would have been informed that unless he had a brass band inside, there was not a band within 10 miles of where he was standing; so he got in a hack and went up to a boarding house.

Our delegates need not worry about what is going to be the outcome of the Conference. Those fellows over there had it all written out before our fellows got there. It is just taking a little time for our fellows to swallow it, because they have got to learn how to swallow. Does anyone need to tell me that our representatives can get over there one day and settle $75,000,000 worth of debts for 8 cents on the dollar the next day? Nothing of the kind.

They are doing business too fast. We had better remain in session here long enough so they will hesitate and think things over a little bit. Why be afraid of staying here a little while longer? If we will stay here until the President has time to investigate, assuming that he is the kind-hearted man we say he is and that I say he is, if we will stay here until that kind heart has a knowledge and an understanding of what is going on in this country, he will listen to somebody besides the chief executioners of the Veterans' Administration, and he is bound to come to a realization that these infamous practices should be discontinued and such rules and regulations as are now being followed should be done away with and put out of existence by the Veterans' Administration.

We probably will be beaten on this matter tonight. I have heard it said on the floor of the Senate that all the Democrats have been called up from the White House and asked to vote against the veterans. They may have called up all the rest of them, but they did not call me. [Laughter.] When they call me up, Mr. President—well, I have not been called up today. It makes no difference whether I was called or not, I know these veterans a great deal better than the White House knows them. I know if we are called on as a party matter we are supposed to bow to it as a party matter. We are told the Republicans are practically solid one way and that the Democrats must stand the other way to keep the party from being embarrassed.

I do not look upon it that way. I am fighting for the preservation of the party. I am fighting for the standing of the party. I am fighting to keep the party from making a mistake; and even if I were not, I am not going to allow my hatred for Republicans or my liking for Democrats or anything of the kind to send the citizens of this country who are wounded and disabled and blind, I am not going to send the widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers have left this earth by reason of wounds they received in defense of this country, out into the highways and byways and to the charity bureaus. No one can talk Democracy or Republicanism to me, and they cannot talk party regularity or protecting the party from this great embarrassment, and expect me to take part in driving out upon the streets of the country the orphans of the World War veterans, their widows, nor any of the blind or disabled men who fought the battles of this great country of ours in the World War. It is above Democracy. It is above party.

If Senators will hear me now they will not put the cudgels in the Republican Party's hands to go out into the country and give us a Republican House by about 100 majority. Remember these words. They will not be taken out of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Remember these words. If this travesty and this disgraceful thing is put over on the veterans here tonight, we will have a Republican House or some other kind of proposition if we have any Congress left in November, 1934. That is what is being done here tonight.

I am standing for the party, because I know the party can never forget its obligations to humanity and to the soldiers who have defended us. It was not the Republicans who declared the war. They declared one war, the Spanish-American War, but the Democrats declared the World War. Now we are called upon to participate in a great victory. We are called upon to join our party tonight in a great victory. It will be a great victory. It will be a victory by which the dominant party will triumph over the man who was thrown out of his bed and who has no place to go. That is the great victory we are called upon to share tonight.

Will it be a great victory, Mr. President, when we bring to tears the orphans and children of the veterans in this country, the widows whose husbands and the children whose fathers gave all they had in the defense of their country? We are called upon to share with the party this great victory against the men who have no bed in which to sleep, a victory against the starving men with not a bite to eat, a victory against our disabled and destitute veterans, a victory against the widows and orphans of the Spanish-American War veterans, many of whom died like flies in Florida and others of whom lost their lives in Cuba. That is the great victory we are called upon to participate in tonight.

Some men are great in victory. If I participate in that kind of a victory, then I feel that I shall be in the position of the famous old general who said, "One more victory like this and it will be the end of my regime." Another victory like this will be the end of our Democratic regime.

As a Democrat and as an American I cannot vote as some of my friends say. I would feel as if I were not a Senator. I would feel as if I were not anything like a representative. Shall I stand here and say, "The President will not let me do anything else? I know it is right that we should do this for the veterans, but the President will not let me? I know that we ought to take care of the blind and suffering veterans, but the President will not let me? I know that we ought to do this, yet I am going to vote the other way?" Shall I say we ought to do something that is different, something that is merciful, something that is kind, something that is honorable, but we cannot do it because we do not think the President wants the Congress to stay here any longer? I say to you that if there is a majority of only 1, if there are 49 Senators in this body—and I pause for any Senator to controvert what I am about to say—those 49 Senators in this body can guarantee this legislation.

I do not care what the House does. We have all read of the gag rule under which they have operated. They have a rule over there under which they come in and allow 1 hour for debate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that he may not comment upon the proceedings in the other House or their rules.

Mr. LONG. I cannot talk about the rule of the House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not disadvantageously to the rule of the House.

Mr. LONG. I cannot even mention it? I do not want to speak disrespectfully of them. I just want to state what is the fact. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed. The Chair has reminded him of the rule.

Mr. LONG. At any rate, we will say that in this body, the Senate, if we were operating here under some kind of a proposition by which something is brought out, and we are told to swallow it, and we have 1 hour to prepare to swallow it, if we were to render judgment in that kind of fashion, it would remind me of the old justice of the peace deciding a case. He heard the evidence, and he heard the arguments of counsel, and he said, "Now, gentlemen, the court is going to consider the evidence, and the court is going to consider the law and the arguments of counsel. Now the court is going to adjourn, and the court is going fishing. Then I am coming back here on Thursday 2 weeks from now; and the court, after consideration of the law and the evidence will render judgment in favor of the plaintiff." [Laughter.]

But we are not deliberating that way, gentlemen of the Senate. We have our own time; we have our own course, and the responsibility is ours. We have our own minds to make up. There is not any rule of expediency calling upon us to leave here tonight. Ordinarily I myself should like to leave, but not now. I should like to leave as much as you, maybe; but there is no rule calling upon us to leave here. This can be the law. It ought to be the law, we all admit. I have not heard anyone in the Senate who voted with us to start with who says that he did not vote right so far as the substantive law was concerned. Of all those who voted 3 to 1 to suspend the rules, none has yet gainsaid his vote. Of all those who stood here to suspend the rules in order that legislation might go on an appropriation bill, not one here tonight or at any other time has once said that he did not vote the right way.

Well, why quit now? Why quit tonight? Why quit? Why have it said that last night we voted the right way, being told that we were going to have the bill vetoed, and tonight we floundered and voted the other way? If we were going to change tonight, we could have changed last night. We started out here by saying that we were going to keep this thing on an appropriation bill in order that by that extraordinary process we could make it law. If that was a proper thing to do in the beginning, it is a good thing to do now.

I hope we will be men enough to stand here tonight. I hope we will stand where we stood last night. I hope we will not go back upon the people who sent us here. I hope we will remember the veterans. I hope we will remember the orphans of those veterans and the widows of those veterans. I hope we will not be led aside, thinking that our own circumstances are such that we must impose upon the veterans something that we are unwilling to impose upon ourselves.

Now, just a word about ourselves and I am through.

We voted to reduce our own salaries 15 percent. Now remember, gentlemen of the Senate, it makes no difference how long we stay here, the Government is paying us—as long as we have a duty to perform the Government is paying us anyway. We are getting just as much money for every day we spend at home as we are getting here; and every hour that we ought to be giving to the relief of anybody in this country we owe it to the people to stay right here and give.

We voted to decrease Government salaries. The President of the United States set a good example. He cut his own salary. He cut his own salary from $75,000 a year to 15 percent less than $75,000 a year, and we cut our own salaries from $10,000 a year to 15 percent below $10,000 a year. That was a gracious thing for us to do. That was a gracious thing for the President to do. It is a gracious thing for the President and for Congress voluntarily, by their own actions and by their own votes, to cut their own salaries 15 percent. It left the President with 15 percent less than $75,000. He gets only about sixty-six or sixty-seven thousand dollars and we get only about $8,500 under this reduction.

But we are called upon now to cut the compensation of men who are wounded, who are hungry, who are disabled. We are called upon to take away the pitiful compensation that is being drawn by widows and by orphans. We are called upon to say whether or not we are going to take our own $10,000 salary, that we would not reduce more than 15 percent, and whether or not the President is going to take his own $75,000 salary, that he would not reduce more than 15 percent, and then take the little widow and two orphan children, who are getting $40 a month, and cut it 65 percent; and take the poor blind man, who is getting $100 a month, and cut that 80 percent; and take the poor devil here who was wounded all over the back, and operated on eight times, and reduce him from $67 to $8 a month. We are called upon to say whether or not it is justice and right under the living, shining stars of heaven to sit here tonight and take away 65, 75, 80, and sometimes 100 percent of the amount that some poor little widow or orphan or wounded veteran is drawing when we are not willing to take away more than 15 percent from our own salaries of $10,000 a year.

That is what we are called upon to say here tonight, gentlemen of the Senate. We are called upon to say whether or not there is such a thing as justice. Some poor little widow, some poor blind man, waiting on himself, waiting for the Reaper to come, and praying that he will come soon enough to relieve him of the distress that he is in; the poor blind devil who lies there, never to see the sun's light again, never to see the face of his child again, starving and hurt and bleeding, praying for the day when the Almighty will take him and relieve him from this distress—we are called upon to say tonight whether we will take $80 out of the little $100 he is getting, and will not take more than $15 out of the hundred dollars we are getting ourselves.

That is what we are called upon to decide.

No; I will not participate in the Democratic victory tonight, Mr. President. I have participated in many Democratic victories and in many Democratic defeats. I have been a participant; but, so help me God, when we have won a victory it has been against strong and stalwart men. It has been against monopolies. It has been against giants of finance. We have grappled with them and won; but I do not care for my share in a victory that means that the poor and the downtrodden, the blind, the helpless, the orphaned, the bleeding, the wounded, the hungry, and the distressed, will be the victims of a victory in which I am to participate in the Senate.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, we are faced tonight with the same proposition with which we have been faced time and time again during the past few weeks. That situation can be expressed in a few words.

The Senate, by decisive vote, adopts a particular course of action. It sends to conference conferees a majority of whom have voted against that action. Then the conferees surrender everything that the Senate has favored.

Let me recall to the Senate the votes in the past few weeks.

On June 2, in the first decisive vote cast in the Senate relative to the veterans, the Senate, by a vote of 59 to 21, decided to suspend the rules and take up the Trammell amendment. The Trammell amendment, may I say again to the Senate, would have kept both the presumptive cases and the directly service-connected cases on the rolls, with a limitation of cut not of 25 percent but of 15 percent.

As I say, the Senate voted 59 to 21. Among the 21 who voted "nay" were Mr. BYRNES and Mr. GLASS.

A few hours later the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] moved to change the figure of 15, contained in the amendment of the Senator from Florida, to 25. That motion was defeated by a vote of 51 to 25—more than 2 to 1. Among the 25 were Mr. BYRNES and Mr. GLASS.

Later on a controversy arose between those who wanted the full benefit of the Trammell amendment and those who wanted a lesser degree of benefit under the Connally amendment. On this occasion the Connally amendment carried, and carried principally because the Senator from Texas assured the Senate that there was no chance of the Trammell amendment's escaping a veto, and implied strongly that the Connally amendment would not obtain a veto. The tie was broken by the Vice President. Among those who voted for a lesser degree of benefit to the veterans were Mr. BYRNES, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. RUSSELL—the three majority members of the present conference committee.

Last night the Senate took a vote on substituting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and myself for the House amendment as amended by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. The yeas were 51; the nays were 39. Among the 39, among the minority, I noticed the names of Mr. BYRNES, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. RUSSELL—the three majority members of the conference committee.

Mr. President, one of these days the Senate of the United States is going to get tired of sending to represent it conferees a majority of whom are avowedly opposed to the will of the Senate. We saw that last week in the votes on the Economy Act. We have seen it time and time again, not only in this session of Congress but in every session since I have been a Member of this body. The result, of course, is minority rule. You come back to this body after surrendering nothing of your own opinions—merely surrendering the opinions of the majority of the Senate, with which you were never in agreement—you come back to this body and present it with a situation where you either have to vote for the conference report or vote against it; and invariably the argument is made, "Oh, but the House conferees insisted on their amendment!"

How can Senate conferees who disbelieve in a Senate amendment make the same kind of a fight which the House conferees can make for an amendment in which they believe?

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has stood on this floor this very evening and told us that he has been too busy with other kinds of legislation to be able to present an intelligent argument on the question which is presented before the Senate tonight. Yet he goes on that conference committee, surrenders the wishes of the Senate, and comes back here and reports to the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I do not yield to the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Three times yesterday on the floor of the Senate I asked the Senator from Virginia to yield to me, and each time he declined.

Mr. President, I am very fond of the Senator from Virginia, and I think every Senator feels the same way, but I wish to quote from what the Senator from Virginia said yesterday immediately after he declined to yield to me:

I am going to vote against the proposed amendment—

Said the Senator—

because I feel that no man who will not fight for his own country is worth living in that country.

That is the reason the Senator from Virginia gave for voting against an amendment which would limit to 25 percent the cuts authorized to be made in combat-connected cases, which gave some scant measure of justice to the Spanish-American veterans, and which gave protection after the 31st of October to men who were on the rolls by presumption.

The Senator went on to say:

When he comes out of the combat without wounds, without disability, he has no right to raid the Federal Treasury perpetually because he was called into the contest—called in under draft, too, when it was a question of being shot here or shot at abroad. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, with all respect for the Senator from Virginia, I think that word "laughter" is the most disgraceful word which has ever been written into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In other words, the men who were drafted by the Congress of the United States went into the service because, if they were not willing to be shot at abroad, they would be shot at home; and at that somebody is supposed to have laughed.

I sat here while the Senator from Virginia was making his speech. I confess I heard no laughter. I am glad that I did not hear it. I do not know whether the Senator from Virginia revised his remarks in the RECORD or not.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of personal privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from New Mexico is making an infamous suggestion with respect to my conduct——

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I am making nothing of the sort.

Mr. GLASS. Which is nothing less than mendacious.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I call the Senator from Virginia to order under rule XIX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. GLASS. I do not say that under the shelter of constitutional immunity, either. I want the Senator to understand that. I will repeat it to him somewhere else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. CUTTING. As I have said, I do not yield to the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Virginia has just made an accusation of mendacity. I will yield to him for the purpose of stating just what I have said which he so qualifies.

I have read from the RECORD——

Mr. GLASS rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has suggested that I interpolated that word "laughter" in the RECORD.

Mr. CUTTING. No; I did not.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator did suggest that.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I implied nothing of the sort.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; the Senator did.

Mr. CUTTING. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me to proceed, I will tell him what I implied. I implied that if he saw that word "laughter" at that point in his remarks, the most ordinary sense of justice to those who served in the World War should have required him to strike that word from the RECORD.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it should not have done anything of the kind. I am not in the habit of falsifying the RECORD, if the Senator from New Mexico is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico will proceed.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia repeatedly on this floor takes advantage of the fact that we are all fond of him and that he is a man who has had a long and distinguished public career. He takes advantage of that fact to insult his colleagues freely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks perhaps the Senator is transgressing the rule.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, if I am transgressing the rule, what did the Senator from Virginia do when he accused me of mendacity?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggested that the Senator from New Mexico had the floor and that the Senator should proceed.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I do not care what the Senator from Virginia has to say with regard to me personally or with regard to any other Member of this body; but when he traduces the entire force which this country sent into the war from 1917 to 1919, then I feel that I for one have to protest against any such thing. So much for the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. President, we are acting under minority rule in this body. It occurs to me that the country is being run by minority rule. Does anyone think that the sentiment of the country is expressed by the House amendment which was agreed to by the conference committee? Does anyone think that the House amendment as agreed to by the conference committee represents even the sentiment of the House? Does not every Member of this body know that the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol adjourned today in order that there might be a caucus of the majority Members; and caucus rule, of course, as everyone knows, is minority rule, and cannot be anything else. The minority of the majority time and time again is going to be lashed into line, as the Senator from Pennsylvania said yesterday. I did not agree with him yesterday; I am afraid I am going to have to agree with him before the evening is over.

Mr. REED. Cannot the Senator do it right away?

Mr. CUTTING. No, Mr. President; I refuse to prejudge any issue before the votes prove it.

Mr. President, since I have been a member of this body until the present session the party on this side of the Chamber was in the majority. I have often criticized the majority of the Republican Party. I have often voted against them. I voted freely against the majority of this party when I thought they were wrong. I voted against the presidential candidate of this party when I thought he was wrong. I have no apologies to make for that. I have no apologies to make for standing up in this body for what I thought was right.

Why, at this late date, should a caucus of a party at one end or at the other end of the Capitol enforce their will on the membership of the party? Nothing like that, may I say, was ever done by the Republican Party when they were in the majority at any time since I have been a Member of the Senate.

You talk about Democracy, you talk about the principles of Thomas Jefferson. Can you conceive that the methods employed by the leadership of the Democratic Party from the beginning of this session to this day would be approved of by Thomas Jefferson or by any of the men whom the Democratic Party from his time to this has delighted to honor?

Every effort has been made to make this question a partisan issue, although the most ardent friends of the ex-service men at the other end of the Capitol and many of those in this Chamber are Democratic Members. These men have repeatedly fought for the rights of the veterans, regardless of party lines.

The Senate has expressed itself repeatedly. It expressed itself on the Trammell amendment. It expressed itself against the Robinson amendment. It expressed itself in favor of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon and myself. After all that, what do we get? We are presented tonight with a conference report repeating verbally, without a change, the very proposition which we voted down by such a large majority last night.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I do not want the Senator to make a mistake. We are not faced with the same thing we voted down last night. They have taken out the hospital amendment, and they have taken out the Dill amendment for the Spanish-American War veteran. We are faced with something which, to that extent, is vastly more repugnant than what we voted down last night.

I know one Senator near me here now who voted for the Byrnes amendment because they put the Dill amendment in it last night, who otherwise would not have voted for it, and tonight they have come back with the Dill amendment taken out, an amendment for the Spanish-American War veterans, and with the hospital amendment taken out, so that even the hospital beds which are empty cannot be used by the veterans of the World War who are disabled and have no place to go.

Mr. CUTTING. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, and in that connection I may read a telegram which I have just received from Asheville, N.C.

Apropos administration veterans' program advise several members Civilian Conservation Corps admitted this hospital receiving full pay. Veterans denied hospitalization and just compensation must be considered. Public uninformed of such inhumane inconsistencies.

S. T. AUXIER.

Mr. President, that is what we are doing with the hospitalization program. I am glad the Senator from Louisiana reminded me of that. I am glad he reminded me also of the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, which has also gone out in the conference report.

I was very much impressed a few moments ago with a remark made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], when he said that nothing which in its terms was permissive and not mandatory was, under these circumstances, worth the paper it was written on.

I have discussed the House amendment at great length. I do not want to continue to discuss it more than to recapitulate the principal points which I have made against it. I shall, however, read it, and make very brief comments.

The President is hereby authorized, under the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, to establish such number of special boards (the majority of the members of which were not in the employ of the Veterans' Administration at the date of enactment of this act) as he may deem necessary to review all claims (where the veteran entered service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disability is not the result of his own misconduct) in which presumptive service connection has heretofore been granted under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, wherein payments were being made on March 20, 1933, and which are held not service-connected under the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress. Members of such boards may be appointed without regard to the Civil Service laws and regulations and their compensation fixed without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. Such special boards—

I hope the Senate will pay particular attention to this sentence, because no Senator on the floor of this Chamber has made the slightest explanation of its meaning. I have stated that the only interpretation possible is that such boards will act under the provisions of the Economy Act, and yet in violation of the terms of the Economy Act. I still submit that no other explanation can be made. If any Senator desires to interpret it, I shall be glad to yield to him for such interpretation. I shall first read the sentence:

Such special boards shall determine, on all available evidence, the question whether service connection shall be granted under the provisions of the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress (notwithstanding the evidence may not clearly demonstrate the existence of the disease or any specific clinical findings within the terms of or period prescribed by regulations 1, part 1, subparagraph (c), or instruction no. 2, regulation no. 1, issued under Public Law No. 2, 73d Cong.), and shall in their decisions resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof in such cases being on the Government.

I pause for the purpose of allowing any Senator who can construe that language to do so now, because it is now that we are going to vote on this particular language. [A pause.] Apparently no Senator is prepared to interpret that language.

I shall not quote the next paragraph, which deals with insurance, because there is nothing in it to which anyone of whom I know has any particular objection, but I shall read the third paragraph.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the decisions of such special boards shall be final in such cases, subject to such appellate procedure as the President may prescribe, and, except for fraud, mistake, or misrepresentations, 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, therein shall continue to October 31, 1933, or the date of special board decision, whichever is the earlier date: Provided, That where any case is pending before any one of the special boards on October 31, 1933, the President may provide for extending the time of payment until decision can be rendered. The President shall prescribe such rules governing reviews and hearings as may be deemed advisable. Payment of salaries and expenses of such boards and personnel assigned thereto shall be paid out of and in accordance with appropriations for the Veterans' Administration.

All the provisions which I have so far read, Mr. President, apply to the so-called "presumptive cases"; that is, to cases that were placed on the rolls on account of the statutory presumption provided by Congress in the case of particular diseases where, through the nature of the disease, it was impossible to connect the case with service.

Anyone who read that section casually would think that those cases would be kept on the rolls unless the board decided that they ought to be removed, and that if the board decided they should stay on they would continue to receive 75 percent of what they are receiving at the present time, but anyone who studies the language and notes the word "mistake" will realize that the Veterans' Administration would be authorized, by virtue of that word, to call up for review any case whatever, on the plea that the doctors who had originally passed on the case had made a mistake. Undoubtedly such a review would be given in every case which could come before the board. "Seventy-five percent of the payments shall continue." It does not say, as we provided in the Connally amendment or in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon or in the amendment which the Senator from Missouri and I first proposed to the Senate, "not less than 75 percent", but "75 percent." In other words, the onus for making this cut of 25 percent is placed on the Congress of the United States and not on the President or the Director of the Budget or on the Veterans' Bureau.

Furthermore, Mr. President, after October 31, 1933, there is not the slightest guaranty in the House provision that any presumptive case will be kept on the rolls. Even though he may be totally and permanently disabled, even though he may be the most deserving veteran in the United States, he may be thrown off the rolls on October 31. Can anyone on the floor of the Senate or anywhere else justify such a provision as that? We take care of them until the 31st of October, and then we turn them loose on the world.

I have read the debates in the House of Representatives; I have sat on this floor through all the debate in the Senate; I have not heard one word in defense of that provision, and I do not expect to hear a word in defense of it. So much for the presumptive cases.

I come now to the cases which in March the Senate was assured would not be cut down 1 cent, the directly combat-connected cases. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] in March offered an amendment which we all know unfortunately contained three or four weasel words, "except as to rates." The Senator from Massachusetts then assured the Senate that under the terms of his amendment no veteran whose disabilities were combat-connected would be cut down at all unless there was some justification on account of the change in his condition. But if the Senate had known the way the Bureau was going to interpret this provision, it would not have been satisfied by providing a limitation of 25 percent; it would have insisted at that time that no cut at all should be made in those cases.

Here is the wording with which we are presented under the House amendment:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the rates of compensation payable for directly service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, in receipt of compensation on March 20, 1933, be reduced more than 25 percent.

I refrain from reading the remainder of the paragraph. The word "mistake" again would allow a review of every one of these cases; it would allow the veterans to be called in by the Veterans' Bureau time and time again; it would allow any board to pass on the medical judgment of men who had made the review at first hand; it would allow them to turn those cases off the rolls altogether; it would allow them to rerate these cases; and, after all, even in the cases which were not thrown out under the excuse of "mistake", the amendment merely provides that the "rates of compensation payable" shall not be cut.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. I am sorry the Senator from New Mexico did not read the remainder of the paragraph which he is discussing.

Mr. CUTTING. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. STEIWER. Because I think it throws considerable light upon the interpretation of the language the Senator now has in mind. With apologies to the Senator from Virginia, to whom the discussion of the Senate's position on this subject seems to be a little distressing, and in the time of the Senator who is speaking, let me read the remainder of that language. The last part of the paragraph reads as follows:

In no event shall death compensation, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, being paid to widows, children—

And I omit some of the language and continue:

be reduced or discontinued.

The purpose of the language which I have just read is to prevent reduction in the death compensation in the cases referred to. The language that is used to convey the thought is a plain, simple, straightforward language that the death compensation may not be reduced or discontinued. There is no reference here to rates of compensation.

The language is in the same paragraph as the language which the Senator from New Mexico is calling into question at this time. It seems to me that the employment of a different kind of phraseology in one and the same paragraph ought to warn every Senator that this proposal, which was born in the Veterans' Administration, is meant to protect the widows and orphans, but is intended to permit that administration to cut the compensation of the veteran.

If the Senator will permit me to go a little further in respect to the matter, in another paragraph which he has already read is a provision that the compensation in the presumptively connected cases shall not be cut pending the time of the review or until October 21, as the case may be. Obviously the purpose there was to prevent any cut greater than 25 percent. Let us see how that language is phrased. It provides, omitting a part of the paragraph, that 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, shall continue to October 31, 1933, or the date of the special board's decision, whichever is the earlier date.

In this case the language consists of a plain straightforward declaration that the payment being made on a certain date shall not be cut, and so it is in the third place in this proposal in which there is a limitation upon the reduction in compensation. In two of the instances we find direct and unequivocal language which actually limits the cuts, and the third case is the one the Senator from New Mexico is now discussing, and in that one we find the language that the rate of compensation payable shall not be cut.

It occurs to me, and I think every lawyer will agree, that when in the same instrument distinctions of this kind are made, we have no right to assume that all three phrases have the same meaning. We are on our guard. We know that the employment of special language in a special case has been used in order to do the thing we are told unofficially, by word of mouth, that the Veterans' Administration intends to do and which in my judgment they will do before we are 30 days away from the Capitol.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Oregon. Of course there can be no possible explanation of the words "rates of compensation payable" except that which the Senator has given.

The Senator goes on to say that in the words dealing with the widows and dependents, the clear word "compensation" was used, but I notice that even with regard to the widows and dependents, for whom until this moment I had thought we were providing in this compromise, we still find the words "except by mistake", so that even in the cases of the widows and dependents I submit that every one of them can be reviewed for mistakes. Does the Senator from Oregon agree with me?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, there is no question about it at all. All that remains for us to speculate about is whether or not the Director of the Budget thinks it is a mistake to pay death claims to widows of veterans of our war. If he thinks it is a mistake, they will be discontinued.

Mr. CUTTING. Then the only protection for any human being which I had always thought was in the House compromise is not there. There is not one word of protection for anybody. If we are going to vote tonight on the acceptance of the House proposal we might as well face that fact right now, and then go back home and explain to our people that we voted for something without one word of merit from start to finish, that we voted for something which we knew when we voted for it was a fraud and a sham. That is the record with which we are faced. That is what we are going to have to go home and explain if we accept the conference report tonight.

No one on the floor of the Senate has dared to defend the record made by the Director of the Budget in the handling of straight combat-connected cases. They have been cut down 50, 60, 70, and 80 percent. Cases have been presented here time and time again showing that to be the fact. We do not protect them in this legislation. When we read the press of the country we find that all the arguments made deal with so-called "presumptive cases." We are told that those presumptive cases were not actually due to the service, but that we just legislated them into a pension or compensation.

I shall not go over the entire record of those presumptive cases because most Senators are familiar with it. I think it was in 1924, or shortly thereafter—and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] will correct me if I am in error—that it was found necessary to take some care of those suffering with certain diseases because it was impossible in the nature of things to prove the exact time when those diseases originated.

Mr. REED. It was 1924.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator from Pennsylvania confirms me in the belief that it was in 1924.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator from Pennsylvania further stated that after a preponderance of medical evidence they agreed upon a period of 5 years for the presumption. Is not that correct?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Mr. REED. We fixed the definite date of January 1, 1925, as the end of approximately a 5-year period.

Mr. CUTTING. It was approximately 5 years, at any rate.

Mr. HATFIELD. Notwithstanding that the Senator from Pennsylvania through his committee, after a preponderance of evidence from no doubt outstanding medical men of the country, arrived at that conclusion, notwithstanding that there is not a book in print upon the subject of medicine that will not support the conclusions of the Senator from Pennsylvania upon the subject of presumption, the American Medical Association we are told now takes the position that the presumptive period in the kind of diseases such as tubercular and neuropsychiatric diseases should not extend longer than a period of 2 years. In other words, the American Medical Association repudiates the authorities upon the subject. It is a subterfuge pure and simple, Mr. President, that this association takes at this time upon this important subject which involves the American World War veteran and the Spanish-American War veteran.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair admonishes the Senator from New Mexico that if he yields except for a question he may lose the floor.

Mr. CUTTING. I shall in the future be guided by the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. President, in 1930 it was found that a great many very pathetic and very deserving cases of men who were not able to trace directly to the service their disability, were in want and need through tuberculosis, through neuropsychiatric disease, and through many other infirmities. A bill at that time was introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. RANKIN, of Mississippi, to extend the statutory presumption from 1925 to 1930. The Senate Finance Committee, which was then dealing with veterans' affairs, had hearings, and at one of the hearings the distinguished physician who represents the State of West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] appeared before the committee and testified in language which to me at least was completely convincing, in language which I have quoted in a great many States in the Union, that the 10-year presumptive period was sounder medically than the 5-year presumptive period.

There may be some doubt about that contention. The contrary was argued by some Senators on the floor, notably, by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], but when the vote came on extending the benefit of presumption from 1925 to 1930 the vote in the Senate stood 66 to 6. There were six Senators who voted against it. They were Messrs. Bingham, Gillette, Hastings, Reed, Walcott, and Watson. Among the 66 Senators who, after a full day of debate in a time when nothing else of any importance was before the Senate, voted to extend the presumption from 5 years to 10 years, I find the following names—and I shall not read them all, but I want to call attention to some of those who are in the Senate today: Mr. ASHURST, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. BRATTON, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. DILL, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. WAGNER.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us who was President then?

Mr. CUTTING. The President of the United States at that time was Mr. Hoover. I am glad the Senator reminded me. [Laughter.] Mr. Hoover vetoed that bill. He stood with the Senator from Pennsylvania and with the six Members of the Senate who voted that way. He stood against the 66 Members of the Senate who voted the other way. There was not a single Member of the Democratic Party who voted the way Mr. Hoover thought they should have voted. That was not a question of cutting down the presumptive period from 5 years to 1 year, as has been done under the Economy Act. That was the proposition of raising the presumptive period from 5 years to 10 years.

I do not think the distinguished Senators who voted that way would like to explain their votes on the ground that at that time the President of the United States belonged to the Republican Party, and that now the President of the United States belongs to the Democratic Party. But let me go on a little further.

Before the vote was taken on the Rankin bill, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] moved a substitute providing that veterans who were disabled to a certain extent could be placed upon the rolls regardless of whether their disability was service-connected or not. That amendment was voted down at the time; but after Mr. Hoover vetoed the Rankin bill, that proposal was put through the House of Representatives and sent to the Senate. It was accepted by the Senate because they felt they could get nothing better. I voted against it; and I am glad to see that then, at any rate, I had the company of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. But before we voted against it, a vote was taken on increasing the rates given to non-service-connected cases. That amendment was proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]; and among others the following Senators in the then minority, but in the present majority, voted for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to increase the rates on non-service-connected disabilities. These were the disabilities of men who were not to be on the statutory rolls by presumption, but frankly without any connection at all with the service—men who might be run over by an automobile on the street.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I hoped the Senator would use that phrase, or the one about being run over by a street car yesterday, because that is the one that is usually quoted in attacking this provision of law.

Mr. CUTTING. That very phrase was used at the time, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment to which the Senator has referred, presented by myself, proposed to apply the Spanish-American War rates.

Mr. CUTTING. To all non-service-connected disabilities.

Mr. WALSH. Of the World War.

Mr. CUTTING. That is quite correct, Mr. President.

The following Senators voted for the increased rate for cases totally unconnected with the service: Mr. ASHURST, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] did not vote, but had a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]; and I can only assume, from the opposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania to raising the rates, that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, who then was the minority floor leader, would have voted in favor of raising the rates on non-service-connected disabilities.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is not naming all of the Democrats who voted for that amendment?

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. But only those who voted against his amendment last night?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; and those who had said they would vote for the conference report tonight. Of course the Senator from Massachusetts voted for his own amendment.

I am not criticizing anyone who voted that way. I voted that way myself.

Mr. WALSH. They showed good judgment. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTTING. I think so; but that is the record of the Senate, first on presumptive cases, and second on non-service-connected cases.

Now, how in the name of all consistency can the Democratic Party take up as its slogan an opposition not merely to non-service-connected cases which have completely gone off the rolls, except in cases of total and permanent disability, but to presumptive cases which they unanimously voted for when it was a question of extending the presumption from 5 years to 10?

Between 1930 and 1933 there was no veterans' legislation of any significance before this body. So we come to the present session of Congress.

The Economy Act was passed at a time of stress and panic. I criticize no Senator who voted for it. Personally, I was paired against it. I was absent from the city, and unable to get here in time to vote. I submit that since the Economy Act every vote in this body has shown that the Senate disapproved of the cuts in combat-connected cases altogether, and that it disapproved of the inordinate slashes in the so-called "presumptive cases"—cases of men who were lying helpless in hospitals all over the Union—men who were to be thrown out on the 1st of July with their compensation cut, and unable to support themselves or their families from that time on.

As I said before, on the 2d of June we suspended the rules in order to take up the Trammell amendment, allowing a cut of only 15 percent not merely in cases of directly service connected soldiers but in cases where the connection was traceable through presumption. Among the majority who voted for that amendment I see the names of Mr. ASHURST, Mr. BACHMAN, Mr. GORE, Mr. MCGILL, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. POPE, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. STEPHENS, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, and Mr. VAN NUYS. These distinguished Senators of course knew exactly for what they were voting. They must have desired to bring on the floor of the Senate the matter not only of directly service connected cases but of presumptions.

Later in the day the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] moved to increase the possible limitation in the cut from 15 to 25 percent. Among those who voted against the Senator from Arkansas—that is, those who would not allow the President to cut these cases more than 15 percent—I see the names of Mr. BACHMAN, Mr. BLACK, Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. DUFFY, Mr. ERICKSON, Mr. MCGILL, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. POPE, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, and Mr. VAN NUYS.

These gentlemen, of course, knew that the only issue was whether we should allow the President to cut these cases, including the presumptive cases, to a maximum of 25 percent, or whether we should limit his cuts to 15 percent; and all those gentlemen said that we should reduce the cuts to 15 percent.

We had a debate after that on the relative merits of the Connally amendment and the Trammell amendment. The decision on that issue was reached only after it had been pointed out that one amendment would be vetoed and the other one would not be vetoed. The vote on that amendment, I submit, was a meaningless vote, because Senators in the best of faith might have voted either way with equal motives of assisting the disabled ex-service men.

It is unfortunate that the Senate did not take a record vote on the Trammell amendment as amended by the Connally amendment. If it had, I do not believe five Members of this body would have been recorded as voting against it. Of course, that is guesswork. There was not a single audible "no" in this Chamber when the question was put.

Before and since that vote was taken we have been given assurances of what was going to be done by the Veterans' Administration and by the Director of the Budget. These assurances have come from Senators acting in the best of faith on this floor, and in every case the administration has failed to live up to the promises made by its representatives here in the Senate. At last we were told that a committee of the House had been meeting at the White House with Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Budget, and that they had reached a fair compromise. We were told that that compromise would protect every combat-connected case from being cut more than 25 percent. We were told that that compromise would protect the presumptive cases until and unless a board of review had stricken them from the rolls.

When I got that information, Mr. President, I rejoiced, because I thought that there at last we were going to get some protection for the veterans of our wars, or at least for the veterans of the World War.

It was not until this miserable provision came down here and I had a chance to read it for myself and analyze it that I realized that it gave no protection either to the combat-connected cases or to the presumptive cases.

When I discovered that, I felt, and I know that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] felt, that we had no alternative except to expose this sham before the Senate and offer a substitute of our own.

For several hours the Senator from Oregon and myself engaged the attention of those Members of the Senate who were willing to listen to the argument. We dissected this provision word by word, showed the meaninglessness and the fraud involved in it. Nobody has answered those criticisms; nobody has stood up here and defended the House provision.

At the request of several Senators, on last Monday the Senator from Oregon and I withdrew the amendment and allowed the question to go to conference, on the distinct understanding that it would come back here and that we should have a vote. At that time, even those who spoke in favor of sending the amendment back to conference said that under no circumstances would they ever accept the House provision.

I quote from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]:

> I want it distinctly understood, insofar as my own vote is concerned, that it is not to be construed as a vote in favor of the House proposal. If that is brought back to the Senate by the conferees, I shall vote against the conference report.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] spoke as follows:

> Mr. President, I join the Senator from Alabama in saying that if the conferees do not do justice to the men who have served our country in the final test of a man's loyalty to his government, I, for one, shall resist any compromise that approximates what the House has sent here.

Mr. GEORGE, the Senator from Georgia, than whom there is no better friend of the ex-service man on the floor, spoke as follows:

> I had concluded that I should vote for the Cutting-Steiwer amendment, but in the interest of a free conference, and believing that it is quite possible for the conferees, if they are left free, to reach a satisfactory agreement between the Senate amendment and the amendment made by the House, I shall vote against instructing the conferees.

The Senator from Georgia proceeded:

> I think there is nothing to be gained by a lack of candor. The Senate, in my judgment, will not accept the House amendment as the House has submitted it to the conference, and unless there is some effort to reach an agreement which will deal more liberally with the veterans, particularly the Spanish-American War veterans, who are left wholly to Executive order, when the conferees report here the report would be rejected, notwithstanding the fact that we are anxious to adjourn finally and go to our respective homes.

If any Senator spoke in favor of accepting the House proposal on Monday, I have been unable to find his remarks in the RECORD. It seemed to be the unanimous sentiment of the Senate that, whatever else we accepted, and whatever compromise our conferees might be able to obtain for us, there was one thing we would not do—we would never under any circumstances accept the House provision. No Senator at that time rose to his feet and said that he would accept the House provision, and no Senator at that time suggested one single argument against the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon and myself.

The conferees went back to conference; they came back here and submitted the old House provisions, with a few additional provisions taking care of Spanish-American War veterans over 55, whom the President or somebody designated by the President was to rate as 50 percent disabled and in need—qualifications which made the whole thing meaningless—and they gave those veterans of the Spanish-American War a pension of $15 a month, a very generous pension, indeed, in times when we may be facing inflation.

The argument was made all day on this subject. Not one word of argument came from the Democratic side of the Chamber, or from anywhere else in this Chamber, against the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon and myself, except about two sentences which the Senator from Arkansas read off of a piece of paper. All the rest of the discussion dealt with the possibility that the House would not accept our provision, with the possibility, or, as some stated it, the certainty, that the President would veto the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, things which were entirely foreign to the argument, things which had nothing to do with our duty as Senators to cast our votes for the things we believed in.

As I just said, the Senator from Arkansas did read a word or two from a piece of paper, after discussing the foreign debts and other extraneous matters at some length.

He has made the disclosure—

Said the Senator from Arkansas; "he" meaning the President—

I have discussed the matter with him repeatedly, and during the last 2 days have sought to find some way of composing this controversy. The President is perfectly willing to take the responsibility. He does not base his opposition to the amendment so much on the amount of money that is involved as upon what he designates "a principle."

Thereupon the Senator from Arkansas took up a piece of paper and read as follows:

The fundamental objection to the Steiwer amendment, according to the President, is that it would preserve the 6-year period of presumption and restore to the rolls practically all presumptive cases, regardless of the fact that their disabilities cannot be traced as a matter of fact or of medical knowledge to the military service. The American Medical Association has supported the presumption of 2 years which is contemplated by the President's regulation.

The Senator from Arkansas made that criticism regardless of the fact that in 1930 he had voted for a 10-year period of presumption.

The second feature of the Steiwer amendment—which the President regards as objectionable is that it would restore to the rolls more than 75,000 Spanish-American War veterans, quite irrespective of service connection or need or degree of disability.

The Senator from Arkansas continued to read—

Those two paragraphs contain all the criticism which was submitted against the Steiwer-Cutting amendment on the floor of the Senate on that day or on any other day. That provision has been before the Senate since Monday. On Monday morning it was printed and on the desk of every Senator, and last night the Senate adopted it by a vote of 51 to 39.

Mr. President, that is the record. I do not see how it could possibly be clearer. I do not see how anyone in a political campaign or at any other time can distort those very simple facts. The Senate is on record, has been on record since 1924, in favor of this presumption which we are now told is a grave mistake and justifies the cutting of these men off the rolls.

Mr. President, that argument might have been perfectly valid in 1924. In 1924 any Senator might have stood on this floor and said that the presumption was contrary to the best medical opinion; that it should not go on the statute books and that he would not stand for legislating a lie; but we are in a very different position in 1933. These men to whom the law declared compensation would be given, whom we placed upon the rolls without any necessity for establishing the service connection of their disabilities, have been compensated by the Government, have been kept alive, and their families have been kept alive from 1924 until 1933.

I know the Government is not legally bound to keep its contract with anybody, but these men who suffered in the service of the United States, these men whom the Government and the Congress of the United States drafted to fight our battles in time of need, considered it a moral contract, and I consider it a moral contract, Mr. President, and there is not a veteran who ever dreamed that his Government would at some future date cut him off the rolls unless he could establish by direct and conclusive proof the service connection of his disabilities.

Perhaps he could have done it in 1924, yet it is quite possible that the same man would be totally unable to prove the service connection of his disabilities 9 years afterward, when the men who fought with him may be dead, when the men who had the next beds to his in the hospital may be dead. Even the widows and dependents of men who have died, who have no possible way of establishing the service connection and who do not know the comrades of their dead husbands, may still be cut off the rolls under the Economy Act, and they may still be cut off the rolls under this infamous House proposal if some doctor says that they were on the rolls by mistake.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. CUTTING. There was a ruling by the Chair a little while ago that I could not yield except for a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator may yield for a question.

Mr. CUTTING. I yield for a question.

Mr. HATFIELD. Is it not a fact that this is the first time in the history of our Government that it has repudiated its contract with or its obligation to the soldiers?

Mr. CUTTING. I think so, Mr. President. If there have been any similar cases, I do not know of them. I think it is a terrible precedent to establish. These presumptive cases, these cases where the pensioners have been held up to the country as grafters, panhandlers, and "garbage-can grenadiers"—to use the language of a Baltimore evening newspaper which was recently presented to me—are today suffering more intensely perhaps than any other men in the United States. If it could be definitely established that their disease was not connected with the service, even then, Mr. President, they are human beings; they are suffering human beings, whom the Congress of the United States 9 years ago promised to take care of. They did not place themselves on the rolls; they are on the rolls because we passed legislation here stating that we would take care of those men regardless of whether or not they could prove direct service-connection.

I showed the Senate a few days ago the picture of one of them, a man with one lung, and that infected with tuberculosis. I asked the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to examine this man, to study his history, and to make a report on the case. They did so, and reported that, in their opinion, there could not be the slightest doubt that his should have been not a presumptive but a directly service-connected case.

I have been told during the course of the day that some evidence has been presented by the Veterans' Administration which would discredit the case of this man. I have always found, Mr. President, that in cases of suffering veterans whenever examination is made and then whenever criticism is made by the name of the case, time and time again evidence is produced, often doctored, often distorted, often garbled, but always evidence tending to show something completely contrary to the facts. For that reason, and because the Bureau has usually "had it in" for men whose cases were made public, I have generally refrained from mentioning names. The name of this man was mentioned by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, who conducted the examination. I hope if the Veterans' Administration has any evidence of the kind which I have mentioned and which has been rumored around the Senate all day that it will be presented tonight, so that the Senator from West Virginia may refute it.

But, Mr. President, the case does not depend on that man or any other man. The case depends on hundreds of thousands of men all over the United States, men whom we all know personally, men whom we have seen cut down, dying, committing suicide, having hemorrhages in the hospitals.

Yesterday I received this telegram from Phoenix, Ariz.:

Associated Press announces suicide by hanging of 70-year-old Spanish War veteran, Thomas "Buck" Smith, pioneer Arizonian, at Flagstaff today. Sheriff Vandevier says Smith had been despondent because he was threatened with a reduction in Government pension; further, Joseph Berryman, Spanish War veteran, at Nogales, Ariz., in fit of despondency over contemplated pension legislation went into his room, closed door, and turned on the gas, committing suicide. I know of others in Arizona in same frame of mind; this is not conjecture but of my own actual knowledge.

W. D. ONEIL,
Commander Phoenix Camp, No. 1,
United Spanish War Veterans.

I received a telegram from Fort Bayard, N.Mex., from the adjutant of the D.A.V., reading as follows:

It has really been tragic here primarily due to the anticipated results of the economy bill. One boy, here 9 years, hemorrhaged Saturday night and died. We presume this is an example of what is happening generally all over the country.

I can assure the Senate that it is "happening generally all over the country."

How long are we going to let this thing go on? These men are on the rolls through our legislation. If it could be proved definitely that they ought not to have been placed on the rolls in 1924, that would not salve my conscience for one moment in now turning them out on the streets to die.

I think, Mr. President, the time will come, and I think there are Senators on this floor who will see it come, when the Government will take care of all men who are too old to work or too sick to work or who are unable to obtain employment on account of economic conditions in the country. I hope that time will come soon. In the meanwhile, Mr. President, we are faced with the immediate duty toward this particular class of men for whom in a special and immediate degree we are responsible.

The conditions in Arizona and New Mexico are in no way different from the conditions in every other State of the Union. What are we going to do about those men? Perhaps some of the States, even in time of depression, are wealthy enough to take care of them. Arizona and New Mexico are not able to do so. What are we going to do with them? Are we going to leave them to die? Does the local community have the only obligation to such men? Does the Nation have no obligation to men toward whom it entered into a moral contract in 1924?

Let me quote some eloquent words uttered in April 1932, by the then Governor of New York, Franklin D. Roosevelt. His article is headed—

I can be Governor, but could I be a shipping clerk—

And reads, in part, as follows:

I am 50. I consider myself at the peak of whatever ability I may have acquired. But if I were to seek employment, even in boom times, upon a basis of equality with other average men of 50, I should have the greatest difficulty.

I could be the governor of a State, but I could not be a shipping clerk—for the growing number of employers, even in the best of times, are hiring only younger men.

In times of depression the older men and women are the first, not the last, to go. That this is a human problem which has been with us for a long period is obvious.

Now let me call the attention of the Senate to these words:

But no government which refuses to consider the sufferings of these people really merits support.

The people for whom Governor Roosevelt was speaking are not the people for whom the Congress of the United States has ever assumed any particular obligation. They were average men and women of 50 out of employment.

I quite agree with what the Governor of New York said in April 1932, that "no government which refuses to consider the sufferings of these people merits support." But what of a government which refuses to consider the sufferings of men drafted into the service of the United States by the Congress of the United States, men who are suffering under what Congress said was the result of that service, men who have been on the rolls of this country from 1924 to 1933, and who are now thrown loose on the mercies of charity, without the Government of the United States being obliged by any mandatory provision to do anything whatever for them, for I again call to the attention of the Senate the fact that there is not one mandatory word in the House provision from beginning to end.

Now, let me make it clear: It is not, of course, the President of the United States who is personally responsible for failing to carry out the desires of the Congress of the United States as expressed by the legislation of 1924 or as expressed by the guaranty offered to the Senate by the Senator from Massachusetts in March 1933. The President of the United States is entirely too busy even to give these matters the general consideration which men who have been studying them are able to give. Obviously neither he nor any other one man nor any other hundred or thousand men can give the necessary attention to the individual cases.

Yet, Mr. President, it is the individuals who are suffering; it is not an abstract class of men who are suffering; it is men of our own flesh and blood whom we, in our capacity as Senators, together with the House of Representatives at the other end of the Capitol, guaranteed to take care of while they were disabled. Those are the presumptives. With regard to the combat-connected cases, the only reason that I do not emphasize them further is because every Senator on this floor is agreed that they ought to be taken care of.

We are promised justice for these men. We have been promised justice ever since March. Who is going to interpret what justice means? We know Mr. Lewis Douglas' conception of justice. We know the interpretation of justice by the Veterans' Bureau. We know the outrages which have been perpetrated and the brutality which seems to bring pleasure to the sadistic hearts of these men. Then we are asked: Why do we suspect? Why have we not confidence that from now on justice will be done? Why do we not believe it when we are told that from this day forward cases of veterans will be administered fairly and in a sympathetic spirit? Does anyone really believe that? Is there any Senator on this floor who, in his heart, really believes that a great change has come over the heart of the agent of the Veterans' Administration? Does any Senator really believe that the Director of the Budget is going to be a different man from now on than the man he has been in the past? If so, let that Senator vote for the conference report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does not every Senator here know that Senator after Senator and Representative after Representative and veterans' organization after veterans' organization have appealed in vain to the Director of the Budget to modify these regulations?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, Mr. President, and Senators also know that when the Director of the Budget was a candidate for an elective rather than for an appointive office he made the direct pledge that so far as lay within his power no Spanish-American War veteran should ever be required to establish service connection.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not apparent from what we have seen here that the veterans have nothing left but an election to restore their rights?

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I hope it has not come to that. I should not like to go so far as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts suggests. I hope that the veterans of the country may find protection without an election, that the veterans of the country may find protection where they have a right to expect it—on the floor of both Houses of Congress. If we do not legislate in their favor tonight or tomorrow—in case we are going to be in session tomorrow—if we do not legislate in their favor at any rate before we close this session and go home, then, Mr. President, every death and every instance of suffering which will come to any veteran between now and next January will be laid at the doors, not of the President, not of the Director of the Budget, not of the Veterans' Administrator, but at the doors of the two Houses of Congress. If we go away, we leave them to the mercy of the men who have established a record for brutality unequalled in the history of the country. We know perfectly well what is going to happen. Every Senator on this floor knows what is going to happen. There is no use in deceiving ourselves.

We are asked not to be suspicious. May I say, Mr. President, that the Indians in the Southwest have a proverb: "If you fool me once, shame on you. If you fool me twice, shame on me."

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if there is to be an immediate vote I have no desire to interpose any personal matters into the discussion. I shall be glad to wait until the vote is taken if I am assured that there will immediately be a vote. Then I shall rise to a matter of personal privilege to respond to the attack made upon me by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. TRAMMELL, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I realize that the Senate is anxious to have the issue joined on this question and I assure them I shall delay the vote but a few moments. In view of statements that have been made by those who have seen fit to criticize the conference report both as to the motives and as to the previous votes of the signers of that report on veterans' legislation and in justice to myself, I feel impelled to make a brief statement.

It is true, as related by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], that when the motion was made to suspend the rules in order that legislation for the benefit of the veterans might be inserted in an appropriation bill I voted in favor of suspending the rules. For that vote I have no apologies to make this evening.

Letters have been read on the floor of the Senate from time to time that portray the many grave injustices that were wrought by the first regulations that were drawn under the terms of the Economy Act. Every Member of this body has received letters from men who are bearing in and upon their bodies wounds that were received in the service, showing that their compensation for actual, directly service-connected injuries have been reduced from 40 to 50 or 60 percent. I did not believe then, nor do I believe now, that it has been the intention or the wish of the Congress of the United States nor the people of the United States nor the taxpayers of the United States that men who had actually been wounded in their country's service should have such drastic reductions made in the compensation which they receive. If conditions now were the same as when this bill first reached the Senate, I would stay here until Christmas in an effort to correct what I regard as injustices.

I supported the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] limiting to 25 percent the amount whereby any man's compensation could be reduced who had a service-connected disability. Mr. President, had I my way the compensation of men who were actually injured in their country's service would not be reduced one single dime. I express the hope and the belief that within a short while, when this legislation and the regulations which have been promulgated thereunder shall have had an opportunity to be put into effect, to be studied, and all the results surveyed, the directly service-connected veterans of the World War and other wars will not suffer any substantial reduction.

By innuendo it has been inferred that those who signed the report of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate were not friendly to the ex-service men. Mr. President, I signed that report freely and cheerfully, feeling that this act demonstrated that I am a friend of the ex-service men. They have been my companions. I do not mention my service during the recent World War because it was only a matter of 2 months and I never heard a gun fired in anger nor left the United States. But I am proud of the fact that this service, though limited, entitles me to membership in the American Legion and that I have enjoyed the friendship and confidence of the members of that organization in my own State.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], as I observed in reading the RECORD of day before yesterday, stated in the Senate that I had been a State commander of the American Legion. That statement is an error. It has been my privilege to serve as post commander in the small country town in which I reside. I have known the ex-service men and they are my friends and I am theirs. I feel that the conference report presented this evening offers the real friends of the veterans the best means of expressing their friendship that it will be our pleasure to enjoy. I feel that because, as I construe the House amendment, it limits to 25 percent the amount of reduction in compensation of any man who actually was injured while in the service of his country.

That answers the question so often asked here as to what benefit the ex-service men will obtain from the House proposal. It assures some protection to the service-connected veteran. If that construction be not correct, if the construction put upon that amendment by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] is right and time proves to me to be in error, if greater reductions shall be made in compensation, I shall be among those who at the next session of Congress will support as strongly as I know how legislation that will so clearly establish the right of the service-connected-disability veterans that there cannot be any doubt or question as to their rights.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal said as to what benefits will be derived under the House amendment. I shall not tire the Senate, but I wish to state for the benefit of the RECORD, and in view of the reflection or innuendo that has been made, some of the benefits I see from the House amendment.

In one instance it places upon the rolls and restores by law, after they had been stricken off by law through the Economy Act, 36,325 widows and orphans and parents of ex-service men whose claims were presumptively connected and who had been entirely eliminated by the Economy Act. It is true that perhaps these widows and orphans and parents are not well organized, but they should, indeed, be a charge upon and a subject of interest to every Member of this body.

In addition to that it gives something, a very little, I will admit, but at least some assurance to the Spanish-American War veterans, that they did not enjoy under the regulations which were issued under the Economy Act, that having been a concession, as I am reminded by my friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that was obtained after the measure reached the Senate and as a result of conferences of Members of this body with Members of the House and with the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I submit to this body the inquiry, Who in this hour are the real friends of the American veteran—those who seek something that we all know in our hearts cannot be obtained by the adoption of the Cutting-Steiwer amendment, or those who take this concession that has been gained since this bill reached the Senate and the fight started to relieve the veterans of the injustices of the Economy Act. The amendment provides increases amounting to from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000 in increased benefits to the ex-service men and soldiers of these United States. We all know that, despite the greatness of this body, the Senate of the United States cannot legislate without the cooperation of the House of Representatives, and that the efforts of both bodies will fail tonight if that legislation does not meet with the approval of the President of the United States.

I regret that any question has been expressed on this floor with reference to the good faith of the President of the United States. But I submit that there is not a single, solitary Member of this body who does not believe the statement made that this measure would not meet with his approval, and every Member also knows that it will be impossible to summon a two-thirds vote to override a Presidential veto.

Mr. President, if we wish to stay in session for a great length of time and pursue a circle that can only lead us back from whence we started we can vote down the conference report, we can adopt again the Cutting-Steiwer amendment, we can attach it to a resolution that will be presented to continue the appropriations heretofore made, and the President will veto that, and we will start in on the circle again.

But, Mr. President, the time is approaching when under the original Economy Act thousands of presumptive cases will go off the rolls without the slightest hearing. If no legislation be passed and approved by the President before July 1, 1933, these presumptive cases will be stricken from the rolls without a hearing; and Congress would indeed look silly to stay here and chase any such illusive shadow in a circle from now until then and have these presumptive cases go off the rolls, when under the terms of the House amendment these men are presumed to have received their injuries in the service; it gives them the benefit of the doubt and places the burden upon the Government of the United States to prove otherwise. They will have a hearing before a jury of five to investigate all available evidence to determine whether or not their injuries are service connected.

This amendment does not meet with my whole approval. Had I written it, in some details it would perhaps have been more pleasing to those on the other side of the Chamber. But, Mr. President, while I have not served long in this body, my service in legislative bodies within my State has long since taught me that it is impossible to write any one comprehensive measure so that it will please in its entirety and in every detail any one individual. Only through a meeting of minds and by concessions can we legislate here this evening.

We have here these benefits that I have outlined, in the aggregate from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000 of increases to the ex-service men over that which was allowed them by the original regulations promulgated under the Economy Act. I say that it would be better to take this now than to endanger all of the increases by continuing to strive here for something that is unobtainable.

I feel in my position that a defeat of the report will hurt the ex-service men. I have goodly company. I have discussed this matter with a Member of the National House of Representatives, a man whose name is a household word wherever ex-service men gather, a man who is known to every man who has ever sought compensation, who has been interested in the payment of his adjusted-compensation certificate, and who has loyally championed the cause of the ex-service man in and out of season. I refer to Congressman PATMAN, of Texas. He says that the success of the procedure advocated here by those who are opposing this report is likely to strike down the ex-service man and injure his cause for 10 years to come.

As I see it, the ex-service man is served by supporting this report far better than by mere lip service advocating measures it is impossible to obtain at this time.

Feeling that by the adoption of this report at this time and under all of these circumstances I can best serve the ex-service men of America, I gladly signed the conference report and shall support it when the roll is called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. McNARY and other Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GLASS rose.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire recognition for a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator from Virginia had the floor, though the Chair declined to recognize him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not intend to decline to recognize the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I beg the Chair's pardon. I understood he had ordered the roll call to proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asked if the yeas and nays were ordered, and they were ordered. The Senator from Virginia had announced that after the roll was called he would address the Senate on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia has no grievance against the Chair. The Senator from Virginia did obtain the floor, and announced that if there was to be a roll call without further speaking, he would defer his speech; but other Senators intervened and made speeches, so I will wait.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire a few moments, and of course I desired not to interfere with the Senator from Virginia when he gained the floor. That is, there was no recognition of him, but he was on the floor first.

I do not question the sincerity of any Senator as to the position he takes upon this question. Throughout the entire contest, however, I have felt that the best way to obtain something for the veterans was to go forward, instead of receding. I have never thought of the idea of entering into a compromise which was equivalent to a surrender.

A good many Senators for whom I have the greatest respect, and who are entitled to their own opinions and views, instead of going forward with the fight for our veterans all the way through have been too easily driven to supporting every proposed compromise. They are welcome to that view and that course. They are, of course, sincere in that view; but I sincerely pursue the other policy of fighting for what I think is right, for what I think is just; and I think we generally obtain much better results by following a militant course instead one of retreat.

If nothing is done more than will be accomplished by the adoption of this report, some of us have obtained something for the soldiers, not by a weak-kneed policy of trying to back-track all the time and get ourselves in position for alibis. No concession whatever, in my opinion, would have been made but for the stubborn fight made for the veterans by about seven or eight Senators. Most of the others preferred the easiest course. If nothing more is accomplished than is recommended by the conferees, some of the Senators here who have been aggressive, in season and out of season, in behalf of the soldiers, are the ones who have brought about that result, and not those who think the way to favor the soldier is always to compromise, compromise to the extent of a surrender.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will yield only for a qestion. I do not want to detain the Senate more than a few minutes, and I do not propose to yield for a speech. If the Senator wants to speak after I conclude, he can do so. I yield for a question.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. CLARK. Did the Senator vote for the economy bill?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I voted for the economy bill. [Laughter.] For that reason, if I made a mistake, I desire to correct that mistake. If I made a mistake in voting particularly for the feature of it which allowed the drastic regulations and the abuses that have been inflicted upon the veterans of the country, particularly the service-connected soldiers, I feel that it is my duty to correct it as far as is possible, and I am to answer for that, and not to be directed by someone else as to how I shall answer for it.

I believe—I may be wrong; I credit sincerity to everyone who believes otherwise—I think that if those who are in charge of the veterans' affairs of the country have been convinced by the exposure which has been made in the Senate until it has impressed them so that they are willing to try to do what is contained in the conference bill, they will do that, if they are men of heart and of justice, whether legislation on the question is enacted or not.

On the other hand, if we doubt that, then when I reach the crossroads where I find one road going this way to a certainty that will benefit and help the soldier, taking it for granted that those who administer the law may not act without legislation, I am going to follow that road instead of taking the road of doubt, the road that winds hither and thither and is coming in contact most of the time with those who are unsympathetic with the American soldiers. I am not going to wander off on that path. Others, of course, think that is the proper path. I am not questioning anybody's sincerity, but I never won a fight in my life by compromising and surrendering all the time, and I have never seen anybody else who did.

You do not win fights in that way. You win fights by holding the line when you gain a certain advance, just as the American soldiers did in the great Battle of the Argonne.

Their commanders, on the night before that battle, had warned those gallant and brave boys what was to happen on the next day, that they would have a great battle. The American soldiers were to confront the picked soldiers of Germany, the Royal Guard; and their commanders warned them and begged them on the morrow to hold the line.

We remember the bulletins that were returned the next day, following that great battle line, where for 50 miles thousands and thousands and hundreds of thousands of soldiers confronted each other, when the news came back and was flashed upon our own shores and to our own country that that day, as the French had been driven back, driven back, the Americans had held the line; and finally there came back the bulletin that thrilled every American heart, saying that the Americans were in full advance, the Germans were on the retreat, and there were no Germans left beyond the Marne, except the wounded and the dead.

What if our soldiers had begun the compromising policy, the policy of breaking the line and going back and back every time someone said, "Well, you cannot get that"? What if they had done that? The story of the World War would have been quite different from what it is and as it has been written.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Under the civil law, the definition of "compromise" is such that both parties get something. In this thing here, the soldiers are not getting anything. It cannot be called a compromise. It could be called a surrender.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that if the conference report is administered sympathetically, and by friends of the soldiers, probably they will get something helpful; but if it is administered by the same character of people who have been writing regulations and who have been planning all of these abuses of the soldiers, then they would not get anything of consequence to them, except mistreatment. The other amendment is more specific and is more definite.

I challenge any Senator to show where, in the committee amendment—the amendment that was offered in the House and came to the Senate—there is any guaranty in a service-connected case that the compensation cannot be reduced in excess of 25 percent. There is no such protection in the provision that was passed in the House and which is now before us. The only provision is that the rate of compensation cannot be reduced more than 25 percent.

We know the manipulation in connection with those features and what that means. That means that they can reduce the rate for a certain schedule of injuries so much, but not over 25 percent; but when it comes to the question of the compensation that the man is receiving, there is no restriction whatever upon the amount he can be reduced in the House provision which we are urged to accept now.

Mr. President, I want to make plain and reiterate that those who have favored the question of the protection of the soldier—that, I think, has rung true in regards to all of the amendments—have had in mind protection for the service-connected cases. This measure does not go into the question of all the soldiers whose disabilities are not service-connected. We probably may need some legislation in regard to that in the future; but both the House provision and the provision offered by the Senators from New Mexico and Oregon deal entirely with the service-connected cases, and I think they are deserving of some protection.

There is a reason, of course, why we have legislation of this kind confronting us. There is a reason why there is an aroused public sentiment in this country, and it is not confined to the veteran himself. That reason is on account of the harsh, ruthless treatment which has been extended to the service-connected cases. We have not mentioned cases other than the service-connected cases. I have not. Nobody can retreat behind the proposition, and do it justly, that anyone is trying to have a lot of people carried on the roll who have no business there, or retreat behind the false argument that any Senator who has advocated relief, as has been advocated by practically all the Senators, is trying to protect some fellow who got on the roll by some fraudulent manipulation. We want such fraudulent cases stricken from the roll.

That is not the proposition that is confronting us. The proposition confronting us is whether or not we shall protect the sick and the wounded and other disabled veterans who were injured in the line of duty. That is what we have been contending for. I think the Steiwer-Cutting provision is better, and I will support it, feeling that even if a majority of the Senate should support the conference report it would then depend entirely upon whether or not a generous spirit guided those who administered it, because with all the loopholes in it, with its lack of specific, direct provisions as to what treatment shall be extended to the service-connected cases, unless the administration is to guide the situation with sympathy, the veterans will not get anything of consequence. Under the other proposal, of course, they would have to go directly in violation of certain specific provisions of the law if they did not give protection to the veterans.

Mr. President, I think that without any amendment being adopted along the lines of that offered by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Mexico, we will have practically no law that will furnish any guaranty to the veterans. That is why I raised the subject, and why the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from California and a few others raised the subject here about the same time, some 10 days ago, because we had reached such a state of sentiment in regard to these cases, which seem so terrible, that we felt Congress should take up the matter.

I want the veterans to get some definite relief, and I want to try to put up the bars against administrative officers who have no sympathy for the veterans, who give no consideration to matters of humanity, and have no feeling for the men who served their country, and served their country valiantly. At one time, at least, they had the plaudits of all Americans, and I will assert that today, as far as the rank and file of the American people are concerned, they still enjoy their esteem and their confidence, although some Representatives and some Senators may not accredit them with having done anything for their Nation.

I think they did the world good when they served the Nation and served it faithfully. I do not think we owe Great Britain and our other Allies anything because they may claim to have protected us. I think the indebtedness is on the other side, because when the United States entered that conflict, the Allies were fighting as it were, with their backs to the wall. It was not long after our soldiers had entered before history began to reverse itself and the Allies began to win. I cannot see how any American could attribute the winning of the war to any other thing than the entrance of the United States and the contribution which we made upon the battlefield in human beings and to our Allies through our financial assistance. I think not only America but the world owes a great debt of gratitude to the American soldier.

Mr. President, as I see it, I am going to follow the branch of the road at the crossroads which I think leads to a very definite protection and relief for the wounded, the blind, and the sick veterans of this country who received injuries upon the battle front, and I believe it can be more definitely accomplished by the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Oregon.

I care nothing about whether it is offered by a Republican or a Democrat. I care nothing about whether some Democrat does not want me to support it or whether some Republican wants me to support it. I do not vote upon legislation on that theory nor upon such influences.

I remember one night in this very Chamber long years ago. It was a dramatic page in our Nation's history. The League of Nations was before us. The President, whom I esteemed as much as anybody in America, had urged that our country enter the League of Nations. I may say that I esteem President Roosevelt as much as does any Senator on this floor. I believe in him. I am proud of the splendid record he has made. I will not yield to any man in my loyalty and in my admiration for him. Whether or not I will always vote as he suggests, I have a right to my opinion, the same as he or anyone else has a right to his opinion.

On that tragic evening, the night we voted on the League of Nations, I hated to vote against the immortal Wilson. However, I just happened to be one of the seven willful Democrats who voted against our entering the League of Nations. As I left the Senate Chamber at least seven of my Democratic friends who had voted on the other side commended me, saying I was right. History has vindicated me.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I demand order in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has asked for order, and is trying to keep order as nearly as possible.

Mr. LONG. If we do not have better order among our guests on the floor, I will ask that the Senate floor at least be cleared.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is for the Senate to decide and not the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it is a rule of the Senate that there shall be order in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a rule of the Senate that there shall be order in the Senate, but whether the Senate will clear the Chamber of its guests who are entitled to enter it is a question for the Senate to decide.

Mr. LONG. It is my right to ask for it if order is not kept.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will be recognized to make the suggestion.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I yield to no one in my loyalty as a Democrat, but I have a duty to perform in the Senate as a Senator from a sovereign State. On the occasion to which I have just referred I did not yield to anyone else as to what my duty was. I performed my duty, and I voted against the resolution unqualifiedly endorsing the League of Nations. That was some 16 or 17 years ago, and I am still in the United States Senate, and I still have my standing among my Democratic friends in my own State and throughout the Republic. I did not come here to be a jellyfish.

I do not consider it any disrespect for a person if a Senator votes his own convictions, and I am in the habit of doing that. I mention this because someone discussed a matter here a while ago about voting for a policy when a Republican offered it or when a Democrat offered it. I have found that sometimes some of my good friends on the Democratic side and I may differ. Of course, I much prefer to vote with them, if I feel I can consistently do so; but at the same time I will not be controlled by partisanship upon questions which are not party questions, and this is not a party question. This is a question of preserving the rights, preserving the health of the veterans of this country and affording protection and food for their children and for their widows, instead of allowing them to be driven into the street to starve, to beg, or to be dependent upon charity.

As for my part, I take the side which I think will best protect the veterans in the future.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, it is impossible to conceive of the perfidy we are about to commit to the injured soldier without a short review of what this extra session of Congress has done and how it has broken its political undertakings to the people right and left, what it has committed itself to, and, by comparison, how it will affect the veteran, the farmer, the worker, and plain folk in general.

It is now after midnight, and I take it that at the close of this speech we will vote and in that vote will be decided the fate of the disabled veteran and along with that vote will be clearly demonstrated the attitude of the Democratic "new deal" toward humanity.

The Executive order that has been worked out so disastrously to the disabled veterans, unless we by our votes here tonight change its destructive course, will be thought of by the veteran and the people in general much as the opinion expressed by one of our soldiers in France when it was reported to him that General Pershing had said that he would give an American division, 125,000 men, to take St. Mihiel. The soldier's laconic reply was, "He is a liberal cuss."

We hold up our poor disabled soldiers to furnish contributions up to 75 percent, and in many cases 100 percent, of their slight compensation for injuries received in war under the disguised Democratic slogan of "Balancing our Budget." Why kick sick veterans out of hospitals that the Government built especially for them? Why refuse to furnish them railroad fare back to friends or at least what they call their home? Why let widows and orphans of injured soldiers starve or become a charity charge?

The Republicans paid off debts recklessly contracted by the Democrats to the extent of about $10,000,000,000 since the war. Already the "new deal" has and will through recent legislation put us back into debt more than $9,000,000,000, which the taxpayers now and henceforth must meet. Yet the Democratic platform, as usual, vehemently declares for drastic reduction of expenditures. They have increased the governmental expenditures over $1,000,000 a day! What a farce!

The contemplated saving of over $400,000,000 out of the blood and suffering of the veteran makes only a small patch of this new over $9,000,000,000 debt. If the young voters who supported this "new deal" could only have known of the inefficiencies and debt-getting proclivities of the Democratic Party, they never would have believed their recent campaign slogan, "It could not be worse." That is why the Democrats only win every 15 or 20 years. They have to wait for a new generation to grow up who does not remember the wreckage of the last Democratic administration. [Laughter.]

"NEW DEAL" LEGISLATION

Mr. President, it is fitting, therefore, tonight in the last moments of this extra session to review the legislation passed under the "new deal." Such a review will indicate clearly that altogether it has taken our Nation a long step in the direction of planned economy, controlled production and consumption by means of the Federal Government, all in the same direction as Hitler, Mussolini, and Lenin. Economists and historians have to strain their thinking ability to find any distinctions between the general plans those gentlemen propose and what the "new deal" now proposes. The minority, outnumbered two to one, have had little heart to oppose. Perhaps they should not have opposed. To oppose would immediately label them as obstructionists. So while we cannot oppose we can, with what little power we have, call to notice, let the people know that they are not getting what the "new deal" platform promised to give them. Perhaps that will be sufficient. We hope it will. The first steps have been completed in eliminating the middle class. Henceforth the continuance of the policy now adopted will tend to establish the status of master and slave. This is the very thing that our Revolutionary fathers thought they had escaped in founding this Republic. They thought that just as Christ came to guide mankind, so the Government they had founded would be an inspiration and guide to other nations. Built upon the equality teachings of Christ—the first shall be last and the last shall be first—in no other country can the lowest become the highest. Christ said we should be free to choose between good and evil. Without such freedom there can be no advancement of the individual. Any government can serve for the rich, but there must be in that government which would look to the needs of the humble, the right to advance to such limits as their own individual initiative prescribes.

Anyone who has a conception of what liberty means would surely rather hazard the rough and uneven path of individualism than be confined in a rule-ridden asylum, however fine his food and raiment and however perfect and antiseptic his care. A slave is a slave, however elegantly housed and fed. When you take away the right of individualism you remove ambition. When hope dies all the evils of materialism that were turned loose in the world from Pandora's box will concentrate themselves to make one man the uncomplaining servitor of his rich brother. When you by law make all mankind alike, when you standardize the efforts of his labor, you destroy his freedom to the right of understanding and retard the growth of his soul.

True, Congress has granted Roosevelt only permissive powers, but looking back over a century we can safely assume that the Executive will use the powers granted him and will vehemently protest their being withdrawn and they can only be withdrawn over his objection by the vote of two thirds of Congress. The Executives over a period of years have gradually arrogated to themselves the power to carry on war without congressional declaration—a power exclusively vested by the Constitution in Congress. Yet our troops have for years been sent hither and thither, contrary to this right, by the Executive.

Hence the grant of the power will undoubtedly lead to its use by the Executive.

The planned economy of the "new deal" will be in contrast with rugged individualism.

The rights of the individual as advocated by Jefferson are displaced for the authority of a Lenin, a Hitler, a Mussolini, a Franklin Roosevelt.

The excuse for this rapid change is laid at the feet of the present depression. The world price level has fallen to its lowest in a hundred years in some instances because of a multitude of causes, chiefly those growing out of the enormous wreckage of the World War.

It may seem drastic for me to compare this Democratic Government to that of Hitler, of Mussolini, of Lenin. Yet we are now definitely headed in the same direction as they are. For 150 years, ever since the beginning of our Government, we have believed in freedom of the individual to earn his own living, separate and apart from the state. We have assigned to our political society certain functions impossible of achievement by any person or corporation, such as police powers, national protection with Army and Navy, delivery of mail, and similar functions especially pertaining to health.

Now, however, our Federal Government, like those named, is about to render economic services. Uncle Sam is about to become a partner in business. This undertaking presents an anomalous situation. The sovereign power enters business where it also has to enforce laws and regulations as one of the partners. Such a partner must necessarily be a different kind than any yet known.

This partner will enforce the codes that determine prices, wages, hours of labor, and other business regulations. And there is where the Government definitely parts from the past. It will set the price of goods it helps to produce as one of the partners.

Heretofore production and consumption of goods have been governed by prices and profits, and they in turn have been comparatively freely influenced by a multitude of factors, such as world crops, drought, floods, distance of transportation, interest rates, wars, famines, wages, habits, customs, change of styles, and many more.

These factors and others have all contributed to determine prices and profits, which in turn govern production and consumption.

Henceforth Uncle Sam, as one of the partners, will by means of a code set the price, however unresponsive that price may be to the different factors that before have governed. Production will not depend on the old barometer of prices, in production, and consumption, but on what the political unit will determine shall be the price, and it can only guess the price. It will have to risk overproduction or underproduction, depending on this master mind, this political overlord, to decide what we shall pay for what we buy.

Economy powers granted to the President in two bills especially, the farm bill and the industrial recovery bill, constitute a revolutionary step. It sets aside prices as a governing factor in our production and consumption and replaces them with a political decision rendered by the White House. It is in that respect that we shall henceforth resemble Russia, Germany, and Italy. They render economic services and determine cost of production as we are about to do. Whatever the future may hold in store for us, if we follow this course there is reason to believe our goal will eventually be about the same as theirs. I wonder if the American people will be as elated as this administration assumes when they realize they have been elevated to the great heights that the people of Russia, Germany, and Italy now enjoy. Planned economy will entirely displace rugged individualism, freedom to act as you will in the matter of production and consumption. The individual liberties of Jefferson have been discarded for the planned economy of the "new deal."

All this is done under the guise of breaking the depression. We are told that to let matters drift will not cure our troubles. They demanded action and are surely getting it. What will the reaction be? What other nation in the world's history ever had an industrial machine as huge and comprehensive as ours that cured its depression with a planned economy? Yet our brain trust says that is the way to do it. So we have thrown overboard traditions 150 years old to break a depression with a cure concocted in the minds of certain professors who have been reading the propaganda of Hitler, Mussolini, and Lenin. What is Jefferson compared to them? they say. Who is Lincoln, Washington, and Theodore Roosevelt when compared with modern men of the type of Hitler?

The bank-holiday proclamation was the first step. It was followed by a law granting the President the power over the opening of banks and the control of gold movements. In rapid succession this led to continued gold embargoes, inflation powers almost unlimited in extent, and repeal of the Gold Standard Act.

That the Democratic Party in 1932 did not contemplate any such drastic action is best evidenced by the following words from its platform:

> We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.

The author of the plank relative to sound currency has stated that he does not think that the currency now proposed under the inflation powers would be sound currency. They have turned their backs on their word to the American people in 1932, and we can only hope that it is for the best. The President was not elected to do what he is now authorized to do. This authority he requested Congress to grant to him.

The "new deal" program as set forth in the Democratic platform had this to say about the antitrust laws:

> We advocate strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices, and revision therefor for the better protection of labor and the small producer and distributor.

Which means the "new deal" has forgotten all about their promises to the individual, the little merchant, the small producer.

Under the Industrial Recovery Act the President is given the right to suspend the antitrust laws and to permit trusts and combinations in restraint of trade. Senator BORAH did insert an amendment to prevent combinations in restraint of trade, but this amendment, under the insistence of the President, was emasculated in conference—another broken promise, another link in the program of planned economy, of industrial dictatorship under the President.

Regulation of farm and factory is contemplated in these two bills, the farm bill and the industrial control bill. In the latter, industries are permitted to establish codes on prices, hours, wages, and regulations for each trade association with Presidential approval.

In the farm bill, progressive Senators tried to insert a cost-of-production amendment in behalf of the farmer, surely necessary if, contrary to the antitrust laws, prices can be set on everything the farmer buys. But the administration would not permit this amendment; it left the farmer to get an average return based on the period 1909–14. This may or may not be cost of production. To protect the farmer in this "new deal", he should have been so safeguarded that whatever price the President permits in his industrial control bill would take into consideration the farmers' income in relation to the cost of everything he has to buy.

As it stands the cost on everything he buys can be raised so high that it will wipe out all benefits he may derive from prices depending on a base period. The base period is no assurance that the prices will cover the cost of production under the "new deal", under the plan of the so-called "economy of the Franklin Roosevelt administration."

Under the two home-loan bills, namely the farm- and the city home-owner bills, the city resident can borrow on his home up to 85 percent, while the farmer can borrow on his home only up to 35 percent. This glaring discrepancy shows clearly that the "new deal" does not consider that the basic industry of the country—agriculture—is entitled to the same consideration as industry. That is why the administration knocks out the agricultural-marketing system which was established for and did protect the farmer from the wholesale-market racketeers. That is why with one hand he saves $2,000,000 from going to the farmers' benefit while with the other he spends hundreds of millions of dollars to establish machinery for the control of industry. The farmer, the Government employee, and the injured soldier are singled out to bear double the so-called "economy" of the "new deal" and rightfully claim it is not a "new deal", but just a new cut, a joker.

THE DISABLED VETERAN

We are about to engage in the largest peace-time program that history records, yet the administration is committed to a program of cutting Government expenditures.

Public Act No. 2 is entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States," and allows the President to cut compensation of veterans of all wars and of Government employees. Credit of the United States! What sort of credit will the Government of the United States reap from this session's work? In accordance with this power, the President has merged bureaus, reduced the number of employees, and cut the compensation of those still on the pay roll.

All this has left Government employees in doubt and fear, demoralizing the whole Federal force. In addition, it has entirely and purposefully disrupted the Civil Service regulations, leaving employees with ranking Civil Service ratings out of work and reemploying, under the farm bill and the industrial control and other bills, help without civil-service ratings, as the acts specifically provide the President can do. The governmental cuts of 15 percent that apply to the old governmental employees will not apply to the new appointees. Because of the evil influences of the spoils system, the Civil Service Commission was set up in the hope that once and for all Government service would be placed above politics. Deserving Democrats have to be taken care of at the expense of the civil-service laws which the Democratic platform of 1932 specifically provides must be observed and maintained. The replacement of efficient civil-service employees by inefficient Democrats only augments by leaps and bounds the usual inefficient, unbusinesslike, and profligate Democratic administration.

The extent of this abrogation of civil-service rules can only be realized when we consider that the Federal Government is about to regulate both farm and factory as part of its planned economy program. What a tremendous political machine will be built for future elections and the perpetuation of dictatorship. It does not stand to reason that the Federal Government can carry out a program of a Hitler, a Mussolini, and Lenin with less help than that required for a program of rugged individualism.

To create work, the Federal Government passed an act to establish a Forestry Conservation Corps, to employ 250,000 or more men, maybe women as well, by sending them out to plant trees and to protect forests from fires. The expenses of this corps has already absorbed more than the touted savings. Injured saplings have been put in the beds in veterans' hospitals in place of veterans displaced under this so-called "economy act." Tree planters ride on Pullman cars, whereas veterans are put out of hospitals without car fare. A widow of a brigadier general of the World War had her widow's pension reduced to $15 under the new regulations, whereas the widow of a tree planter under the "sap bill" is allowed $45 per month.

The regulations under the so-called "economy act" led to such wide abuses that finally the Senate attempted to insert the Steiwer-Cutting amendment to limit the cuts to war-injured veterans. A brave Democrat, Senator TRAMMELL, introduced an amendment to limit cuts to 15 percent on all veterans except those who were drawing pay not because of war service. A rule of the Senate made this amendment out of order on an appropriation bill, but Senator TRAMMELL moved to suspend the rule in order to vote upon his amendment. The Senate voted 21 to 59 for suspension of the rule. This is the unhampered and true consensus of the Senate for a limit of only 15-percent cut. Senators were led to believe the President would not sign the Trammell measure but that he would sign the substituted Connally amendment limiting them to 25 percent. Thus the "herring was drawn across the trail" to give time for work to be done upon independent Democratic Senators who tenaciously clung to justice rather than the Democratic "new deal." The vote on the Connally amendment was 42 to 42, with the Vice President breaking the tie. This vote shows that the parliamentary trick was successful, for many Senators, friends of the soldiers, hoping to get a limit of 15-percent cut, voted against the 25-percent cut substitute.

After this victory for the veterans they were soon to be disillusioned in discovering that the President would not sign the independent offices appropriation bill with the Connally amendment in it. The House, under the direction of the President, rejected that and inserted the President's amendment with no definite limits as to cuts, the only difference being that these inhuman, cruel, and unjustifiable cuts go into effect October instead of July. The amendment is so filled with a jumble of weasel words that no one can tell what it means and it can be interpreted in almost any direction. The Senate, by a goodly majority, including the solid Republican vote and 19 Democrats, rejected the House amendment and the bill went back to conference, the vote standing 51 to 39. The Senate insisted that the Government stand by its contract with its war-injured men by at least giving them 75 percent of what they were entitled to under the law and justice of the land. But what is a contract, a promise, sound money, an obligation, a party platform, Civil Service law, the Constitution, under the Democratic "new deal"?

If you independent Democrats who have so far in this fight supported the cause of the injured soldier stand steadfast to your conscience regardless of the tremendous administrative pressure being placed upon you and refuse this conference report, the Senate will have its way, and even those Senators voting for this report will rejoice that the injured war veteran, despite their votes, has received some little measure of just consideration. A score or more of House Members have told me that they are hoping and praying that we will have the courage to return this unpatriotic, unfair conference report to the House and thereby see to it that the war-injured veteran is not reduced more than 25 percent. Government salaries have been cut only 15 percent—surely 25 percent is an ample cut for the disabled veteran. History everywhere records the decay of that nation which forgets and belittles its defenders. We honor the men who put our flag in the sky. We must not, if we are long to remain a leading nation, despise the men who have kept it there.

The House Members tell me, and we all who have been Members of the House know that it is true, that they did not have a chance to vote upon the real issue; and some of them tell me they have been misinformed, which misinformation has been dispelled by the Senate debates upon this question, and that they are now ready, if we will but return this disabled-soldier issue to them, to back us up.

I know, and you independent Democrats know, that the king of patronage of this administration has been about and in the gallery all during this controversy and still sits in the gallery even at this late hour of half-past 12 with pencil in hand to take the names of recalcitrant Democrats. But, Senators, regardless of him and all he represents, vote your convictions. What are you going to tell the widow, the orphan, and the injured veteran when you get back home? Are you going to say that you thought it was the right thing under this silly slogan of "Balance the Budget" to rob the war cripples, to take the food from the mouths of their widows and their children? Are you going to say that if you had voted other than directed you would have been ignored in the numerous political appointments that otherwise you would be consulted upon? Or are you going to say that you think these inhuman, unjust, and cruel cuts contemplated and already by Executive order being put into execution are the right thing? You remember the case called to our attention by Senator CUTTING, of New Mexico? His name was Peter J. Reno. He was being cared for at the tubercular hospital at Fort Bayard, N.Mex., but when he was to be kicked out under Executive order that we, as the Congress, empowered the President to make, the people of Fort Bayard took up a collection and sent him on here as a typical example of what was being done to the disabled veteran. Senator CUTTING asked Dr. HATFIELD, Senator of West Virginia, and Dr. COPELAND, Senator of New York, to make an examination of this man.

The report made by both Dr. COPELAND and Dr. HATFIELD was that the tuberculosis was directly due to the service, and Senator JOHNSON asked Senator BYRNES if this report was consistent with the Veterans' Bureau files, and he replied that it was. This man served in five major engagements; was decorated for gallantry. At the Battle of the Marne he was severely gassed, from which his tuberculosis trouble came. In some one of these five battles, as I remember it, he was wounded in the back. One lung has been entirely removed and the other is seriously affected. The hole in his back extends clear through and within less than an eighth of an inch of his heart. By placing your hand in the hole you can feel the beat of the heart and by casting a light in the hole you can see the beat of his heart. The man is entirely helpless. The wound in his back must be washed and dressed at least four times a day. His wife at present is doing this service for him. He has three dependent children.

He was rated totally disabled and receiving $100 a month. The Executive order ousts him from the hospital and sets him down as entitled to $20 a month. Under the strong pressure of several Senators who had become interested in this typical case, it was finally decided by those in authority under this Executive order to raise the compensation to the magnificent sum of $30. This was done after due reflection and considerable study, not, as I take it, through sympathy and understanding of the man's condition and his case but those in authority no doubt considered the senatorial pressure and valued it at $10 per month, which $10 was added to the $20 already allowed, making the munificent sum of $30 with which he should care for himself, his wife, and his three children, and if he could not do that on $30 the "new deal" should worry. Thirty dollars was all they could squeeze out to give this entirely disabled man, even though they had had for once in their life the opportunity to see and feel the beat of a human heart. What chance under such an Executive order has the ordinary injured soldier?

Do you want to meet that kind of a case back home and answer that you think that $30 a month was adequate for a great and grateful country to do for its crippled defenders?

Every veteran will look over tonight's roll call. The excuses you have given here tonight may serve as a political expedient to ease your own conscience, but your words to the common people, the ordinary soldier, will be only as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.

In the last few days I have been inspired by hearing Democrat after Democrat come to the aid of the beleaguered soldiery with fiery eloquence and cold, hard logic, and I rejoiced, thinking that the simple garments of Dorcas would again outweigh the crown of the dictator. But as I have sat here tonight and heard some of these same Senators deliver their fixing speech, my heart grew heavy. I have heard Republican Senators about me time and again this evening listening to these speeches say, "Oh, oh there he goes; the discipline is strong." It reminded me of my experience in following our boys in the Chateau-Thierry drive.

The Germans were retreating and blowing up their ammunition dumps. Whenever one of these tremendous explosions rocked the earth I would hear some of the boys say, "There goes another ammunition dump; now we'll move." My advice would be to heed the still small voice and save your ammunition. Stand by yourself, by justice, and humanity.

DISCIPLINE OF LEGISLATORS

Mr. President, I have a keen understanding of party discipline. It has been applied to me both in the House and in the Senate, and I know how hard it is to follow your own good judgment as God gives you the light to see it when opposed by the selfish desires of mean and petty men.

Truth forever on the scaffold,
Wrong forever on the throne;
Yet that scaffold sways the future,
And behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow,

I was elected to the House in 1914. In 1916 I campaigned the country for Hughes, but our Democratic President who kept us out of war was reelected, and with true Democratic promise-keeping, he immediately put us in the war.

In 1917, with a Democratic Senate and a Democratic President on the threshold of the declaration of war, I felt that the best interests of my country lay in the election as Speaker of the House, of that Democratic progressive, Champ Clark, for through his election as Speaker the Democrats would retain the committee machinery of the House and put a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate back of a Democratic President. I felt that the issue of the organization of the House was the issue of the Nation. I felt that our Nation involved in an international crisis should show to the world a solid front. I felt that it was a bigger issue than party, just as I feel the question here before us tonight is a bigger issue than party, though I am happy to state that every Republican in the Senate will cast his vote or be paired in favor of the soldiers. So as a progressive Republican I nominated and voted for Champ Clark for Speaker and without that vote he would not have been elected. I thereby called down upon my head the scorn and contempt of the hidebound party men who figured that through my vote they had lost the loaves and fishes.

Most of them could not construe my action as anything but deep-dyed party disloyalty, for they did not realize that I owed nothing to the regular Republican organization of my State. Rising in indignation, they left the space all around me empty, so I sat alone, scorned as a renegade, the earlier months of that session, except for a few bigger Members who, by an occasional word or friendly touch, would indicate they understood. That party discipline followed me to the Senate and instituted a contest for my seat. Not that I had done anything to warrant that action, but I had committed the crime of being independent, and to show you the spleen, when the Senate unanimously dismissed that contest, this powerful influence caused my own State senate to pass a resolution calling for a hearing of my election and appointed a committee especially arranged to nail my political hide to the fence.

Testimony in this very hearing showed that $30,000 had been paid for three witnesses to testify to certain falsehoods written up by those interested in my political demise and a copy handed to these witnesses for them to commit to memory. One witness was called and went through as per schedule, but when the second was called it was found that he was just recovering from a very severe illness. He went on the stand and testified that he had been so ill that he thought he was going to die; that he had called in the priest, taken the last sacrament, and made a full predeath confession. Whereupon the priest admonished him, if he lived, he should go before that committee and tell the whole truth. And the truth was, according to his sworn testimony, as above stated. So their well-laid plans to destroy me failed, and the committee were forced unanimously to exonerate me of all charges, and the Senate unanimously adopted that report.

Thus—

Behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow.

I continued that independence here in the Senate, and when my reelection came up in 1930 some sinister and powerful influence followed me again to Minnesota and furnished the necessary money to fight from within the Republican Party my election, though I had been nominated upon the Republican ticket by 100,000 majority. The $2,000,000 spent to get me did not succeed, though it did capture the Republican machinery and all but about 17 newspapers in the State. This newspaper onslaught against me was headed by a great Republican paper, known in my State as the "Minneapolis Journal." My record had been, and still is, 100 percent for labor, 100 percent for the farmer and agriculture, and 100 percent for the veterans. This was a hard record for them to drive a wedge in. But the Journal's brain trust figured out several propositions to make attacks that were entirely false, and anyone who would take the trouble to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would know it. But the most ingenious scheme of all their false attempts was the one in which they used a whole page, which page was distributed to over 400 other Republican newspapers in the State, and those papers enfolded this sheet with their own and sent it out through Uncle Sam's mail. All the time these papers were yelling about my using the frank with which to defend myself against their falsehoods, while they mailed, under their newspaper frank, these same papers free to every subscriber throughout the county in which the newspaper is published.

Their plan ran something like this, and I am sure you Senators will appreciate the ingenuity displayed: "SCHALL says his farm record is 100 percent. Let us see about that. When the tariff bill was before the Senate Finance Committee and the farm schedule was up, where was SCHALL? When so and so was up, in which the farmer was most interested, SCHALL was absent; when thus and so was up in which the farmer was greatly interested, SCHALL was absent." And thus they filled a whole sheet of that great Republican newspaper with goose eggs and absent marks. All of which was true, but at the same time carried the most damnable falsehood to the voters of Minnesota. The ordinary voter would not understand, and they knew he would not understand the difference between the Senate floor and a Senate committee. I was not, and they knew I was not, a member of the Senate Finance Committee; and, of course was absent. I had no business there. But they nevertheless carried the impression to the farmers of Minnesota that I had betrayed them.

On September 20, 1930, a Standard Oil truck ran into my elder son and severely mangled and injured him. We despaired of his life for months. During that time, these hired papers printed that I had had my son run into this truck to create sympathy, and headed their articles with such defaming titles as "Blind Tom's Sympathy Racket."

A jury, just a few weeks ago, passed upon that accident and awarded my son a verdict of $60,000.

The discipline continued. They bribed several local labor leaders to oppose me stealthily, and these traitors to labor's cause through falsehood, lost me a large part of the labor vote, though my labor record then was 100 percent for 16 years in Congress and still is and will continue to be 100 percent. It is hard for fake labor leaders to fight that kind of record. Nevertheless some of these racketeer labor leaders are still at work preparing anti-Schall propaganda.

Just the other day a friend sent me a clipping from a so-called "labor paper" in Minneapolis, known as the "Labor Review." The editor of this paper is an out and out "Red" and has always been for somebody else whenever I have been up for election. It carried an article headed "SCHALL'S reward of labor", and sought to put over the idea that I was building a magnificent home and in its construction was misusing labor, and showed a picture of a "sandwich man" with placards on both sides of him, before the house which I hope to make my home, bearing the inscription, "Senator SCHALL's palatial new home 'unfair' to labor. Senator SCHALL says his labor record is 100 percent. On this job his record is 000 percent." An ingenious way of getting over an utter falsehood and the tools who were hired to do it know that it was a damnable lie.

Ever since I have been old enough to realize, the one wish of my heart has been to own a good home. The hard times afforded me the opportunity to buy from the estate of Van Tuyl at a price that my lean pocketbook could afford, and no honest man will begrudge me a decent home after 50 years of hard work and close temperate living and saving.

The facts are that sometime ago I contracted to purchase a home, that was a good home when it was built in 1900, for $6,000. I arranged to borrow $5,000. But before its consignment, enlisted certain repairs, including carpentry, plumbing, tinning, stuccoing, plastering, the fixing of the chimney, and painting. It seems the contractor had no trouble with employing union labor for everything but painting. This exception came about through the grafting, racketeering, and dishonest methods of one Stanley Anderson, who was being used as a substitute for the real paint union leader, who was ill. He, in true racketeer's style, was determined, as he put it, to get a "break" upon that job. He told the contractor that a United States Senator just had to give him the "break", whatever that means, or he would put the screws to him.

It is this kind of grafting, criminal racketeering by so-called "labor leaders" that does more harm to the cause of labor than any other single thing. And, by the way, this particular local labor organization was opposed to me in the last election, though the Federation of Labor and the railroad unions supported me and vouched for my labor record as 100 percent. I wonder what part of the $2,000,000 these so-called "labor leaders" got, and if they are not still on the pay roll.

The slush fund tried to hire farm leaders to oppose me, but in this ruse they were not successful. The farmers had kept track of my record and they were therefore unable to deceive them. From all parts of the State the farmers—God bless them—gave me an enormous vote, that more than offset the wholesale stealing and miscounting of my votes in the Twin Cities.

This sinister influence was so chagrined at my reelection that they thought the only way to save face was to institute a contest against me, which was unanimously dismissed by this Senate—and so bitter was still the resentment that they filed another contest, which was again unanimously dismissed last session. And all this discipline has been given me because I dared to speak and vote my convictions.

So I insist that I know something about party discipline over the course of 19 years in Congress.

But I also in that time learned something, being here from its inception, about the war and the boys who fought the war.

SOLDIER AND FARMER

My colleague the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and I were on the Mount Vernon when she was torpedoed 250 miles off the coast of France. That vessel was carrying about 500 boys who had had legs, or arms, or eyes, or jaws shot away. They were beyond repair and were being sent back home. These are the boys whom we are tonight fighting for. The disabled men who fought that war. We are proposing, by voting for this conference report, to kick them out from our protection and care, where the Constitution places them, into the tender mercies of those who have already been proven to have no mercy, of those who apparently stand with upraised cutting knife to advance upon these war cripples and without understanding or sympathy drain from them what little sustenance of life they have.

I was on the battlefield with the boys in France and I know something about what they suffered and what they did. I lined with them at mess and communed with them in bivouac in the night.

I heard here on the floor the other night one of the leaders of the "new deal", as he was one of the leaders of the old Democratic deal that took us into the war after their winning slogan to the people had been "He kept us out of war", just as their winning slogan in the last campaign was "It couldn't be worse", declare that it was our business to get into the war and that we should have been in long before we were.

I want to say with all the emphasis I have that it was not our business to get into that war and we should not have been in it if a Democratic President reelected upon the platform that he had kept us out of it had cared anything for what the people of the country desired. If our Democratic President, with the aid of the international bankers, had not taken us into that war this country today would not be in the slump of despair and despondency that it is. It is because of that war and the reckless extravagance of it that laid the foundation that has brought about our condition today.

It seems odd that the people of this country could be so deceived that they would return the very party to take us out of our difficulties who had through their drunken-sailor attitude in the war made the very conditions which cannot be expressed better than they put it in their slogan, "It couldn't be worse." Nowhere, anywhere in the annals of history can be found even an iota of parallel of the extravagant, ill-managed, wreckage of our country that the Democrats brought about through their conduct of that war. They created the condition from 1916–20 that we as a nation have had to answer for since 1928 to the present time.

The people, suffering in 1932, not realizing their condition was directly due to the wrecking administration of 1916–20, were as easily misled with the slogans, "It could not be worse" and "We must have a new deal" as little Red Riding Hood who asked, "But Grandma, what makes your eyes so big?" and the phony Democratic grandma answered, "The better to see you with, my dear." By the time the citizen, little Red Riding Hood, gets to the question of "what makes your mouth so big?" they will begin to realize that it is a gastronomic condition that will not be sated with the blood of the disabled soldiers or Government employees but crunches on into the vitals of the country, gnaws away the very foundation of our liberty, gulps down the very Constitution upon which we, aye the world, depend for the preservation, development, and understanding of the individual and stands with its new deal, its new laws, its unlimited powers filched from Congress, a menace behind the Stars and Stripes ready to strike down when the moment shall come the emblem of liberty and hoist in its place the black flag of Mussolini, Lenin, and Hitler.

Here we are with the same party, almost the same personnel that conscripted our soldiers and sent them over there to fight for democracy. They did not conscript wealth, but on the contrary pampered it and are doing so today.

Now this same party, this same personnel, is trying to fix up the havoc they wrought when they were in power before and they begin with the Government employees. Then they ask the very soldiers who have been shot up, mangled, and diseased through obeying their orders to come forth now and lay upon the altar of sacrifice the little pittance a Republican Government gave to them to keep life and body together.

Yes, they are fixing things up all right just as they did when they were in power before. The similarity is analogous in their many new commissions, new bureaus, "new deals" which are again to be run by "pay-triots", the dollar-a-year men, who as a rule were interested only in their particular manufactory or business or form of making money.

Remember the war contracts that were let on a percentage basis and where millions of feet of whole lumber yards were burned to increase that percentage? Where cement was piled in wet sloughs that it might be destroyed and the percentage thus increased? Where five or six men were hired to do one man's job and paid exorbitantly? Where the ordinary laborer was getting $10 to $15 a day and the skilled from $25 to $40 all of which went to increase the cost? Compare this wage with the $1 a day of the boys whose compensation for injury we now propose to take away from them. Oh, yes; the Democrats always were great boys to put things in circulation. Remember the story of the plumber's helper who reported somebody following him around, thought it was a German spy and upon investigation it was found to be the helper's helper, all of which went to the cost and in a crude way explains Democratic efficiency. [Laughter.]

We appropriated $42,000,000,000 for that war and spent it over and above our loans. We paid our noble allies from $80 to $140 for every soldier they took over on their ships to fight their battle, and we paid cash as we went clear through the war. We bought from France and paid them in cash; I am not sure as to the figures, but I think it was around $100,000,000 more than they got from us, including their $4,400,000,000 loan, so I cannot agree with the Senators who suggest that we profited out of the war.

We built them ships, we deepened their harbors, we built them docks, put machinery on those docks, built railroads, furnished thousands of cars and engines, built hospitals, and we paid for everything as we went, in cash—cash raised from the people of this country.

They wanted to charge us and did charge us for the ground our soldiers drilled on and felt they were abused that we did not pay them for the property shot up in driving the Germans out of their land. We gave 125,000 lives and the millions of crippled, torn, harassed, infected, diseased humanity that was left to us as a heritage, which is costing us around $800,000,000 a year. We are paying out about that sum in interest on money we borrowed from the people to loan to our allies, and we must pay the principal when due.

We loaned something over $12,000,000,000 to 12 different nations, and we have raised this money from the people by means of so-called "Liberty bonds", and we agreed to pay that money back with interest at the rate of 3½, 4, 4½, and in some instances 5 percent.

We loaned to England $4,715,000,000.

To France $4,400,000,000—$1,800,000,000 after the armistice.

To Italy $2,150,000,000.

Belgium a half a billion and so on to 12 different nations. This money was loaned without any regard to good business principles.

Congress had passed a law that these loans were to be made to our allies and that we should take in exchange for these loans their national bonds in the amount of the loan, bearing interest at the same rate that we were paying to the people. This was not done. Loans were made with only an I.O.U. receipt, so that after our boys, practically in 6 months, had cleaned up what the Allies had been trying to do for 4 years and through their efforts brought victory to the Allies and thereby gave them the unjust Versailles Treaty, because of which England is now in possession of nearly a third of the world, through which France filled her pockets, Italy her lap, and Japan her arms, and we got prohibition. [Laughter.] And now the Democrats have taken that away from us. [Laughter.] We asked nothing out of that war and got nothing. The least thing our allies could do in showing their appreciation is to pay the debt they owe us, a debt the amount of which they themselves dictated. After the war was safely over and they had the spoils of that war carefully locked up, the Allies began to twist and turn, as usual in the case of a dead horse, to find some way to get out of paying their legitimate debts. After much parley we accepted their proposition, and really, in effect, canceled these debts. We accepted in lieu thereof a small rate of interest over a period of 62 years. In the case of England this amounts to 3.7 percent, in the case of France 2.17 percent, in the case of Belgium 2.1 percent, in the case of Italy 1.1 percent.

That is the war debt of which we hear so much, and that is the debt and the conditions of it that some of our noble allies wished to default or have it arranged in some other way so that in the end they can even get away from this tiny interest and pay nothing.

While I was in France during the war an official delegation called upon me and asked me to urge the President to announce at once that at the close of the war we would give France one half of our merchant marine which we were then building for our allies' defense. They said it would make for better understanding. They were suspicious of our soldiers landing there in such tremendous numbers. They surmised it would not be much better if we took possession instead of the Germans. In order to allay the feeling of Europe that we had any design, we called a conference to limit the different nations' armaments, which France and England and Italy gladly joined. They had nothing to lose at the time. We had a Navy built and building that would have whipped the combined navies of the world. In order to make them feel that we had no desire of conquest, we agreed to sink and did, like silly asses, sink 22 battleships, 11 of them brandnew, while our noble allies tore up a great number of blueprints. This had no sooner been done than our allies began to pull back from the Navy disarmament as to lighter vessels and adjourned to take that matter up at a later date. They all went home and began to build war cruisers as fast as they could build them with our money, and they have been building them ever since, until from this magnificent Navy that would have defeated the combined navies of the world we are now in fourth or fifth place. Europe has over 30,000,000 men under arms, more by several million than she has ever had in her history.

Now if we had had the national bonds of these different nations—and we would have had if Republicans had been at the helm, if the law had been carried out, or good business principles practiced—we could have put them upon their markets. We would not have been forced as we have been, step by step, to abandon every claim that we have advanced for the taxpayer of this country in lessening his bills by cutting down war preparation.

If we had had these bonds we would have had a club that would have brought them to terms, for none of them could have afforded to have these bonds placed upon their market at any time since the war. We get nothing from Europe, as history shows, and especially history since the war, unless we are in position to enforce it. Promises mean nothing to them, treaties are only scraps of paper, though we went into that war upon the pretense of making them something else.

We were outmaneuvered and outpointed in all conferences and are thought of today in Europe as a soft mark. No wonder Will Rogers says that we have the greatest navy of the world at the bottom of the sea and that we have never lost a war and never won a conference. Over there we are called "Uncle Sham" and "Uncle Shylock", and yet our President in exact opposition to the declaration of his party platform just yesterday accepted $7,000,000 in lieu of an $89,000,000 interest payment of England and remarked the while that he did not hold this slight payment as a default. Why not insist upon these tiny interest payments as a means of balancing our Budget instead of taking it out of the very men they sent over there to get wounded and diseased? It is a crime that these boys, the targets of the war, must now become charity charges in order to help patch up a depleted Treasury because of the Democratic financial orgies of their last administration. Better that we insist on the Allies paying their little interest as they agreed to do, and if they do not, let us call it by its proper name, a "default", and end the matter there and charge it up to education in hopes that it will teach us to attend to our own business and keep out of entangling alliances.

Over there in London today they are holding forth to settle the troubles of the world, and from there we learn that our debtor nations will default on the June 15 payments except for about $7,000,000. One hundred and forty-four million dollars is due us. Little Finland, who is by far less able to pay than either England, or France, or Italy, or Belgium, pays hers in full.

Because of the unprecedented generosity toward our allies we find ourselves burdened with $12,000,000,000 of bonds to our citizens that gradually fall due, making it, as the administration says, impossible for our Government to give fair treatment to our soldier boys because of the depression, which depression, if traced to its origin, would run right back to the Democratic mismanagement of the war. If the Democratic administration would be as considerate of them as they have been of the Allies, we should not have to be arguing here for days over a $100,000,000 for them when by mere notice from Europe we are told we shall lose $140,000,000 that they refuse to pay us on debts they acknowledge they owe, and which represents only a tiny interest on cash money we turned over to them.

We wanted it, moreover, distinctly understood when we went over there that the debts were not to be discussed. Still they are the first thing put to the fore.

Then they talk about tariffs over there and about inflation. They say that there is no use to set tariffs until they stabilize their currencies, as they can cheapen their money to defeat any tariff barriers we may set.

Well, some time ago we gave the President power to set the value of our money. So the market went up. Yesterday we find the stock market fell on a mere rumor that the President has in mind to peg our dollar at 84 cents of its old value in terms of gold.

Tomorrow I suppose he will have to assure the country this is not so to make it move up again. Then it will move again until some other rumor comes out.

England and France are opposed to our setting our dollar where it will have about the same ratio in gold as their money now has. The dollar should be set somewhere around $3.40 to the pound to accomplish this. England wants it set around $4.05. France does not want it that cheap, as they both openly advocate an expensive dollar so they can defeat us in the world markets.

We gave the President power to set our money value on the theory he would need that power in the Economic Conference. It is likely he will not be able to influence our former allies to join with him, so our delegates might as well come home. And then what good is inflation?

Why be battling around in Europe asking them to reduce their tariffs? Over 90 percent of our entire commerce is done within our own States. Let us tend to our own business and our own commerce and our own affairs and our own people and forget this Lady Bountiful pose.

If we raised our tariffs to protect our markets from the deflated currencies of the world, we would have had enough gold to say on gold, without inflation, and would then have prevented this added uncertainty in our business, the uncertainty of the value of our dollar. As matters stand, I cannot see how any business man can know what value to put on goods while prices are going up. And this all because some international bankers insist on doing business all over the world, and to do that we had to get into a currency war so they could compete.

Oh, yes, they say, we need inflation at home also; that it was not only because of foreign competition. In the past we have got out of depressions without such radical measures. We had every reason to believe that we were about to witness a rising price movement in this country without artificial stimuli, because our shelves were empty, the falling prices had made it impossible to manufacture goods. No one would stock up for fear of a falling market. Hence merchants had to wait for their orders to be filled to make a sale.

With guaranty of bank deposits and with confidence in banks returning, there was every reason to believe we would soon have a rising price level without artificial measures.

Now it appears that we are confusing a rising market with some hallowed price level, arbitrarily set at 1926. If we can only get back to the 1926 price level everything will be all right. I wonder if the average business man is more interested in some certain price level than he is in knowing that the market is rising and that he can safely go ahead with his factory with little worry that prices will fall. It takes production, not a price level, to create purchasing power. Without purchasing power no price level can be sustained.

It seems to me that the rising price level would have led business men back to their work, and with a stable dollar they would be much more confident of the future than they are with this artificial value of the dollar. No one knows from one day to the next what the dollar is worth now. Hence, how can they safely go ahead and do business? Look at the market today. Who can say that this inflation dollar lends confidence to business?

Surely inflation will not cure the maladjustment of population in agriculture. It will not remedy the evil of a 20-percent overproduction of grain and a 50-percent overproduction of cotton. Thirteen million bales of cotton will not be quickly used up because of a soft dollar. We do witness 9-cent cotton now and 75-cent wheat, but for how long? Suppose we continue the usual overproduction, how can inflation cure that?

The fact of the matter is that for many years prior to the war we used our overproduction of wheat and cotton and grain to pay our debts to Europe, but since the war, through tariffs, they have practically placed an embargo on our goods to show their friendly attitude to the nation that saved them.

Where to find foreign markets for the farmer is our problem. How to adjust our agricultural population to domestic consumption is our trouble. But inflation will not do it. Soon we shall have got to the top—to the 60-cent dollar—and then what? Where will the farmer be then? Will he raise more grain than last year? More cotton? If he does, the farmer will be worse off and not better. His fundamental problem is to adjust his production to domestic consumption. We have no foreign market for his products. There is no foreign country with money to pay. Look at China. She borrows from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. She may never pay back. I am glad the farmer got the break. Now Russia wants to try the same stunt. But will the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be able to finance all foreign countries who want to buy our grain? If not, we are back at the old post—overproduction of grain and cotton.

The World Conference will settle nothing. How can we cut tariffs with a currency war on? How can we peg the dollar without tariff and risk dumping in our country?

In foreign affairs we may as well admit we need tariffs and less entangling alliances. If we can stand in with our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere, we do well, and we will be on solid ground—on the Monroe Doctrine—in line with Washington's admonition. To roam about in Europe, in Asia, in Japan, is to encourage trouble.

Let us keep our tariffs. We should not abandon the gold standard for some mythical results to be got at any London Conference and throw added uncertainty into the business world. Let us adjust our farming population to meet domestic needs.

Let us use a little more American Constitution, a little more of Washington's advice, a little more of the Monroe Doctrine; let us use our gold for our money and forget about Europe, and maybe eventually we may even have enough money so we can do as much for our boys as we have done for Europe. While we waste time on mythical conferences to peg the dollar, to cut tariffs, and to cancel our debts, we neglect both our farmers and our veterans and leave them to depend on what Europe may do for us, and that, we should know, is nothing.

It was the international bankers that took us into the World War. They loaned money to our allies. They would have no doubt loaned it to Germany if they could, but the English Navy kept the German ships pretty well locked up. The loans became so large and the Allies were getting whipped that it soon became evident to them that if they were to save their money they must get the United States into the war on the side of the Allies. We had really as much reason to go to war with England as we had with Germany. England was trampling under her feet every freedom-of-the-sea right we had. So the international bankers began propagandizing the country, with the aid of fiction writers called "correspondents" through the newspapers, through propaganda in the pulpit, over the radio, and in all sorts of ways just as the Economy League, backed by the same sort of personnel, is putting over the propaganda today in an effort to cut down the just compensation of the disabled veteran.

Aye, Mr. President, we went into that war only because of propaganda.

I have heard men speak here on the floor who were strong for the bankers but weak for the poor devil of a soldier who fought to keep the bankers alive and going. Where would their bankers be if it had not been for the soldier, if it had not been for the boys who went to France and shed their blood and gave their lives?

I was in Paris when the Big Bertha shells were pouring in there. I was in Paris when the Parisians were moving out. German patrols were captured within 6 miles of Paris. The Frenchmen were not standing, they were being driven back; the Prussian Guard, headed by the Crown Prince, with five German divisions, had captured Belleau Wood and, with their great guns trained upon the road to Paris, cleared it for over 10 miles in advance, and the German troops were coming forward at the rate of from 4 to 5 miles a day as steady as clockwork. So confident were they that they were going into Paris that the Prussian Guard, as will be remembered, put on their dress suits, starched-bosom shirts, and spiked helmets because they thought they were going into Paris and no one could stop them. The Italians believed they were, the English believed they were, and the French themselves believed they were. The only ones who did not believe it were 15,000 Americans who were thrust into the line by Foch just as a sort of stopgap. He did not have much of an idea that the American soldier was any good. They wanted us to send our troops over there to be fed into their lines without American generals and without American military organizations. The Allies did not even want us recognized in the war as a nation; but the French troops were forced back, and finally Foch, in order to gain time so that reenforcements might be brought up near Paris, picked out four handy American regiments—the Fifth and Sixth Marines, the Ninth and Twenty-third Infantry of the Second Division. Fifteen thousand of our men were loaded into trucks and in the dead of night taken out toward the front. They passed retreating French troops, who said, "Go back; you're zigzag; you are crazy; sure death is ahead"; but the American soldier does not go back with an enemy in front. So our troops were landed there in the rain and in mud up to their knees, and in the morning faced an attack by five German divisions, headed by the Prussian Guard, which had never been defeated in 4 years of war. Those 15,000 Americans fought them, turned them back, defeated them, and began the rout that 6 months later ended in the victory of the Allies.

As I have said, every person in every land who knew the situation and facts believed that the Germans were marching into Paris; they all believed it except these 15,000 boys, there in the mud, who met the Germans at the break of dawn and turned them back and thereby turned over to our noble allies the spoils of the world which they have today; and they still are refusing to pay the tiny rate of interest that it was their own proposition to pay. The Germans thought from the way the Americans fought that they were there by the hundreds of thousands. So well did our boys fight that wherever they were lined up with the Allies the American salient was always the farthest advanced. Foch and other commanders tried to get them back to straighten out their lines with the French, and repeatedly quarreled with the officers. Finally one American officer was put upon the carpet and asked why he did not obey orders and take his boys back and get them straightened out with the French line, and he replied, "How the hell do you expect me to hold them back when the whole damned German Army cannot hold them back?" [Laughter.]

That is the kind of soldiers we had over there. I followed along there in the Chateau-Thierry drive, and I had pointed out to me where lay five or six dead Americans leading to a German machine-gun nest; over there 10 Americans strewn along in the capture of another of the German machine guns. That is the way our boys died. They died with the bullets in front. They were wounded by shell and choked by gas, and some of them are here today, a part of the wreckage of that war. They gave everything to that war. Our boys won it. If they had not been there the allied cause would have been lost. Because of our boys being in that war the Allies won.

You Democrats did not conscript wealth, you merely conscripted these boys, to make the world safe for the international banker, and it seems, from all I have gathered during this session, that you are still hard at work at your old job for the old master, and now wealth needs some money, and wealth says, "Conscript these poor devils; they cannot defend themselves; let us take the money from them." No wonder they should say, as they did of Pershing, "What a liberal cuss," taking the money by this fake economy law, which has turned every power Congress had over into the hands of what seems to me to be working out to be a true dictator. If we must delegate our power, let us delegate it to somebody in sympathy with the boys who fought our battles. We have delegated the power, and the money is taken from the soldiers; and more than that—it is put into the "sapling" camps, and members of the "sapling army" go into the soldier hospitals; the soldiers are kicked out and the little favorite saplings are put in their beds. Is that justice? Is that what we are seeking to have done here tonight? Is that the kind of thing we want the veterans to read in the RECORD tomorrow morning, that we were afraid to give them justice? We conscripted and paid a dollar a day to the soldiers who fought our battles, but for clerks who stayed at home we appropriated money to raise their salary and in addition gave them a bonus. We bonused everything; we bonused he railroads; we bonused every contractor in the country; but when bonus was mentioned for the soldiers after they had won the war, you gave hardly enough at the high prices then to buy a shoddy suit—$60. Then there came the "graveyard bonus" proposition that would not have been considered for anybody else. Certainly big business must be taken care of.

I heard one of the Senators say to us that he was so interested in bankers' legislation that he had not had time to pay any attention to the soldiers who fought our battles, and that we have got to have bankers to depend on to stand by and keep this country going. But where would his bankers be if it had not been for the soldier? It is the soldier upon whom the banker stands. It is the soldier upon which law and order and civilization must stand. Oh, yes! We loaned $12,000,000,000 to 12 different nations and we borrowed the money from our citizens. We took a club and went out and hit them over the head and made them buy the bonds, many of them, and they did buy them.

I heard a Senator say the other night that we put good money into the war, but that money was not anything in comparison to blood. I agree with him, but we put blood in there and we put money. We did it without thought of compensation to us to please the international bankers. The Allies had no claim on us to go across the sea, and what we did should certainly be recognized by the allied nations. They certainly should recognize and thank us instead of telling us that we got over too late, instead of doing the things that they are doing to us today.

When I was in Paris the French people were so rejoiced that the Americans were over there that everything was "just lovely"; it could not be otherwise—and I think it is so with the common people over there today—but the politicians got to work after the war was over. We had over $400,000,000 worth of goods and supplies in France, and Senators will remember that we sold them to the French Government for something like 10 percent and took their note for 10 years, at no interest, and the agreement was that they should keep those goods and not resell them in the United States. The ink had hardly dried on the paper when shiploads of shoes and clothing began to pour in here; and it will be remembered that we had to pass a hurry-up resolution to prohibit it. So you see, Mr. President, how they keep their word; you see what their word is worth. We do not want the American soldier to get the idea that the Government of the United States is keeping its word like that.

We pledged ourselves almost unanimously—I think there were only 5 or 6 votes against it—to give these soldiers certain rights, and under legislation enacted by the House and by the Senate these soldiers were to be given certain sums of money. That was a contract, and God knows they had some right to rely on it. They said, "There it is; Uncle Sam for whom we fought is doing this for us." But along comes the economy bill. It never should have been passed; never in the world should we, in this country, turn over absolute authority to any one. That is contrary to the Constitution. I heard my friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] say here the other night that the Constitution is an old-fashioned document in the "new deal"; but let me say to my friends on the Democratic side, do not let them crack the whip over your backs; do not allow them to get you tonight to vote against humanity and right or you will not sleep well hereafter. Stand by your guns; stand by your opinions, believing that your soul is worth more than any patronage that can possibly be given to you by the dictator. Stand by your conscience and vote for humanity; vote for the men who have stood for their country, who have fought the battles of your country.

Senators, you remember the story of the Holy Grail. It was right outside the door. That is where it is tonight; it is right here in the hands of the veterans. That is where the Holy Grail is. Do not get excited when you hear the crowd yelling for Barabbas. You will remember that when Pilate washed his hands so nice and clean, the crowd yelled "Barabbas." Why are some Senators preparing to change their vote? They are just washing their hands nice and clean. I heard all along the Republican line during this battle, "That fellow is going overboard. He is getting ready to take a dive. Oh, that is too bad", and it is too bad. It is too bad, my friends, that you will not stand and fight as these boys fought. Why exhibit such cowardice, and be driven away from doing what you know is right? Stand by justice and humanity! It will be remembered that when Pilate washed his hands of the Savior, he said, "Let me give you this other man and let me pardon Christ." But the mob yelled, "Oh, no; we want Barabbas!"

My friends, do not yell for Barabbas. Ask for humanity. Ask for the Christ that is here. The Holy Grail is right here in front of you in the persons of the veterans who fought your wars. Stand by them. This is not a party question. It will not get you anything but the contempt of the men who saw you change your minds and sneak away and vote for a little patronage benefit; that is what Judas did for 30 pieces of silver, but he had the decency to go out and hang himself after he had had time to realize his perfidy.

In a few moments the vote will have been taken, the fate of the injured soldier decided, and with him perhaps the fate of his country.

Congress will then come to an adjournment but just before that adjournment the customary message of the President will be read, and no doubt he will thank you Democrats for your stanch work and the way you stood by him in getting over his dictatorial powers, and especially he will thank you for tonight's work for he already knows the outcome.

It seems to me that I hear him say in the words of Mark Antony after his funeral oration over Caesar wherein he had aroused the citizens and they had carried out the stab-riddled murdered body of Rome's first soldier:

> Now let it work; mischief, thou art afoot,
> Take thou what course thou wilt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as I hope the Senate has observed, I did not desire to interpose my personal affair to prevent a vote on this important measure, and three times desisted when I desired to speak. Very likely I should be content with the record as it stands, except that I should very likely, for the RECORD, make a statement as to my relation with this particular question of the veterans' compensation.

As already indicated to the Senate, I was incessantly engaged with banking legislation when this particular matter came up for consideration before the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am chairman. I also am chairman of the subcommittee of that committee having charge of the independent offices appropriation bill. Knowing that it would be impossible for me to give attention in detail to these important matters, I requested the Senator from South Carolina, next ranking on the subcommittee, to take charge of the bill, and that he did; and I gave little attention to the discussion until the last 2 days, when banking legislation was enacted. In the last 2 days, however, I took my place in the Senate; I heard every word of the discussion indulged in by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] on one side, and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and perhaps other Senators on one side or the other.

I am not quite so stupid, as the Senator from New Mexico implied, as not to have been able, by listening to these discussions, to get a fairly comprehensive idea of the differences between the proponents of one side and the proponents of another side of this question. I recall very distinctly that when an attempt was made in the Senate to instruct the conferees, and when that attempt was resisted, there was exacted from my colleague the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] an agreement that the House amendment should not be agreed to by the conferees on the part of the Senate unless it should first be brought back to the Senate; and while I did not openly participate in that agreement, I felt that by my silence I was committed to that plan of procedure. With that understanding, we went into conference.

Of course, I followed my colleague from South Carolina in nearly all matters of detail, because having put upon him the burden of considering these matters involving conversations with the White House, with the Veterans' Bureau, and with leaders of both House and Senate, nothing could have been more ungracious in me, except upon a matter of principle, than to have contested mere details agreed to by the Senator from South Carolina.

We went into conference and kept faith strictly with the Senate, refusing positively to agree to the action of the House, and compelling the House conferees to take the so-called "Steiwer-Cutting amendment" to the House for a formal vote. That was done; and the action of the House thus taken was reported back to the Senate, and full opportunity thus given to the Senate either to concur in the action of the House, or to send the bill to a free conference between the two Houses, or to send the bill to conference under instructions to the Senate conferees.

The bill was sent back to a free conference; and for 2 hours the same question of construction that occupied the Senate for hours was gone into; and I—modestly, I hope—impute to myself enough of ordinary intelligence, contrary to the assertion of the Senator from New Mexico, to have understood the argument presented by the Senator from Oregon, and the contrary argument made by the Senator from South Carolina.

I felt then, as I am convinced now, that the construction of the Senator from South Carolina was the correct construction of the text of the bill proposed; but, regardless of that judgment on my part, I took every precaution to interrogate the House conferees to ascertain from them whether they would agree to any modification of the action of the House beyond the incorporation of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina and once adopted by the Senate.

The answer of the House conferees was unqualified and unmistakable. They stated that they would not agree to any modification; they would not accept the construction placed upon the text of the proposed bill by the Senator from Oregon; and they insisted upon the amendment of the House, as modified by the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Knowing that that was all that could be gotten, having been very definitely apprised of the fact that the President would veto the bill should any further concession be made to the proponents of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, we were faced with the practical situation of either yielding to the House or inviting an inevitable veto by the President, which in our judgment could not be overridden. The Senate yielded and made its conference report. That, I think, is an incontestable statement of the facts.

Then we had from the Senator from New Mexico the most extraordinary and, I venture to say, the most unprecedented performance that has ever been witnessed in the Senate of the United States, of personal attacks upon Senators who exercised their conscientious judgment and recorded it in a conference report.

The suggestion first was made that Senators agreeing to the conference report were for some reason afraid to have it known. That was the suggestion made in his most amiable mood by the Senator from Oregon, who is never quarrelsome but always tactful, but sometimes rather suggestive. But then the Senator from New Mexico seemed to single out the senior Senator from Virginia for some reason, to reproach him with some large degree of culpability because at some time or other when the Treasury was flush, when the country thought it was prosperous, when fortunes were being made on paper in speculation, the Senator from Virginia had voted in some sense of liberality for persons on the pension roll who had no service connection.

There was called to my attention in the course of the conference what very likely I had known before, but was then stressed, that the President of the United States was given unqualified authority to determine these matters; and I, for one, assumed that he would not determine them in a sinister way, or in the harsh and brutal way which has been imputed to him in discussion here tonight.

Knowing him personally as I have for 20 years, regarding him as one of the most philanthropic and humane men I have ever known, it was inconceivable to me that he would himself take hostile action against veterans whose disabilities might be attributed to the service, or that he would sanction harsh or unjust action in any other branch of the Government. Therefore I signed the report without hesitation.

I could have made no concealment had I desired to make any, and I have never in my public life desired to conceal an opinion or a vote I have ever cast. When I sought to interrupt the Senator from New Mexico, in a way quite as brutal as the cruelty imputed by him to the Director of the Veterans' Administration and to the Director of the Budget, if not to the President himself, he abruptly declined to be interrupted, although the RECORD will show that I permitted him to interrupt me three times this evening when I had the floor. I was never before so astonished in my life. Then he proceeded to make a statement the only implication of which was that the Senator from Virginia had been guilty of a despicable alteration of the RECORD and had inserted in it something which had not occurred.

Mr. President, so far as participation in the World War through those of my blood and bone, so far as support of this Government and the country during the World War are concerned, I am perfectly content to make contrasts with the Senator from New Mexico. So far as sympathetic consideration with veterans who may trace their disabilities to actual service is concerned, I assert that the records will show that my sympathy exceeds his and that my generosity surpasses his.

I have said that were I the President of the United States acting under the economy law, I would not subtract a thrip from the compensation of any veteran whose disability may be traced to actual service for his country in any war. So far as my information extends, I have no reason to believe or suspect that the President of the United States desires to reduce the compensation of such men or their dependents.

The Senator made one statement which, had he omitted it from his attack upon me, wanton and unprovoked as it was, I should very likely have been content to let the record stay without another word. He said that I had presumed upon the affection of my colleagues, upon the esteem in which they held me, to insult them at my pleasure.

I challenge any Senator here to search this RECORD in either House for 32 years and to show where I ever initiated a dispute with a colleague in the other House or in the Senate for the last 13 years, during the time I have been here. There is a single man on the other side of the aisle who may think that on one occasion I spoke harshly of him; but, in my view, the provocation was great. There is but a single man on this side of the Chamber to whom I have spoken harshly, under the gravest provocation. But with neither one of those two Senators did I ever initiate a dispute. I believe in the doctrine of Abraham Lincoln on that point, said to have been written above his office door:

> Beware of entering into a quarrel; but once in, make the other man beware of you.

It hurt me to the quick to be told that I had presumed upon the affection and esteem of my colleagues to insult any one of them. There is not the semblance of truth in the accusation. Although I am not accustomed to being proud of myself in any sense, I have often said that the greatest satisfaction of my public life was the belief that on both sides of this Chamber, perhaps on the other side more than on this, I had the respect and devotion of my colleagues.

For the Senator from New Mexico I had the greatest esteem, approaching the point of affection, had so high a regard for his character and intelligence that he knows that I advocated his appointment to the President's Cabinet, and urged him personally to accept the position of Secretary of the Interior. After this unprovoked attack upon me he spoke of my vote, as if he could imagine that I could ever fear the result of my action here presented to the people of Virginia, as if he could intimidate me to alteration of my views or a change of my vote by citing to the Senate my attitude on this question—something so astonishing that I shall not soon recover from the amazement of such a performance. Then to tell me of his love and affection for me!

If I could quote Scripture as accurately as the senior Senator from Louisiana, I would be tempted to illustrate the loving affection the Senator from New Mexico entertains for me, as I gather from his unprovoked assault here in the Senate Chamber tonight. I was reminded of that scene in the Palestine desert where Joab met Amasa, and, following the Jewish custom, took him by the beard with one hand and kissed him on the cheek and said, "Art thou in health, my brother?" But Amasa observed not that Joab carried in his right hand a dagger, and with it he smote Amasa, and shed out his bowels to the ground. That is the sort of affection the distinguished Senator from New Mexico has manifested toward me here in the Senate, simply because I acted upon my judgment and my conscience in trying to get, as I conceived, something for the veterans, rather than nothing.

I am distressed to think that my accustomed poise and well-known amiability were so disturbed that I had to apply what it seemed to me was a suitable epithet in response to the utterly unprovoked accusation made by the Senator from New Mexico. I do not like to figure that way in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD nor before my colleagues, but with this statement of the record I have no apology to make.

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on today, June 16, 1933, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following bills:

S. 815. An act to provide for the survival of certain actions in favor of the United States.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia, whom I still esteem and admire, believes that I treated him with the same degree of brutality with which the Director of the Budget has treated the disabled veterans of the country, then I want to tender to him my sincere apologies. I have not the slightest idea that anything I said could be characterized in that way.

If the Senator from Virginia had listened until I had completed my sentence he would have seen that I did not accuse him in any way of what he calls "a despicable alteration of the RECORD." When he reads the RECORD in the morning, he will see exactly what I said, and he will see that the sentence as a whole accuses him of nothing of the sort, although in the middle of the sentence, with his usual speed of action, he rose to his feet and accused me of mendacity.

Mr. President, I am not going to initiate any kind of a feud with my distinguished friend the Senator from Virginia; I think just as highly of him as I have thought of him ever since I have been a Member of this body; and I hope that, on reflection, he may again award to me some part at least of the esteem which he tells us he has felt for me in the past.

However, Mr. President, the issue which I raised with the Senator from Virginia was not in any sense a personal one. It is a question which seems to me of the gravest importance for the Senate of the United States. I do not wish to be diverted from the question of public policy by any bandying of epithets between individuals on the floor of this body. The Senator from Virginia has repeatedly stated that he was so busy with banking legislation that he had not had time to give attention to the subject of veterans' laws. Nevertheless he went on the conference committee. When he went on the conference committee, according to the statement which he has just concluded, he listened to arguments of the Senator from South Carolina opposing the attitude which the Senate had taken and to arguments of the Senator from Oregon supporting the attitude which the Senate had taken, and he followed his colleague from South Carolina against the wishes of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I did not hear the statement this evening, but certainly the Senator from Oregon would say that what has just been said is not a correct statement of the facts. The question discussed by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from South Carolina was as to the interpretation of certain language. The contention of the Senator from South Carolina was that the effect of the language of the Byrnes amendment and of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment which was in dispute was exactly the same, and the argument on the part of the Senator from South Carolina was not against the position of the Senate.

Mr. CUTTING. Exactly.

Mr. BYRNES. It was simply a question between us as to the proper interpretation or construction of the language.

Mr. CUTTING. But the interpretation which the Senate had given to that language was in harmony with the opinion of the Senator from Oregon or the Senate would not have acted as it did last night. If these two amendments meant exactly the same thing, there would not have been any point in sending the bill back to conference.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from New Mexico should be fair about that. There was a difference, but the dispute was only around one section of the bill. Of course there were differences between the bills, and the Senator from South Carolina stood for the Senate bill in that discussion.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the Senator from South Carolina say that he stood for the Senate bill in the discussion, but the point I am trying to make is that the Senate conferees had instructions from the Senate of just as sacred and just as binding a character as the conferees on the part of the House had from the body which they represented. The conferees of the House had been instructed by their body in favor of a certain proposition; the conferees on the part of the Senate had been instructed in an equally binding fashion, to support the Senate proposal. If that was an unhampered conference between equals, I repeat that the conferees on the part of the Senate should have at least obtained a compromise somewhere between the terms of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment and those of the House amendment. There was a large degree of latitude between those two propositions. When the Senate conferees came back here and surrendered, I think they were entitled to criticism, and it is that criticism, with neither personal feeling nor personal motive in view, which I endeavored to express in the remarks which offended the Senator from Virginia.

I think that is a very fundamental proposition, Mr. President, and I hope that when we come back here in January we will take measures which will prevent Members from serving on conferences when they are not genuinely and firmly and sincerely convinced of the soundness of the position taken by the body which they represent.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H.Con.Res. 24), in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on Friday, the 16th day of June 1933, and that when they adjourn on said day they stand adjourned sine die.

RAILROAD SALARIES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a report from Joseph B. Eastman in regard to the salaries of railroad officials 1932–33. It is supplementary to a public document of last year and brings the data down to date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM PLEDGES AND THEIR FULFILLMENT—LEGISLATION OF THE SPECIAL SESSION, SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a review of the legislation of the session, together with data and memoranda with reference thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, President Roosevelt was elected on a platform which, in plain and simple terms, pledged his administration to a definite program of action for the relief of conditions which had become intolerable. That platform declared that the only hope of affording permanent relief lay in a drastic change in governmental policies. It further declared that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when intrusted with power.

The special session of the Seventy-third Congress, of which a large majority in both Houses is Democratic, was charged with enacting the measures necessary to carry out the legislative program of the Executive in order to fulfill the platform pledges. This Congress, which covered a period of about 90 days, has made a record unparalleled for speed and effective action. Taken in connection with the Executive acts of the President, it furnishes incontrovertible evidence that the pledges of the platform upon which the present administration was elected have all been kept when final action was possible, and the remaining problems have been advanced to a stage which promises early ultimate results.

The manner in which these platform pledges have been kept can best be shown by enumerating them and reciting the action taken for their fulfillment:

THE PLATFORM

We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

THE FULFILLMENT

On the second day of the present session President Roosevelt transmitted an emergency economy bill, which empowered him to establish a revised pension system and authorized a reduction of Federal salaries up to a maximum of 15 percent, effective for the fiscal year 1934. This measure, in connection with the authorization for the reorganization of departments and bureaus and economies effected in the appropriation bills, was estimated to bring about a saving in excess of $1,000,000,000. This estimate has been modified by other legislation favorable to veterans, which tends to reduce the amount of annual savings to about a billion dollars, which is equal to a reduction of 25 percent of expenditures as pledged in the party platform.

THE PLATFORM

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

THE FULFILLMENT

The emergency economy law, in connection with reductions in the annual supply bills and reorganizations in the departments, accomplished the balancing of the Budget.

It is proper to state that measures have been enacted authorizing the employment of Government credit for purposes deemed essential to national recovery; but it should also be stated that for the most part additional revenues have been levied to service these unusual Federal activities, such as unemployment relief, public works, and industrial control. The continuation of somewhat irksome taxes and the imposition of higher rates in some instances, in order to support essential sinking-fund arrangements, is believed to be fully justified as the sound and proper method of maintaining the national credit while initiating undertakings calculated and intended to revive business and revitalize industry.

PLATFORM PLEDGE

Pending repeal (of the eighteenth amendment) we favor immediate modification of the Volstead Act to legalize the manufacture and sale of beer and other beverages of such alcoholic content as is permissible under the Constitution and to provide therefrom needed and essential revenue.

THE FULFILLMENT

During the regular session of the Congress following the election of President Roosevelt a joint resolution submitting the question of repeal of the eighteenth amendment was passed by the necessary two-thirds vote in both Houses. The legislation carrying out the promise to modify the Volstead Act by legalizing beer of alcoholic content believed to be within the constitutional limit was promptly enacted following the inauguration, and the sale of beer was permitted in States whose laws did not prohibit the same. The revenue from the beer bill is an important factor in the balancing of the Budget. Originally estimated at between one hundred and twenty-five million and one hundred and fifty million dollars, the returns from this source indicate that annual Federal revenues from beer will amount to $250,000,000.

THE PLATFORM

We favor the restoration of agriculture, the Nation's basic industry; better financing of farm mortgages through reorganized farm-bank agencies at low rates of interest on an amortization plan giving preference to credits for the redemption of farms and homes sold under foreclosure.

Extension and development of farm cooperative movement and effective control of crop surpluses so that our farmers may have the full benefit of the domestic market.

The enactment of every constitutional measure that will aid the farmers to receive for their basic farm commodities prices in excess of the cost.

THE FULFILLMENT

Within 2 weeks after the new administration came into power, a farm relief bill was presented to the Congress. Under it the President was granted wide powers over the production and distribution of basic agricultural products. He was also authorized to cause to be expanded the currency of the National Government. The farm legislation enacted by this Congress also includes a provision for refinancing the farm debts, by exchanging farm mortgages for Federal land-bank bonds with interest guaranteed by the Treasury. The legislation for refinancing farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, supplementing the Federal Farm Loan Act and providing for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks and for other purposes, was introduced in this body as early as April 3, 1 day less than a month after the inauguration of the new administration. In addition to providing $2,000,000,000 for exchange of unpaid farm mortgages for Federal land bank 4-percent bonds, it supplies loans of $200,000,000 to farmers through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in refinancing themselves and redeeming foreclosed property.

There are many other features of the legislation all beneficial to the farmer and designed likewise to protect the holders of farm mortgages.

When the President signed the farm relief bill he made a special appeal to mortgage creditors to abstain from foreclosure proceedings, and received many favorable responses from the large insurance companies holding such mortgages directing the suspension of foreclosures.

THE PLATFORM

We condemn the extravagance of the Farm Board and its disastrous action which made the Government a speculator of farm products.

THE FULFILLMENT

By Executive order issued March 27 President Roosevelt abolished the Farm Board and consolidated all of the agricultural credit agencies under one head, to be known as the "Farm Credit Administration" with an administrator, to be known as "the Governor" of the new organization. Large unexpended balances of the Federal Farm Board were thereby impounded and returned to the Treasury.

THE PLATFORM

We advocate the extension of Federal credit to the States to provide unemployment relief wherever the diminishing resources of the States make it impossible for them to provide for the needy; expansion of the Federal program of necessary and useful construction affected with a public interest, such as adequate flood control and waterways.

We advocate the spread of employment by a substantial reduction in the hours of labor, the encouragement of the shorter week by applying the principle in Government service. We advocate planning of public works.

THE FULFILLMENT

The platform pledges made for the relief of unemployment have been more than fulfilled. Within 3 weeks after his inauguration President Roosevelt put in motion one phase of his plan for unemployment relief by transmitting to Congress a bill for the creation of a Civilian Conservation Corps by which 250,000 unemployed would be given work in the national forests and the national parks. In addition to the cash allowance, they receive their food, quarters, clothing, and medical attention. Subsequent action adds 25,000 men from the unemployed bonus army to this reforestation corps. To this extent unemployment is reduced and various communities relieved of the expense incident to the support of 275,000 unemployed persons. The moral result is even greater by removing many youths from the temptations that would beset them in the towns and cities from which most of them are drawn. This involved no present additional taxation, as there was $200,000,000 of unobligated money already in the Treasury heretofore appropriated for public works.

The second phase of the administration's unemployment relief program was the passage of the so-called "Wagner-La Follette-Costigan bill" authorizing the grant of $500,000,000 outright to the States for the care of the unemployed.

The administration's vital blow at unemployment is the gigantic public works bill, transmitted to Congress on May 17, involving the control of industry, which provides for a $3,300,000,000 bond issue, to be retired over a period of years, at an estimated cost of $220,000,000 annually. This legislation was designed for the shortening of the working week, the payment of a decent wage, and the prevention of unfair competition and overproduction. It is limited to 2 years. It is estimated that the entire cost of this plan for Nation-wide reemployment can be met by the increased revenues that would follow the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Late in the session the Congress passed the Wagner-Peyser employment agency bill, providing for the Federal employment agencies and authorizing appropriations to carry out the same for each succeeding year until 1938.

In addition to these measures for unemployment relief, President Roosevelt has taken steps in behalf of wage earners already employed. In an address to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States he urged its members, representing the principal employers, to refrain from further reductions in wages and to increase wage scales in conformity to the rise in prices. The President also asked the Governors of 13 industrial States to urge the adoption of laws similar to the new minimum wage act of New York State.

INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

History probably will record the National Industrial Recovery Act as the most important and far-reaching legislation ever enacted by the American Congress. It represents a supreme effort to stabilize for all time the many factors which make for the prosperity of the Nation.

Thus spoke the President as he signed the Industrial Recovery Act, a measure providing $3,300,000,000 for a public-works program—probably the greatest undertaking of its kind ever attempted by the Government.

Continuing, the President said—

The law I have just signed was passed to put people back to work—to let them buy more of the products of farms and factories and start our business at a living rate again. This task is in two stages—first, to get many hundreds of thousands of the unemployed back on the pay roll by snowfall; and second, to plan for a better future for the longer pull. * * * As in the great crisis of the World War, it puts a whole people to the simple but vital test: Must we go on in many groping, disorganized, separate units to defeat, or shall we move as one great team to victory?

The funds provided by this Industrial Recovery Act will be spent in various ways: $400,000,000 for highway building projects; $238,000,000 for construction of new vessels for the Navy; $9,000,000 for new airplanes for the Navy; the Post Office and Treasury Departments are to get by October first $100,000,000 for new post offices, quarantine stations, and so forth.

Further referring to this act, the President said:

In my inaugural I laid down the simple proposition that nobody is going to starve in this country. It seems to me to be equally plain that no business which depends for existence on paying less than living wages to its workers has any right to continue in this country. By "business" I mean the whole of commerce as well as the whole of industry; by "workers" I mean all workers—the white-collar class as well as the men in overalls; and by "living wages" I mean more than a bare subsistence level—I mean the wages of decent living.

THE PLATFORM

We advocate the conservation, development, and use of the Nation's water power in the public interest.

THE FULFILLMENT

One advance step in the fulfillment of this platform pledge is the passage of legislation for the operation and development of the great plant at Muscle Shoals, almost entirely abandoned since the war. As pointed out by President Roosevelt, the potential public usefulness of the entire Tennessee River is involved in this legislation.

Such use—

He said—

if envisioned in its entirety, transcends mere power development: it enters the wide fields of flood control, soil erosion, reforestation, elimination from agricultural use of marginal lands and distribution and diversification of industry * * *. It touches and gives life to all forms of human concern.

This project includes a broad plan for the improvement of the whole Tennessee Valley and is designed to add comfort and happiness to the hundreds of thousands of people there and be generally beneficial to national recovery.

THE PLATFORM

We advocate quicker methods of realizing on assets for the relief of depositors of suspended banks, and a more rigid supervision of national banks for the protection of depositors and the prevention of the use of their moneys in speculation to the detriment of local credits.

The severance of affiliated security companies from, and the divorce of the investment banking business from, commercial banks, and further restriction of Federal Reserve banks in permitting the use of Federal Reserve facilities for speculative purposes.

THE FULFILLMENT

President Roosevelt entered upon his duties facing a banking crisis. A Nation-wide run on the banks of the country had already closed thousands that were weak or insolvent, and if permitted to continue would have brought about the closing of strong and solvent ones. His first Executive order declared a bank holiday so that it might be determined what banks were sound and able to resume business, and to aid those whose assets would warrant assistance that they might also resume. It was a period of terrible suspense for all bank depositors, especially for those whose life savings were involved. One week later the President took the people into his full confidence, explained the situation in such plain terms that every person of common understanding realized not only the necessity for his act but also that it was in behalf of the people themselves. Public confidence was almost immediately restored.

Congress was called to assemble 4 days later, and on that day the President transmitted an emergency banking bill legalizing his acts in the crisis, giving him full authority over the banking situation and providing additional currency to meet any necessity that might arise. The bill invested the President with the tremendous World War powers of regulation over transactions in credit, currency, gold, and silver, including foreign exchange. It also authorized the President, without invoking the war powers, to fix restrictions on the banking business of Federal Reserve members. The result has been that the banks which opened upon the lifting of the ban or since have remained open.

The temporary or emergency banking legislation is supplemented by the passage of the Glass banking bill, which provides for the safer and more effective use of the assets of banks, requires insurance of bank deposits in a limited amount, and prevents the undue diversion of funds in banks from commercial to speculative purposes.

THE PLATFORM

We advocate protection of the investing public by requiring to be filed with the Government and carried in advertisements of all offerings of foreign and domestic stocks and bonds true information as to bonuses, commissions, principal invested, and interests of the sellers.

Regulation to the full extent of Federal power of:

(a) Holding companies which sell securities in interstate commerce.

(b) Rates of utility companies operating across State lines.

(c) Exchanges in securities and commodities.

THE FULFILLMENT

The platform declarations for Federal control over interstate traffic in securities were made effective in a bill signed by the President on May 27. This act is to be administered by the Federal Trade Commission.

THE PLATFORM

We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from executive interference, reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations, and an international economic conference designed to restore international trade and facilitate exchange.

We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards and an international monetary conference called on the invitation of our Government to consider the rehabilitation of silver and related questions.

THE FULFILLMENT

The continued depreciation of foreign currencies operated notably to the disadvantage of American producers and merchants. In the opinion of many, conditions which had not been anticipated by the previous administration made necessary the grant of extraordinary powers to the President with respect to the content of the gold dollar. Authorization for the issuance of Treasury notes secured by Government bonds and for the purchase by the Treasury of Government obligations is supported by numerous precedents. Manifestly the platform declaration, which declares for an international monetary conference to consider the rehabilitation of silver, did not commit the administration to the obligation to maintain the gold standard in spite of the fact that nearly all other commercial nations of prominence might abandon it.

As early as April 21 the President began conferences with representatives of many of the principal nations of the world with a view to facilitating the work of the International Economic Conference to meet at London. Differences of opinion have developed. Some of them are complex and present great difficulties. The Conference has potentialities of great benefits, but it must be remembered that the representatives of no one government can dominate its proceedings or direct the course that shall be taken respecting problems of vital importance to all the participants.

THE PLATFORM

We advocate a firm foreign policy, including peace with all the world, and the settlement of international disputes by arbitration; no interference in the internal affairs of other nations; the sanctity of treaties and the maintenance of good faith and good will in financial obligations; adherence to the World Court with appending reservations; the pact of Paris abolishing war as an instrument of national policy to be made effective by provisions for consultation and conference in case of threatened violations of treaties.

We advocate international agreements for reduction of armaments and cooperation with nations of the Western Hemisphere to maintain the spirit of the Monroe Doctrine.

THE FULFILLMENT

Demonstrating the firm foreign policy of the present administration and its desire for international peace, President Roosevelt addressed a message to 54 nations in behalf of disarmament and amicable relations. In this message he asked for a solemn, definite pact of nonaggression and that the nations should individually agree that "they would send no armed force of whatsoever nature across their frontiers." It was a courageous and dramatic act of high statesmanship which revived hope for the success of the Disarmament Conference in Geneva.

Thus far I have cited only the record of this session of Congress and acts of the Executive as they apply to the fulfillment of specific platform declarations. It is an incomparable record. The rapidity with which the legislation has been formulated and presented has been equaled only by the promptness with which the Congress has enacted it. I know of no other instance of equal cooperation by a legislative body with the Executive. There have been differences of opinion regarding detail, but they have been quickly composed and the desired result obtained. The Congress has not been a rubber stamp. The most obvious necessity of emergency legislation has been a speedy passport for its enactment, while other measures less urgent, or seemingly so, have been debated in considerable detail. The Congress, however, has realized that much was expected of the Executive, but it also has had a clear understanding of its duties and responsibilities to the people, and has endeavored to meet them as fully and as promptly as the distressful conditions of the country demanded.

This special session has also dealt with considerable important legislation not specifically pledged in the Democratic platform. Among these measures is the railroad reorganization bill, creating the office of Federal Coordinator of Transportation and dividing the railway lines into three separate groups. It also repeals the recapture clause of the Transportation Act of 1920. It provides for definite planning by the railroads with the aid of Federal authority for the purpose of eliminating duplication and waste resulting in railroad receiverships. With the assistance of the Commission it is designed and expected ultimately to overcome operating deficits. The bill also provides for financial reorganizations to reduce fixed charges so that the earnings may not be unduly impaired.

One of the most important measures dealt with by this Congress and not specifically pledged in the platform is the bill providing for the refinancing of mortgages on homes. This legislation creates an emergency loan corporation authorized to issue $2,000,000,000 in bonds which may be sold or exchanged for mortgages, with the interest but not the principal guaranteed by the United States Treasury. It provides also for moratoria on interest payments in case of extreme need.

Incidental to the President's Executive order declaring the bank holiday, he placed an embargo upon the export of gold, renewed later by Executive order.

The joint resolution which declared that obligations payable in gold "obstruct the power of the Congress to regulate the value of the money of the United States and are inconsistent with the declared policy of the Congress to maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States" was signed by the President on June 5.

It declares that every provision of every obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency to be against public policy and further declares that every obligation heretofore or hereafter incurred, regardless of whether any such provision is contained therein, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment is legal tender for public and private debts.

In other words, every dollar in coin or currency issued by the Government is given an equal value and is made legal tender for the payment of public and private debts.

Not all of these legislative acts are permanent changes in our Government, of course. So grave was the emergency and so acute was the distress at the time President Roosevelt took office, drastic and courageous action was imperative. It was with that thought in mind that the Congress acted promptly in providing for some pronounced alterations in the Federal Government. Some of the features of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, provisions of the Industrial Control Act, and the unemployment-relief measures are only temporary in their scope. It is hoped and expected that they will provide the necessary stimulus for industrial and agricultural recovery in the United States. Other phases of the legislative program of this Seventy-third Congress are permanent; and such measures as the Securities Act, the Muscle Shoals legislation, the banking law (Glass bill), and the modification of the Volstead Act to allow taxation of beer should prove of lasting benefit. It is hoped that all the legislation will prove effective as a stimulus of business activities. If what has been accomplished does bring the country back to normal and permanent prosperity, the cooperation of the majority of Republican Members of this body and House of Representatives must be acknowledged, as they have reciprocated for action by the Democrats in the past Congress.

SIGNS OF BUSINESS REVIVAL

No one who keeps in touch with the daily happenings as recorded by the press can fail to be impressed with the reports from time to time from various sections of the country that there is a decided improvement in business. In the first statement on business conditions by the present Secretary of Commerce, issued on April 26, it was set forth that general business activity had progressed steadily since the latter part of March. It was noted, however, that the statistics for the month of March revealed a general decline.

On the 3d of May, however, the Secretary of Commerce, in a statement on business conditions, called attention to the upward trend in commodity prices, pointing out that the unofficial index of wholesale prices reached the highest point of 1933 in the previous week.

Retail sales were sustained at relatively high levels in many parts of the country.

The improvements noted in a general way by the Department of Commerce on May 3 were more specifically set forth in the financial pages of the press as early as May 7. On that date it was shown that the carloadings for the previous week gained 42,706. An Associated Press dispatch from New York showed that the rise in the stock market during April added nearly $7,000,000,000 to the value of shares listed on the New York Stock Exchange, and that the average price per share of stock had risen from $15.41 to $20.73. It also showed that the markets had continued to gain during the first week in May.

One of the most encouraging signs of the first week of the same month was the reopening of 117 banks, as reported by the American Banker—the largest number of weekly resumptions since the end of March.

In the agricultural field, a much better livestock market was reported, at prices varying from 25 to 40 cents higher around the circuit. Hog prices gained 5 to 20 cents and sheep 10 to 50 cents, according to the individual market. There was an advance in the cotton market which carried the price of July contracts in New York to approximately an 8½-cent level, or about $11 a bale above the low price touched on the reaction of late last March.

Compared with the previous week, wheat on the Chicago market was 8½ cents a bushel higher, with a rise of 9 to 11 cents in rye, 7¾ to nearly 9 cents gain in corn, and provisions showing a rise from 32 to 57 cents.

Chicago on May 6 reported that the March cash income of farmers rose about 17 percent above the February low.

One of the early wage increases of recent date was attributed by the Associated Press on May 6 to Detroit, where the American Store Equipment Corporation announced an increase to about 400 employees of 10 percent. Detroit also reported on the same date that the automobile industry estimated a May output of about 200,000 units, which is 40 percent higher than the volume for May 1932.

New York reported that leather was up from 15 to 25 percent. There was a rise in tire prices for the first time in the year of 1933.

On May 8, following this encouraging news, a New York Stock Exchange firm announced a salary raise of 10 percent "in support of President Roosevelt's program to revive business and increase purchasing power." From Chicago on the same day the Cord Corporation announced a blanket increase of 5 percent to their employees in automobile plants and affiliated industries, affecting more than 10,000 individuals in 25 States.

One week later, on May 13, New York reported the greatest volume of business in recent years in cotton goods. For that same week the first gain in unfilled orders of the United States Steel Corporation since October 1932 was reported, with an increase in steel-ingot production to an estimated 31 to 33 percent of the country's capacity. Since then steel-ingot production has increased to more than 40 percent. For the same week, for the first time in nearly 3 years, electric-output consumption ran at a higher rate than in the previous year. As reported by the Edison Electric Institute, the gain for the week was 3,675,000 kilowatt-hour production. Automobile production for the week of May 13 was the highest weekly figure attained since the week of June 27, 1931. The output was estimated at 51,671 units.

In the lumber business the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association reported new business for the week amounting to 208,665,000 feet. Steel mills at Chicago jumped 28 to 30 percent, and the daily metal trade publication announced that the steel industry for the week was running at 33-percent capacity.

Dow Jones & Co.'s statistician estimated sometime ago that when the mills reached the 35-percent figure they would start doing their bookkeeping with black ink instead of red. For the week ending May 13 hogs reached the price of $4.80, establishing a new high since last September. Wheat in the Chicago market advanced to the level of 75 cents a bushel, or from 31⅛ to 32½ cents above the low point of the season.

On May 17 Secretary of the Treasury Woodin reported that frozen deposits in national banks which had not yet been licensed now total about $1,500,000,000 out of more than $17,000,000,000 of deposits when the national-bank holiday was proclaimed.

On May 22 the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation reported that bank reopenings had passed 125 a week and that the Corporation had received back about $500,000,000 of money loaned the banks, trust companies, and related institutions. He cited these and other facts as evidence that the Nation was recovering under the lead of President Roosevelt. As another sign of returned confidence in the fiscal affairs of the Government, the latest issue of a billion dollars in securities by the Treasury was reported on June 8 to be oversubscribed five times, despite the absence of the gold clause.

The increased industrial operation in business and the steady improvement in agricultural prices have been accompanied by increases in employment and in wages of workmen.

The following items are taken at random from the month of May reports in the daily press:

Steel mills at Gary reopened, calling back to work more than 3,000 men.

The pay roll of the Inland Steel Co. at Hammond, Ind., now shows 4,300 employees, estimated to take about 1,500 families off the local relief rolls as a result of newly created jobs.

The national plant of the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co. at Monessen, Pa., resumed 100-percent operation on May 22 with 1,600 men. The plant has been idle since March 15.

The Laughlin Tin Plant at Martins Ferry, Ohio, has advanced to 100-percent operation, adding 300 employees to the 1,200 previously employed.

Seven textile mills in eastern Massachusetts announced wage increases on May 20 to more than 30,000 employees. Some of the increases have been as high as 15 percent. Numerous manufacturing plants in Connecticut and Ohio, including the Remington Arms Co. at Bridgeport and the Goodyear and Firestone plants, have recalled many employees by reason of increased production.

The Pittsburgh Coal Co., in the latter part of May, announced a 10-percent increase of wages to 8,000 miners in 12 of the company's mines, including 1 Kentucky mine—the first upward revision in the company's wages since 1926. Other companies, employing from 1,000 to 1,200 men, also made a 10-percent increase in the wages of their miners.

Four hundred miners in the tri-State district lead and zinc mines in Oklahoma have received wage increases of 25 cents a day.

Four Rhode Island textile companies announced wage increases of from 10 to 12 percent in the latter part of May. Two of them employ 5,500 workers.

A 12½-percent wage increase was also announced by seven Maine cotton mills, affecting 5,000 employees.

Reopening of plant at the Universal Atlas Cement Co. in Indiana on June 1 put between 300 and 400 men back to work.

On the other side of the continent at Portland, Oreg., and Longview, Wash., a pay-roll increase of $150,000 a month in the Douglas fir plywood industry was given 6,000 workers, making their average wage 80 percent of the amount paid in predepression years.

On June 8 a 12-percent increase in wages was given the mine workers of two large Ohio steel companies, while a firebrick company announced wage advances for its 200 employees. At Youngstown, Ohio, the pay roll of industrial plants increased 50 percent in the month of May, according to a special dispatch to the New York Times.

The foregoing are only scattered items of news in the daily press and are only a part of those reported. They are used here merely for the purpose of showing that increases in employment and wages are not confined to any section or to any industry, and that they are made by small employers of labor as well as by the larger ones.

The steel industry is now operating at 50-percent capacity, according to the Iron Age, for the first time since April 1931. This is 15 percent above the dividing line between profit and loss. The last monthly report of the American Federation of Labor estimates that a total of 1,629,000 persons gained employment since the end of March.

The New York Times Weekly Index of Business Activity for the week ending June 10 indicates that the trend of business, as advanced for 12 consecutive weeks, registered a 45-percent gain since the low point in the week ending March 18.

May imports increased $18,588,300, according to the report of the Department of Commerce, the largest advance in any month since the beginning of the downward trend in 1929. This increase is credited to the general improved condition of domestic industry in the United States, requiring large quantities of foreign raw material. May exports increased by $8,781,000, due largely to increased shipments of cotton.

Miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes will show a gain over the last fiscal year of $350,000,000. At the present rate of receipts, they are estimated to amount to $1,500,000,000 annually.

The details of the rise in commodity prices since the inauguration of Franklin Roosevelt on March 4, together with a comparison of the prices on June 6, 1933, with June 7, 1932, are contained in the following table herewith appended:

BEHOLD THE NATION RISING TO LEADERSHIP!

No man of observant eye can fail to mark the change that has come over America in the past 3 months.

You can see it in the records which the trained business analyst follows: Commodity prices are surging up.

You can see it in advertising and in the stores where you go to buy: Retail prices already have made a slight rise.

You can see it in city after city where the wheels of industry are turning again: Men are marching back to work.

After 3 years in which business withered because prices were chiseled lower and lower—in which people feared to spend money and held back lest prices drop still lower—a new spirit of courage and confidence has started people buying!

This new spirit, this new courage, is born of a single cause—leadership. This new confidence, expressed in a reviving trade, is the direct result of vision, enterprise, competence concentrated upon a clearly understood task.

Just as surely as the men and women of America recognize and respond to national leadership, so do they react to leadership in the everyday things of life.

THE GREAT EMPLOYER

The Federal Government is fast preparing to do its share toward bringing employment to the unemployed. The plans for the operation of the public-works program, for which Congress has appropriated $3,300,000,000, are taking shape and already there has been an allotment of $400,000,000 to be used in highway development throughout the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories. In addition $135,000,000 has been allocated to be used for construction work at Army posts. Rules have been adopted relating to employment on highway construction. In the regulations provision is made for a 30-hour workweek, for a minimum wage, and for the use of human labor in place of machines "where consistent with sound economy." Preference must be given to former service men with dependents, to bona fide residents of the districts in which the work is carried on, and to residents of the States where the work is located, in the order named. The plan is designed to give the maximum employment at wages that are fair and capable of providing a living, and at the same time the problem of a national highway system is not overlooked. The funds for the road work will become available July 1.

The Government's public works program represents the contribution of the American people through their Government to the solution of the unemployment problem. It is a contribution by the public, because the bills for these public works, including both labor and material, must come out of the pockets of the people. There has been much argument regarding the efficacy of this attempted cure of unemployment. The time for argument has passed. The experiment is under way. The elected representatives of the people have decreed that a huge sum of money is to be expended for public works. That the experiment will be beneficial is necessarily the hope of the people.

[New York Times, June 1933]

The more convincing becomes the evidence that financial and industrial recovery is genuinely under way, the more one hears of divergent reasons for it. That a definite turn has come, the customary indices without exception testify. Activities of textile mills in May were the largest of any month since October 1929. Freight loaded for distribution by the railways, which since 1929 had at no time until last month equaled the loadings for the corresponding period a year before, has thus far in June exceeded 1932 by 193,200 cars, or 13 percent. The country's steel production, now at the year's highest to date, has considerably more than doubled itself since March—a period usually marked by decreasing output. Business insolvencies, compiled for May in the whole United States, were numerically the smallest of any month in 4 years. The rise of average prices, doubtless both effect and cause of the trade recovery, is computed by the conservative Labor Bureau statisticians to have been more than 2 percent since the opening of March.

[From the Washington Star, June 1933]

The rise in wholesale prices at this time is encouraging to everybody as indicating an upturn in business, but for the farmer it is spreading happiness and joy. For every time the wholesale price level rises, the level of agricultural prices rises much faster, while the prices paid by farmers for commodities which enter their cost of living lag behind. Thus, a gain in agricultural prices is a gain in more ways than one for the farmer.

What has happened this year can be understood by the following comparisons in price indexes:

	Prices of farm products	Wholesale prices	Prices paid by farmers for commodities bought
January	51	61	104
February	49	60	102
March	50	60.2	101
April	53	60.4	100
May	62	62.7	100

As it is seen, since the beginning of the year the prices received by the farmers for the commodities they sell have gained 11 points, wholesale prices have gained almost 2 points, while the farmer's costs have fallen by 4 points. In other words, he is receiving more money for his products, but what he buys is cheaper. That is clear gain for him in the purchasing power of his dollars.

Today wholesale prices have risen since the end of May to 64.5, and the rise in agricultural prices has been even greater. The process of what happened to the farmer when wholesale and agricultural prices began their fearful slump in 1925 is being reversed today. From 1925 until the end of 1932 the prices received by the farmers for the commodities they sold decreased by 90 points, while the prices paid by the farmers decreased by only 59 points.

CAPPER FORECASTS STEADY BETTERMENT—MORE EMPLOYMENT AND BETTER PAY SHOULD RESULT FROM HIGHER PRICES, HE SAYS

A steady improvement in economic conditions during the next few months was predicted last night by Senator CAPPER, Republican, of Kansas, who said: "Commodity prices should continue to improve, making possible more employment and at better wages."

"Commodity prices are on the rise", said the Kansan. "Stock-market levels are higher and promise to go still higher. There will be recessions in both, some of them sharp. But the tendency is upward, and that means increased employment and more purchasing power.

"So far as the Farm Belt is concerned, things are on the upgrade again. The farm-mortgage relief sections of the Agricultural Adjustment Act are operating to relieve the farm-mortgage situation. Coupled with local tax reductions, which are very general and noticeable throughout most of the Farm Belt, the Government aid to agriculture, through mortgage relief and through increased returns for agriculture through inflation, through better employment conditions, through the price-raising features of the Farm Act, are bound to increase the purchasing power in the Farm Belt."

THE LITERARY DIGEST IS RECORDING THE REBIRTH OF A NATION

With new vision and new leadership a Nation dormant and discouraged suddenly comes to life. Inspired by the courage and driving force of a new leader optimism flares overnight. A great populace, too long idle and despondent, becomes busy, active, happy again. Since President Roosevelt delivered his inaugural nearly 2,000,000 men have gone back to work. News, big news, epoch-making news flashes over the wires. History—vital and significant—is in the making.

GAINS IN BUSINESS REVEALED AS COVERING ENTIRE NATION

NEW YORK (A.P.)—Business gains throughout the country in the last 2 months are characterized as "decisive" by the New York Board of Trade.

It made public yesterday the results of a survey garnered from chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and other organizations in more than 100 cities.

As a result the board says: "Using every index by which business is measured, the replies indicate substantial progress generally throughout the entire country."

Percy C. Magnus, president of the board, commented: "Upon reading the reports that have reached us * * * the conclusion is inescapable that the depression is over and that we are well on the road to recovery. The 4 months of March, April, May, and June witnessed economic changes of colossal proportions."

The survey showed improvement in employment, working hours, wages, and volume of sales.

SILVER IN THE MONETARY SYSTEM

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an open letter addressed to President Roosevelt by the Spokane branch of the American Monetary Reform Association, and also a letter from Mr. D. F. Guinan, president of the Merchants Banking Trust Co., of Mahanoy City, Pa., on the subject of the use of silver in the monetary system.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

SPOKANE BRANCH OF THE AMERICAN MONETARY REFORM ASSOCIATION,
Spokane, Wash., March 27, 1933.

HON. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Chief Executive of United States of America,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Pardon us for intruding upon your valuable time, but we are prompted by a spirit of patriotism, national pride, and the trend of public sentiment to invite your attention to a few statements and authorities relating to the silver question.

While the facts hereinafter set forth are matters of record, doubtless many Members of both branches of Congress are not familiar with the history of the important subject of silver and its relation to universal human needs, for the reason they may not have had access to the information herewith respectfully submitted, in substance as follows:

DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER

In the House of Representatives, February 10, 1873: See Appendix to the Congressional Globe, part 3, Forty-second Congress, third section, CXXXI, an act revising and amending laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States, pages 236 to 240, both inclusive. Section 15 states that the silver dollar shall be legal tender up to $5 for any one payment. (After this bill had passed the House it was surreptitiously changed and never read before its final passage in the Senate. Thus the forgery and fraud.)

Also, in the Senate, February 12, 1873: Congressional Globe, part 2, Forty-second Congress, third session, page 1280, top of third column. (This was the date of the final passage of the bill in the Senate demonetizing silver.)

For more complete details of this revolting crime we refer you to A Call to Action, by J. B. Weaver, 1892. Read especially pages 319, 320, and 321. This book contains 446 pages and is a thorough treatise of the destruction of silver in our monetary system. See also quotations from Senator Jones on pages 300–301 and 322–323. Book should be found in public library.

Crime of 1873, by former United States Senator Charles S. Thomas, of Colorado; republished in Spokane Mining Truth, December 1 and 15, 1932. (15 cents per copy.) Rothschilds led the first assault for the demonetization of silver.

Special attention is called to the Bankers' Magazine of August 1873, stating that $500,000 of foreign money was used to bribe Senators and Congressmen who aided in demonetizing silver. (Excerpt found in the Weaver book.)

Imperial Washington, by the late United States Senator R. F. Pettigrew, whose 50 years in public life is told in this book. It deals clearly with the silver question. Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago. $1.25.

Senator WHEELER's speech in Congress January 25, 1933, covers the question quite completely. All should study the facts therein given.

To further emphasize the importance of remonetizing silver—as provided in the Wheeler bill—a few excerpts are quoted from Bulletin 80, Money and the World Crisis, by H. S. Denny, C.B.S., 1931. We quote:

"The bimetallic unit basis is a dual standard in one sense and single in another, designed to suit the needs of the rich and the poor, individually and collectively.

"Remonetization of silver for currency purposes alone would immediately absorb all floating supplies and there is more danger of a famine than a flood.

"Remonetization of silver is an act of just restitution. Myriads of humble people have had their life insurance gratuitously and drastically cut down by the imposition of the gold standard and accompanying degradation of silver.

"Finally, the world has to have more metallic money than present gold reserves represent, and the quickest, fairest, and most effective method of meeting the demand is reformation of the existing currency condition."

(Mr. Denny is a mining engineer of world-wide experience and a well-known technical writer. Bulletin No. 80 can be had from Hon. Charles McCrea, minister of mines, Toronto, Canada.)

B. C. Forbes, recognized financial authority, says:

"If every gold dollar in the United States were tendered in payment for taxes, the bill would not be one third settled. If all the paper currency in circulation throughout the country were added to all the gold we would still owe the tax-collector as much more again—and more."

If still in doubt of the justice and necessity of restoring silver to its former place with gold, write to Judge James H. Teller (35 cents), Denver, Colo., for a copy of "Money: The Silver Question and Bimetallism."

The populace of all nations are pleading for a standard of money with full debt-paying power, and would follow if the United States would take the lead and restore silver, but they have been cowed and dominated by the international bankers and money changers and are only waiting for a leader.

Credit inflation and managed currency (paper) are fundamentally unsound and uncontrollable, and is the most dangerous inflation that any government can indulge in. Currency based upon metallic inflation is a permanent inflation by reason of the fact it is limited by nature.

The dastardly crime of demonetizing silver in 1873 was accomplished without the knowledge of the American people and without the approval of either the Republican or Democratic Party or any other political organization—which fraudulent legislation was contrary to the sound, patriotic principles upon which this great Republic was founded.

According to Congressman William D. Kelly, the bill which brought about the demonetization of silver originated with the Treasury Department, and the Congressional Globe reveals that Congressman Samuel Hooper, of Massachusetts, was the "key" man in the House and that John Sherman, of Ohio, was the arch traitor in the Senate, and with their insensible connivance, working in conjunction with one Ernest Seyd, representative of the international bankers and Bank of England, committed this revolting crime of demonetizing silver and at the same time set up the single gold standard in the United States in lieu of the bimetallic system—thus destroying more than half of the wealth of the nations of the world, which merciless destruction is responsible for the ruin of American homes, American industries, and innumerable private business enterprises and commercial undertakings. The ruinous effect of this brutal system and reprehensible policy have been more disastrous than the World War, which internecine conflict was the outgrowth of an avaricious greed for gold by the money changers.

Between 1870 and 1876 all nations of Europe that were not already on the gold standard, demonetized silver and adopted the single gold standard—followed by bankruptcy, crime, destitution, and untold misery, a condition similar to that of the present but not so intense and far-reaching.

It is passingly strange that so few persons in public life associate our damnably corrupt monetary system with the crisis that is crushing civilization out of existence, as evidenced by the utter collapse of almost every undertaking, whether in civic circles, commercial pursuits, religious movements, or social activities. It is only now and then one will find a man who has the courage to strike at the root of the evil that is responsible for the chaotic condition with which the whole world has been cursed for the past 3 or 4 years.

In this connection it is well to take note of this indisputable fact—a fact upon which all economists of recognized authority agree—that the price of silver governs the price of all commodities and the price of labor. Therefore, serious thought should be given to the almost incredible and astounding truth that four London brokers, affiliated with bankers in New York City, Shanghai, China, and Bombay, India, fix the price of silver daily. This statement is made on the authority of Herbert M. Bratter, of the United States Department of Commerce, in an article in the Denver Mining Record, January 28, 1933. So long as these international bankers and brokers control the price-fixing of silver they can bring on an economic war at will, causing bankruptcy and the destruction of property values of every kind and character, followed by crime, distress, and poverty. Or they can create artificial prosperity for the sole purpose of growing another "flock of lambs to fleece", as has been done in regular periodical cycles for more than 50 years. It must be remembered that when the price of silver was fixed at 30 cents, the price of wheat sought the same low level, as did other commodities. Wheat at 30 cents per bushel is at least 50 cents below cost of production, and when the prosperity of the farmer is destroyed, all other undertakings are correspondingly affected. The victims of depression's ruthless war are reflected by hundreds of thousands of farmers losing their farms, and city folks losing their homes, adding millions to the ranks of the unemployed and forcing thousands into the breadlines.

This indefensible system of price-fixing of silver by a small coterie of foreign brokers and international bankers is sent broadcast daily by way of controlled news agencies and a subsidized press. This criminal conspiracy is, therefore, responsible for the economic war which encircles the globe, robbing its inhabitants of their wealth, driving them from their homes and even depriving them of the right of existence. Nations are devastated, their potential resources placed in jeopardy, and the morale of the people sadly demoralized—all for the benefit of a band of legalized pirates who control the gold.

At this point it is pertinent to quote from an alleged secret document written over 30 years ago and later published, purporting to have had its origin in close proximity to the international bankers, to wit: "All wheels of state mechanism are set in motion by power, which is in our hands, that is to say, gold."

From earliest history silver has been used as money, and long before gold was adopted as coinage, silver was in use all over the world, and, as money, has served countless myriads who never possessed a gold coin. Long before the Roman Empire became the mistress of the civilized world the par value of silver and gold was stabilized by custom or conviction at 12 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold. For many centuries the ratio established by custom was between 12½ and 14½ to 1, this ratio being based upon the relative production of the two metals. The average for the period of 438 years, dating from 1493, is 14.5 ounces of silver to 1 of gold. For hundreds of years, therefore, the price ratio of silver to gold was approximately 14½ to 1, the average price up to 1873, when silver was demonetized, being a little over $1.40. From 1833 to 1873, however, the price fluctuated from $1.30 to $1.36.

The facts stated in the first foregoing paragraph should make it clear to the average citizen that the single gold standard does not furnish an adequate supply of legal-tender money, with full debt-paying power, to meet the enormous obligations imposed upon the yellow metal to carry on the commerce of the world. Over 10,000,000 men tramping the highways seeking employment to support themselves and families is a warning that when you "impoverish labor you imperil the whole structure of society."

Accepting available statistics as reliable, the aggregate of silver coins in circulation over all the world is but $4,000,000,000 which if added to the $11,000,000,000 of gold in existence, will not pay even one half of the annual interest charge on the world's indebtedness of $750,000,000,000 gold-bearing bonds. The interest at 5 percent on this debt amounts to $37,500,000,000 annually, more than three times all the gold in the world for monetary use. The ratio between this debt, payable in gold, and the $11,000,000,000 of gold in coin, is approximately 75 to 1. This is an object lesson that should warn financiers, bankers (Jew or Gentile), and lawmakers and high officials that the single gold standard is a menace to humanity, and that unsettled conditions, the strife and struggle for existence, that chaos and turmoil will continue throughout the world so long as gold is buried beneath the burden of debt—the interest upon which can never be paid, to say nothing of the principal.

Witness Arthur Brisbane: "If all the gold mines in the world shipped every ounce of their production, it would take 34 years to meet America's tax charges for 12 months."

Mark Sullivan, the well-known political commentator, wrote under date of May 23, 1931: "I gather that you regard the currency question, that is, gold and silver, as the most fundamental. I may tell you that I receive an immense number of letters taking the same view."

Bimetallism is the most direct cure for our financial ills, and it is incumbent upon the United States to take the lead in this movement. This is a creditor Nation, and not only has the right but has the power to restore silver to its rightful place in our monetary system, which can be done with the Wheeler bill, no. 2487, now pending before Congress. It provides for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. No substitute will meet the necessity of the hour. The adoption of this bill would permanently fix the price at $1.29 or thereabouts, which price would correspondingly affect the price of wheat, consequently making a market for the farmer for his wheat crop at a profitable price. The Wheeler bill adopted would destroy the nefarious business of the foreign brokers who gamble with the welfare and lives of 2,000,000,000 people who are at the mercy of these international sharks.

It is absurd and illogical to waste time and money for holding an international conference with these bankrupt debtor nations with the cards stacked against us. Judging from past experience nothing whatever will be accomplished toward restoring silver to its former place in our monetary system. The only way that silver will ever be rehabilitated will come through the action of Congress of the United States. The sooner this fact is recognized and acted upon, the sooner this Government will get on a sound financial footing and start on the highway of prosperity. No one piece of legislation will return more men to work than the passage of the Wheeler bill. Every industry and every trade channel will readily respond to the beneficial effects of the adoption of this 16-to-1 silver measure.

Scarcely a nation on earth has any silver to spare if silver was remonetized, and in proof of this statement we quote Senator PITTMAN, who was reported by the Associated Press on March 10: "If you are going to expand the currency, there is a limit to silver expansion, as there are only 12,000,000,000 ounces in the world; which could be made to provide $15,000,000,000 in sound metallic currency, ready to circulate."

Should the passage of the Wheeler bill fail (but we are not conceding that it will), the act of February 12, 1873, demonetizing silver through the device of bribery, forgery, and fraud, should be set aside by the Supreme Court of the United States. Surely the statutes of limitation do not run against a crime which has been the primary cause of bankrupting the Government of the United States of America as well as millions of her patriotic citizens. It is never too late to right a wrong. It is time to act.

There appears to be a custom for Senators and Congressmen to leave their seats and retire to cloakrooms when a Member is speaking upon some measure, and even refraining from voting. This custom should be abolished. The public is heavily taxed to carry on the Nation's business, and when Members of either House are found absenting themselves from their seats during a session they should be held accountable to their constituents for this dereliction of duty—and left at home permanently.

When any metal is coined into money it ceases to be a commodity, and when changed back into a commodity it ceases to be money.

Only a sovereign power can create money, and nothing is money upon which the law does not confer the compulsatory power of paying debt.

An increase or decrease of money in circulation will cause a change in the level of prices.

The volume of money in circulation fixes the price of commodities and the wages of workers.

Increasing the volume of money increases the prices of commodities and the wages of workers.

Decreasing the volume of money decreases the prices of commodities and the wages of workers.

Increased prices of wages results in increased production and employment.

Decreased prices of wages results in decreased production and employment.

The employed consume the product of the farm and products of the factory, creating prosperity.

Unemployment causes business depression, poverty, bankruptcy, crime, suffering, and general destruction.

Respectfully submitted,

MERCHANTS BANKING TRUST CO.,
Mahanoy City, Pa., June 15, 1933.

DEAR STOCKHOLDER: Your board of directors has resolved to "pass the dividend", owing to the diminished income arising from the nonpayment of interest on loans and default on bonds. The cause of the loss of income is Nation-wide. The fault is with the country, not with the banks.

Men are not working; they are not able to pay rent, so that the property owner can get money to pay interest. Congress alone can pull the country out of the depression.

For some few years deflationary measures were going on, contracting bank credit and currency. The currencies of foreign countries became depreciated in comparison to the gold dollar and thus it required more foreign money to buy goods in America. They couldn't buy. We did not sell. We lost trade; scarcity of foreign exchange was the cause. Our 12 Federal Reserve banks contracted bank credit by refusal to rediscount some nonliquid notes. Here are some figures to show deflation while the cry for inflation comes up from farmers, workers, and others suffering from low wages and low commodity prices:

Total rediscounts held by all Federal Reserve banks:

March 1, 1933	$712,391,000
May 3, 1933	400,102,000

There is no hope of industrial recovery until every deflationist is removed and the policy of inflation carried quickly into effect. There should be an abundant increase in the quantity of currency and bank credit to start the wheels of industry and insure permanent and lasting prosperity.

The free coinage of silver, as proposed in the Senator Wheeler bill, the issuance of paper money instead of bonds as proposed by Senator MCADOO, the issuance of more paper money as proposed by Senator ELMER THOMAS. Each and all are the needs of the hour. Price-fixing and other childish measures will be unnecessary when the high flood of inflation is started. Nothing else can put men to work; nothing else can hold up wages, earnings, and commodity prices.

Seasonal and spasmodic starts of industry do not mean anything. They may hold out false hopes of "things picking up" and the threat of inflation may lead the man with money to speculate on stocks or commodities.

The writer will stake his reputation as a prophet and assert there is nothing yet done to keep up prices, and they can't stay up without abundant inflation of currency and bank credit.

Our good President has the confidence of the people, but he has not yet done anything for inflation of currency or bank credit. There is no hope of revival of industry until the President or Congress gives the country the full measures of inflation.

The resourcefulness of the then Secretary of the Treasury, MCADOO, and his inflationary measures put the country going at high gear during the World War. Such resourcefulness is needed now. Waiting for international conferences to determine measures for inflation shows lack of sincerity or lack of knowledge.

Every stockholder, every depositor of banks should join in urging Congress to make mandatory the inflationary measures left to the discretion of the President. Notwithstanding misleading reports to the contrary, the Ship of State is drifting on the Niagara and will soon be in the current of the rapids. The reverse movement must come at once.

D. F. GUINAN, President.

FLAG DAY

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Flag Day address of Watson B. Miller, chairman national rehabilitation committee, American Legion, made in Washington, D.C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My comrades and fellow Americans, more than a century and a half ago our forefathers ordained for us the emblem of all that we are, all that we ever hope to be—the Stars and Stripes, radiant symbol of our indissoluble Union. Down through the years generation after generation has looked to that Star-Spangled Banner, in disaster and in peace, and found there the inspiration to carry them resolutely forward to the building of a nation of free men and women that has no equal in all history.

Today that flag waves as gallantly as it did 156 years ago, unstained, undefeated—unfailing beacon of hope and confidence for all civilization in this night of depression which has engulfed all the world. And as the harbingers of dawn now begin to put the shadows of night to flight, giving promise of a new and better day, with what portent these immortal words of Francis Scott Key come back to us:

"What is that which the breeze, o'er the towering steep,
As it fitfully blows, now conceals, now discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,
In full glory reflected now shines on the stream;
'Tis the Star-Spangled Banner; O long may it wave
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave!"

It was on June 14, 1777, that Congress formally proclaimed the Stars and Stripes our national emblem. No man in that troubled little group could place what was said and done that day into the frame of the world today. Our forefathers then were fighting for political freedom. Today that liberty has become the accepted and least-disputed possession of the men and women of this country. That battle is won. Today we are struggling instead to untangle hindrances to economic opportunity, the freedom to earn and live and work.

The high hours of the world are those in which its leaders convert the world's dreams into action and, doing so, risk disaster. It is easy to preach things when there is no risk involved. And mere daring without a principle at stake is soon forgotten. The union of the two—a great ideal and a great risk—set the bugles echoing for centuries. Such was the Declaration of Independence, the emancipation proclamation, and the hour we entered the World War. The issues were different, but in each case the world was formulating a dream, crystallizing into deeds a sentiment hereto unfaced.

But this is merely looking backward. From the past we may take our inspiration; but our flag, the emblem of our country, commands us to lift our eyes and look forward. It carries now and for all time a meaning which the changes of time, the dimming of remembrance cannot alter.

The world is hungry now as it was in the days of the Reformation, of the American Revolution, of the World War for leadership. It is now, as it was then, clouded with problems and distress. It is ready to reward now, as it rewarded then, leaders who can convert ideals to action and face the consequences of such courage. The world does not forget courage that can shoulder failure and criticism in order to advance a little further the common dreams and purposes of all mankind.

My comrades and fellow Americans, I believe the world is beginning to find that leadership. I believe all of us can see the first soft glow of a new and better dawn rising over the horizon. Let us, on this one hundred and fifty-sixth anniversary of the birth of our flag, raise our eyes to its starry field and consecrate ourselves anew to perpetuate the principles and ideals of our country, to give our every ounce of energy to bring a new era of peace and plenty to our own land and all the world.

As I lift my eyes to the Stars and Stripes I seem to hear a murmur of voices. Whether it is the hum of the crowd outside the door or the dry lips of our distinguished forefathers speaking to us from the sacred pages of colonial parchments, the meaning is always the same.

Learn then that America may not persist only in virtue of the fact that it is the greatest national entity on earth, no matter how virtuous that genesis may be. Know that it may not exist upon its own vitals. Know that we must gain and maintain the respect of the world. Know that we must promote peace without sacrificing those safeguards which a fair knowledge of human frailties demands. Discourage the efforts of those misguided ones who would break down those laws by which we have thriven and who would lead us through somnolence to disorder and chaos. Again, the generation to which we here belong have seen sights in the glory of pristine morning and in the flame of sunset which we would to God will be spared your eyes. Out of the fullness of experience we choose to tell you that every orphan succored, every lonely mother comforted, every good inspiration handed to your comrade, every physical pain alleviated, every mental discomfort made serene, every unfortunate soul helped toward rationality and independence, every flagging spirit revived, every unpretentious gesture of decency, every act of civic righteousness—these, several and all and more, are the influences which will give coherent utterance to the tenderness and goodness which lie in the hearts of every one of you. These modest manifestoes will be your contributions to the growing greatness of this Republic. It will be your acts as individuals and groups which will keep that flag aloft, not as a spectacular banner but as a solemn symbol of a people great in the love of man and magnificent in the fear and love of God.

LETTER OF APPRECIATION FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, when the end of the session approaches, it is customary to appoint a special committee to communicate with the President and ascertain whether he has any further message to send to the Congress. In view of the lateness of the hour, the President waives that communication and authorizes me to state that he has no further message save that which is upon the Vice President's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 15, 1933.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Before the adjournment of the special session I want to convey to you and to the Members of the Senate an expression of my thanks for making possible, on the broad average, a more sincere and more wholehearted cooperation between the legislative and the executive branches of the United States Government than has been witnessed by the American people in many a long year.

This spirit of teamwork has in most cases transcended party lines. It has taken cognizance of a crisis in the affairs of our Nation and of the world. It has grasped the need for a new approach to problems both new and old. It has proved that our form of government can rise to an emergency and can carry through a broad program in record time.

I am certain that the American people are appreciative of the work of this special session of the Seventy-third Congress.

Please let me add that the past few months have given to me very special pleasure in the renewal of old friendships and the forming of new friendships among the Members of the Senate. To each and every one of you I send my best wishes for a well-deserved and happy holiday during the coming months.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution coming over from the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H.Con.Res. 24) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on Friday, the 16th day of June 1933, and that when they adjourn on said day they stand adjourned sine die.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the concurrent resolution is agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move, in accordance with the terms of Concurrent Resolution 24, that the Senate do now adjourn sine die.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes a.m., Friday, June 16, 1933) the Senate adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 1933

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 14, 1933)

The House met at 10 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair. I want to make this statement to the membership: It is expected that the House will be called back not before 1 o'clock and not later than 1:30. I also want to say this: The Democrats will have a conference on this floor within 15 minutes, and I hope that all Democratic Members will stay here.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I beg the pardon of the House for being a half minute late, but I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee what is the program?

Mr. BYRNS. The program is that some of the Democrats wish to have a conference relative to this measure that is pending before the House. The idea is to have a conference within 15 minutes on the floor of the House, so that Democrats who wish to may discuss it. I have moved that the House take a recess at the call of the Chair, not to be reconvened before 1 o'clock, and not later than 1:30. The Chair will give 15 minutes' notice by the ringing of the bells.

The motion of Mr. BYRNS was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 5 minutes a.m.) the House stood in recess at the call of the Chair.

AFTER THE RECESS

The recess having expired, at 2 o'clock the House was called to order by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 3344. An act to amend section 14, subdivision 3, of the Federal Farm Loan Act; and

H.R. 5909. An act to transfer Bedford County from the Nashville division to the Winchester division of the middle Tennessee judicial district.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H.R. 6034, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes;" and that the Senate agrees to House amendment to Senate amendment no. 2 to said bill.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.J.Res. 63. Joint resolution temporarily suspending section 18 and portions of section 2 of the Executive order of June 10, 1933, relating to the organization of executive agencies.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H.R. 5389, the independent offices appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the conference report.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I have in my hand a letter from the Public Printer declining to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some of my remarks. The Speaker pro tempore yesterday ruled as follows:

> The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule that the gentleman from New York under a previous order of the House has that permission.

I asked for extra permission, if it be necessary, in order to include two speeches. I still have that permission, according to the ruling of the Chair, and I should like the Speaker to rule, so that this can go into the RECORD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understood the gentleman to rise to a question of personal privilege. Is that correct?

Mr. FISH. It is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order that the matter stated is not a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

grees of hazard in various types of flying duty and make different rates of extra pay applicable thereto."

And the Senate agree to the same.

C. A. WOODRUM,
JOHN J. BOYLAN,
W. W. HASTINGS,
J. P. BUCHANAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. I want to know if I have not the right under the general leave to print my own remarks to incorporate in the RECORD a speech made by me entitled "Republican Viewpoint of the Economic Conference"?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the leave granted, and he is so advised, any Member can insert his own remarks, but to print anything else he has to have the consent of the House.

Mr. GOSS rose.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GOSS. But I am ready to make the point of order that I reserved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GOSS. I make the point of order against the report of the conferees in respect to the language contained in Senate amendment numbered 36, which in the bill as it passed the House was numbered section 10. As the bill left the House, it contained the following language:

SEC. 10. The President is authorized to place on furlough such officers of the Army, Marine Corps, Public Health Service, Coast Guard, or Coast and Geodetic Survey as he, in his discretion, shall deem desirable. While on furlough, officers shall receive one half the pay to which they would otherwise have been entitled, but shall not be entitled to any allowance except for travel to their homes.

The Senate inserted the following language as an amendment to the House bill:

SEC. 10. That under the provisions of section 20 of the act approved June 10, 1922, as amended (U.S.C., title 37, sec. 29), no additional compensation shall be allowable or paid to any person in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or Army Reserve Corps, or National Guard, or the Naval Reserve, or Marine Corps Reserve, or the Coast Guard in consequence of such statute as amended at a rate per annum in excess of the maximum prescribed for a lieutenant colonel in the Army.

The conferees, according to the report, have agreed to the following language, as found on page 2 of the report:

SEC. 10. The President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend the extra pay or reduce the rate of extra pay allowed to commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard while on flying duty, and to distinguish between degrees of hazard in various types of flying duty and make different rates of extra pay applicable thereto.

The language has been changed, and I make the point of order that the conferees have exceeded their authority in bringing back the amendment which they have agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late.

Mr. GOSS. Oh, I reserved the point of order on this when the gentleman asked unanimous consent to read the statement in lieu of the report.

Mr. BLANTON. O Mr. Speaker, the language agreed upon by the conferees is entirely in order.

Mr. GOSS. I prefer to have the Speaker make the ruling instead of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I submit the matter to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The point of order is overruled. The Chair thinks the conferees have not exceeded their authority.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of anything controversial in the conference report which has been agreed to, to which the conferees have presented the full agreement. Unless there is some particular question to be asked about it, I am disposed to move the previous question.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. With reference to the voluntary optional retirement.

Mr. WOODRUM. The section relating to retirement is reported in the conference report exactly as it left the House. The Senate added the word "voluntary", which gave the employee the right to retire after 30 years' service. The conferees struck out the word "voluntary."

Mr. KELLER. With what effect?

Mr. WOODRUM. It gives the President the right, in his discretion, to place on retirement any employee who has had 30 years' service in the Government.

Mr. SNELL. As I have looked over the general conference report, there are no controversial matters in it?

Mr. WOODRUM. There is nothing controversial in it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to be heard on amendment number 7, which seems to be in disagreement.

Mr. WOODRUM. We will come to that later. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 7: Page 44, line 6, strike out "$85,273,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$86,273,000: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000,000 of this amount may be used for payments to State institutions caring for and maintaining veterans suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments, when found to be to the best interest of the United States."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$85,773,000: Provided, That when found to be to the best interest of the United States, not to exceed $500,000 of this amount may be used for payments to State institutions caring for and maintaining veterans suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments who are in such institutions on the date of the enactment of this act."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the congressional district in Illinois that has sent the distinguished Speaker of this House to Congress has a hospital for mentals—all sorts of people who are affected and who are commonly styled as lunatics. Among the thousands who are located there at the present time are 1,050 war veterans, who somehow have had that little slender cord that binds the present to the past and the present to the future torn away as a result of war service. They are the men for whom no armistice will ever be signed. If you could go to that hospital and see them looking vacuously into the distance, and know that until death shall write the final word for them the war will never have ended; when you realize that the whistles which blow and the bells that ring on Armistice Day will never be meant for them, I am sure you would vote to reinstate the amount of money to be spent for those men.

The State institutions have built up a therapeutic treatment for those veterans. There they make dolls and toys and rugs and all that sort of thing. Under existing conditions the Government of the United States pays to those hospitals a certain amount for every veteran who is there incarcerated. If we do not make adequate provision for them, we will ultimately take the 1,050 mentals away to a Veterans' Bureau hospital in northern Illinois, and the only thing they can do there is to sit behind a window that is barred from the outside and look vacuously into the distance, and there rot away in the agony and distress that was occasioned through service to democracy and to the flag and to the country.

I ask you Members of the House, is it not the fair thing to do to leave the $1,000,000 appropriation in that bill instead of cutting it to $500,000, so that the boys who are there now, and as I say, for whom no armistice will ever be signed, will have the right kind of therapeutic treatment? It is discretionary, in a sense, because there is a saving clause that it must be in the interest and welfare of the United States of America. I say to the Membership of this House that $1,000,000 is certainly not too much for the shell-shockers, for the boys who rushed in at Chateau-Thierry, Saint Mihiel, and the Argonne, and who, because of the intense concussion of the 220- and 240-millimeter shells, had that little slender cord torn away that has robbed them of lucidity. I am asking the membership of this House to vote down the conferee's recommendation to cut that appropriation from $1,000,000 to $500,000, because it will be a sorry and a tragic day when you have to go back to your districts and say that after all the millions and billions which this Congress has spent, we have not got a single million dollars left over for the boys who paid the supreme sacrifice by giving up the most precious of all gifts—a sound mind—for the cause of democracy. I hope that this body will retain the $1,000,000 appropriation for the shell-shocked and the mentals in the hospitals of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Is not the gentleman also concerned about the limitation of time? The patients in these neuropsychiatric hospitals must be there at the date of the enactment of this act. That is something new. If we had realized it in time, I think a point of order could have been lodged against that limitation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I believe that as far as the money is available, the Veterans' Bureau can pay under existing contracts that are now obtaining with the various States where these hospitals are located.

Mr. KVALE. If the gentleman will permit, I have in mind veterans now being juggled about and transferred and who might not be in State institutions at the time this law is enacted.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Like everything else, we will have to be partially dependent upon the charity and mercy of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the language of this amendment, it is not necessary to spend the $1,000,000 unless it is necessary?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Precisely.

Mr. DOWELL. And if it is not, certainly those men should not be denied the little amount that is appropriated in this amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Right.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, there is no difference of opinion among any of us as to the obligation of the Government to care for these men who are mentally ill, nor does the reduction or limitation placed in this amendment indicate any such purpose or intention. This amendment was placed in the bill in the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, our former colleague, Mr. Dieterich, and it was placed there after he called attention to the fact that Illinois, as well as several other States, had incurred quite a great deal of expense in providing and equipping very fine neuropsychiatric institutions.

May I call your attention to the fact that the Federal Government has—the Veterans' Administration has—neuropsychiatric institutions second to none in the world? There is one in Perry Point. There are others in various parts of the country; and under the terms of the Economy Act it was thought wise and economical to treat Veterans' Administration patients, as far as they might be able to treat them, in Veterans' Administration institutions and not go to State institutions or to private institutions and pay them high rates to treat patients when the Government already had facilities provided for such cases.

After it was called to the attention of the conferees that perhaps there were a few places where veterans have already been placed in these State institutions with their cases under treatment by specialists of those particular institutions, that perhaps it would not be for their welfare to move them into new environments and put them under the care of strange physicians, we put in here the amendment that the distinguished Senator who introduced it thinks is sufficient to care for all needed cases in State institutions where they are there at the present time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts and Mr. DOWELL rose.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield first to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think also there is not a single vacant bed for nervous or mental cases in any of the N.P. veterans' hospitals. Am I not right?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that a great many of these mental cases are not now permitted in the Federal hospitals because there are no beds in those hospitals?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think that is true, I may say to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. I may say to the gentleman my information is—and I think I have it pretty correctly—that there are not beds sufficient in these hospitals to accommodate those who ought to be hospitalized.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. At the time this amendment was inserted on the Senate side there was a committee in a semi-official capacity representing the State of Illinois here in Washington, and while the definite amount that might be necessary is a matter of conjecture, it may run to a considerable amount. The $500,000 that the committee carries may never be fully expended. On the other hand, if the expense exceeds $500,000 and the money is not available, then these men who are receiving good therapeutic treatment will simply be relegated to the regional hospitals, where no such treatment at the present time is available. Mr. Hiller, who is an assistant to General Hines, told me that manifestly veterans in State hospitals would not receive the same kind of treatment in the regional hospitals at the present time.

Therefore it seems the money should be appropriated. It may never be expended, but I am anxious to see there is a sufficient amount appropriated that none of these veterans will be left in distress. Therefore I do not believe $1,000,000 is too much.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat to the gentleman from Illinois that after conferring with the Senator who introduced this amendment, and telling him of the action of the conferees, he was satisfied. We will be back here next January, and if it develops that more funds are needed they can be appropriated then. The gentleman knows it is not the policy of Congress to appropriate money that is not presently needed or for which there is not some indication that it will be needed.

It is the view of the Veterans' Administration that this amount of money will be amply sufficient to take care of all cases that may be put in a State institution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. When we appropriated the $150,000,000 necessary for the Glass-Steagall bill the point was made during the discussion that we did not need all the money and that we would be back here in January, yet the entire amount was written into the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. And did we not, also, in the House, appropriate over $3,000,000,000 that everyone knows cannot be used by January 1?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to concur with an amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 10: On page 47, after line 14, insert "Provided further, That in addition to the pensions provided in this title the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized under such limitations as may be prescribed by the President, and within the limits of existing Veterans' Administration facilities, to furnish to men discharged from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty and to veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, domiciliary care where they are suffering with permanent disabilities, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric ailments and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment no. 10 and concur in the same with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by such amendment insert the following: " Provided further, That section 6, title I, of the act entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government', approved March 20, 1933, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 6. In addition to the pensions provided in this title the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized under such limitations as may be prescribed by the President, and within the limits of existing Veterans' Administration facilities, to furnish to men discharged from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty and to veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, domiciliary care where they are suffering with permanent disabilities, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric ailments and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries.'"

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this is the so-called "Tydings amendment" placed on the bill in the Senate with the consent of the administration which permits the hospitalization of peace-time veterans who have injuries or disabilities due to service.

It seems that under the provisions of the Economy Act since it has been carefully studied and is in practical operation it has been found that a veteran of the regular establishment having a service-connected disability could not be hospitalized. The Tydings amendment permits him to be hospitalized.

The motion is to recede and concur with an amendment. The House amendment only affects the first portion of it which recites an amendment to the Economy Act. It is necessary to put that in.

Mr. JAMES. It also includes Spanish-American War veterans?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. It mentions tuberculosis and neuropsychiatric cases. Practically everyone who served either in Cuba or the Philippines are not bothered with either tuberculosis or neuropsychiatric ailments. They are bothered with malaria. Under this it would be impossible for a Spanish-American War veteran to be hospitalized because he was suffering from malaria.

Mr. WOODRUM. The Spanish-American War veterans, if totally and permanently disabled, may be hospitalized.

Mr. JAMES. But if he is 50 percent disabled he cannot get in.

Mr. WOODRUM. He is exactly on the same plane as a World War veteran with respect to hospitalization privileges.

Mr. JAMES. If he is 100 percent disabled.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; if he has tuberculosis or requires neuropsychiatric hospitalization, and, of course, if he has a service-connected disability, he may be hospitalized.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion to recede and concur with an amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 11: Page 49, line 10, strike out "$231,730,000" and insert "$401,730,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this amendment affects the amount required for pensions and hospitalization, and the action we take on it will depend on whatever action may be taken hereafter on amendment no. 47. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this amendment may be passed over until we take action on amendment no. 47.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 13: Page 49, after line 16, insert "That the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized to agree to a judgment to be rendered by the presiding judge of the United States court having jurisdiction in the case, pursuant to compromise approved by the Attorney General upon the recommendation of the United States attorney charged with the defense, upon such terms and for such sums within the amount claimed to be payable, in any suit pending on March 20, 1933, and on the date of the enactment of this act, brought under the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, on a contract of yearly renewable term insurance, and the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to make payments in accordance with any such judgment: Provided, That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of disbursing officers of the Veterans' Administration for all payments of insurance made in accordance with any such judgment: Provided further, That all such judgment shall constitute final settlement of the claim and no appeal therefrom shall be authorized."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments nos. 14 and 15: On page 50, in line 19, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$2,000,000"; and in line 20 insert: "Provided, That not less than one half of $2,000,000 so appropriated shall be used for supplying hospital treatment for veterans, without regard to whether their disability was service-connected or not."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that amendments nos. 14 and 15 may be considered together.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to Senate amendments 14 and 15.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KVALE) there were—ayes 162, noes 23.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 16: Page 51, after line 9, insert: "The unexpended balance of the appropriation 'Fourteenth Annual Convention of French Veterans of the World War, Washington, D.C., 1933' is hereby made available for reimbursement to the Veterans' Administration for all expenses (including transportation to bona fide residence) incurred in connection with indigent veterans in attendance at the convention of the rank and file organization of World War Veterans held in Washington, D.C., during the month of May, 1933, and the decision of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in connection with such expenditures shall be final and conclusive."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 16 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the first three lines of the matter inserted by such amendment insert the following: "such amount as may be necessary of the fund entitled 'Recreation fund, Army', created by the War Department Appropriation Act, approved March 4, 1933, is hereby appropriated and."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on the amendment. The amendment is not germane to this particular section of the bill. It refers to an unexpended balance of appropriation for the annual convention of French veterans, whereas the gentleman's amendment applies to a recreational fund of the Army contained in the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, the original text provides a certain fund from which the expense of this veterans' camp should be paid. The amendment selects a different fund and I submit it is germane to the section, and otherwise proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this is merely a reappropriation of an unexpended balance which this amendment proposes to use for another purpose than that for which originally appropriated. The Chair thinks that that is certainly germane, for, after all, all appropriations of money, whether it be a reappropriation or a direct appropriation, must come out of the Treasury. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOSS. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that this fund comes out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know where else it could come from.

Mr. GOSS. I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that they have special funds in that bill that do not belong to the Government.

The SPEAKER. The amendment simply makes it available for that purpose.

Mr. GOSS. This has to do with something that is not Government funds.

The SPEAKER. Well, the fund is in the Treasury.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this proposition on two grounds. In the first place, I have in my hand, and I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain portions of a letter—I will not ask for the whole letter because it is five pages long—from the Chief of the Veterans' Bureau stating that he does have legal authority to spend this money.

In the second place, this was an illegal expenditure for expenses of a convention gotten together by men who were not members of the Army during the war, but who organized this group to bring them here to promote their own ends.

Why should the Government pay the expenses of any organization coming here to run a convention? If we are going to start in by paying expenses of any group we have got to go the full length by paying the expenses of every hay dealers' convention.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman realizes that the Woodrum amendment does not take the taxpayers' money, but takes the money out of the organization not connected with the Government. It is not Government money at all.

Mr. TABER. That makes the situation still worse, because we are taking money that does not belong to the Government and we have no jurisdiction over it whatever.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. How much of this fund has been spent?

Mr. TABER. They have spent about $40,000.

Mr. BYRNS. The previous administration appropriated out of the Public Treasury $100,000, of which $70,000 was spent, and I never heard the gentleman opposing that.

Mr. TABER. That was a different situation. That was a loan on bonus certificates. This is an outright donation of money. I have heard the gentleman from Tennessee time after time oppose the payment of funds out of the Treasury in an illegal manner.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Is not this money raised by this organization, and after they had dispersed then it had nowhere to go?

Mr. TABER. Yes; this money was left in the custody of the War Department, but the Government is not entitled to it. We have no right to muscle in on it. It is entirely an illegal performance.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Does the gentleman think this will cost the Government any more than it did under the Republican administration to call out the Army to drive them out of the city of Washington?

Mr. TABER. The gentleman knows that during the Republican administration they treated them fairly and squarely, and the Army was not called out until it was absolutely necessary, because of the performance of the man who was chief of police at that time.

Mr. GOSS. Is not this fund earmarked as a special fund in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. TABER. The money does not belong to the Government of the United States.

Mr. GOSS. That is just what I said when I made the point of order.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. If the House is going to pay the expenses of all organizations who come here seeking their own ends, is it not taking steps to pay the expenses of all bonus seekers?

Mr. TABER. We might as well pay the return expenses of the canners who are now in convention here.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. I understood the gentleman to say something about my friend and buddy, General Glassford. What did he do?

Mr. TABER. He mussed up the whole situation by creating disturbances and distress here in Washington.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, this is not the first visit of certain veterans and perhaps others who have come to Washington for the purpose of insisting on the payment of the bonus. About a year ago we had a similar march on Washington under the previous administration. At that time there was appropriated for transportation alone $100,000, of which $71,000, according to my recollection, was used, and in addition to that I personally know that the Secretary of War provided for a part of the sustenance and maintenance of those marchers here out of the fund appropriated for the subsistence of the Army. I do not know how much was so provided. In addition to that, there was the extra cost entailed in bringing the tanks and soldiers from Fort Myer, and in the use of gas, illuminating and otherwise [laughter], in order to quell the disturbance alleged to have occurred down here upon the Avenue. Only $37,000 was spent by this administration, for which Mr. Louis Howe, the executive secretary of the President, is entitled to credit, and the soldiers left here by agreement without the slightest trouble or necessity for either calling out the police or the Army. I say it is to the credit of this administration, and particularly Mr. Howe, that these marchers came here and then went home quietly and peacefully, after expending only $37,000, as compared to the amount spent under the former administration. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Floyd Gibbons was taken off the radio by General Harbord, who did not get his pay cut in the Economy League, because he told the truth about driving the soldiers out of Washington. When told that he was mistaken, he showed General Harbord the moving pictures and said that the camera cannot lie.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I am sorry; my time has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I have a very high regard for the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. I have a high regard for his opinions on all questions. However, I think there is a complete misunderstanding on the part of the House as to the fund from which it is proposed that this expenditure shall be made. Otherwise, I dare say there would be no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. TABER. I am opposed to it on general principles, because in my opinion it was illegally made.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Strictly and technically the gentleman is right; but, legal or illegal, the expense was of a nature that hardly could have been avoided. Following the war certain funds which had accrued during the course of the conflict became available and subject to administration by certain officials of the Department. For instance, a weekly paper known as the Stars and Stripes was published by the American Expeditionary Forces. From that publication several hundred thousand dollars were realized. After the war was over the accumulated receipts came under the control of certain officials of the War Department and were expended for various purposes, some of which most of us would not have approved if we ourselves had had the responsibility. There was another sizeable fund that became available upon the disbandment of certain World War organizations. In the last War Department appropriation bill it was provided that those two funds should be deposited in the Treasury and there held subject to appropriation by Congress for the welfare of enlisted men in the event of another war. The thought was that the money had been raised by enlisted men and that it should not be used except in directions that would directly benefit enlisted men. The money was being spent for every object under the sun. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that since the very soldiers who created the funds in question have been the beneficiaries of the expenditures, we are now considering, there could not be a more appropriate use of the money than this one, to wit, to pay their expenses for coming to Washington for the purpose of submitting to the President and to the American Congress the cause that was uppermost in the minds of many of them. I feel this is an entirely proper use of the money and should be approved by this Congress.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Does not the gentleman consider it quite a contrast from the proceedings of last year. Last year President Hoover would not even meet those veterans, while this year we had the first lady of the land, Mrs. Roosevelt, going out to their camp and talking to them, right in their own mess.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 156, noes 59.

So the motion to recede and concur was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, amendments numbered 17, 18, and 21 affect totals. I ask unanimous consent that these three amendments be passed over until we vote on the others.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 19: Page 53, beginning in line 1, insert:

"INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE

"The sum of $48,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State in the following manner:

"(1) Not to exceed the equivalent in United States currency of 192,000 gold francs for the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the Institute, including the shares of the Territory of Hawaii, and of the dependencies of the Philippine Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

"(2) Not to exceed $5,000 for the salary of a United States member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture.

"(3) Not to exceed $5,500 for rent of living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (46 Stat. 818); compensation of subordinate employees without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; actual and necessary traveling expenses; and other contingent expenses incident to the maintenance of an office at Rome, Italy, for a United States member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, that is the amendment affecting the International Institute of Agriculture, which we have considered several times in the House.

Mr. GOSS. Is this the so-called "Blanton amendment"?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not know which particular Blanton amendment the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. GOSS. I mean about the $48,500 to be contributed to this Agricultural Institute in Rome.

Mr. WOODRUM. This is the amendment put in providing for a contribution to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Is this a permanent appropriation or is it one that is provided for for just 1 year?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Just for 1 year.

Mr. BRITTEN. I wanted to get a couple of minutes to talk rather than ask a question. I was in hopes the House conferees would insist on their disagreement with the Senate conferees in this matter, because surely this is no time to throw $50,000 into the wastebasket over in Rome. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his motion, and let us get a vote on this thing after a couple of minutes. Will the gentleman yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. WOODRUM. I will take it under consideration; but right now I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRITTEN) there were ayes 132 and noes 48.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] to recede and concur.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRITTEN) there were ayes 136 and noes 64.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 30: On page 57, after line 14, insert:
"SEC. 6. After the enactment of this act the Postmaster General is directed to suspend payments upon any air mail or ocean mail contract to any individuals, companies, or corporations which, singly or in combination with other individuals, companies, or corporations receiving a subsidy, pay any salary or salary combined with bonus to any officer, agent, or employee in excess of a salary of $17,500. If such individuals, companies, or corporations employ any officer, agent, or employee on a part-time basis, such salary, or salary combined with bonus, shall be reduced in proportion to such part-time employment."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:
"SEC. 6. Hereafter the Postmaster General shall not award any air mail contract or any ocean mail contract under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 to any individuals, companies, or corporations which, singly or in combination with other individuals, companies, or corporations pay any salary, or salary combined with bonus, to any officer, agent, or employee in excess of $17,500. If such individuals, companies, or corporations employ any officer, agent, or employee on a part-time basis, such salary, or salary combined with bonus, shall be reduced in proportion to such part-time employment."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The amendment as I heard it read contains the word "hereafter", making this permanent law, forever. I have no particular objection to the language contained, that makes it for the duration of the life of this appropriation bill, but it might not be wise, under certain circumstances, to make it permanent, forever. The word "hereafter" makes it legislation on an appropriation bill, which makes it permanent legislation.

Mr. WOODRUM. The original text makes it permanent legislation.

Mr. GOSS. But it reads "after the enactment of this act."

The SPEAKER. We are considering the Senate amendment. The entire amendment of the Senate is legislation which the House may now perfect by any germane amendment.

Mr. GOSS. I will reserve it for the moment, to hear further explanation. I do not want to see it made permanent law.

Mr. WOODRUM. The only change which the House makes in it is the very proper change not to undertake to make this retroactive to apply to contracts. They have post-office contracts that have already been made in good faith, but it does provide——

Mr. GOSS. For all time.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; until Congress changes it, because the original language was for all time.

Mr. GOSS. But when that language goes in an appropriation bill, it is difficult to get it out again. If you make it applicable to the year for which the appropriation is written, it would not make it permanent law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If I understood the gentleman's substitute amendment, it provides that you cannot investigate contracts that are already in effect with respect to air mail. Am I correct?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not exactly. The preceding section in the bill confers the power on the President to investigate and revise all air mail and ocean mail contracts. This simply applies to such contracts as are made in the future.

Mr. McCLINTIC. In other words, you do not cut out the preceding section?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Respecting the objection made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss], if this is a wise provision for this year, why is it not a wise provision for next year? I submit that inference to the intelligent judgment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 34: On page 60, after line 2, insert:
"(c) Whenever at any time hereafter prior to July 1, 1935, any person to whom the Canal Zone Retirement Act, approved March 2, 1931 (Public, No. 781, 71st Cong.), applies, who has an aggregate period of service of at least 30 years computed as prescribed in section 7 of such act, is voluntarily or involuntarily separated from the service for reasons other than his misconduct, such employee shall be entitled to an annuity computed as provided in section 6 of such act payable from the Canal Zone retirement and disability fund less a sum equal to 5 percent of such annuity: Provided, That when an annuitant hereunder attains the age at which he would have been entitled to retirement with annuity computed as provided in section 6 of such act, such deduction from the annuity shall cease. If and when any such annuitant shall be reemployed in the service of the District of Columbia or the United States (including any corporation the majority of the stock of which is owned by the United States), the right to the annuity provided by this section shall cease and the subsequent annuity rights of such person shall be determined in accordance with the applicable provisions of retirement law existing at the time of the subsequent separation of such person from the service."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the letter "c" and insert in lieu thereof the letter "b", and in line 6 strike out the words "voluntarily or."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman to concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 43: On page 65, after line 9, insert:
"SEC. 16. (a) There shall be in the Department of Justice an Assistant Solicitor General to assist the Solicitor General in the performance of his duties, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Said Assistant Solicitor General shall be allocated to the same classification grade and be paid the same rate of compensation as apply to Assistant Attorneys General and shall perform such additional duties as may be required of him by the Attorney General. (b) One of the existing positions of Assistant Attorney General is hereby abolished."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CROWTHER. Were the duties of this new solicitor outlined to the committee? I have in mind whether or not this new solicitor is to prosecute the hoarders of gold which we heard so much about a while ago. Have there been any prosecutions under this law by the Attorney General?

Mr. WOODRUM. The committee has that under consideration right now, and will report later.

Mr. CROWTHER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 44: On page 65 beginning in line 21, insert section 17:

"SEC. 17. That section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1928, entitled 'An act to amend the salary rates contained in the compensation schedules of the act of March 4, 1923, entitled "An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services" ', as amended by the act of July 3, 1930, be further amended by adding thereto the following: 'Provided, That in all cases where, since December 6, 1924, in such adjustment the position occupied by an employee has been or shall be allocated to a grade with a maximum salary below the salary received by the incumbent, the rate of pay fixed for such position prior to such allocation may be continued so long as the position is held by the incumbent occupying it at the time of such allocation.' "

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment no. 44 and concur in the same with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 44, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 17. That section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1928, entitled 'An act to amend the salary rates contained in the compensation schedules of the act of March 4, 1923, entitled "An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services" ', as amended by the act of July 3, 1930, be further amended by adding thereto the following: 'Provided, That in all cases where, since December 6, 1924, in such adjustment the position occupied by an employee has been or shall be allocated to a grade with a maximum salary below the salary received by the incumbent, the rate of pay fixed for such position prior to such allocation may be paid after the date of the enactment of this act so long as the position is held by the incumbent occupying it at the time of such allocation and the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to allow credit in disbursing officers' accounts for all payments heretofore made at such higher rates.' "

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 45. On page 66, beginning with line 11, insert:

"SEC. 18. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to effect a modification of the contract for the construction of the Long Beach (Calif.) post office so as to afford such relief as he deems to be proper for losses caused the contractor for restoration of damages to the building occasioned by the earthquake of March 10, 1933, and to make such structural and other changes in the building as may be necessary to minimize a recurrence of earthquake damage to the building: Provided, That the present appropriation for the Long Beach project shall be available for the purposes named, and that any additional cost incurred by reason of the above shall not exceed the present limit of cost."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment no. 45 and concur in the same with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment before the period insert the following: ": Provided further, That the contractor shall not be allowed any profit in connection with the restoration of such earthquake damages."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman tell the House what cost is involved?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield for that purpose to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN], a member of the committee.

Mr. BOYLAN. The amount involved is about $40,000.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Virginia there is to be no profit in the amount appropriated in this bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct.

Mr. DOWELL. Merely the actual loss?

Mr. BOYLAN. The actual loss only.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 46: On page 66, beginning in line 24, insert:

"SEC. 19. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans as hereinafter provided, in an aggregate amount not exceeding $50,000,000 to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts duly organized under the laws of any State, and to or for the benefit of political subdivisions of States, which prior to the date of enactment of this act have completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of lands for agricultural purposes. Such loans shall be made for the purpose of enabling any such district or political subdivision (hereafter referred to as the "borrower") to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness incurred in connection with any such projects, and shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended; except that (1) the term of any such loan shall not exceed 40 years; (2) each such loan shall be secured by bonds, notes, or other obligations which are a lien on the real property within the project or on the assessments, taxes, or other charges imposed by the borrower pursuant to State law, or by such other collateral as may be acceptable to the Corporation; (3) the borrower shall agree not to issue during the term of the loan any other bonds so secured except with the consent of the Corporation; (4) the borrower shall agree, insofar as it lawfully may, to pay to the Corporation, until all bonds or other obligations of the borrower acquired by the Corporation are retired, an amount equal to the amount by which the assessments, taxes, and other charges collected by the borrower exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project and maturities of interest and principal on its outstanding obligations, and (5) the borrower shall agree, to the satisfaction of the Corporation, to reduce, insofar as it lawfully may, the annual taxes, assessments, and other charges imposed by it for or on account of the project by an amount proportional to the reduction in the corresponding annual requirements for principal and interest of its outstanding indebtedness by reason of the operation of this section. No loan shall be made under this section until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (A) has caused an appraisal to be made of the property securing and/or underlying the outstanding bonds of the applicant, (B) has determined that the project of the applicant is economically sound, and (C) has been satisfied that an agreement has been entered into between the applicant and holders of its outstanding bonds or other obligations under which the applicant will be able to purchase or refund all or a major portion of such bonds or other obligations at a price determined by the Corporation to be reasonable after taking into consideration the average market price of such bonds over the 6 months' period ending March 1, 1933, and under which a substantial reduction will be brought about in the amount of the outstanding indebtedness of the applicant."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, amendment no. 46 merely clarifies existing law with reference to loans to drainage districts. It makes no change in the law at all.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment no. 46 and concur in the same with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of line 1 of the matter inserted by such amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 19. Section 36 of the 'Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933', approved May 12, 1933, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 36. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is.' "

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. What is the need of this amendment if it does not change the law?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is clarifying language the Reconstruction Finance Corporation submitted to the Senate and was unanimously approved.

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 47, page 69, after line 2, insert:

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, the matter the Clerk is about to read is the Steiwer-Cutting amendment.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I thought we were taking up the amendment as it came from the Senate and reading that first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 47: Page 69, after line 2, insert:

"SEC. 20. Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government', in no event shall World War service-connected disability compensation of any veteran or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War"—

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I thought I was right. Evidently this is the Steiwer-Cutting amendment that the Senate has inserted.

Mr. GOSS. No, Mr. Speaker; this is the Connally amendment that came over in the Senate bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, the Clerk ought to read the Steiwer-Cutting amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, as that is the matter properly before the House.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. I have the bill in front of me, H.R. 5389, which we have been following all afternoon. Now, amendment no. 47 of the Senate is not the Steiwer-Cutting amendment at all, and the Clerk had not finished reading that.

The SPEAKER. The copy that the gentleman has probably was printed before the Senate adopted the Steiwer amendment.

Mr. BULWINKLE. But, Mr. Speaker, the House acted the other day on this Connally amendment and substituted for it the House amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. GOSS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. In view of the parliamentary situation I would like to get a ruling, if the Chair will permit, on the point that any amendment offered to the Steiwer amendment would be an amendment in the third degree and, therefore, subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. I was simply going to ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment.

Mr. BECK. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman proposed to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BECK. I object. I want to hear the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President is hereby authorized under the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, to establish such number of special boards (the majority of the members of which were not in the employ of the Veterans' Administration at the date of enactment of this act), as he may deem necessary to review all claims (where the veteran entered service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disability is not the result of his own misconduct), in which presumptive service connection has heretofore been granted under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, wherein payments were being made on March 20, 1933, and which are heretofore or hereafter held not service connected under the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress. Members of such boards may be appointed without regard to the Civil Service laws and regulations, and their compensation fixed without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. Such special boards shall determine, on all available evidence, whether service connection shall be found in such cases, and shall in their decisions resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the veteran. For the purposes of this section the granting of service connection in such cases shall not be based upon the requirements of regulation no. 1, part I, subparagraph (a), or instruction no. 2, regulation no. 1, issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, it being the intent of this section to preserve service connections as granted by section 200, World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, title 38 of the Code (other than disability resulting from the claimant's own misconduct), unless affirmative evidence clearly discloses that the disease or disability had its inception before or after the period of military or naval service, and was not aggravated thereby.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the decisions of such special boards shall be final in such cases, subject to such appellate procedure as the President may prescribe, and, except in those cases where the special boards shall find that the award was based upon fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error not less than 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, therein shall continue to October 31, 1933, or the date of special board decision whichever is the earlier date: Provided, That where any case is pending before any one of the special boards on October 31, 1933, the President may provide for extending the time of payment until decision can be rendered. The President shall prescribe such rules governing reviews and hearings as may be deemed advisable. Payment of salaries and expenses of such boards and personnel assigned thereto shall be paid out of and in accordance with appropriations for the Veterans' Administration. In all cases where service connection shall be preserved under the review herein provided, not less than 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, shall continue, and the determination of service connection in such review shall be final in all cases: Provided, however, That in the event of a change in the degree of disability of any such veteran the amount of compensation payable shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect prior to March 20, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced by more than 25 percent.

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the compensation being paid for directly service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error, in receipt of compensation on March 20, 1933, be reduced more than 25 percent: Provided, however, That in the event of a change in the degree of disability of any such veteran the amount of compensation payable shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect prior to March 20, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced by more than 25 percent; and in no event shall death compensation, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error, being paid to widows, children, and dependent parents of deceased World War veterans under the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, on March 20, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, whether the death of the veteran on whose account compensation is being paid was directly or presumptively connected with service; except that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply with respect to veterans residing outside the limits of the continental United States and its Territories and possessions, or with respect to any veteran who is being furnished hospital treatment, institutional, or domiciliary care by the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, if such veteran has neither wife, child, nor dependent mother or father.

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the pension paid to veterans of any war prior to the World War, or to any widow and/or dependent of such veterans shall not be reduced more than 25 percent of the amount being paid prior to March 20, 1933.

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 17, title I, Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any claim for yearly renewable term insurance on which premiums were paid to the date of death of the insured and any claim for pension, compensation allowance, or emergency officers' retired pay under the provisions of law repealed by said section 17 wherein claims were duly filed prior to March 20, 1933, may be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration on the proof and evidence received by the Veterans' Administration prior to March 20, 1933, and any person found entitled to the benefits claimed shall be paid such benefits in accordance with and in the amounts provided by such prior law: Provided, That the payments hereby authorized to be made shall continue only to include June 30, 1933, and only one original adjudicatory action and one appeal may be made in such cases. Where a veteran died prior to March 20, 1933, under conditions which warrant payment of or reimbursement for burial expenses, such payments or reimbursements may be made in accordance with the laws in effect prior to March 20, 1933: Provided, That such claim for payment or reimbursement must be filed within 3 months from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. BECK (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Am I privileged to withdraw my objection to the unanimous-consent request to dispense with the reading of the amendment? If so, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I renew the objection.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 47.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Steiwer-Cutting amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, on that, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. This is a direct vote now on the Steiwer-Cutting amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nays 209, not voting 44, as follows:

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DOUGLASS, is unavoidably absent on account of sickness in his family. If here, he would vote "aye."

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, the lady from New Jersey, Mrs. NORTON, is unavoidably absent on account of illness. If present, she would vote "no."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts, is unavoidably absent on account of illness.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DOUTRICH, is absent on account of the death of his wife. If here, he would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, there are four other amendments in disagreement, amendments nos. 11, 17, 18, and 21. They have to do with the totals that are dependent on what action is taken by the conferees. I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc and that the House insist on its disagreement to these amendments in order that they may go to conference.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman intend to move to further insist on its disagreement to the other amendment?

Mr. WOODRUM. The one we have just considered? The vote we have just taken is equivalent to a disagreement.

Mr. GOSS. What would happen if the conferees got together on another plan?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House ask for a further conference on the disagreeing votes on the independent offices appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. BOYLAN, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. TABER, and Mr. THURSTON.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, there is still amendment no. 13 in disagreement, aside from the veterans' items, having to do with giving the Attorney General power to compromise cases. The conferees when they considered that amendment came to the conclusion that they would recommend the adoption to the House, and when it came to the floor of the House some question was raised about it, and in order that the conferees may consider it I ask unanimous consent that the conferees have authority to deal with that amendment. If the conferees are able to carry out the instructions, we will be able to bring back a complete report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. WOODRUM, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

RUSSIAN PRIMER

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, yesterday during a discussion on the floor relative to communistic propaganda I stated that a teacher in a Washington public high school had read a Russian primer to the class and stated I proposed to secure the name of the teacher. My remarks could be accepted as condemning the action of the teacher. My purpose in rising today is to say I have secured from a friend a copy of the primer. Of course it is propaganda, but not offensive propaganda. It does not teach revolution; it does not advocate the destruction of governments. It is a statement of facts in relation to the 5-year plan written so Russian children would understand the plan translated in English, printed, and sold in this country.

It is rather socialistic, but I must confess we are in no position to throw stones in that direction in view of the glass houses we have constructed for ourselves. I find the book an interesting statement as to what the Soviet Government is trying to accomplish. It goes into detail as to what machinery can accomplish. Outlining a 5-year plan for children, the 10 suggestions it contains along this line cannot be assailed; in fact, the suggestions might be commended.

Mr. Speaker, I was correct when I said a teacher had read this primer to a class in a Washington high school. Had I read the primer prior to making the public statement, I would not have referred to it. I have made no attempt to learn the teacher's name, nor do I intend to, as I am convinced no harm has been done.

I will go as far as any Member of the House to oppose communism and communistic propaganda; but, finding my criticism in this instance was not warranted, I feel I owe it to the House, the people of Washington, and to the country to make this statement, which I do solely of my own accord.

CAN THE REPUBLIC LIVE?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address delivered by our colleague, Mr. MCGUGIN, over the radio the other evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, as the extension of my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD a radio speech broadcast by the National Broadcasting Co. of our colleague, Hon. HAROLD MCGUGIN, Representative from the Third District of Kansas, Saturday, June 3, 1933. It seems to me that this speech contains some thoughts which are deserving of the consideration of the Congress and the country.

The speech delivered by Mr. MCGUGIN is as follows:

Friends of the radio audience, the foremost public question before the American people today is whether or not the Republic is to be preserved. He who thinks in the spirit of childish fatalism that somehow the Government will wiggle through and that all that is of importance now is our personal financial affairs is living in a false security.

No government is a stable government which is not a solvent government. The Government of the United States is getting perilously near the point of insolvency. The American people as a whole are not as able to pay taxes today as they were in 1913, yet their tax burden today is far greater than it was in 1913, and their public debt is over eight times what it was in 1913.

In 1913 the total public debt, which included the debt of the Federal Government, the States, cities, counties, and school districts, was $4,800,000,000. By the time this special session of Congress adjourns the total public debt will be approximately $42,400,000,000.

Not only is this $42,400,000,000 debt a terrific burden for the people to bear but it is a great part of our wealth, which is tax exempt and bearing no part of the cost of government. In addition to these direct obligations of the Government which are tax exempt we have started the policy of setting up outside organization, such as the Federal land banks and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which we call instrumentalities of the Government. These organizations are authorized to sell their bonds, which are also tax exempt. No one knows how many billions of dollars of tax-exempt securities these special corporations now have outstanding, or will have in the near future. It is probably safe to say that there is either now in existence or authorized at least $50,000,000,000 worth of the tax-exempt securities in the United States. This means that a tremendous part of our property under present values is exempt from any taxation.

Every thoughtful person recognizes the menace of tax-exempt securities in such great proportions. It may be good politics to abuse the men and women who own these tax-exempt securities, yet, the facts are that the people who buy tax-exempt securities are not the ones to be blamed. The ones to be blamed are the officials who issue them and the people who demand money from the Public Treasury, which can only be obtained by the Government borrowing money. So long as the Government spends more money than it takes in it must borrow money. So long as it borrows money it must issue tax-exempt securities, otherwise the rate of interest paid by the Government would be increased. When that would happen, not only the tax burden to meet the interest would increase, but the interest rate on private debts would increase accordingly. No one is going to lend money to individuals and take the chance of loss and receive the same rate of interest which he can receive from the Government.

This special session of Congress has authorized the issuing of about $10,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities, five billion of which are the direct obligation of the Government and between four and five billion of which are to be issued by these outside organizations, called instrumentalities of the Government. Every dollar of these $10,000,000,000 of new tax-exempt securities is to be issued as the direct result of the universal demand that the Government bear our financial responsibilities.

With the present public debt at approximately $42,400,000,000 this means $353 for each man, woman, and child as compared to $43.50 for each man, woman, and child in 1913. With our millions of unemployed, it is safe to say that in actual practice this debt is weighing more heavily upon them than any other class of our citizens. It is true that they may not directly pay through the window of the public tax collector. However, millions of these unemployed are today out of work because productive industry cannot bear this tax burden. As a result, productive industry is not operating and millions of these people are out of work. In brief, there are millions of people out of work today, hungry, and in destitution, as a direct result of the staggering public debt.

Let us view the financial condition of the Government at Washington in the matter of its permanent debt. At the end of the war the Government owed approximately $27,000,000,000. In 1930 it owed $16,200,000,000. In the middle of March of this year it owed $22,000,000,000. To this $22,000,000,000 there is being incurred an additional debt of $5,000,000,000 by this special session of Congress. This will mean that the debt of the Government of the United States has increased from $16,200,000,000 in the year 1930 to approximately $27,000,000,000 by June 30, 1933, as compared with a national debt of $1,000,000,000 in 1913.

Now, this staggering debt challenges the thought and apprehension of every thoughtful and patriotic citizen. The preservation of the Government given to us by our forefathers inescapably demands that we immediately start on the program of reducing the public debt rather than increasing the public debt. If we are to preserve the Republic, we must now consider what must be done in order to reduce the public debt. A year ago it was imperative that the current expenses of the Government be reduced. That meant that there had to be a reduction in the amount of money paid from the Public Treasury to every beneficiary of the Public Treasury.

For my part I have stood foursquare for adequate and proper reductions in money paid from the Public Treasury. I am firmly convinced that after President Roosevelt has carried out his program of reorganization of the Government, we cannot expect many more substantial reductions from the public pay roll. I am firmly convinced that we cannot expect as many reductions in the veteran expenditures as are now being attempted. Therefore we must now look to other sources to effect sufficient savings in the governmental expenses in order to balance the revenue and expenses of the Government and to reduce the debt.

When we do this we must make our reductions in the things for which we are spending money. What are the things for which we are spending money at this time? They are advancements from the Public Treasury for the purpose of taking care of the private obligations and responsibilities of the people of the country. Carrying on such a program leads first to the complete destruction of the Government and then leaving the people individually in a worse position than they were when they set forth to heap their personal burdens upon the Government.

Now, in the case of a government which coins money and prints currency, what does it do when it cannot meet its obligations? Does it just refuse to pay them, as does an individual or a governmental unit which does not coin money? No. It merely prints currency and wipes out its debts. The more currency which is printed, the less value is the currency when exchanged for commodities. When that program is carried far enough, the people are unable to obtain enough money to buy the necessities of life. When that occasion arises, human suffering exists in the congested centers beyond human endurance. It is then that the social order breaks down. That is the background of the French adage, "The printing press and then the guillotine."

The Federal Government at Washington has already started out on this program. Under existing conditions I think the program which the Government has started upon is necessary and all right providing it is held in bounds. By the first of the year 1933 the American dollar, measured in the usual value of commodities, had reached a point where it was worth $1.62. The United States is now off the gold standard. The dollar is going down in value. It seems to me that it is all right for the dollar to descend in value until it reaches the point where it is worth 100 cents, when exchanged for commodities, but if it goes beyond that point, our peril is only to be measured by the extent that the dollar goes below a value of 100 cents when exchanged for commodities. In other words, if the inflation gets away from us, we will experience what Germany experienced after the war, and what the Thirteen Colonies experienced during and following the Revolutionary War. Inflation can reach a point where a $10 bill will not buy a breakfast. If ever inflation runs wild in this country, the distress and the despair of the American people will be manyfold that which they have as yet experienced.

No government ever went into wild inflation except that it had a debt which it could not meet in any other manner. We have undertaken to guard against this evil event by placing full control of our money in the hands of President Roosevelt. In my judgment, this is our only hope to save us from an excessive inflation. However, if the public debt continues to mount, President Roosevelt will be as helpless as a child in trying to hold the inflation in bounds. After all this is a democracy. In the end, the people are going to do what they want to do. There is no way to place sufficient power in the hands of the President so that he can prevent the people from destroying themselves if they are determined to do so.

This last emergency bill of $3,300,000,000 must be the end of our efforts to bring ourselves out of our present despair through the aid of government. It seems to me that it is our last desperate struggle. If, after this money is expended, the people are not able to care for themselves and in turn support the Government, we may as well resign ourselves to whatever may be our fate with the passing of the Republic.

If this $3,300,000,000 proves to be a stop-gap and is the means of tiding us over until the usual order is reestablished, it will have been worth the effort. With our monetary reform to date we are getting an increase in our price level. It is hoped that this increase in the price level will place the producers of farm and mineral products upon their feet. It is to be hoped that $3,300,000,000 of public works will tide over the unemployed pending the time when the producers of the raw products of the farm and the mine sufficiently recover financially to be able to buy the products of industry and thereby restore employment for many of the unemployed.

The most menacing thing in American life today is the utter dependence which seems to exist in the minds of our people. Unless this public thought can be changed there is no hope to save the Republic we have known. On May 2 and 3 of this year an association of college graduates met in Washington. This association passed a resolution demanding that it was the obligation of government to provide a subsistence for college graduates specifically mentioning school teachers, doctors, dentists, nurses, lawyers, architects, chemists, and engineers. Now, when in a country college graduates cannot some way take care of themselves, then that country is about at the end of its road.

We also see captains of finance and industry coming before the Congress under the white flag of surrender and asking the Government to give to their institutions financial support and governmental management. It looks as if all the officers in the once proud economic army of America are surrendering. When any government takes over the responsibility of operating industry, financing industry and furnishing employment to the people, that government ceases to be a republic and becomes a communistic government. All that there is to communism is that it is a government wherein all the people work for the government; therefore, the government must own and operate all productive industry. The price which any people must pay for such a government is a surrender of their personal and human liberty. Strange as it may seem, those who advocate the socialistic principle, profess to be the greatest liberals, yet they are advocating a principle which leads to the most tyrannical society and the greatest destruction of human liberty yet to be found in recorded history. In proportion to the extent the people turn to the government for support and subsistence they give up their liberty.

Since the 4th of March the people of the United States have demanded and received more relief from their Government and more governmental control over their business and lives than they have ever heretofore demanded from the Government. Likewise, since the 4th of March we have seen the people surrender more of their liberties to the President of the United States than have ever been surrendered before in the history of the country. So today, in our own country, in proportion to our increased dependence upon the Government, we have surrendered our liberties.

It is the hope of every patriotic citizen that President Roosevelt is going to be able to exercise these powers as a means of restoring the liberties of the people. We all know that that is his ambition. We all know that he has no dream of dynasty. If he fails, we are bound to awaken one day to find that our liberties are not being temporarily held in trust by a President but held in fee by someone not chosen by the people. Unless we can quickly get this Government on a solvent basis he will fail. The Government will be on a solvent basis whenever the people in all walks of life support themselves and in addition thereto contribute enough to the Government to meet the current expenses of government and in an orderly manner retire the debt already incurred.

HITLER'S AMERICAN ALLY, ST. JOHN GAFFNEY

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD in reference to the persecution of the Jews, and to include therein excerpts from articles appearing in the New York Journal, the New York Sun, and the New York Times, and certain correspondence from Mr. MCGRATH.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I represent the Thirteenth District of California, in which reside approximately 50,000 citizens of the Jewish faith of German extraction. These people are law-abiding, honorable citizens, and they are a credit to the community in which they live. They contribute largely to the making of the city of Los Angeles, which is the largest metropolitan city on the Pacific coast. These citizens resent the persecution of the Jews in Germany, as do all Americans who are opposed to intolerance. They are greatly exercised over the tragic situation which is today confronting the Jewish race in Germany. They have tried to remain silent, thinking possibly the reports from the German Republic were exaggerated, but since positive proof has been forthcoming they have become all the more resentful of this terrible persecution of an innocent people.

An organization was formed in Los Angeles by the Jewish people to oppose this horrible treatment of the Jews. Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin was elected chairman, and they did me the honor of electing me honorary vice chairman. I have been informed from time to time by this organization that mass meetings were being held, and so many people of all creeds—Jews, Protestants, and Catholics—turned out for these meetings that thousands had to be turned away.

A pamphlet was sent to me by a Mr. T. St. John Gaffney, who was an American consul in Germany some years ago, and who I understand was removed from office during the administration of President Wilson. The object in sending out this pamphlet apparently was to minimize and make excuses for the Hitler atrocities. It would seem quite clear to the average person reading over this pamphlet that it is not worthy of any consideration, as I feel that the statements contained therein have been greatly exaggerated.

I wish to include as part of my remarks the following excerpts from various newspapers in New York, published in 1915, which will give my listeners an idea of the caliber of this man, Mr. T. St. John Gaffney:

[New York Times, Sept. 29, 1915]

The newspapers toward the end of September 1915 carried dispatches from Washington stating that the State Department had decided to ask for the resignation of T. St. John Gaffney, United States consul general at Munich. It was charged that Gaffney showed partisanship in the manner in which he handled the business of his office, which was also in charge of British consular affairs in Munich. It was charged that he wrote anti-British articles for publication, also a commendatory letter for publication in Germany, which had been running a series of articles attacking the American Government, specifically Secretary of State Bryan, for the attitude of neutrality in the war. It was said that these statements also reflected upon President Wilson's policies. Another charge was that a letter from an officer of an Irish-American society had been sent to Germany in the consular pouch of the Austro-Hungarian consulate instead of through the regular State Department pouch. Another charge against G. was that he had entertained Sir Roger Casement at a dinner in Munich after Casement had left the British consular service and initiated a movement for the liberation of Ireland with the help of Germany.

[New York Sun, Sept. 26, 1915]

Americans caught in Germany at the outbreak of the war had complained to the State Department of G.'s partisan attitude. It was said that he showed such intense sympathy with the German cause as to make him offensive to many British subjects in Germany whom he was officially required to aid, the United States having taken over the consular and diplomatic interests of Great Britain.

[The Herald, Sept. 28, 1915]

At the outset of the war G. made an official visit to England for the inspection of prison camps there, and his criticism of the British brought forth a complaint from the British Government. The representatives of other allied governments had also complained about G. to the Washington administration. It was recalled that G.'s career had been a stormy one almost from the time of his appointment by President Roosevelt in 1905. The question of his removal had come up in 1913, but he was then transferred from Dresden to Munich.

[New York World, June 19, 1915]

G. wrote an open letter which was published in the New York World denying that Americans were ill treated in Germany and criticizing conditions in England, Russia, and Italy. In the course of this letter G. declared: "In England strikes and riots and the tax on unfortunate civilians are a daily occurrence." He accused the American press of publishing and accepting at their face value dispatches which he alleged were "fabricated" in London, Paris, or Petrograd, and he warned that such publicity endangered German-American friendship.

[New York World, Sept. 29, 1915]

The letter which it was charged was sent to Germany in the Austro-Hungarian pouch was written by Dennis A. Spellissy, an officer of the Irish National Volunteers. At the same time the German and Austro-Hungarian Ambassadors were complaining of their inability to communicate with their capitals.

[New York Times, Nov. 29, 1915]

Upon his return to the United States, toward the end of November 1915, G. vociferously complained to fellow passengers on the ship that he was not being justly treated by the State Department. He flatly denied all the charges which had been published in the newspapers. In answer to the charge of rudeness to American and British citizens, he alleged that the facilities of his office were so overtaxed that it was not possible for him in the early days after the outbreak of the war to give the proper attention to all applicants; volunteer workers lacking in training had to be engaged, and some of these may not have been courteous to those who called at the consulate. As for the letter sent by the officer of an Irish-American organization, G. protested absolute ignorance and said he had never received the letter in question, nor was it true that he had entertained Sir Roger Casement; he had given a dinner in honor of former Mayor MacLellan, of New York, at whose request he had invited Casement. Mr. G., however, did not deny his anti-British and pro-German sympathies.

[New York Times, Aug. 30, 1916]

It appears that G. went back to Munich after spending some time in the United States and returned to the country in August 1916, when he gained a great deal of notoriety by attacking the United States Government's policies on shipboard. To the disgust of a number of passengers he openly approved the Zeppelin raids and the sinking of the Lusitania.

[New York Times, Feb. 7, 1917]

In a wireless dispatch from Berlin the foundation of a German-Irish association in that city is reported. The association is presided over by Herr Mathias Erzberger (then head of the Conservative Party), Count Von Westart (then head of the Pan Geman Party); the board of directors included Herr Ernst Wesserman (then head of the National Liberal Party), Prince Bluecher (who was supposed to represent the Kaiser), and T. St. John Gaffney.

[New York Tribune, Feb. 19, 1918]

A year later G. was dropped from membership in a Republican club in New York City, ostensibly for nonpayment of dues. A member of the war committee of the club, however, said that the club was satisfied that since April 1917 G. had been traveling between Berlin and Stockholm as a German propagandist.

[New York Times, Jan. 26, 1930]

In the February 1930 Current History G. published an article in which was included the text of a letter he had received from the Kaiser in which the chief point made was a denial that there had ever been such a thing as the Potsdam crown war council. In this article G. ardently defended the Kaiser against the war-guilt charge.

[New York Times]

In the March 1930 Current History G. published another article protesting against article 231 of the treaty of Versailles, in which Germany accepts the blame for the outbreak of the war.

[New York Times, Feb. 19, 1933]

In February 1933 G. gave to the press the text of a letter on technocracy which he had received from the Kaiser.

Mr. Speaker, it is my earnest desire that this country use its good offices to put an end to this intolerable situation. May we all join with these good people in the hope that our Government will express itself to the Government of the German Republic in behalf of the individual rights of the citizens of all faiths.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has that permission already. I object.

Mr. FISH. I simply ask the same right that other Members are asking.

Mr. BYRNS. I object. The gentleman has the same opportunity that other Members have.

POSTAL LEGISLATION—SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address delivered over the radio at noon today by the Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], relative to postal legislation in the Seventy-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered over the radio at noon today by the Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], relative to postal legislation in the Seventy-third Congress:

In opening I congratulate the postal workers upon their efficiency and loyalty and assure them of the continued consideration and appreciation of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives.

The history of our Postal Service is the history of the postal workers. It is their unfaltering adherence to the traditions of dependability, courage, and loyalty which has made possible the expansion of the service. The postal employees are gamely making sacrifices today to save that big industry in its present-day perfection for the country, and it is only right that the public should realize and understand their hardships so that they may extend cooperation.

Judging from the number of letters which I receive each day from post-office employees inquiring as to how the bills before Congress will affect them, I thought you might be interested in a résumé of this session's postal legislation, although the measures we have been forced to consider in order to balance the country's Budget are not the kind we have enjoyed passing. And while it is true that our salaries are being reduced, it is also a source of satisfaction that the Postal Service is successfully holding its big family together during the present widespread economic crisis.

I believe the Department will weather the storm without dismissing any of its efficient, faithful, regular employees. This will be permissible because of the number of retirements effective July 1 next and also because of the desire of the Postmaster General to share the work by use of the rotative furlough.

In its program to reduce the postal deficit, the Department has pledged itself not to discharge employees nor to impair the service. Speaking at a recent meeting, the Postmaster General's executive assistant stated, "Whatever reduction of force may be necessary in the Postal Service will be accomplished in the main by voluntary retirement, by cutting down the hours of labor or the hours of duty of clerks, city carriers, and supervisory employees, and by lowering the allowances of rural carriers, not by dismissing them."

The single exception mentioned referred to the clerks at those second-class post offices which will be relegated to the third class on July 1 as a result of the decreased postal receipts during the past calendar year; and even in those cases the Department is making a strong appeal to the postmasters to retain the present personnel whenever possible.

THE ECONOMY ACT

I shall dwell but briefly upon the provisions of the Economy Act which became effective April 1 of this year and will continue in force during the fiscal year 1934. It provides, as you know, for pay cuts based upon the cost of living, such reductions not to exceed 15 percent. It continues the provisions of the previous Economy Act of a year ago suspending automatic promotions and the filling of vacancies, reducing travel allowances, and permitting the temporary interchange of assignments among postal employees without change of pay-roll status.

It does away with the 24-day legislative furlough which created so many difficulties, restores annual leave with pay, restores the full night-work differential, and removes the restriction against the payment of a higher rate of compensation for overtime work.

With a restoration of the 1926 price levels and an increase of postal business wages and working conditions in the Post Office will return to normal again.

In keeping with the economic trend of our time I predict a 5-day week for postal workers, and to correct the abuses of this machine age in which we live a shorter workday and a shorter workweek will soon be enjoyed by the workers generally throughout America.

RETIREMENT

Probably no subject is of greater interest right now than retirement.

The independent offices appropriation bill, which is still under consideration, contains legislation on this subject. It provides that until July 1, 1935, any civil service employee who has an aggregate period of service of at least 30 years to his credit may be separated from the service with full annuity. From this amount 3½ percent will be deducted until he reaches the age prescribed in the Retirement Act for automatic separation.

Should the annuitant be reemployed in the service of the Government before reaching retirement ago, the pension provided by this bill shall cease, and his subsequent annuity rights shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of the retirement law applicable at the time of his later separation from the service.

In the words of the Director of the Budget, "The provision authorizing the retirement, with retirement privileges, of Federal employees who have been in the service 30 years is for the purpose of meeting the situation which will develop under the retrenchment program. It is not contemplated, under the provision of the act, that those who have been in the service more than 30 years will be of necessity discharged. The President is given broad power to except those who have been in the service 30 years or more."

Annuities of 30-year employees who are involuntarily separated from the service are protected by the bill, and it is understood that this authority will be used to reduce the personnel only where necessary in order to avoid dismissals.

ROTATIVE FURLOUGH

The independent offices appropriation bill repeals the former administrative furlough and provides a new furlough plan to avoid the necessity of making discharges when there are more employees than the needs of the service require.

This plan is to divide the work among all the officers and employees in rotation, placing workers on furlough where necessary to carry out this idea, but not furloughing anyone for more than 90 days during the fiscal year.

The President is directed to issue rules and regulations in this respect so that the action taken by all departments and establishments will be uniform in applying the furlough.

Because of the difficulties which would arise were the furlough applied in the Rural Delivery Service, the bill does not apply in this connection to rural carriers, but, instead, authorizes the President to reduce or suspend their equipment allowance during the fiscal year.

I feel confident that this furlough authority will be exercised with discretion and put into operation only when the choice lies between furloughing or dismissing employees.

POSTAL RATES

The changes in legislation which I have just mentioned were recommended as necessary in view of existing conditions. Personally, I wish there were other ways of paring our Budget so as not to disturb the incomes of the lower salaried employees who need every penny to make ends meet. However, while salaries are being reduced, at the same time we are looking forward to means of restoring these reductions before long. Although it appears necessary to reduce expenses at this time, this retrenchment is also serving as a foundation for going forward and building up business which will justify legislation of the future to increase the opportunities offered by the Postal Service.

One of our chief objectives at this time is building up the volume of mail business. We have the skilled employees, the equipment, the space, and the facilities to handle many times the present volume without increasing expenses.

Raising first-class postal rates from 2 to 3 cents was a mistake. It has cost us millions of dollars. Large mailers are using the third-class instead of the first-class. Many of them have forsaken the Postal Service entirely, using their own employees for the delivery of local matter which formerly went through the mails at the lower rate. To win back this business we must restore the 2-cent rate!

Within the past few days Congress sent a bill to the President reducing the rate from 3 to 2 cents an ounce on first-class mail matter addressed for local delivery. I believe the results of this reduction will warrant reducing all first-class postage to 2 cents before long. This bill will give the President authority to make such a reduction.

In addition to restoring the 2-cent rate on local first-class mail matter the bill also gives the President authority during the next fiscal year to modify other rates of postage—including second-, third-, and fourth-class postage—as seems advisable, and to make corresponding modifications in the percentages of gross postal receipts to be counted in determining the classification of post offices and salaries of postmasters.

With the reduction from 3 to 2 cents on local first-class matter, 90 percent of the gross postal receipts are to be counted in determining the classification of offices having city or village delivery service.

The Post Office Department needs more mail volume. Volume will reduce the unit cost of handling the mail. We can take on $100,000,000 worth of additional mail matter without materially increasing the expenses of the Department. To secure such additional mail volume our postage rates must not be excessive. After July 1, when 2-cent postage on local letters becomes effective, I am convinced that postal volume and postal revenues will increase.

We have some welcome reports in this respect already. For the first time since the depression the reports indicate that postal receipts are increasing all over the country, which means that business is reviving, as postal receipts are a dependable barometer of business. The receipts during the month of May at 50 selected offices showed a gain of 3.68 percent as compared with the same month a year ago. The highest percentage (18.64 percent, or $94,510.57) of increase was at Kansas City, Mo., although New York City showed the largest actual increase in dollars—$390,148.29, or 8.28 percent.

CONCLUSION

And now a word to my other listeners who are not postal employees.

The Postal Service is not a profit-making enterprise; it is here to serve. It has played an important part in every development in our country's history. Daily it brings the news to your door. Daily it delivers your messages across country and even across seas. It functions so efficiently that you probably take its operations as a matter of course and do not stop to realize the enormous scope of the postal activities.

Here is a service unsurpassed in efficiency, maintained for your benefit, and affording employment to hundreds of thousands of American citizens. It requires your cooperation, however, to keep this service operating. Won't you do your part by making use of its facilities?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, including therein the program and policies of the Steuben Society of America.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GRASSHOPPERS

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, we are just beginning to be swamped with telegrams from the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and generally throughout the Northwest, to the effect that grasshoppers are coming out and raising havoc with our crops. We have made absolutely no provision in the way of appropriation to cover that situation. I appeal to the Committee on Appropriations to report favorably a resolution which lies on the desk, introduced by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE]. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this measure, which is House Joint Resolution No. 203, introduced by our colleague from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] on June 9, 1933, proposes to appropriate the large sum of $980,000 "for control of the grasshopper." That is quite a sum of money to spend on grasshoppers. It is practically a million dollars. If we had plenty of money in the Treasury, and did not have to further tax the people to get it, possibly the matter would be worthy of consideration. But this bill has not yet received the favorable consideration of a committee. It has not yet been reported and put on the calendar.

Until we take the 2-cent tax off of bank checks, which in the first place never should have been levied, I am not in favor of appropriating $980,000 on any grasshopper program.

Until we repeal the law that requires 3 cents postage on first-class mail, and again return to the sane practice of sending a letter anywhere in the United States for 2 cents, I am not in favor of wasting $980,000 trying to control grasshoppers.

Until we are able to unburden the people from the many nuisance taxes which now hang heavily upon their shoulders, I am not willing to further tax the people to raise this additional $980,000 for somebody to waste messing around with grasshoppers.

The people in King Pharaoh's time were plagued with grasshoppers. There have been grasshoppers in all of the centuries that have passed since then. We have them now, and we will always have them. We could waste 10 times this $980,000 and we would not control them. I am not in favor of spending this nearly a million dollars on grasshoppers, hence I object.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. If it was for the boll weevil, would the gentleman from Texas object?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, I would. I am against spending any money that is not absolutely necessary. I object to spending nearly a million dollars for any such purpose at the present time. We who have charge of the business of this Government, before we spend any sum of money, ought to stop and first ask ourselves the question: "Is this necessary; can we do without it?" That is the plan we pursue with respect to our own personal affairs, if we keep our debts paid, and that is the plan we should pursue with respect to all business of the Government. In no other way will we keep this Government out of bankruptcy. I therefore object. The people of the United States do not want $980,000 of their tax money spent for this purpose at this particular crucial time in our history.

I regret having to deny the request of the gentleman from Minnesota, but this bill ought not to pass. This million dollars should be saved for the people. I therefore object to this bill being considered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that permission already.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute on the subject of veterans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, that is a rather large subject and we have just finished a discussion of it.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Then I shall make a parliamentary inquiry. Mr. Speaker, we have two petitions on the Speaker's table, one a petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill (H.R. 1), and the other referring to the repeal of the Economy Act (H.R. 5393). My parliamentary inquiry is this, Will the signatures that are on those petitions remain there until the next regular session, and may they be added to then?

The SPEAKER. They will remain as they are.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I call the attention of Members of the House to those two petitions and ask their signatures.

I filed these two petitions to discharge the committees handling these two bills, and I made a strenuous effort to bring these two bills before the House of Representatives for action in order that something might be done for the veterans of America and for the Federal employees. I want the country to understand that when a bill has remained in a committee for 30 legislative days, slumbering away there without any action being taken, dying away, as it were, any Member of the House may petition to discharge the committee and bring the bill before the House; and if 145 Members attach their signatures to the petition, the committee is automatically discharged and the bill brought before the House.

A short time ago there was a move on foot to raise the number of signatures required from 145 to a majority of the 435 Members of the House, making it almost impossible for any Member to resurrect a bill pigeonholed in some committee. This move was defeated and the 145 rule still stands.

Is it not strange that in this land of democracy the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, which was debated for hours yesterday in the United States Senate, and which was passed by the United States Senate by a vote of 51 to 39, giving something between thirty and seventy million dollars more money to the veterans of America—I say, is it not strange that when this bill comes to the House of Representatives, with its two-thirds Democratic majority, immediately we are all muzzled; that the previous question is immediately ordered and all debate is shut off, so that no one can speak for improved conditions for the soldiers of America who wore the country's uniform in time of war?

The gentleman from Texas, in stating that "we have just finished a discussion of it", is in error. There was no discussion of this question at all in the House. The previous question shut off all discussion of this soldiers' legislation. I say we were muzzled by this Democratic majority. Free discussion was prevented, and we were forced to a roll call without any discussion.

I want the RECORD to show that I am opposed to this kind of procedure, and I am astonished, when a Member of this House asks consent to proceed for the very short period of 1 minute on the subject of the veterans of America, that any Member of this House should object, and make an erroneous statement that there has been a discussion of this subject, when there was no discussion at all. If Members of Congress refuse to debate the subject of veterans' legislation here, I will venture this: That soldier lads will come marching into Congress to replace sitting Members who voted against soldier legislation and who voted against discussion of soldiers' legislation upon this floor.

I want the country to know that I am for complete and absolute repeal of the "Economy League" bill known as "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", and which I wish to refer to as "An act to discredit the Government of the United States", for surely the Government can gain no honor or glory by throwing soldiers out of their hospital beds and reducing hundreds of thousands of men to abject poverty and destitution and sending them to the soup line. I want the soldiers of the country to know that I am making a last-ditch fight for every veteran of every war in America, and I want the Federal employees to know that I have stood with them on every question before this House. The faithful service rendered by the Federal employees entitles them to a living American wage while they are serving the country and to a decent, respectable pension when they have retired.

The soldiers of America who were sent forth to war—Civil War, Spanish War, World War, or whatever struggle may be mentioned in which we have engaged—these men are the forgotten men today. It may not have been clear to the country when the future president spoke of the forgotten man during the campaign, but it may well have been that the forgotten man was a soldier and it seems to me that the forgotten man is the soldier of America, the Federal employee, and the man who served the Government. And it seems to me that we are forgetting the veterans and Federal employees and remembering instead foreigners, kings, and emperors across the ocean, and empires. We remembered them in 1926, when we cut more than 50 percent off their debts, incurred during the war and after the war—a total amount of $12,097,667,000 as shown by the speech of Senator Howell, of Nebraska, in 1932—himself a Spanish-American War veteran, a brilliant Senator, and a good American. And now we are remembering Europe by accepting less than 10 percent—because that is what it amounts to when the payment in silver is considered—and that in the face of the fact that the foreign countries tell us they will pay no more than 10 percent, and refer to the Lausanne agreement, and use the same argument that was used in the discussions concerning Germany, so that the balance of the amount due this country, of which more than one half had already been canceled in 1926, is to be cut down to a dime on the dollar, or less.

It cannot be said that we are accepting this on account, and that we are not canceling, and that only Congress can cancel, because the foreign countries state specifically that they are paying this small amount with the definite and specific understanding that it is to be on the terms of the Lausanne agreement—10 percent, or less than 10 percent, since the payments are being made in silver. And the chief gentleman carrying on the negotiations as unofficial Ambassador to Europe is Norman H. Davis, many times on the J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. preferred list, propagandist, and fugitive from justice, as shown by Congressman TINKHAM'S speech on this floor, and those who were associated with him in Europe are still there, evidently carrying out the wishes of the great banking House of Morgan to the detriment of this country. I sincerely hope that the four distinguished appointed delegates will undo the damage done by Mr. Davis and his associates, and represent America to the end that this money will be paid into our empty Treasury. That might help to balance the Budget.

The Democratic membership may shut off discussion on soldiers' legislation in this House now, but they are not going to be able to shut off discussion in the 1934 campaign and in the 1936 campaign. The soldiers of America and their friends will speak then, and it is my belief they will speak in no uncertain language.

CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE NINTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 813) to remove the limitation on the filling of the vacancy in the office of senior circuit judge for the ninth judicial circuit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a circuit judge to fill the vacancy in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Judicial Circuit occasioned by the death of Hon. William B. Gilbert. A vacancy occurring at any time in the office of circuit judge referred to in this section is authorized to be filled.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Texas to 20 minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to restore to the ninth circuit a fourth judge, who has been there for several years. Under the act of 1929 creating the fourth judgeship it was provided that upon the death of the senior circuit judge such vacancy should not be filled unless authorized by Congress. The senior circuit judge has died. This bill authorizes the filling of the vacancy. The ninth circuit has a greater amount of business than most of the circuits in this country.

I quote from the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 813) to remove the limitation on the filling of the vacancy in the office of senior circuit judge for the ninth judicial circuit, after consideration, reports the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill authorizes the appointment of a circuit judge for the ninth circuit to succeed Hon. William B. Gilbert, deceased. Such appointment, under existing law, is prevented by a limitation in section 2, chapter 413, Forty-fifth Statutes 1414. There are now three circuit judges in the circuit. Your committee is of the opinion that four judges are required properly to discharge the business of the circuit court of appeals.

The ninth circuit is composed of the following States: Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington, and the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska. The court also hears appeals from the United States Court for China.

From information furnished the committee by the State Bar of California, the following appears:

"The population of the ninth circuit has increased from 3,204,752 in 1900 to 10,131,325 in 1930.

"In 1900 there were 11 district judges within the circuit, while there are now 28.

"During the fiscal years 1900–29 the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has disposed of more cases than any other circuit except the second, where there are now 6 judges, and the eighth, which was recently divided into 2 circuits, the new eighth with 6 judges (1 retired) and the tenth with 4 judges."

The report of the judicial conference, published in the Annual Report of the Attorney General for the fiscal year 1932, page 8, contains this paragraph:

"There is, however, a special exigency in the ninth circuit, where there are at present only two circuit judges. The pressure of the work of the district courts is such that district judges are not available to carry on continuously the work of the circuit court of appeals. As a result, it appears that the court has been compelled at times to sit with only two judges. To provide adequate service in that court there should not only be a successor to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Rudkin but there should be a removal of the existing limitation upon the appointment of a successor to Judge Gilbert (act of Mar. 1, 1929, c. 413, secs. 1 and 2, 45 Stat. 1414; U.S.C., title 28, sec. 213 (b)). The conference renews its recommendation to this effect."

The Attorney General also favors this proposed legislation as indicated by the following excerpt from a communication which he addressed to the Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee under date of May 2, 1933:

"For the past 3 years the conference of senior circuit judges has recommended legislation to provide for the appointment of a successor to Judge Gilbert and this Department has several times expressed its approval of such legislation. The Department file on this matter contains resolutions urging enactment of legislation to provide for the appointment of a fourth judge in the ninth circuit from the Bar Association of San Francisco and the Montana State Bar Association. The material at hand convinces me of the necessity for this legislation."

Justice William H. Sawtelle, of the ninth circuit, in citing the fact that the work of the court in 10 years increased 58 percent; that from 192 cases docketed in 1921, there were 327 cases in the fiscal year 1931; that in 1900 the ninth circuit reviewed the decisions of 11 United States district judges, whereas in 1930 it reviewed the decisions of 28 district judges, concluded:

"If we are not given an additional judge one of three things must happen—

"(1) We must continue to work overtime at the risk of impairing our health.

"(2) We must let the work get behind.

"(3) We must turn out opinions without giving them the consideration that their importance warrants."

This bill has been urged by the Attorney General. It is approved and urged by the bar associations of the ninth judicial circuit. It is urged by the Attorney General. It has been passed by the Senate. It has been reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. Is it not true that quite a large number of new Federal judges have been urged by the Department of Justice, and in what respect does the judgeship in which the gentleman is interested differ from some score of others which have been recommended by the Department during the last year or two.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I may say to my distinguished friend that it differs in this respect: That the judicial conference and the Attorney General have not urged any additional circuit judges, as far as I am informed, except this one.

Mr. TARVER. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. They have urged quite a number of circuit judges as well as district judges.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Circuit judges? That is not my information, and such is not the report of the judicial conference, headed by Chief Justice Hughes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman was not here when this fourth judge was provided for the California circuit.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. May I interpose, this is not merely for California but it is for the entire ninth judicial circuit, comprising 7 States and 2 Territories.

Mr. BLANTON. But if the gentleman had been here he would remember there was a sick judge out there who was not able to transact business, and they came here and asked for an extra judge to fill his place during his lifetime. They assured Congress at that time that when the sick judge died there would not be a successor appointed for him; that that would end it. Why do they not keep faith with the Congress? Why do they come here now and ask for another? I do not think it is fair, either to the Congress or to the people of the United States.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield.

Mrs. KAHN. Might I say that when the other judge was appointed, the population of the ninth judicial circuit at that time was 3,204,000? It has increased to 10,131,325 in 10 years. There were 11 district judges then within the circuit. There are now 28. Those men have on an average of nearly 100 cases a year to decide, which is entirely too many for any judge to pass upon.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know anything about what time those three Federal judges are busy each year? Possibly if they worked a few more hours each week there would be no congestion. I am afraid they are idle much of the time.

Mrs. KAHN. They may do that in the Texas circuit, but they do not do it in the ninth circuit. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. My experience has been that if they would really do a day's work about 5 days a week, about 4 weeks a month, and about 10 or 11 months in the year they could take care of every bit of business out there.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Texas the fact that out in the West we have a great many interstate commerce cases and bus cases, and that the law requires 3 judges to sit upon those cases, 1 judge from the circuit court of appeals and 2 district judges. There are enough of those cases to require that one man, just to keep going around and sitting with the other judges on the bench. In the West when we have work to do we work 25 hours a day—12 hours during the day, 12 hours at night, and during the noon hour. We do not do the way they do down in Texas.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. How long since this judge died?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I do not recall at this moment.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman is wanting to create a new judgeship in place of the judgeship which became vacant through the death of the incumbent?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. When did he die?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I have forgotten the date.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Judge Rudkin died about 2½ years ago.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the lady from California [Mrs. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the applause, but I hope you will "say it with votes." [Applause.]

In the ninth circuit district there are included the States of Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington, the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska, and occasionally the court hears appeals from the United States Court for China.

Most of the Members of this House are lawyers and can well appreciate the number of cases that must come from all those States into the court.

As I said before, the population has increased from 3,000,000 to 10,000,000 since this judge was appointed. We have the approval of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House. This bill passed without opposition in the Senate. It has the endorsement of the bar associations of every single one of those States, and it has the unanimous endorsement of every Member of the House from those States. It seems to me under those circumstances, with the enormous rush of business which the ninth circuit district has, we are entitled to the extra judge.

This circuit between 1900 and 1929 disposed of more cases than any other circuit except the second, where there are now 6 judges, and the eighth, which was recently divided into 2 circuits, the new eighth circuit district with 6 judges, 1 retired, and the tenth, with 4 judges. So it seems to me that with the number of cases coming before the ninth circuit district, we certainly are entitled to this extra judge.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. KAHN. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the distinguished gentlewoman from California know how far the calendar is behind?

Mrs. KAHN. No, I do not; but I do know that with the opening of the next session they will have about 300 cases to hear.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. KAHN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. I wish to say just a word. I am from Oregon. I know there is great pressure in Oregon for the additional judge.

The statement made by the gentlewoman from California is true. There are now pending in the circuit courts there something like 300 cases. There is a great demand from the bar of Oregon for this additional judge.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Members of the House will appreciate my own record with reference to new judgeships. I have opposed the creation of additional Federal judges wherever the work of the Federal court could be carried on with the present personnel.

In this instance a very strong case was made out for the need of this additional judge in the ninth circuit. As has been stated already, they have a great many cases, apparently, out in that country which require 3 judges. I assume they have 2 district judges and 1 judge from the Circuit Court of Appeals. This leaves only 2 judges to sit in the consideration of matters which come before that court. They are something like 100 cases behind now, I believe.

It was our opinion, after having given the matter consideration, that that court is being driven too hard. There is a point beyond which economy is not economy. I think with my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that many of these Federal judges do not work as they ought to work; but the number of opinions being written by the judges in this circuit is greater than should be if the cases are to be well considered. We cannot afford to have these judges, who have the last word to say in most matters, without sufficient time properly to prepare their decisions.

Just one further statement. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to the fact that before the passage of the act of 1925 when the obligatory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was much greater than it is now, there was not the same urgent necessity that now obtains with reference to the Circuit Courts of Appeals. They now in this country are very largely the courts of last resort. I believe if the gentleman from Texas had opportunity to consider the situation in this circuit, he would not have interposed his objection. He does a great deal of good service in this House.

I hope the House will pass this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is no proper atmosphere in which to pass sane legislation. We are in the closing hours of Congress. We have matters up here of extreme importance. Our friend from Texas as Chairman of the great Judiciary Committee of this House has unusual powers. He comes in here on the floor from time to time and we grant him unanimous consent to do this and unanimous consent to do that.

We have been in session continuously since March 9 in the President's special session, which is now practically 4 months in length. If this bill were such an urgent matter, of such great public necessity, why has not my friend come in here during the past 3 months with this measure when we were not in such a turmoil, when we could think normally? And the fact that he has not done this, because he is an energetic man and a man of splendid attainments and good judgment and has the interests of the country at heart, especially the judiciary, because he is the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to my mind is the best argument against the urgent necessity of this bill.

I want to call your attention to something that ought to appeal to all of you. The President down here in the White House is sweating blood trying to get this country back to normalcy, so far as finances are concerned. He has been trying to save the Government from bankruptcy. He has even been cutting the compensation of soldiers to do it.

In just a few days the Supreme Court is going to adjourn for 3 months; in just a few days every Federal circuit court in the United States is going to adjourn for 3 months; in a few days this particular circuit court out on the west coast is going to adjourn for 3 months. If you pass this bill, just as soon as this judge is confirmed by the Senate, the first thing he will do will be to hold up his hand and take the oath of office which puts him on the pay roll of the Government, drawing the salary of a Federal circuit judge, and for 3 months he will not do a lick of work.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TARVER. The statement was made a while ago by one of the speakers that the Judiciary Committee was unanimous in reporting this bill.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. No; I did not say unanimous.

Mr. TARVER. No; not the gentleman, but I said one of the speakers. Being a member of the Judiciary Committee I wish to correct that statement.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from Georgia is an excellent and able and efficient member of the committee.

Mr. TARVER. And I may say in regard to this bill that I did not vote in favor of a favorable report on it, and I may say to the gentleman there are efforts being made in various sections of the United States to create additional judgeships. The gentleman knows that lawyers are always in favor of creating additional judgeships.

Mr. BLANTON. There are always applicants for such positions even in Congress.

Mr. TARVER. One is being sought in my State and in my district in Georgia at this time, and has been for some years.

Mr. BLANTON. I know numerous lawyers right here on the floor now who would like to exchange their present position for a Federal judgeship.

Mr. TARVER. And if this bill is passed it will be the first of a regular barrage of bills to create Federal judgeships throughout the United States where they are now desired and where the Department of Justice has recommended they be established.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, certainly.

Our good colleague, with whom I have served here so long and whom I love dearly, the gentlewoman from California, mentioned the Federal judge down in my district. I want her to know that we have the best Federal judge in the United States in my district.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

The gentlewoman from California talked about the necessity for them to try 100 cases. The Federal judge of my district tries several hundred cases a year.

I want to ask the sane legislators here who believe in sane, orderly government, whether we ought to pass such a bill as this in the closing hours of Congress?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment, if I have time.

I want to put this proposition up to the majority leader and the minority leader whether they think it is right and proper to burden the taxpayers at this particular time with an extra judge, who for 3 months will not do a bit of work, whose court for 3 months will not be in session, and I want them to remember that these Federal judges are the particular class of officials in the United States who do not subject themselves to the law that requires all the rest of us to pay income taxes to the Government. This judge will be one of the few in the United States who is immune from paying income taxes. He will draw all his salary and keep it all. Oh, it is all right for us to give up part of our salary for income taxes, it is all right for the soldiers to give up part of their compensation to help run the Government, but this will be one judge, one superman, who will not have to give up a cent to help carry on the expense of this Government, and for the next 3 months will draw a large salary and not do any work whatever, because it will be summer-vacation time for judges.

Mr. SISSON. Is it the position of the gentleman that since the repeal of the noble experiment is to be written into the statute books, there will be fewer cases in the Federal courts, both in Texas and in California?

Mr. BLANTON. I want you to get some speeches that were made by my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], the Chairman of this great Judiciary Committee, which are in the RECORD, where he said it was almost a scandal when Congress created new judges who did not spend enough time on their benches and did not try enough cases.

He expressed the opinion, which made an impression on my mind, that the judges ought to do more work, and that we ought not to create new ones. If they did more work we would not have so much use for new judges.

Now, I want to put it up to you as a sane business proposition. Do you not think we can wait until we come back here in the regular session? Do you not think that is the proper thing to do?

Mr. TRAEGER. Is the gentleman asking me? If he is, I will answer the question.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman a lawyer?

Mr. TRAEGER. I am.

Mr. BLANTON. If he is——

Mr. TRAEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. For a brief question only.

Mr. TRAEGER. Did the gentleman hear the story that was told in the Senate yesterday, where the Negro wanted a part of everything or all of nothing?

Mr. BLANTON. I heard it here today, but I cannot yield for stories. I did not yield for that.

Mr. TRAEGER. I have spent more time in court than the gentleman has.

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman gets leave to ask a question and asks a civil question others will yield to him; but when he takes advantage of someone on the floor and asks him to yield and then asks an uncivil question, he will never get others to yield to him again. I want to suggest to him that it pays to be civil.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a civil question?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield gladly to a civil gentleman.

Mr. KENNEY. If the Republican lady wants the appointment of a good Democratic judge, does not the gentleman think that we ought to give it to her?

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer my friend by telling him what the present Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary said about political appointments for Federal judges when the Republicans were creating 24 new Federal judges just following the Wilson administration. He said in 1922:

> We must not be Democrats and Republicans when we face a question of this sort.
> I tell you that in a time like this, when there are grave questionings in the hearts of many of the people of this country with regard to the integrity of their officials, the honesty of governmental administration generally, we cannot afford to have the suspicion rest against the judge or against the position which he holds that his job was created for the sake of politics; because, gentlemen, if the facts justify the suspicion that the job has been created for political considerations, you cannot make the people believe that political consideration stopped short of filling the position. That is why you create the position—to put the man in it. When you go before the tax-burdened people this fall with these unnecesary judgeships, you may be able to help some individual Members of Congress who have gotten these judgeships for their respective districts and for their States, but you must face the people of the country as a whole, who are required to pay the taxes for their maintenance, and you must face the people of the country as a whole, who, I believe, do not favor and have virtue enough to resent "playing politics" with Federal judgeships.

Let me say to the gentleman that I was in the House at one session of Congress when there were 24 new Federal judges created by the Republicans soon after they came into power following the Wilson administration. That is too many new judges. It is easy to get a bill passed for a new judge. It is always easy to get a bill passed for any new position, because there is always somebody seeking and ready to fill it. We ought to stop this spending of public money. We ought to take a sane view of this matter, and I think we ought to kill this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. I will yield 5 minutes to my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE], who is always ready to speak against bad bills. [Laughter.]

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened as earnestly as I could, and I have not heard yet any substantial explanation given why we should create this new position. In line with the general economy program of the administration it seems to me that we ought not to do this unless clear and convincing proof has been shown that there is a real necessity for this additional expense.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Did the gentleman hear the lady from California state that since the last judge of that district was appointed the population of the district has increased from 3,000,000 to 10,000,000?

Mr. McFARLANE. I heard a statement to that effect.

Mr. MOTT. Does not the gentleman think that that is one good reason for the appointment of an additional judge?

Mr. McFARLANE. The things that I should like to know, and if the lady can give us that information, I think it would be illuminating, is how long these judges in that circuit actually serve on the bench and how many cases they dispose of; in other words, the condition of the docket, how much work has been turned out by them. I should like to have those statistics.

Mr. MOTT. It is my recollection that the gentlewoman from California gave that.

Mrs. KAHN. I have a telegram here which I just received from Judge Sawtelle, one of the judges of the district, that reads as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., June 15, 1933.

Hon. LAWRENCE LEWIS,
House of Representatives Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Re necessity fourth judge of Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit. Number of cases submitted in 1933 to date, 150; number on Seattle and Portland calendars to be submitted in September, 30; number to be submitted in October at San Francisco, 125; number of 3-judge cases in 1933 to date, 6; number of petitions for appeal in bankruptcy matters, approximately 25. Twenty-two cases submitted last October, 23 submitted in February, and 45 submitted at the May term undecided. Opinion in these 90 cases should be prepared between this date and September. A number of them present very difficult problems. Last year we had two involved cases, each of which required 1 month of careful study. Absolutely necessary that we have four judges if work of the court is to be properly considered and disposed of. We had four judges for many years, when the work was only 50 percent of what it is now. When one of the judges is absent on 3-judge cases which involve constitutional questions and rates of public utilities, the work of the court is terribly handicapped.

WILLIAM H. SAWTELLE,
United States Circuit Judge.

That is signed by Judge Sawtelle of the circuit court. I have also a telegram from the three judges—Judge Sawtelle, Judge Wilbur, and Judge Gerracht—and a telegram from the State Bar Association of California.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentlewoman has stated about the condition of the docket. Does she have any information there showing how many cases the judges have disposed of in this circuit, and how many cases were on the docket 2 years ago and a year ago, and how much work they have actually accomplished in the last year?

Mrs. KAHN. I have not the exact number of cases. I have here a tabulation of the cases disposed of in the ninth district. In 1932 there were 378 docketed and 322 disposed of by the court. In the 10 years ending 1928, 2,512 cases were docketed and 2,474 cases disposed of.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Does the lady suppose if she gets this new judgeship that the other three will donate the 15-percent cut in salary back to the Treasury?

Mrs. KAHN. The new Federal judge has to donate it, because he will be appointed after the law is passed.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. How about the old ones?

Mrs. KAHN. I do not control their pocketbooks.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the lady from California probably does not know that if these judges get shorthanded they can have other judges from other districts where the business is not congested transferred there to help them.

I want to make a suggestion to my friend from Colorado [Mr. LEWIS]. It is admitted here that this court will not meet until September.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; in a moment. It is admitted that the court will not meet until September. If the gentleman from Colorado who made this motion will ask to amend the motion to suspend the rules and provide that the position be not filled until September 1, he would save the salary of this judge for that time, while he is doing no work.

Mrs. KAHN. Then it must go back to the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman do that?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The gentleman well knows the bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that does not make any difference. They do not hesitate to hold up our bills over there. They do not hesitate to put amendments on our bills, some amendments 15 or 20 pages long, in the dying hours of Congress. They do with our bills just as they please over there. Why not amend it, when by doing so we will save money?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I know as a matter of personal information that Judge Sawtelle and Judge Wilbur worked during the whole summer on cases when they did not sit.

Mr. BLANTON. Could they do that during playtime out there in that fine west-coast climate?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. With refreshing grace.

Mr. BLANTON. I am one who cannot support the bill. I have registered my protest against the bill and I have done my duty. In this atmosphere during the closing hours of Congress you will likely pass this bill, but it should not pass.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Not being a lawyer, I should like to ask is it customary for judges during vacation time to read up briefs and become acquainted with the cases?

Mr. BLANTON. No. They are taking vacations.

On December 9, 1921, there was a blanket bill before this House to appoint 22 additional Federal judges. At that time their salary was only $7,500. Later their salary was raised to $10,000. The expense of that bill at that time was 22 judges at $7,500 each, aggregating $165,000. Then there were 22 secretaries and stenographers for these judges at $1,500 each, which made the further sum of $33,000. Then there were 22 court criers costing $13,200, making a total cost of $211,200 per annum for that bill.

I remember distinctly that our present Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. SUMNERS] took the floor against that bill. He stated that Chief Justice Taft had been before the committee and testified that "in some places there would be a judge who had but half of his time occupied." And he said that Chief Justice Taft made the further significant statement that "dockets are quite misleading in the number of cases they seem to show, as there was a lot of stuffing in the dockets, because many cases should be dismissed."

That bill was amended by the committee, so that it carried 24 new Federal judges, as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

"For the district of Massachusetts, 2; for the eastern district of New York, 1; for the southern district of New York, 2; for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, 1; for the western district of Pennsylvania, 1; for the eastern district of Virginia, 1; for the northern district of Texas, 1; for the southern district of Florida, 1; for the eastern district of Michigan, 1; for the northern district of Ohio, 1; for the middle district of Tennessee, 1; for the northern district of Illinois, 1; for the eastern district of Illinois, 1; for the district of Minnesota, 1; for the eastern district of Missouri, 1; for the western district of Missouri, 1; for the eastern district of Oklahoma, 1; for the district of Montana, 1; for the northern district of California, 1; for the southern district of California, 1; and for the district of Arizona, 1. Said judges shall be residents of the districts for which appointed and shall receive the same salary and allowances and shall possess, exercise, and perform the same jurisdiction, powers, and duties as is now provided by law."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

"Page 2, line 4, after the semicolon, strike out the words 'For the eastern district of Virginia, 1.'"

That was in December 1921, just after the Republicans had come back into power, and they were hungry for political appointments.

Again, on May 5, 1922, I heard my colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] take this floor and explain just how he and the committee were convinced that new Federal judges should be appointed, and I quote his exact language, for this is what he then said:

The Attorney General told us that we needed them. I am afraid we were just a bit flabbergasted, so we accepted; at least we were much persuaded by his judgment and a very promiscuous and imposing array of figures furnished.

And so today we are furnished with an array of figures. And we are told by various officials that this judge is needed.

And, Mr. Speaker, I remember distinctly the speech of my colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], now Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, when in this House on September 11, 1922, among other things he said:

I am referring now to the new judge for the State of New Mexico. The record shows that the judge now provided for the State of New Mexico—the judge already there during the fiscal year covered by the last report of the Attorney General—tried only 44 cases, criminal and civil together—44 cases only—and yet this administration is putting in a new judge there. Why? Politics! The rankest sort of politics. I hate to say that, but it is a palpable fact. Forty-four cases tried in one year, and we create a new judge for the district. Think of it, gentlemen. We had already added a new judge to each of the districts of California, a new judge to Arizona, 1 for the eastern district of Oklahoma, 1 for the northern district of Texas, and 1 for the district of Montana, absolutely surrounding the district of New Mexico with new judges and most considerably oversupplying that western territory. And now you are sending an additional judge to New Mexico. What for? Let us be honest about it. Is he needed in that district? No. Nobody can seriously contend that. I assume nobody here will contend that he is needed there. Is he needed in any of the territory from the Pacific Ocean straight through to the Atlantic, in any of the Western or Southern States? Nobody can contend that he will be needed there. He cannot be used anywhere without transporting him across the continent at Federal expense for transportation and $10 per day additional for each day that he is out of his district. Then why is this new judge provided for New Mexico, for a district where he is not needed and in a territory where he cannot be used? Simply, gentlemen, to help out the New Mexico delegation in Congress, or some member of that delegation, you are asked to contribute as a matter of politics this Federal judgeship with its added burden upon a tax-burdened people. I say with all respect, gentlemen, it is a disgrace to the American Congress. You cannot defend it, and you cannot afford to do it.

Thus spake our present distinguished Chairman of the Judiciary Committee in this House on September 11, 1922. But when the matter came to a vote I demanded the yeas and nays, and the bill was passed with 139 yeas and 78 nays.

I realize full well that it is impossible to stop this bill today. In this atmosphere sane legislation is impossible. Our minds are somewhere else. We are thinking of adjourning and going home. But I have done my duty in raising my protest against the passage of this bill. I cannot do more. I would stop this bill, if I had the power. It ought to be stopped. We do not need any more Federal judges. We have enough now. Let the ones we have do the work.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were ayes 113 and noes 8.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS IN AMERICAN SHIPS

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution (H.J.Res. 207) requiring agricultural products to be shipped in vessels of the United States where the Reconstruction Finance Corporation finances the exporting of such products.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That it is the sense of Congress that in any loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to foster the exporting of agricultural products, provision shall be made that such products shall be carried exclusively in vessels of the United States, unless, as to any or all of such products, the United States Shipping Board, after investigation, shall certify to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that vessels of the United States are not available in sufficient numbers, or in sufficient tonnage capacity, or on necessary sailing schedule, or at reasonable rates.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question in regard to this bill.

This bill provides for the financing of the shipment of agricultural products in boats under American control. I should like to ask the gentleman, inasmuch as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has just made a loan of $50,000,000 to ship agricultural products to China, whether or not they are also going to make a loan to Russia, to ship agricultural products in American ships to Russia. Can the gentleman tell me that?

Mr. BLAND. I cannot.

Mr. McFADDEN. Can the gentleman also tell me whether these shipments of cotton and wheat to China are going to be made in American boats?

Mr. BLAND. My understanding of the contract is that it specifically requires that at least 50 percent of the products be shipped in American-flag ships. As to the rest, there is a provision which allows the shipments to be made in vessels of other countries.

That question came before the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, on a resolution introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER]. We gave it consideration, but as the contract was a concluded contract, we felt it was wise not to interfere further than to adopt a committee resolution which we sent to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation expressing the wish of the committee that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should use its agencies and powers to secure shipment in American bottoms.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am prompted to ask that because of the fact that the press for the last few days has been indicating that we are going to make large loans to Russia through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That is important for us to know about, because I am satisfied in my own mind that there is a movement on abroad to involve the United States with Russia and China against Japan. I am interested also for this further reason that at the economic conference in London there is a discussion going on in regard to making further loans to finance European countries.

I am wondering whether, inasmuch as the other evening we took off the limitation on which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation makes these loans, there is in the offing a plan to finance further shipments of goods abroad through loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That is particularly pertinent because of the fact that the foreigners cannot now pay what they owe us for what they have already purchased, and they are only paying us 10 cents on the dollar, and that in silver, upon which they make 20 or 30 cents per ounce.

Mr. BLAND. This bill does not undertake to finance shipments. All it requires is that if loans are made, the products purchased shall go in American ships.

Mr. McFADDEN. I should like to find out from someone who should know about it whether there is a program on to grant more loans through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or through the Federal Reserve or some other institution to finance the foreigner, on the theory that it is going to help the agricultural situation here. I want to know if we are going to use the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to cover sale and shipment of American goods abroad.

Mr. BLAND. I cannot give the gentleman that information.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. By what authority do we make loans to any foreign government?

Mr. BLAND. I am not talking about foreign governments. This is not for the purpose of financing shipments.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I am very much in favor of the bill. I wish the gentleman from Virginia would explain his own experience in reference to this matter, because I had many protests in Boston in reference to the plan when they were exchanging the wheat and cotton with Brazil for coffee. The Brazilians used Brazilian ships to bring the coffee up to this country and then the Brazilian ships carries the wheat and cotton back to Brazil. The American shippers protested. I hope the gentleman will give us the benefit of his reasons why this should be put into effect.

Mr. BLAND. The reason I think it should be put into effect is that in the contract with China we provided that only 50 percent should be carried in American bottoms. China has no merchant marine. I thought it would be a good time to have such a resolution passed. The resolution was introduced by Mr. MONTET, of Louisiana, and the members of the committee thought it would be an opportune time to express the sense of Congress that these shipments should go in American vessels.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. Does the gentleman know of any other instances such as I have cited where foreign ships have carried American produce?

Mr. BLAND. None have come to my mind at the present time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BLAND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SURVIVAL OF CERTAIN ACTIONS IN FAVOR OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 815) to provide for the survival of certain actions in favor of the United States, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported first.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no civil action to recover damages, brought by the United States or in its behalf, or in which the United States shall be directly or indirectly interested, and pending against any defendant prior to the time of his death, in any court of the United States, shall abate by reason of the death of any such defendant; but any such action shall survive and be enforceable against the estate of any such deceased defendant. This act shall not be construed to deprive the plaintiff in any such action of any remedy which he may have against a surviving defendant.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to ask my colleague a question, how many such cases are there within the purview of the gentleman?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in reply to my colleague from Texas, and I think it is due the House, I shall make a very brief statement in reference to this bill.

This bill is intended merely to preserve the right of the United States to pursue under its judgment the estate of the person against whom the judgment is rendered and who since such rendition has died.

I may say to my colleague from Texas I must confess myself subject to criticism with reference to some of these items of legislation that are coming from the Committee on the Judiciary, but this particular matter reached the attention of the Committee on the 9th of this month. It was called to our attention by the Attorney General, and it has also been called to our attention by our representative who has been prosecuting a suit against Doheny.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection. If it will help the Government to prosecute Doheny that is a good and sufficient reason for passing the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

"SEC. 20. The President is hereby authorized under the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, to establish such number of special boards (the majority of the members of which were not in the employ of the Veterans' Administration at the date of enactment of this act), as he may deem necessary to review all claims (where the veteran entered service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disability is not the result of his own misconduct), in which presumptive service connection has heretofore been granted under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, wherein payments were being made on March 20, 1933, and which are held not service-connected under the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress. Members of such boards may be appointed without regard to the Civil Service laws and regulations, and their compensation fixed without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. Such special boards shall determine, on all available evidence, the question whether service-connection shall be granted under the provisions of the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress (notwithstanding the evidence may not clearly demonstrate the existence of the disease or any specific clinical findings within the terms of or period prescribed by regulation 1, part 1, subparagraph (c) or instruction numbered 2, regulation numbered 1, issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress), and shall in their decisions resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof in such cases being on the Government.

"Notwithstanding the provisions of section 17, title I, Public No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any claim for yearly renewable term insurance on which premiums were paid to the date of death of the insured and any claim for pension, compensation allowance, or emergency officers' retirement pay under the provisions of laws repealed by said section 17 wherein claim was duly filed prior to March 20, 1933, may be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration on the proofs and evidence received by the Veterans' Administration prior to March 20, 1933, and any person found entitled to the benefits claimed shall be paid such benefits in accordance with and in the amounts provided by such prior laws, provided that the payments hereby authorized to be made shall continue only to include June 30, 1933, and only one original adjudicatory action and one appeal may be had in such cases. Where a veteran died prior to March 20, 1933, under conditions which warrant the payment of, or reimbursement for, burial expenses, such payment or reimbursement may be made in accordance with the laws in effect prior to March 20, 1933, provided that claim for such payment or reimbursement must be filed within 3 months from the date of passage of this act.

"Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the decisions of such special boards shall be final in such cases, subject to such appellate procedure as the President may prescribe, and, except for fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, 75 percent of the payments being made on March 20, 1933, therein shall continue to October 31, 1933, or the date of special board decision, whichever is the earlier date: Provided, That where any case is pending before any one of the special boards on October 31, 1933, the President may provide for extending the time of payment until decision can be rendered. The President shall prescribe such rules governing reviews and hearings as may be deemed advisable. Payment of salaries and expenses of such boards and personnel assigned thereto shall be paid out of and in accordance with appropriations for the Veterans' Administration.

"Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the rates of compensation payable for directly service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, in receipt of compensation on March 20, 1933, be reduced more than 25 percent, except in accordance with the regulations issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to Federal employees, hospitalized cases, and cases of beneficiaries residing outside of the continental limits of the United States; and in no event shall death compensation, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, being paid to widows, children, and dependent parents of deceased World War veterans under the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, on March 20, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, whether the death of the veteran on whose account compensation is being paid was directly or presumptively connected with service.

"Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who served 90 days or more, was honorably discharged from the service, is 55 years of age or over, is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President, shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 per month."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H.R. 5389 and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WOODRUM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

THE INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5389, known as the "Independent offices appropriation bill" contains a number of appropriations, some of which I approve, and some of which I do not approve.

By reason of the economy bill, known as "Public No. 2", the appropriation for the veterans, in my judgment, is not sufficient, but in the final analysis will be the result of a compromise and the best that can be obtained at this time, and that part of the bill together with certain other necessary appropriations to operate and maintain the Government I do approve. However, there are certain other appropriations that are thrown into this bill that I do not approve, and if I had the opportunity to vote "yes" or "no"—that is, for or against them—my vote would be no—against these appropriations. The appropriations I would be opposed to would be the following appropriations: Appropriations to maintain Executive Mansion greenhouses.

The appropriation of $198,000 for the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission.

$120,000 for the Board of Mediation.

$8,800 for the Commission of Fine Arts.

$96,650 for the George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission.

$10,000 for the Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission.

$310,000 to the United States Shipping Board.

$48,500 to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy.

$13,950 for the enforcement of the Black Bass Law.

There are quite a number of other appropriations provided in this bill, concerning which I am in some doubt, as to whether they are necessary and the reasonableness of the same, some of which are for the continuing of buildings that are already under construction, such as the Supreme Court Building, and other appropriations are for departments, the usefulness of which I am not advised.

It might be well to state, however, that this is the same bill that was passed by the last session of Congress and vetoed by President Hoover; the amount appropriated in that bill other than for veterans has been reduced by approximately 25 percent in this bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under the so-called "Economy Act", or Public, No. 2, and the regulations issued pursuant thereto, the following classes of veterans and their dependents will be entirely eliminated from the pension roll July 1, 1933:

World War presumptive cases, including tuberculosis, mental trouble, cancer, etc	154,843
Dependents of World War veterans (the veterans dying of presumptive disabilities)	36,325
Spanish-American War veterans (some of these will receive $6 a month)	105,660
	296,833

HOUSE COMPROMISE PLAN

When the independent offices appropriation bill was before the House of Representatives, last Saturday, June 10, 1933, an amendment was adopted which would continue each of the 154,843 presumptive cases on the pension roll until October 31, 1933, or until a special board has decided that the case is nonservice connected. In order to prevent encouragement for delay of the cases on review, it was decided to discontinue payments on all of them October 31, 1931, with the understanding that all of them not proven to be nonservice connected after that date, when the board has passed on them, will receive retroactive pay to October 31, 1933.

Under this amendment the burden of proof is placed on the Government to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the case is not service connected; otherwise the veteran will continue to draw his compensation. It is not contemplated that the reviewing board will be restricted to the consideration of the evidence that would be required under Public, No. 2, to service connect a case but will have no restrictions at all; it must find—the Government assuming the burden of proof—beyond a reasonable doubt that the presumptive disability was not incurred in or aggravated by military service. I do not know of stronger language that could be used to protect the presumptive cases.

Under the House compromise plan all the 36,325 widows and orphans of veterans of the World War were restored to the pension roll; they will not receive any reduction at all, but will continue to get what they received under the old law.

Under Public, No. 2, the President is powerless to reinstate the presumptives, veterans and widows, without legislation; Public, No. 2, will cause them to be stricken from the roll July 1, 1933. In order to save them this law must be passed.

The House compromise plan will allow all Spanish-American War veterans who are 55 years of age, substantially disabled and in need, to continue to draw a pension at the minimum rate of $15 a month.

STEIWER-CUTTING AMENDMENT

This amendment is practically the same as the House compromise plan except it provides that all Spanish-American War veterans and their widows shall remain on the pension roll and receive at least 75 percent of what they were receiving prior to March 20, 1933, the date of the enactment of Public, No. 2.

Summed up, the only material difference and practically the only difference between the House and Senate is on the Spanish-American War veterans and widows.

If the Steiwer-Cutting amendment is adopted, the presumptives, veterans and widows, will not be helped any more than they would be under the House compromise plan. We are told that the boards will not be sympathetic and will strike practically all the presumptive veterans from the roll. If the board is arbitrary and unsympathetic under the House plan, it will be no different under the Steiwer-Cutting plan. If these boards do not pass on these cases in the way Congress intends that they shall be passed on or reviewed, there will be another session of Congress in January, and I predict the injustices will be remedied at that time by Congress.

There is no difference between the two plans in regard to service-connected veterans of the World War or Spanish-American War, or the dependents of either; each plan provides that they shall not have their compensation or pensions reduced more than 25 percent.

The more Congress appropriates for non-service-connected veterans the more likely it is that service-connected cases will be required to take a big reduction. Service-connected cases should not be reduced a penny. I opposed reducing the non-service-connected veterans of either the World War or Spanish-American War more than 25 percent, but my opposition was futile.

NEEDS' CLAUSE

Let us see about the needs' clause that is so bitterly opposed. When the country needs man power to fight its wars it is the duty of every young man to offer his life on the field of battle for the cause of his country. When that young man gets older and needs his country—many people insist that the question of need should come in—it is the duty of the country to come to the aid and rescue of its former defender. I realize it is possibly damaging to the cause of all veterans for a few wealthy veterans to draw pensions from the Government for non-service-connected disabilities.

PURGE PENSION ROLLS

It is in the interest of all veterans that the pension rolls be purged of all unmeritorious and undeserving cases. Such corrections will be beneficial to all veterans in the long run. The Government should not require a pauper's oath, but is it unreasonable to require a veteran during this emergency to show need—that is, annual income under a certain amount—in order to get a pension for a non-service-connected disability? I would not willingly require under any circumstances need to be shown for a service-connected disability. If the Government requires a single veteran to state that his annual income is less than $1,000, or a married veteran to state his annual income is less than $2,500, or any other reasonable sum, before granting a pension, is not by any stretch of the imagination requiring a pauper's oath.

BETTER TO GET LITTLE OF SOMETHING THAN A LOT OF NOTHING

Although, under the House plan, the Spanish-American War veterans are not taken care of in the way that we would like for them to be taken care of, shall we jeopardize the chances of 154,843 presumptive cases and the 36,325 widows and orphans to get back on the pension roll July 1, 1934, in order to make a determined effort to get the whole loaf? We will have a chance to increase the pensions of the Spanish-American War veterans at the next session of Congress. I will be in favor of the increase. The Spanish-American War veterans that are affected so materially by the House plan are the ones that have disabilities under 100 percent or partial disabilities that were not caused by their military service. They will continue to draw a pension of $15 a month or more.

The World War veterans who are less than 100 percent disabled will not receive a penny, hereafter, under present laws, for disabilities not caused by their military service. I realize that the question of age should be considered, but a World War veteran that is 99 percent disabled is just as much incapacitated and just as much in need of Government help as the veteran of any other war, regardless of age.

REFERENCE TO INFORMATION

In my speech of June 10, 1933, I fully discussed the different plans pending before Congress; it will be found on pages 5659 to 5663 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

WHAT IS BEST FOR VETERANS

Considering all circumstances, I believe that the cause of the veterans will be better served and the country helped the most by the adoption of the House compromise plan instead of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment. I make that statement for this reason:

The President has told us that he will veto the bill if it contains the Steiwer-Cutting amendment; we will possibly lose any chance of passing another bill at this session and the presumptive World War veterans and widows will be stricken off July 1 if this bill is not passed before that time. Considering the fact the national industries bill, which is supposed to give millions employment, has just passed, the farmers and home owners are expecting a sigh of relief from home and farm mortgages which are bearing a high rate of interest, the farmers also expecting material assistance from other legislation intended to aid them, which will also help the whole country, all contingent upon the success of the present administration, do you think it is a good time to put the veterans in a position of disrupting the whole recovery program? Do not you think it will be much better to take the substantial assistance for the veterans that we know we can get rather than place the veterans in a position before the country that will possibly set their just cause back at least 10 years?

RECOVERED HALF THE GROUND

The Economy Act deprives the World War and Spanish-American War veterans and their dependents of approximately $300,000,000 in compensation and pensions. There were other savings on hospitalization, administration, and for other purposes but approximately $300,000,000 reduction on the classes mentioned. Do you not think $150,000,000 which we are getting restored is substantial? Do you not think it is a long step back in the direction we were prior to March 20, 1933? We cannot expect to recover all the lost ground in one session of Congress. All legislation is a result of compromise. We must give and take. If each of the 435 Members of the House holds out for what he wants we would never have an agreement. Neither side is thoroughly satisfied with a fair compromise.

I sincerely believe it is in the interest of all veterans and the country that the House compromise plan be accepted.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, amendment no. 13 in the independent offices appropriation bill provides authority to the Attorney General to compromise pending suits on war-risk insurance and Government insurance claims. There are at this time pending against the Government 11,837 cases; 1,535 have been disposed of since January 1, in 5 months. Of these, 700 were dismissed; approximately 556 were tried, with verdicts for the Government.

The expense from a salary standpoint of trying these cases was approximately $271 per case. The cases are very largely brought by lawyers in South Carolina, Tennessee, and midwestern lawyers, each lawyer having on hand a large number of cases. Some of them are handling as high as 1,200 insurance cases. Some of the lawyers have been paid out of this proposition as high as $59,000, others close to it.

It does not sound reasonable that all these cases would be turned over to these lawyers without solicitation. It does not sound reasonable that this amendment would have been put into the bill at the sole request of the lawyers who are prosecuting the cases without the consultation and advice of the Veterans' Bureau and the Attorney General's Office.

I have been advised by Mr. Roberts, the counsel of the Veterans' Bureau, that the Bureau did not ask for this provision. I have been informed by Attorney General Cummings personally that he did not favor it, did not want it, and felt that the claimants were entitled to the whole amount or nothing and that the Government was satisfactorily cleaning them up; that the Attorney General's Office was accustomed to recommend to the Veterans' Bureau the payment of a claim if the evidence on hand before the trial indicated that the Government was really liable.

Having all this in mind, I can see no good purpose at the instances of the lawyers for the claimants against the Government to change the law. It savors too much of a racket to me. I hope the House will refuse to put in this amendment.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to vote for the Steiwer-Cutting amendment because I believe it is a measure of essential justice both to the taxpayers and the veterans of this country.

I have the highest admiration and regard for President Roosevelt, but that does not mean that he does my thinking for me. I do my own thinking. I have been a consistent follower and supporter of the President in most instances and I expect to continue to be, but that is because I believe he is everlastingly right in most instances. I think his general program has been most courageous and admirable and that it will put the country on its feet, but I cannot agree with him in respect to the Steiwer-Cutting amendment.

The Steiwer-Cutting amendment makes effective the President's excellent intentions in regard to pension reforms, as we understood those intentions when we passed the Economy Act, and at the same time it irons out some of the most grievous wrongs inflicted by the regulations that were adopted by subordinate officials for the administration of that act.

No right-thinking person can doubt that abuses have grown up in the pension system that should be eliminated. I am in favor of wiping out those abuses and have so voted consistently. In securing the passage of the Economy Act, which I supported, the President undertook to eliminate those abuses. His attention has been so engrossed in formulating and promoting his program for economic rehabilitation at home and world peace that he necessarily has had to leave the drafting of the pension regulations to trusted advisers. In my opinion, they turned out to be bad advisers.

Senator CLARK, of Missouri, a staunch supporter of the administration and a World War veteran, and son of the late Speaker Champ Clark, well said in his speech on the Steiwer-Cutting amendment yesterday:

> Under the powers conferred in the Economy Act, the administrative officials of the Veterans Administration and of the Bureau of the Budget have made regulations which contain instance after instance of what is generally recognized on all sides as constituting most execrable cruelty.

And that is the truth. Execrable cruelty! Should we be "execrably cruel" to men who were maimed and disabled in fighting the battles of their country? The President is kind and humane and he does not realize the effect of these regulations.

If the President could read the correspondence that comes to my office revealing the injustices inflicted on battle-maimed veterans by those regulations, I think he, too, would support the Steiwer-Cutting amendment. When a veteran's lungs were pierced by machine-gun bullets or his eyes were torn out by shrapnel or the seeds of insanity or tuberculosis were planted in his system as the result of war, he became at that very moment a ward of this Nation, and any capitalist, any holder of property, who is not willing to share his last dollar with that unfortunate ought to be ashamed of himself. That constructive work could well be done in the direction of revising the pension rolls every honest person will admit. The rolls should be purged of those whose claims have no merit. But those who went through the hell of war and in that conflict received injuries that have permanently maimed and disabled them and have wrecked their whole lives should be treated with kind consideration.

The Steiwer-Cutting amendment is a fair, honest settlement of the pension problem—fair to the taxpayers because it results in enormous savings to the Federal Treasury and fair to the veterans because it protects them from the grave injustices of the economy regulations. I am equally concerned that justice shall be done to the American taxpayer and the American soldier, and I am convinced that this measure is just to both. The Steiwer-Cutting amendment is not a raid on the Treasury. It is just the opposite. According to estimates the Economy Act with the Steiwer-Cutting amendment will save the taxpayers of the United States the enormous sum of $312,000,000 a year by reducing the Nation's pension bill to that extent. Surely no one can call that a Treasury raid.

It adds only $30,000,000 a year to the expenditures carried by the compromise that was approved by the President and adopted by the House recently. We are spending 110 times that amount on a vast public-works program, 33 times that amount in a Muscle Shoals-Tennessee "paradise" development, and goodness knows how many times that amount in a reforestation experiment. My own thought is that we could well afford to divert some of the reforestation funds to do justice to needy disabled veterans who received their disabilities fighting for their country.

Mr. Speaker, I have been both shocked and amazed by the number and extent of the injustices against combat-disabled war veterans that have been inflicted under the regulations adopted for the enforcement of the Economy Act.

No one who would consult the files of my office and read the great volume of mail that comes to me from disabled veterans could reach any other conclusion than that the Economy Act regulations reek with injustices.

Soldiers maimed in battle, pitiful wrecks of humanity, unable because of injuries received in war to earn any kind of living, find themselves cut off with a mere pittance.

"On July 1", says one, "I will go to a soldiers' home and my wife will go to the poorhouse."

I have faith in President Roosevelt and believe he wants to be fair and humane, but whoever wrote those regulations for him is entitled to a medal for heartlessness.

This is not a wild statement based on the mere assertions of disabled veterans who consider themselves aggrieved. In instance after instance my secretary and I have checked the assertions in the letters against the records of the War Department and the Veterans' Administration and against the files in our office, and we find that the charges of injustice are shockingly true.

Therefore I am going to do what I believe to be the just and right thing to do. I am going to give my vote and my efforts toward wiping out the wrongs that have been imposed on sick and disabled service-connected veterans.

A NEW ECONOMY PROGRAM

The cry has been raised that this would cause an increase of taxes. It would not raise taxes one cent. I have a new economy program under which disabled veterans would receive just and humane treatment and at the same time debt and taxes would be enormously reduced. My plan would be:

First. Repeal the law to establish a "paradise" in Tennessee, known as the "Muscle Shoals bill."

Second. Withdraw the bill which proposes to spend $3,300,000,000 on public works and which places upon the taxpayers an annual carrying charge of $220,000,000, or $50,000,000 more per annum than is necessary to give the service-connected soldiers their dues.

These two bills can wait. In my judgment, regardless of any reference to justice for the soldiers, these two bills should never become effective on economic grounds. In my judgment, they are economically unsound and will only make matters worse by involving the country in a welter of debt beyond the imagination of man.

When the Muscle Shoals bill was before the House, it was stated—and no one challenged the statement—that it would cost the taxpayers $1,000,000,000. The public-works bill carries an appropriation of $3,300,000,000. By repealing the Muscle Shoals law, which has not yet gone into effect, and by withdrawing the public works bill, which has passed the House, but is still before the Senate, we can save the taxpayers of this Nation a debt of $4,300,000,000, an annual carrying charge of about $300,000,000, compared with which the relatively small sum per annum required to do justice to the defenders of the Union who suffer from disabilities due to war service pales into utter insignificance.

As the first step in this program, which I believe to be right and just and in the interest of economy, I introduced a bill to repeal the Muscle Shoals Tennessee Development Act. Before we go into an enterprise that seems like an Elysian dream let us keep our feet on the ground and let us see that justice is done to the soldiers who are suffering incurable injuries received on the battle fronts.

We can and should effect great economies in the administration of veterans' relief, but in all conscience we should do this without taking it out of the backs of the combat-disabled soldiers.

BEYOND FINITE UNDERSTANDING

If the man who wrote the regulations for the enforcement of the Economy Act had been hostile to the veterans; if he had been moved by a spirit of animosity instead of by the love we ought to bear toward the defenders of our country, their widows, and dependents, we might have expected something like the regulations that have been promulgated, but coming from a source that is supposed to recognize the Nation's debt to the soldiers who freely offered their lives to save America and to save civilization, and in so doing received broken bodies and contracted incurable disabilities, these regulations are beyond finite understanding.

I voted for the Economy Act, but I did not vote for these regulations. No, indeed.

My vote was cast for the Economy Act after I had received the most positive assurance that it would be administered under just regulations, and although I want to be fair to everybody connected with the administration of the act, I cannot entirely escape a disagreeable feeling that my trust and confidence have been abused.

What happened? After Congress had voted this blanket authority to revise the pension rolls in the interest, as they thought, of justice, someone to whom the task was delegated apparently slashed pensions without rhyme or reason, perpetrating the grossest injustices on a great many veterans who do not deserve such treatment. This slashing process, with its potpourri of injustices, was revealed when the new regulations were made public and the Veterans' Bureau offices began to function in the task of cutting pensions.

Nothing is finally settled until it is settled right, and this question will be settled right before it is settled at all. The Economy Act was conceived for the laudable purpose of wiping out wrongs against the taxpayers arising from the presence of undeserving persons on the pension rolls, but these regulations merely shift the scenery and relocate the wrong by placing it on veterans whose bodies are racked with service-connected disabilities. One wrong cannot be cured by the commission of another. These regulations are crying to heaven for revision, and they will be revised. Make no mistake about that. They are shot all through with unfairness and injustice, and the American people, who want liberal and humane consideration to rule in dealing with veterans with service-connected disabilities, will never permit these regulations to stand unamended.

I do not know who wrote these regulations, and I hope I never shall know. If I knew him, I would be tempted to repeat to him a remark made to me recently with a touch of humor by a veteran, who said: "I do not know who wrote the regulations, but I do know that he has a heart as big as a chigger." If he is the man I think he is, that castigation does him a serious injustice. I think some superior officer probably said to him: "We ought to save $400,000,000 a year by revising the allowances to veterans"; and, being very efficient, he undertook to make a good job of it and without due thought and consideration cut too deeply.

WHAT IS THE RIGHTEOUS SOLUTION?

Now, what is the righteousness of this problem of soldiers' compensation? What is the justice of it? Let us as Members of Congress get down to brass tacks and seek to analyze the evils that have grown up under the veterans' laws and to apply the remedy, without doing injustice to anyone.

That evils have developed which are an unjustifiable burden on the taxpayers no one will deny. Many comparatively young men with questionable disabilities, and with no disabilities at all of service origin, have managed to get their names engrafted on the pension rolls. They ought not to be there. Many officers of the World War, drawing officers' retired pay, are on the Government's salary rolls and are receiving large salaries in addition to their retired pay. That ought not to be. It was to wipe out these injustices and to save the Nation from financial chaos and ruin by correcting such conditions as this that most of us voted for the Economy Act. We did not dream that regulations would be adopted ripping into service-connected cases and reducing to the very depths of penury and want soldiers of the Republic who certainly earned the right to better treatment when they received permanent combat injuries in fighting for their country.

WARDS OF THE NATION

That constructive work could well be done in the direction of revising the pension rolls every honest person will admit. The rolls should be purged of those whose claims have no merit. But those who went through the horrors of war and in that conflict received injuries that have permanently maimed and disabled them and have wrecked their whole lives should be treated with kind consideration.

SAFE AND SANE LEADERSHIP

I represent a district in which there is a very large population of veterans of all wars. The national headquarters of the American Legion is located in my district and at this point I should like to digress to pay a compliment to the men who represent the Legion in its matters before Congress, outstanding among whom are National Commander Louis A. Johnson, Capt. Watson B. Miller, John Thomas Taylor, and Edward Lewis. While they ably represent their group, they are sanely constructive and, recognizing the extreme need of economy in the public-welfare equation, they are always ready to yield to any reasonable compromise. Their attitude, in short, is very fine. We have there in the heart of the city of Indianapolis a most imposing memorial to the 4,000,000 Americans who in one vast uprising of patriotism went forth a decade and a half ago to give up their lives, if necessary, that civilization might not perish from the earth.

Many of them returned with shattered minds and broken bodies, never again to know what it means to be free from distress and pain, and many of these service-disabled men now find that the financial relief around which they have ordered their lives and on which they depend and to which they have looked forward expectantly for some measure of freedom from suffering, has been cut to almost nothing by the harsh regulations promulgated under the Economy Act.

ENORMOUS MAIL FURNISHES EVIDENCE

Any person who would read the enormous mail that comes to my office day by day would need no more graphic evidence to convince him of the injustice of those regulations than the letters that are constantly pouring in. Day after day the mails bring to me specific instances of glaring wrongs that would be inflicted by these regulations on soldiers with combat disabilities. I shall not burden the record with a large number of citations from this voluminous correspondence but shall set forth a few examples showing how the regulations are operating. An Indianapolis veteran writes:

I received from the Veterans' Administration this week a notice informing me that my pension of $90 a month has been reduced to $34 a month. For a man as badly injured as I am, my arm torn off at the socket, all of the ribs on my side crushed, and a piece of my scalp torn off, which injuries were received in the line of duty, to be cut from $90 to $34 is more than I can see.

Can anyone else, looking at this man's case through the spectacles of justice, see it, either? He adds:

I have not only myself to keep but also have an old mother to support. How that is to be done I don't know.

Nor does anyone else know, unless it be the good God above us.

Another Indianapolis veteran finds his compensation of $20 a month cut off by the regulations. He writes:

Mr. LUDLOW, I could see why that Disability Allowance Act should have been killed, but why a man who is a plain service-connected case, and all records of his case proven, should be cut off I cannot see. If other service-connected cases have been treated like I have been, God pity them.

Another veteran, also of Indianapolis, writes:

Knowing you to be a friend of the ex-service man I am appealing to you in regard to my compensation. I have received a letter notifying me my compensation was cut off. I was wounded twice while in service and my arm is crippled. Every examination shows my wound to be permanent partial disability. I have not had any work for the past 2 years, and taking my compensation away from me means to throw me on charity.

One veteran of my district who has been drawing $50 a month for service-connected pulmonary tuberculosis finds himself reduced to $8 a month, and in a note of despair he writes:

I believe that a cut of 87 percent is not fair to me, and that any amount the Government has paid has not been too much for what I have suffered and no doubt will continue to suffer the rest of my life.

Says another Indianapolis veteran:

Letter under date of May 23 from the Veterans' Administration cuts off my compensation in its entirety. I have been drawing $62.70 per month since September 8, 1930, and compensation in various amounts since date of discharge, and all the records show service-connected disability and hospitalization.

Arthur G. Gresham, a prominent and highly respected Indianapolis veteran, former State commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, writes:

Each day I receive a large number of letters from service men all over the State demanding restoration of compensation of all service-connected cases. These veterans interpret service-connected as any case that has been established under the old law which provides that if a veteran can connect his disability with the service by furnishing substantial medical evidence his case is service-connected. The provision in the regulations issued by the President which states that disability must have been incurred before November 11, 1918, is an injustice and most unfair.

Again I ask for the restoration of all established service-connected cases and for action at once. I ask that you do your part to prevent Congress from adjourning until justice has been done.

Ollie A. Davis, Adjutant of the American Legion, Department of Indiana, sends me some striking examples of the operation of the regulations in Indiana. He says:

We believe that our Representatives should know exactly what is being done toward World War veterans by this new economy bill, and for your information and records I am submitting herewith the results of this new economy program.

On 1,131 claims that have been reviewed in Indianapolis Veterans' Administration office, 362 awards have been discontinued; 303 will receive $8 per month; 181 will receive $20 per month; 82 will receive $40 per month; 42 will receive $60 per month; 21 will receive $80 per month; and the most drastic cut is 76 who were drawing permanent and total of $100 per month have been reduced to $20 per month, which makes a total of over $22,500 that has been cut from 1,131 awards or 65 percent.

I made a personal investigation of four different cases that were rerated under the new schedule which I think that you, as Representatives, should know, and I want to take the time to explain these four different cases, which I am sure you will agree is too much of a cut on these cases.

2. A veteran suffered complete loss of creative organs, muscle involvements in thigh, and limitations left ankle, all results of gunshot wounds in combat. He had been rated permanent total since day of battle and drew $125 per month under the old law. Under the new law he will draw $40 per month.

3. A veteran served on the Mexican border in 1916, was treated for intestinal trouble and constipation, was discharged February 1917. He reenlisted in the World War in 1917, serving in battles in France. He had a severe aggravated condition, formerly rated total, colitis, severe. He was drawing $100 per month under the old law and is now rated disability not due to service and receives no award.

4. A veteran had active pulmonary tuberculosis at time of discharge. After serving overseas, and after returning to the States, for 18 months he was in a tuberculosis hospital or in the far West climate for his condition. The condition became arrested, he was drawing $50 per month and is now rated no percent disabled.

These are only four out of many that are being reduced under the new law and we leave this up to you to decide whether or not the ex-service man of the World War is receiving justice under this Economy Act. We sincerely hope you will support the veteran and not reduce his compensation any more than the cuts taken by yourself or all Government employees, which is 15 percent.

The files of my office are bursting with letters like the above, all telling of the feeling that has been aroused among World War veterans with bona-fide service-connected cases.

SPANISH WAR VETERANS ALSO ILL-TREATED

And now I want to say a word in behalf of Spanish War veterans, who, I think, also are ill-treated by the regulations which cut them off the rolls entirely in event of their inability to establish service connection. It has been more than 30 years since the close of the War with Spain. Many of the participants in that struggle are dead. The records of that time were very imperfect. How in the name of common sense can Spanish War soldiers be expected at this late date to secure evidence to establish the service origin of their disabilities? And if they are deprived of their pensions how can they, at the average age of 60, secure employment when the management of every concern in the country frowns on the acceptance of men over 45 for employment?

A physician of Miami, Fla., himself a Spanish War veteran, writes to me as follows:

In a recent circular sent out by Mr. Bryson, manager of the Veterans' Administration facility, St. Petersburg, Fla., to all medical examiners, he states that we are advised by the central office that only a few Spanish-American War veterans have actual service-connected disabilities. The result is that we are condemned before we are even tried.

This week several men have shown me letters from the Veterans' Bureau reducing their compensation from $60 to $20 per month. I have examined these men several times. I know that their disabilities are service connected, and I am writing to you to ask your assistance in restoring to them what they should have. Several of these men have no income at all except their pensions. They are worried to death because they and their families are going to become a charge on the city of Miami. Several have died recently, caused by the worry of such a condition. I have heard of several committing suicide in other parts of Florida. On account of the climate there is probably a larger percentage of such veterans in Florida than in any other State. Hundreds of thousands of dollars will have to be provided by the communities of Florida to take care of these people. Not only did the United States Government do this before, as they should, but the pension money was all spent here in Florida.

We have many Spanish-American War veterans here from Indiana who have moved here on account of their disabilities as well as their inability to keep warm without the use of coal. I am hoping your sympathy will extend to all the Hoosiers, even if they are compelled to live down here on account of their health.

I consider the conditions here as serious. Any help you may be able to give to relieve this condition will be greatly appreciated by all the veterans of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection of this State.

From Indianapolis I received many telegrams pointing to the Connally amendment as a measure of justice to the Spanish War soldiers. I shall not quote all of them but will set forth a message from Frank G. Mathusack, of 410 North Dorman Street, Indianapolis, as a sample of all. Mr. Mathusack, who served his country with great credit in the War with Spain and later in the Philippines, wired as follows:

I hope you will vote for the Connally amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill as it refers to Spanish War veterans who cannot show service disability after 35 years.

I shall quote only one more telegram from the Spanish War group, showing their viewpoint. It is from William J. Otjen, commander in chief of the Spanish War veterans, and is as follows:

As commander in chief of the United Spanish War Veterans, I am urging you to give your support to the Connally amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill which limits the reduction of pensions to Spanish War veterans to not more than 25 percent. While I feel this is a most drastic cut, the fact remains that by the adoption of the amendment thousands of Spanish War veterans will be able to live without the necessity of applying to local charity organizations, which would be the case after July 1, if present regulations are put into effect. As President Roosevelt stated in his regulation no. 12, veterans of the Spanish War are severely handicapped, in fact almost debarred from proving service connection 35 years after their muster out of service, and we feel that the Connally amendment meets the existing problem in an acceptable manner to both the veterans and the taxpayers.

I believe our Indianapolis Spanish War friends and Commander Otjen who wired to me were absolutely right. I indorse the reasonableness of their attitude and I was glad to have the opportunity to show my sympathy for their position by supporting the Connally amendment.

The Connally amendment was not "in the picture", however, and in its place came the Steiwer-Cutting amendment which is now before the House and which gives to Spanish War Veterans the justice that is denied to them by the regulations.

LETTER TO PRESIDENT

I did everything that was humanly possible for a Member of Congress to do to urge the adoption of regulations that would be fair to the soldiers of all wars and at the same time fair to the taxpayers of the United States who have to bear the burden of veterans' legislation. On March 15, in behalf of the Spanish War veterans, I sent the following letter to President Roosevelt:

MARCH 15, 1933.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In a spirit of cooperation and with a desire to be helpful if possible in connection with the administration of the new Economy Act, please permit me to say a few words in reference to the Spanish War veterans and to point out what I believe to be their exceptional status under the new act which by the time this reaches you probably will be a finished piece of legislation.

During the fiscal year 1933 the direct benefits paid to the veterans of all wars in which the United States has engaged will be $799,200,000. Segregating the various items we find that of the above amount the direct benefits paid to Spanish War veterans will be $116,400,000. Of this item of $116,400,000 it is estimated that only about $60,000,000 will be the sum paid to Spanish War veterans with non-service-connected disabilities, a relatively small amount compared with $799,200,000, the total paid in veterans' benefits.

I am writing to express the hope that non-service-connected Spanish War veterans will not be cut off of the rolls for the following reasons:

1. Their average age is now 60 years, and if they lose the support the Government has long given to them and upon which they have learned to order their lives, they will be unable on account of age to obtain employment to sustain themselves and their dependents.

2. There has been such a lapse of time since the war with Spain that it would be manifestly impossible for a great majority of the veterans of that war at this late date to obtain the necessary evidence to establish service-connection.

If it is felt some action must be taken in regard to the pensions of Spanish War veterans, I would respectfully suggest that instead of removing them from the rolls entirely the ends of justice might be served with due regard for the needs of the Treasury by making a cut of, say, 15 percent in the pensions of that particular group to conform with the pay cut of Federal employees.

I understand that under the new Economy Act your powers are very flexible and that you could consider age as a factor in extending special recognition to the Spanish War veterans. I hope you may see your way clear to do this. In these modern times a man at the age of 60 usually finds the doors of opportunity closed and employment beyond his reach.

I am sure, Mr. President, that you will administer the new Economy Act humanely and the thoughts I have herein expressed no doubt already have occurred to you. I know you will pardon me for reminding you of them, and I thank you for the just consideration I am certain you will give to the soldiers of the War with Spain.

Very sincerely yours,

LOUIS LUDLOW.

Two days later, on March 17, I received the following letter from Col. Louis Howe, the President's secretary:

MY DEAR MR. LUDLOW: Your letter of March 15 to the President has been received. He deeply appreciates the spirit of cooperation and helpfulness in which you have written. You may be sure that all of these veterans' matters will have his most sympathetic and careful consideration.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS MCH. HOWE.

Soon after the Economy Act passed I called twice on Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and, accompanied by W. M. Louden, a distinguished Spanish War veteran of Indianapolis, I went to see Mr. J. O'Connor Roberts, Solicitor of the Veterans' Administration, the purpose of these visits being to impress upon the authorities the need of exercising great care in framing the regulations to see that reductions were made justly and equitably.

FAITH IN ROOSEVELT

I wish to repeat—and this expression of confidence comes from the heart—that I have the utmost faith in President Roosevelt, whom I believe to be both just and humane, and I think that when he finds that the hardships and injustices inflicted by the Economy Act regulations are so numerous, so real, and so cruel, he himself will move to bring about further amendments that will take away the sting. My own thought is that an amendment to the regulations that would limit the reduction of Spanish War pensions and service-connected World War cases to a 15-percent cut, which is the same cut that has been applied to the salaries of all Government employees, would just about meet the situation and serve the ends of justice. Modified in that way the regulations would still result in a large saving of the taxpayers' money without any real cause for complaint from any quarter.

There is one rule, and only one, by which this question of pensions should be decided, and that is the rule of right. We should strike off the rolls the names of all who do not deserve to be there, but we should be equally solicitous to do the right thing on the other side of the equation and should keep on the rolls all the veterans who deserve to be there, and pay them fair and liberal rates. A just nation can do no less than that. There must be a revision of the pension administration in the interest of a more equitable distribution of benefits and also in the interest of the taxpayers, who have to foot the bills. Some veterans are receiving large allowances for small disabilities, others are receiving no allowances for large disabilities. The whole pension system at present is a hodge-podge of inconsistencies and is excessively costly to the taxpayers. President Roosevelt is right in taking the lead for a reformation of the system. The fault is with his subordinates who prepared the regulations. The fairest proposition before Congress in the interest of the veterans of all the wars and the public that wants to see the veterans treated with fairness is the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, which will save the taxpayers $312,000,000 a year, and I am glad to keep my pledge of fair treatment to the veterans by voting for the Steiwer-Cutting amendment.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, Public, No. 2, known as the "Economy Act", was passed in a period of national peril, and seemingly at a time agriculture, transportation, industry, business, and all other vocations were drifting rapidly to disaster. Conditions were more serious than at any time in our national history—in fact, much more grave than those which confronted us during the World War period. The National Treasury was bankrupt, States were bankrupt, cities were bankrupt, and practically every occupation was in financial distress and about to be broken on the rock of insolvency. We were facing economic chaos and on the verge of a bottomless abyss.

Under these conditions the President called on the American people to meet the emergency and save the Nation from bankruptcy by granting him plenary powers to regulate and reduce expenditures of the Government of every kind and character. In his historic message of March 10, 1933, which struck fire from flint and awakened all Americans to a frenzy of patriotism and self-sacrifice, the President said:

When a great danger threatens our basic security it is my duty to advise the Congress of the way to preserve it. In so doing I must be fair not only to the few but to the many. It is in this spirit that I appeal to you. If the Congress chooses to vest me with this responsibility it will be exercised in a spirit of justice to all, of sympathy to those who are in need, and of maintaining inviolate the basic welfare of the United States.

Believing that the perpetuity of our institutions was menaced, and that the emergency required a full measure of sacrifice all along the line, Congress granted the President the extraordinary powers believed to be necessary to avert economic chaos and national disaster. The President was authorized to cut Government expenses so as to balance our National Budget, restore Government credit, establish confidence, and bring our people out of the wilderness into a normal national life.

Under the powers granted, the President was authorized to reduce pensions and compensation benefits to veterans of all wars and their dependents. When this power was conferred, I think I speak the truth in saying that every Member of the House and Senate believed that it would be reasonably, wisely, and humanely exercised. I am quite sure that if it had been known or suspected at the time that such drastic cuts would be made as were subsequently made in the pensions and compensation of veterans, especially those suffering from service-incurred disabilities, the economy bill in its present form would not have been enacted.

Members of Congress knew that President Roosevelt was not only a wise and patriotic statesman, but a man of ripe experience, sound judgment, tremendously sympathetic, and actuated by lofty ideals and humane motives, and believing that the President would accurately appraise the claims and needs of veterans and their dependents, and in every instance grant a full measure of justice, and that the cause of the veterans would be safe in his hands, the Economy Act was passed.

I have not lost faith or confidence in the wisdom, patriotism, fairness, and high sense of justice of Franklin D. Roosevelt. For him I have an ever-increasing admiration. In his veins flows the milk of human kindness. He is the same big-hearted, generous, kindly, compassionate character that he has always been. He is unspoiled by power, unawed by the economic dangers that threaten our national existence; courageous, yet confident, as he fights with his back to the wall against the evil influences that have poisoned the fountains of social justice and unbalanced our national life for the last 12 years.

Nor has Congress lost its faith or confidence in the President. I believe, and I think every Member of Congress believes, that President Roosevelt was too busy trying to lift a troubled Nation out of the quagmire of an unprecedented depression to realize just what the Veterans' Administration was doing when it promulgated the unreasonably severe and entirely too drastic regulations relating to pensions and compensation of veterans and their dependents. Buffeted by cross currents and rip tides of unparalleled proportions, it was humanly impossible for the President to supervise every governmental agency; and, being compelled to depend on departmental heads and bureau chiefs, it was but natural that he should look to the Veterans' Administration to formulate the regulations which would bring about an equitable readjustment of pensions and veterans' allowances.

In preparing these regulations and in determining what reduction should be made, the Veterans' Administration seems to have been functioning under some evil influence, and as a result the regulations were in many respects unreasonably harsh, unquestionably unfair, exceedingly unsympathetic, contrary to the intent of Congress, and not in harmony with the humane attitude of the American people toward our disabled veterans and their helpless dependents. The reduction in pensions and compensation, especially for service-incurred disabilities, was entirely too drastic and in many instances was so harsh and inhuman as to shock, methinks, the conscience of even many hard-boiled members of the Economy League.

I am sure the veterans understand the tremendous load President Roosevelt has been carrying. Obviously he could not give very much personal attention to each and every perplexing question that dogged his footsteps and plagued his administration. With all of his great powers and remarkable comprehension of national problems, he is only a man and has his finite limitations, and there is, of course, a limit to what any one man can do. Our Government is so complicated and our national ills have become so chronic and acute that the world wonders how the President has been able to give so much personal attention to so many different matters, and seemingly in every instance get unlooked-for results and bring order out of confusion. Therefore the unwise and unjust action of the Veterans' Administration escaped the President's attention until the Nation awakened to a realization of the full measure of injustice that had been done thousands of disabled and deserving veterans and their dependents.

It is a rule of my life to be charitable and temperate in my judgment and appraisal of the motives and conduct of men, and I do not believe that the officers of the Veterans' Bureau at the time they promulgated these regulations fully realized the injustice and in a multitude of cases the cruelty and inhumanity that would inevitably flow from their enforcement. The President, General Hines, and Mr. Douglas all admit that the regulations were too harsh and the pension and compensation cuts entirely too drastic.

When the American people realized the extent of the injustice with which a great army of disabled veterans were threatened, a wave of protest and indignation swept from coast to coast. The belief was almost universal that the Veterans' Administration had gone entirely too far, particularly with reference to veterans who are suffering from service-incurred disabilities.

I am a member of the Democratic steering committee of the House, which was created to formulate and direct the policies and procedure of the Democratic majority. On this committee I represent the States of Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota. The Democrats in Congress took the lead to moderate and humanize the regulations of the Veterans' Administration, and to restore pensions and veterans' allowances to a fair and equitable basis. And in so doing we did not violate the letter or the spirit of the Economy Act. In passing that measure Congress never intended that the veterans should be unduly penalized, or compelled to bear more than their just proportion of the contribution necessary to balance our Budget and restore national credit. The Economy Act was right in theory and principle, but the Veterans' Bureau did not administer it sympathetically but by harsh, and in some respects inhuman, regulations reduced the pensions and compensation of deserving and disabled veterans to a point where the future held nothing in store for them except public charity or the poorhouse.

About the middle of May the Democratic steering committee appointed a special veterans' committee to confer with the President, with a view of securing a liberalization of the regulations promulgated by the Veterans' Administration in relation to pensions and veterans' allowances. A Democratic caucus ratified this action. This special veterans' committee consisted of seven Democrats—CROSSER, of Ohio; POU, of North Carolina; GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland; HASTINGS, of Oklahoma; LEA of California; PATMAN, of Texas; and LOZIER, of Missouri. This committee called to its assistance Mr. BROWNING, of Tennessee, and Mr. JEFFERS, of Alabama. PATMAN, BROWNING, and JEFFERS are World War veterans with honorable service records, and are recognized in and out of Congress as probably the best informed men in the United States in reference to veterans' legislation and veterans' affairs. Their devotion to their country and to the cause of veterans and their dependents will not be questioned. They are men of integrity, ability, and sound judgment. Two have service-connected disabilities. Our committee desired their help and expert knowledge in our conferences with the President. In assisting in bringing about an acceptable compromise the value of their services to the veterans and the country cannot be overappraised.

Our committee held numerous conferences with the President. He welcomed us, listened to our plea, discussed the veterans' problems from every standpoint, reviewed the past and present pension policies, discussed in detail the regulations previously promulgated by the Veterans' Administration, frankly and earnestly stated his position, at all times was patient, courteous, sympathetic, seemingly anxious to correctly understand the situation, do full justice to the veterans, and at the same time protect the taxpayers of the Nation from unreasonable burdens.

Our first interview lasted nearly 2 hours, the second 3 hours, the third 3 hours, and at no time did the President become impatient, listless, or show a disposition to end the interview. We sat around the table and talked face to face in an earnest endeavor to reach a just and proper decision. I understand that in our several interviews with the President our little veterans' committee was probably given more time than the President had given to the representatives of the powerful groups of financiers, industrial lords, and transportation kings who conferred with him in reference to the epoch-marking legislation relating to banks, railroads, industry, and big business. And during these interviews Mr. Roosevelt was so human, cordial, and considerate that we almost forgot that we were talking to and matching wits with the President of the United States, the most powerful and most beloved man in the world.

These were epoch-marking, history-making conferences. We were seriously discussing the relative rights of the veterans and the taxpayers, and endeavoring to find a formula or plan that would be just and fair to the veterans, and yet not unjust or unfair to the Government. General Hines and Director of the Budget, Mr. Douglas, participated in these conferences. While I have long recognized the outstanding ability, exalted character, and far-seeing statesmanship of Franklin D. Roosevelt, until I saw his superb intellect in action for hours, I had not comprehended the full measure of the man or accurately appraised his striking and admirable qualities of mind and heart. Whether in attack or on the defensive, he is always intellectually alert. He is robust, sturdy, and intensely human, yet unyielding where principle is involved. He frankly said that he would liberalize the regulations promulgated by the Veterans' Administration, because he thought they were unreasonably rigid, and that as to veterans with service-incurred disabilities the reductions were too drastic. As a result of our conferences with the President a compromise was reached which was accepted by the House, plus the Byrnes amendment, and finally approved by the Senate.

Now compromises are seldom satisfactory to either side, but I am convinced that for the time being we have secured the best possible settlement of this perplexing veterans' problem. I was not satisfied with some of the features of this compromise. The regulations of the Veterans' Administration cut too deep and took away from veterans and their dependents more than was just and reasonable. By this compromise settlement the veterans recover a substantial part of what wrongfully was taken from them. The regulations cut their allowances $410,000,000. By this compromise $100,000,000 of this loss is recovered.

While the veterans, by this compromise, are not getting all they demand nor all to which I think they are entitled, they have certainly made progress, because under present economic conditions $100,000,000 is a dignified sum which will be tremendously helpful until a final and fair solution of the veterans' problem can be reached. In this Congress no legislation could have been passed over a Presidential veto. If Congress had refused this adjustment, we would have faced a veto, and ultimately the veterans would have received much less than they get under the compromise that our committee negotiated with the President.

Our committee worked diligently to effect a settlement that would restore every benefit of which the veterans had been unjustly deprived. While conceding that the rolls should be purged of unmeritorious and fraudulent cases we insisted that every presumptive case should remain on the rolls until the Government, by clear and convincing evidence, affirmatively showed that the disability in question was not incurred in or aggravated by service. We vigorously contended that the Spanish-American War veterans and their widows should remain on the rolls and draw not less than 75 percent of the pensions that they had previously been receiving.

Now, let us see what we are getting for the veterans by this compromise: We restored the widows and dependents of 36,325 World War veterans to the pension rolls, and they will continue to draw the same pensions they formerly received without any deduction whatsoever. We restored to the rolls for the time being 154,848 World War veterans who had presumptive service-connected disabilities, and made it possible for many of them to remain on the rolls permanently, because the compromise provides that the burden of proof is on the Government to show by affirmative evidence that the disability was not incurred in or aggravated by the service, and in determining the question of service connection all reasonable doubts must be resolved in favor of the veterans.

I helped frame this language, and it is so plain and clear-cut anyone who reads it will readily understand that a veteran who has a direct or presumptive service-connected disability will remain on the rolls until the Government, by clear and convincing evidence, affirmatively and conclusively shows that the disability was not incurred in or aggravated by the service. Then again the compromise puts back on the pension rolls 105,660 Spanish-American War veterans who would have been removed under the original regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration.

Except, as to Spanish-American War veterans, the compromise that was finally adopted—that is, the House proposal plus the Byrnes Senate amendment—was more favorable to the veterans than the Connally amendment, and even now the President has authority under Public, No. 2, to restore to Spanish-American War veterans all the benefits they previously enjoyed.

The Connally amendment did nothing for the widows and other dependents of 36,325 deceased World War veterans whose pensions would have been discontinued July 1 under the regulations of the Veterans' Administration.

Our committee worked hard to get a more liberal allowance for Spanish-American War veterans, and I regret that we were unable to write into the bill a satisfactory and definite provision granting adequate pensions to this group of deserving veterans, most of whom are needy, disabled, or suffering from the infirmities of age. Our committee was deadlocked with the President for 2 days on Spanish-American War pensions, and much of the time consumed by our committee in conference with the President was used in discussing Spanish-American War pensions.

We could see no reason for the discrimination against veterans of the Spanish-American War, and we urged that they be allowed to remain on the pension rolls at not less than 75 percent of their previous pension allowances. They served in a tropical climate, lived in unsanitary camps, were compelled to eat unwholesome food, and had no hospitals and little or no medical attention, and practically no records were kept of their illness, activities, and service.

The President agreed to reduce the pensionable age of Spanish-American veterans in non-service-connected cases to 55 years, and only a few are now under that age. While this group will draw not less than $15 per month, we succeeded in placing them on the rolls, which will help tremendously when an effort is made in subsequent Congresses to give the Spanish-American War veterans a fair and adequate pension, which they are not getting at the present time. Now, practically every Member of Congress with whom I talked admitted that the Spanish-American War veterans are subject to an unjust and undeserved discrimination, whether considered on the basis of their age and infirmities or in comparison with pensions paid to veterans of other wars.

But your committee did the best it could. Congress did the best it could. We got everything we could get for the Spanish-American War veterans. We only yielded when we saw that we could get nothing more. But they have a just cause, and as sure as night follows day Congress will correct this mistake and place the Spanish-American War veterans on an equality with the veterans of other wars.

The Steiwer Senate amendment did not differ materially from the House proposal, except it restored Spanish-American War veterans to the rolls with three fourths of their original pensions. I gladly would have accepted the Steiwer amendment if there had been any chance for it to become a law, but the President authorized Senator ROBINSON, the Democratic Senate leader, to state that if Congress adopted the Steiwer amendment the bill would be vetoed. So nothing could be gained by sending the Steiwer amendment to the White House, where an inevitable veto awaited it.

If Congress had refused to approve this compromise, adopted the Steiwer amendment, and forced a Presidential veto, it would have done irreparable injury to the veterans and their dependents, and such ill-advised action would have set back the veterans' cause for at least 10 years. As Senator CLARK stated in the Senate, "a part of something is much more than all of nothing." Our committee secured the maximum concessions it was possible to obtain, and Congress rendered a very valuable service to the cause of the disabled veterans by averting an open breach and schism with our popular and beloved President, behind whom the Nation stands almost as a unit.

With more time and opportunity to study the question, I am confident the President and Congress will be able to agree on a policy that will do full justice to the veterans of all wars, and at the same time strike from the rolls the names of all those who have no just claim on the Nation's bounty and whose retention on the rolls is unfair to the deserving veteran and imposes an unjust burden on the taxpaying public.

May I enumerate some of the advantages accruing to veterans and their dependents as a result of the action of Congress?

(a) Under the regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration, the presumptives were all to be removed from the rolls July 1. Under the compromise all remain on the rolls and receive not less than three fourths of their present allowances until an independent board set up by the President determines their rights to service connection. These boards are not bound by medical opinion or clinical findings, but will consider all evidence offered, with all reasonable doubts resolved in favor of the veteran, and with the burden of proof on the Government to show affirmatively that the veterans' disabilities are not service connected. This provision will retain many thousand veterans on the rolls who would have lost their compensation July 1.

(b) Veterans who have disabilities which are directly service connected are saved from the drastically low cuts made under the Economy Act and their compensation restored to within an average of 18 percent of what they have been receiving, with a provision that the reduction shall not exceed 25 percent in any directly service-connected case.

(c) The widows, orphans, and other dependents of 36,325 World War veterans are restored to the rolls and will continue to draw the pensions they formerly received, without any reduction whatsoever.

(d) Under the regulations authorized by the Economy Act, veterans suffering from total and permanent non-service-connected disabilities had their pensions reduced to $20 per month. Under this compromise they will receive $30 per month.

(e) All Spanish-American War veterans who are suffering from service-connected disabilities are given an increase and allowed the same pensions as veterans of the World War, in the same class.

(f) All Spanish-American War veterans over 62 years of age will receive not less than $15 per month. Under the regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration they would have received only $6 per month.

(g) All Spanish-American War veterans between 55 and 62 years of age who are in need and 50 percent disabled from any cause will receive not less than $15 per month.

Now, a word in reference to disability-allowance cases—those where the disabilities have not so far been shown to be service connected. Where this disability is total and permanent, the veteran will receive $30 per month, $10 per month more than he would have received under the regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration. Aside from this increase, the compromise does nothing for those drawing disability allowance, and nothing could be done for this group of veterans because as to cases where the disability is less than total and permanent, and is not shown to be service connected, the President was adamant and determined not to budge an inch. He told us kindly but firmly, that while this group would be given hospitalization, he was opposed in principle to granting them pensions unless they have a total and permanent disability. In other words, the President is opposed in principle to granting a pension to any veteran unless such veteran's disabilities are shown to be service connected.

I am convinced that many of these disability-allowance cases are meritorious and the veterans justly entitled to Government aid. In many of these cases, the veteran claims and honestly believes his disabilities are due to his service, and has submitted much proof to substantiate his claim, but because of imperfect and hastily prepared hospital and military records, the veteran is unable to furnish the proof demanded by the Government to establish such service-connection. In many other cases the veteran had hospital records, and was shown to have suffered from severe illness while in the service, but the Bureau physicians held that the proof was not sufficient to show that the veteran's present disabilities were the outgrowth of his illness while serving his country.

Many veterans who are drawing disability allowances are in equity and good conscience entitled to disability compensation, but perhaps through some technicality or omission in the records, service connection has been denied. When the disability-allowance statute was enacted, thousands of soldiers who had applied for disability compensation and were endeavoring to establish service connection of their disabilities concluded to accept the disability allowance rather than to be put to the trouble and expense of establishing their right to disability compensation.

Now, after our committee had its first conference with the President, he promulgated regulations liberalizing the regulations previously issued under the Economy Act. Under these new regulations approximately $40,000,000 annually was added to the amount payable to veterans and their dependents, as pensions and compensation allowances. But our committee was not satisfied with this increase, and insisted on additional concessions, which we believed in fairness and all good conscience were due the veterans. We continued our conferences with the President and, as I have stated, obtained additional concessions bringing the increases to approximately $100,000,000. We feel that we were partially responsible for the first liberalization made by the President on June 6 which restored directly service-connected cases to within 18 percent of their former rating; but be that as it may, the fact remains that since the Democratic House caucus sent our committee to the President the law and regulations have been liberalized so as to add $100,000,000 to the annual payment to veterans and their dependents.

I am convinced that in thousands of cases the disabilities of veterans are due to their military service, even where there is no record to affirmatively and conclusively establish such fact. Many veterans came out of the war without having been seriously ill during their military service, but they were debilitated, "run down and worn out," their vitality reduced, their constitutions and vigor impaired, and perhaps slumbering in their systems were the insidious germs of disease that remained dormant and latent for months and years after their discharge, but finally became active and virulent, and ultimately produced a state of invalidism.

If the Government adopts the policy of not granting pensions to any veteran unless it is shown that his disabilities were service-connected, then by every principle of justice these disability-allowance cases should be reopened and the veterans given a chance to have their cases reviewed, so they may, if possible, establish service connection. But future Congresses will determine how far we shall go in extending aid to veterans whose disabilities are not shown to have been incurred in or aggravated by their military service.

While opposing the policy of granting pensions in cases where disabilities are not service connected, the President stated that he was willing to make an exception to this rule as to veterans of the Spanish-American War, because in that war very few, if any, medical records were kept and that there were practically no hospitals or hospitalization of soldiers, which made it practically impossible for a Spanish-American War veteran to show that his disabilities originated in or were aggravated by his military service; and as 35 years have elapsed since that war and many of the participants are dead or widely scattered, it is exceedingly difficult and in most cases impossible for a Spanish-American War veteran to establish by the testimony of his comrades that he was ill or injured in the service and in the line of duty.

While as a whole the compromise is a substantial victory for the disabled veterans, it does not do full justice to certain groups, but I am convinced that this condition will be corrected at an early session of Congress. Neither the President, the Congress, nor the American people want to deal unjustly with deserving and disabled veterans of any war who are suffering from disabilities that may fairly be traced to their military service.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1917, we entered a war, they said, "to make the world safe for democracy." We won the war, and the world is now safe for international bankers, dictators, and J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. The men who fought for democracy, whose bodies and minds are scarred with the ravages of war, now see their small pittances taken from them by dictatorial powers. The Economy Act has torn down the whole structure of more than a century of pension legislation. The same international bankers who demanded that these men be sent to the trenches of Europe are now intent on robbing them of their compensation. These international bankers and captains of international industry have no flag and know no patriotism, and their only god is gold. They now declare another war, a war on the veterans of America; again they have enlisted the press of the Nation to distribute their propaganda and poison the minds of the American people against the defenders of the Nation.

They are raiders of the Treasury, and we must thrust them from their seats of power before it is too late, before they have plunged this Nation into another colossal disaster. We point them out as racketeers and we brand them as such. Write the name "Treasury raider" across every international banking house, every private munition plant, every huge corporation which controls the natural resources of this country and exploits them for enormous private profits at the expense of the people. Write the name "racketeer" across every corporation or individual who profits from war. These profiteers and racketeers have joined forces against the veterans of America. Evict them from their seats of selfish profit as they evict the workers from their homes and the farmers from their land. Let them protect their own investments abroad. Let them live and die on foreign shores where they invest and where they risk war for profit and gold.

ECONOMY LEAGUE PROPAGANDA

The Economy League spent huge sums of money propagandizing the people of this country into support of the Economy Act. The sums of money to be saved the taxpayers were advertised. The effect this so-called "saving" would have upon the veterans was not mentioned. And when the plans of the administration for carrying out the proposed saving of $460,000,000 were actually formulated, the burden to be thrown upon the backs of the veterans was so heavy that the facts were kept secret for a time by the Veterans' Administration.

Congress finally revolted against administrative control. A Democratic caucus of the House was held on May 25. A Democratic committee was appointed and called on the President on May 29. Estimates of veterans' cuts were demanded and received, and in submitting the estimates General Hines stated:

> We have been extremely loath to give out information concerning the breakdown of these items, as it is felt that only through the review now being made may we arrive at a reasonably accurate distribution of pension expense, especially in view of the fact that but one appropriation covers pensions of all types and there probably will be variations as to the groups within this total.
> I fear that any new publicity given to preliminary estimates as quoted above will create unnecessary apprehension on the part of many. For this reason the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the House handling this particular appropriation bill saw fit to withhold this information from the House as a whole and confine it to the above subcommittee.

The reason why "unnecessary" apprehension was feared can be clearly seen by an examination of the estimated slashes to be made under the Economy Act. It was after these figures were published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of May 29, 1933, by Congressman CROSSER, of Ohio, that a general but mild uprising in House and Senate occurred. The President issued new orders on June 6, 1933, slightly increasing certain classes of pensions; and various amendments liberalizing the Economy Act were tacked onto the independent offices appropriation bill and voted on by both House and Senate.

RECORD OF MINNESOTA DELEGATION ON VETERANS' LEGISLATION

I present the record of the Seventy-third Congress, and especially the record of the Minnesota delegation on these various pieces of veterans' legislation: The Economy Act, the independent offices appropriation bill as first introduced, the Connally amendment, the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, the original so-called "House compromise plan", which the House substituted for the Connally amendment, and the final plan which was adopted as a part of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act.

Under the old law 197,260 would receive $107,026,277.

Under the present law 98,600 of these veterans will receive $21,459,644.

The number of non-service-connected widows, under the old law, was 42,161, who would have received $17,124,658.

Under the new act 41,036 will receive $7,700,000, or a loss of $9,424,658.

CIVIL WAR

Service-connected and non-service-connected

Under the old law 22,525 veterans would have drawn $24,000,000.

Under the new act 22,525 veterans will receive $21,460,700, or a loss of 10 percent.

Widows

Widows will lose 10 percent for 1 year only, the same as the veterans will lose 10 percent for 1 year only.

Under the old law 122,492 would have received $58,534,100 the coming year.

Under the new act they will receive $52,680,690, or a loss of $5,853,410.

OTHER WARS—INDIAN, MEXICAN, 1812

The veterans will lose $559,747.

Under the old law 4,676 would receive $2,808,188; they will receive $2,248,441 under the new act instead.

The widows, 5,135, would have received $2,025,028. They also take a 10-percent reduction and will receive $1,822,525.

PEACE TIME

Service-connected

The number under the old law would have been 21,082 and the amount $6,400,000.

Under the new act the number of veterans will be 30,389 and the amount $5,672,000, or a loss to the veterans of $728,000.

The widows will be increased from 5,736 under the old law to 10,736 under the new act, and the amount increased from $1,389,974 to $2,400,000.

Under the new act there will also be an estimated saving of $34,000,000 in administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services from $110,538,514 under the old law to $76,538,514 under the new act.

MILITARY AND NAVAL INSURANCE

There will be a reduction of from $134,000,000 under the old law to $123,000,000 under the new act.

HOSPITAL AND DOMICILIARY FACILITIES AND SERVICES

There will be a reduction of from $5,000,000 under the old law to $1,000,000 under the new act.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE-CERTIFICATE FUND

There will be a reduction of from $100,000,000 under the 1934 estimate to $50,000,000.

PRESUMPTIVE CASES

World War veterans

One of the most cruel blows struck by the regulations issued under the Economy Act was aimed at those veterans who are receiving compensation for disabilities presumed to be service connected under the World War Veterans' Act, as amended. Under section 200 of this act if a veteran developed active tuberculosis or nervous or mental diseases at any time prior to January 1, 1925, the condition was presumed to be due to service. The Veterans' Administration states:

On April 30, 1933, compensation payments were being made to 338,138 World War veterans whose disabilities were directly or presumptively connected with service. It is estimated that approximately 150,000 of these veterans will be dropped from the rolls under Public, No. 2 (the Economy Act), because of presumptive service connection.

These figures were given to me by the Veterans' Administration on June 8, 1933.

These 150,000 World War veterans are affected by Executive Regulation No. 1, part 1, in which there is a paragraph stating:

That for the purposes of paragraph I (a) hereof (stating that certain veterans shall be entitled to a pension) a chronic disease becoming manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more within 1 year from the date of separation from active service as set forth therein shall be considered to have been incurred in or aggravated by service, as specified therein * * * provided the person suffering from such disease served 90 days or more in active service.

IMPOSSIBILITY OF PROVING SERVICE CONNECTION

These 150,000 veterans once secured affidavits and other evidence to prove that they were afflicted with active tuberculosis or a mental or nervous disease prior to January 1, 1925. When the Economy Act was passed, they began to search frantically for more affidavits, more evidence, to prove that their sad condition was in existence 1 year after discharge.

But they have no affidavits; they have no evidence. They did not stop after their discharge to collect evidence of their disabilities; they were heroes; they relied on the promise of Uncle Sam to take care of them. Many of the doctors who treated these men are dead; they cannot give affidavits. Thousands of veterans took no notice of their disabilities after the war. They never thought of seeing to it that a systematic record was kept of their physical condition. Their first concern was to get away from the Army and go home. Many of them found jobs in the boom years and never thought of applying for compensation until the Money Trust staged the stock-market crash of 1929.

$20 A MONTH FOR PERMANENT AND TOTAL DISABILITY

To these permanently and totally disabled World War veterans, who formerly received $100 a month, the first Executive regulations under the Economy Act allotted $20 a month. By the regulations of June 6 this amount was changed to $30. And remember that this $20 and this $30 were to go to veterans who suffered all the horrors of war in the trenches of France. Many of these men carried home in their bodies the dread germ of tuberculosis or in their heads the echoes of crashing shells which frequently led to mental disease. These are the men who are constantly in need of medical attention and care.

How did the gentlemen who voted for the economy bill answer the letters they received from totally disabled veterans who were notified that their compensations had been cut to $20 a month? Did they say "It was necessary to cut your compensation to $20 a month in order to maintain the credit of the United States Government"? These veterans know that this Government was in the red 16 years ago. Then Congress found billions of dollars to send them to the battlefield where many of them incurred these disabilities.

PRESUMPTIVE CASES

Spanish War

Under the Economy Act, all World War and Spanish War veterans whose disabilities were not shown to be incurred in actual service were to be dropped from the pension rolls with the exception of Spanish War veterans over the age of 62 and of veterans who are permanently and totally disabled. (That provision of the Economy Act was slightly modified by the independent offices bill as it finally passed both Houses. I will take up that modification later. It does not materially affect what I wish to say here about the effect of the original Economy Act on the Spanish War veterans.)

The so-called "presumptive clause", regulation 12 of the Executive orders, recognized that Spanish War veterans would be at a decided disadvantage in proving their disabilities to be service-connected. This clause states that these men shall continue to receive a pension under the act at the rate being paid them on the date of the enactment of the Economy Act—

It being presumed that the injury or disease causing the disability was incurred in the line of duty in the active military or naval service during * * * the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection.

This presumption was to be rebuttable, but the burden of proof was to be on the Veterans' Administration to show that the disability was not service-connected, and this evidence was to be based on "medical judgment or affirmative evidence."

87 PERCENT TO 90 PERCENT OF SPANISH WAR VETERANS CUT OFF

It appears that no consideration was given to this presumption clause. The burden of proof was thrown back on the veterans, who are now of the average age of 59, and many of whom are 62 and over. The United Spanish War Veterans headquarters and the National Tribune variously estimated the number of Spanish War veterans to be taken off the rolls under the regulations of the President from 87 percent to 90 percent of the total. Thousands of Spanish War veterans were apparently to be taken from the rolls because they could not qualify for total disability under the amended rating schedules authorized by the Economy Act.

These veterans have reached their declining years. I doubt if there is a Member of this House who has not received letters from bewildered Spanish War men who have received notice that their pensions are to be cut to $6 a month or who have been dropped from the rolls. How did the gentlemen who voted for the Economy Act answer these letters? Did they reply "It was necessary to cut your pension to $6 a month in order to maintain the credit of the United States Government. I am sorry you have no other means of support, but we will give you a flag for your grave"?

One case has come to my attention, of a Spanish War veteran who received three medals from the Navy Department in recognition for service in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer uprising, and in the same mail received a notification that his pension had been cut from $60 to $20 a month. This case was reported in the Minneapolis Tribune on Thursday, June 8, 1933.

EXPLANATION OF INCREASE IN SERVICE-CONNECTED SPANISH WAR VETERANS

The increase shown here in the number of service-connected Spanish War veterans, and the increase in pensions granted them under the Economy Act, is explained in this way:

Until 1920 all Spanish War veterans who were drawing pensions had established service connection in accordance with the requirements of the old so-called "general law." On June 5, 1920, the Spanish War service pension law was passed. Under this law there was no distinction between service-connected and non-service-connected disabilities. Any Spanish War veteran who applied could receive a pension for varying rates of disability. The same applies for the laws of May 1, 1926, and June 2, 1930, which increased the rates of pension until the maximum of $60 was reached for permanent and total disability cases.

Thousands of Spanish War veterans dropped their claims of service connection under the general law and applied for the more liberal pension granted under the later laws without regard to service connection. For that reason prior to the Economy Act, out of about 195,000 Spanish War veterans on the pension rolls, only 600 were recorded as service connected. These 600 merely had neglected to apply for pensions under the new and more liberal law.

EFFECT OF ECONOMY ACT ON HOSPITALS

With a few exceptions, under the Economy Act, no hospitalization or domiciliary care is to be given to veterans whose disabilities are not shown to be service connected under the new regulations. These are the instructions of the Veterans' Administration. About a month ago Stephen Early, Assistant Secretary to the President, issued a statement which was published in the press, in which he stated:

> Regional offices of the Veterans' Administration will not be closed as has been reported, except where it has been clearly demonstrated that regional facilities are not necessary.

Apparently, under the Economy Act, it is unnecessary to treat thousands of veterans who are in need of treatment. We can dismiss several hundred doctors and nurses and throw them in the breadline. We can close up these institutions and throw the veterans in the streets. And that is exactly what is being done under the Economy Act. The Veterans' Administration reports the following figures showing the number of vacant beds in Government hospitals:

Vacant beds, Feb. 28, 1933	3,611
Vacant beds, June 15, 1933	14,638

These are not domiciliary beds, but actual hospital beds. The vacant domiciliary beds, in soldiers' homes and institutions, increased from 1,424 on February 28, 1933, to 11,706 on June 15, 1933.

In other words, there are 11,027 more vacant hospital beds today than there were before the passage of the Economy Act, and there are 10,282 more vacant domiciliary beds.

I say these men are being thrown into the streets. I said at the time this act was passed that men would be thrown out of their hospital beds into the streets, and the figures of the Veterans' Administration bear me out now. There were assurances at the time this act was passed that it would be administered humanely, but I warned at the time against granting such broad, sweeping power on the faith that it would be wisely used. Even as early as May 1, 1933, the Naval Hospital at Philadelphia was forced to reduce the number of its patients from 578 to 270, and that fact was published in the daily press.

Every veterans' hospital in America is on the verge of disruption, and there is no assurance in any legislation passed since the Economy Act that these hospitals will be saved and the veterans of America cared for. These things are coming to pass. The warnings such as I gave at the time this act was passed cannot be silenced now with the assurance that the act will be humanely administered. It has not been humanely administered, and there is every indication that it will not be humanely administered in the future.

HOUSE ROLL CALL ON ECONOMY BILL, MARCH 11, 1933

On this act, which threatens to disrupt our Government hospitals, and which tore down the structure of veterans' legislation built up through a period of over a century, the Minnesota delegation voted as follows:

Yeas: Theodore Christianson (Republican), Harold Knutson (Republican), Einar Hoidale (Democrat).

Nays: Henry Arens (Farmer-Labor), Magnus Johnson (Farmer-Labor), Paul J. Kvale (Farmer-Labor), Ernest Lundeen (Farmer-Labor), Francis H. Shoemaker (Farmer-Labor), Ray P. Chase (Republican).

The bill passed by a vote of 266 to 138.

TO ACCEPT SENATE AMENDMENTS WAS TO MAKE ECONOMY BILL LAW

No Farmer-Labor Member of the House of Representatives voted for the economy bill, either as first introduced or as amended by the Senate and again passed by the House March 16, 1933. Farmer-Labor Members of Congress knew that a vote for the Senate amendments to the bill was a vote to send that bill to the President for signature. It was not just a vote to improve the bill; it was a vote to pass the bill. Separate votes were not taken on the amendments and then on the bill in the House. Members of the House voted for the amended bill as it came from the Senate or they voted against it.

If a majority of the Members of the House had voted against the amended bill, it could not have become a law, and the structure of veterans' legislation built up through 150 years could not have been struck down with one blow. If a sufficient number of Representatives had voted against the amended bill, it would have gone back to conference instead of to the White House for the signature of the President. Instead of voting to accept a bad piece of legislation because it had been slightly improved, Farmer-Labor Members rejected it altogether. If a sufficient number of Representatives had done likewise, a large number of totally disabled veterans would never have received notice that their compensations were to be cut to $20 a month on July 1, 1933. Thousands of veterans would never have been told that they were to be removed from the pension lists and thrown on State and local charity. Thousands of bewildered old men who once volunteered their services in the Spanish-American War when they were mere boys would never have had to stare into a dark future of poverty and destitution for the remaining few years of their lives.

The effect of an affirmative vote on the amended economy bill was stated on the floor of the House just before the vote was taken, when Congressman McCORMACK, of Massachusetts, inquired:

> Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
> The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
> Mr. McCORMACK. As I understand it, the question before the House is not the passage of the bill but the acceptance or rejection of the amendments of the Senate to the bill.
> The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Then Congressman CONNERY, of Massachusetts, made a parliamentary inquiry which brought out the real effect of a vote for the amended economy bill:

> Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
> The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
> Mr. CONNERY. But the effect of accepting the Senate amendments is that the bill becomes law.
> The SPEAKER. The bill becomes law; yes, of course.

That was the effect of a vote for the economy bill as it came back amended from the Senate. The bill became a law. No Farmer-Labor Congressman voted for that amended bill. The Minnesota delegation voted as follows:

Yeas: Ray P. Chase (Republican), Theodore Christianson (Republican), Harold Knutson (Republican), Einar Hoidale (Democrat).

Nays: Henry Arens (Farmer-Labor), Magnus Johnson (Farmer-Labor), Ernest Lundeen (Farmer-Labor), Francis H. Shoemaker (Farmer-Labor).

Not voting: Paul John Kvale (Farmer-Labor), absent.

Congressman KVALE was absent because of a serious hospital operation and illness in his family.

The bill passed by a vote of 373 to 19.

SENATE ROLL CALL ON ECONOMY BILL AMENDMENTS

Several amendments were proposed in the Senate to the economy bill on March 13, 14, and 15, 1933, as it was received from the House. Each amendment was voted on separately in the Senate. On some of these amendments the yeas and nays were demanded. On those amendments which affected the veterans, and on which the yeas and nays were demanded, I present the votes of the Minnesota Senators.

On March 14 Senator HARRISON, of Mississippi, offered an amendment to liberalize title 1, section 17, dealing with yearly renewable term insurance, and providing that nothing in the Economy Act should interfere—

With payments hereafter to be made under contracts of yearly renewable term insurance where suit on such insurance has been instituted and trial had prior to the enactment of this act and judgment has heretofore been or hereafter is entered and has become or becomes a final judgment; * * *.

The amendment also provided—

That no costs shall be taxed against any plaintiff whose right to continue his suit on yearly renewable term insurance is abrogated by this section.

This amendment provided that judgments already rendered should be paid and that those suits pending in court should be dismissed at the cost of the Government rather than the veteran.

On this amendment the Minnesota Senators voted as follows:

Schall, not voting (absent); Shipstead, not voting (absent).

Senator HARRISON'S amendment was rejected by a vote of 56 to 18.

On March 15 Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, offered the following amendment:

The rate of pension or compensation of each person receiving pension or compensation after the date of enactment of this act is hereby reduced by 15 percent. When used in this section the term "compensation" shall include military and naval compensation for death or disability payable under the War Risk Insurance Act, as amended, the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, or any special act of Congress authorizing payment of such compensation, and the annuities authorized by the acts approved May 23, 1908, February 28, 1929, as amended, and January 31, 1931. When used in this section the term "pension" shall include any amount payable to any person by virtue of being placed on the pension rolls of the Veterans' Administration pursuant to any act of Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE explained his amendment in these words:

It seeks to preserve the present structure of veterans' legislation, but, at the same time, to provide a substantial saving in the amount of money being paid to those veterans. * * * It is a sincere and logical attempt during such an emergency period to save the legislative structure which has been built up during and since the war.

On this amendment the Minnesota Senators voted as follows:

Schall, not voting (absent); Shipstead not voting (absent).

Senator LA FOLLETTE'S amendment was rejected by a vote of 16 to 62.

Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, offered an amendment on March 15:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions contained in this title, in no event shall World War service-connected disability compensation of any veteran or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War be reduced more than 25 percent of the amount thereof according to existing rates and subject to any rerating of disability under this act.

This amendment left the power in the hands of the President to rerate veterans' cases; but, as Mr. CONNALLY stated, the amendment was—

Simply a limitation, providing that when the President has once determined that a case is service-connected and the soldier's claim has been rerated and the proof is that he has a watertight case, then he shall not be reduced over 25 percent.

On this amendment the Minnesota Senators voted as follows:

Schall, not voting (absent); Shipstead, not voting (absent).

The amendment was rejected by a vote of 28 to 45.

SENATE ROLL CALL ON FINAL PASSAGE OF AMENDED BILL

On the final vote—for or against the economy bill, which finally was signed by the President—the Minnesota Senators voted as follows:

Schall, not voting (absent); Shipstead, not voting (absent).

The bill was passed by a vote of 62 to 13.

PRESIDENTIAL ORDERS OF JUNE 6, 1933

The Veterans' Bureau estimates that under the President's regulations of June 6, 1933, $32,972,000 more would be paid to veterans of the World War than provided for under the Economy Act, and $17,028,000 more would be paid to veterans of all other wars. This would make the total increase $50,000,000.

A new rating schedule was set up which provided for $90 for total service-connected disability for veterans of the World War or Spanish War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection. There are 10 different ratings, instead of 5, as set up in the first regulations, and these schedules range from $9 to $90, instead of from $8 to $80, as under the first regulations. The pension for non-service-connected permanently and totally disabled veterans of either war is increased from $20 per month to $30 per month. No change is made in the regulations affecting Civil War veterans. These veterans took a straight 10-percent cut under the Economy Act, and further legislation passed did not change that provision.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

The House roll call on the original independent offices appropriation bill was taken on May 12, 1933. This is the bill which proposed to cut the appropriations of the Veterans' Administration approximately in half, taking approximately $460,000,000 away from the veterans.

On this roll call the vote of the Minnesota delegation was as follows:

Yeas: Theodore Christianson (Republican).

Nays: Henry Arens (Farmer-Labor), Magnus Johnson (Farmer-Labor), Paul J. Kvale (Farmer-Labor), Ernest Lundeen (Farmer-Labor), Ray P. Chase (Republican), Harold Knutson (Republican).

Not voting: Einar Hoidale (Democrat) (paired for the bill), Francis H. Shoemaker.

The bill was passed by a vote of 250 to 117.

When the bill went to the Senate, the Connally amendment was attached, providing:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", in no event shall World War service-connected disability compensation of any veteran, or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War, or the pension of any widow and/or dependents of such veterans, be reduced more than 25 percent of the rate being received prior to March 15, 1933.

The Veterans' Administration estimates that under this amendment approximately $153,000,000 would have been turned back to the veterans from the $460,000,000 cut contemplated by the original Economy Act. Many of the veterans' friends in the Senate voted against this amendment, because they wanted to substitute in its place an amendment which would have called for a 15-percent cut instead of 25 percent.

On the Connally amendment the Minnesota Senators voted on June 2 as follows:

Schall, nay; Shipstead, nay.

The amendment passed by a vote of 43 to 42, the Vice President casting the deciding vote.

CONNALLY AMENDMENT IN THE HOUSE

In place of the Connally amendment the House substituted a "compromise amendment", by which the Connally amendment was stricken out and in its place inserted a provision whereby the President was authorized to establish special boards for the purpose of reviewing the presumptive cases of World War veterans to determine whether or not such cases might be considered to be service connected.

The amendment stated that, except for "fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation", 75 percent of the payments being made before the Economy Act was passed were to continue until October 31, 1933, or the date of a special decision on the case, whichever is the earlier date. The rates of compensation for directly service-connected cases were not to be reduced more than 25 percent. But no provision of this kind was made for the Spanish War men. Instead, Congressman CROSSER, chairman of the special Democratic House committee which called on the President on May 29, received a letter from the President, which Mr. CROSSER presented to the House on June 10:

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am enclosing herewith the language which I suggest be substituted for the language of the so-called "Connally amendment."

It is not necessary that there be included in this amendment language dealing with the Spanish-American War veterans who are 55 years of age or more. I have the authority under the provisions of the "act to maintain the credit of the United States Government" to issue regulations for their benefit.

I give you the assurance that if the Congress sees fit to substitute the language attached hereto in lieu of the Connally amendment I will issue a regulation which will give some assistance to the Spanish-American War veterans who are 55 years of age or more.

Because of the peculiar conditions surrounding the Spanish-American War and Spanish-American War veterans, I want to emphasize that the assurance given in this letter and the action which I shall take pursuant thereto must not be considered as a precedent of other wars.

P. S.—It will be necessary to add to the language herewith enclosed provisions exempting the members of the board from the provisions of the Civil Service and Classification Acts.

The Veterans' Bureau estimated that the House compromise amendment would have paid $51,404,000 more to the veterans of the World War than would be paid under the original Economy Act and that $21,596,000 more would be paid to veterans of all other wars. The original House compromise plan would also have added $17,000,000 to the appropriations for administration and hospitalization. The total additional cost over the Economy Act would have been $90,000,000, according to the figures of the Veterans' Administration.

On this compromise amendment the votes of the Minnesota Representatives were as follows:

Yeas: Einar Hoidale (Democrat).

Nays: Henry Arens (Farmer-Labor), Magnus Johnson (Farmer-Labor), Paul J. Kvale (Farmer-Labor), Ernest Lundeen (Farmer-Labor), Francis H. Shoemaker (Farmer-Labor), Ray P. Chase (Republican), Theodore Christianson (Republican), Harold Knutson (Republican).

The bill with this compromise amendment passed the House by a vote of 243 to 154.

STEIWER-CUTTING AMENDMENT

When the conference report on the independent offices appropriation bill was taken up in the Senate on June 14, the Senate adopted the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, which was substituted for the House compromise amendment. Rather than stating that the "rates of compensation" for directly service-connected cases shall not be reduced more than 25 percent, as did the House compromise amendment, the Steiwer-Cutting amendment stated:

In no event shall the compensation being paid * * * be reduced more than 25 percent.

The Steiwer-Cutting amendment also protected the presumptive cases by making it more binding upon the Administration to resolve all benefits of doubt in favor of the veterans. It also protected Spanish-American War veterans by providing that in no case were the pensions being paid to the veterans of any war prior to the World War to be reduced more than 25 percent.

The Veterans' Administration estimated that the Steiwer-Cutting amendment would have given $148,000,000 to the veterans over the amount originally estimated by the Administration under the provisions of the Economy Act. This Steiwer-Cutting amendment would give to the veterans $58,000,000 more than they would have received under the original House compromise plan, according to the estimates of the Veterans' Administration.

SENATE ROLL CALL

On this amendment the Minnesota Senators voted as follows:

Shipstead, yea; Schall, yea.

The amendment passed by a vote of 51 to 39.

The next day, June 15, the Steiwer-Cutting amendment was to be taken up in the House. The House met at 10 a.m. Immediately the House recessed for the purpose of holding a Democratic caucus. At 2 p.m. the House was called back and the Steiwer-Cutting amendment was voted upon with no opportunity for debate. The vote of the Minnesota Congressmen on this amendment was:

Yeas: Henry Arens (Farmer-Labor), Magnus Johnson (Farmer-Labor), Paul J. Kvale (Farmer-Labor), Ernest Lundeen (Farmer-Labor), Francis H. Shoemaker (Farmer-Labor), Theodore Christianson (Republican), Harold Knutson (Republican).

Nay: Einar Hoidale.

Not voting: Ray P. Chase (Republican). (Mr. Chase was paired for the amendment.)

The amendment was defeated by a vote of 209 to 177.

THE FINAL VOTE

After the defeat of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment by the House the bill went to conference, and the conference committee reported back a measure approximately the same as the so-called "compromise amendment" adopted by the House when the House voted down the Connally amendment. The only important difference was that in the final compromise plan was included a provision which stated:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, who served 90 days or more, was honorably discharged from the service, is 55 years of age or over, is 50 percent disabled, and in need as defined by the President, shall be paid a pension of not less than $15 a month.

PRESENT STATUS OF CIVIL WAR VETERANS

The pensions of Civil War veterans were reduced 10 percent by the Economy Act, and no change in that cut has been made.

PRESENT STATUS OF SPANISH WAR VETERANS

Spanish War veterans who are over 55 and are 50-percent disabled can be sure of receiving a pension of $15 a month—if they qualify under a pauper clause. That is the protection offered the Spanish War veterans by the independent offices appropriation bill. They may still be dropped from the rolls on July 1 if the Veterans' Administration, after reviewing their cases, decides that their disabilities are not service connected, and those who are kept on the rolls under the provision just quoted must comply with the "pauper clause"—be 50-percent disabled and over 55 years of age.

PRESENT STATUS OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Presumptive cases

The President is authorized to establish special boards to review the cases of World War veterans who entered the service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, in which presumptive service connection had been granted and payments were being made on March 20, 1933, under the World War Veterans' Act as amended, but in which service connection was not granted by the regulations issued under the Economy Act. Service connection is to be granted if on all available evidence the board determines that a chronic disease became manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more within 1 year after discharge from active service.

Veterans whose cases are to be reviewed in accordance with this provision will be kept on the rolls at a 25-percent reduction from the amount of compensation they were receiving prior to the passage of the Economy Act, except in cases of "fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation", until the case is reviewed or until October 31, 1933, whichever is the earlier date.

In interpreting the word "mistake", Senator CUTTING, speaking before the Senate Saturday night, June 15, stated:

> Anyone who read that section casually would think that those cases would be kept on the rolls unless the board decided that they ought to be removed, and that if the board decided they should stay on they would continue to receive 75 percent of what they are receiving at the present time, but anyone who studies the language and notes the word "mistake" will realize that the Veterans' Administration would be authorized, by virtue of that word, to call up for review any case whatever, on the plea that the doctors who had originally passed on the case had made a mistake * * * It would allow the veterans to be called in by the Veterans' Bureau time and time again; it would allow any board to pass on the medical judgment of men who had made the review at first hand; it would allow them to turn those cases off the rolls altogether.

Directly service-connected cases

The Independent Offices Act provides that "the rates of compensation" payable for directly service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active service prior to November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct shall not be reduced more than 25 percent. Senator CUTTING explained this provision in his speech of June 15 by saying that although the rates of compensation could not be reduced more than 25 percent, the cases could be rerated and given lower ratings and the compensation cut in that way.

Therefore—

Said Senator CUTTING—

> there is nothing in the House language that places any substantial restriction upon the Veterans' Administration in making drastic cuts in compensation. If we agree to the House language, the Veterans' Administration can proceed in the next 3 months, as they have in the last 3 months, to make such cuts as they wish.

SENATE ROLL CALL

On this final compromise plan, the votes of the Minnesota Senators were as follows:

> Schall, nay; Shipstead, nay.

The bill passed by a vote of 45 to 36.

Immediately the measure was brought before the House. The previous question was ordered by the Democratic floor leader, and the vote taken without roll call. The Speaker announced, "The ayes seem to have it", and the bill was passed, appropriating $602,838,000 for the Veterans' Administration, an increase of $96,000,000 over the original estimates under the Economy Act, according to the estimates of the Veterans' Administration, but still over $345,000,000 less than the appropriations made for the Veterans' Administration last year.

Here we have the maximum measure of justice which the first session of the Seventy-third Congress saw fit to give the veterans of America. It is my firm conviction that repeal of the Economy Act should be the aim of every Congressman and Senator who believes himself to be the friend of the veterans—repeal, nothing short of that and nothing less than that. My bill for repeal of the Economy Act was introduced May 2, 1933. I filed a petition to call that bill before the House. It was placed on the Speaker's desk June 13, 1933. It will be on the Speaker's desk the opening day of the next session of Congress. Senator SCHALL introduced a companion bill to this repeal bill on May 29, 1933.

The rumors that we are paying too much money to our veterans are nothing but the results of effective propaganda on the part of the Economy League, which, according to Senator LONG's speech made on the floor of the Senate on June 14, 1933, raised $35,100 for propaganda.

RATES OF COMPENSATION PAID UNDER UNITED STATES EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION ACT

In many cases we are paying less to the war-scarred veterans of this country than we pay to the civil employees of the United States Government who have been disabled in the employment of the United States. This is shown by some very interesting figures set forth in a speech of Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS in the House of Representatives on Wednesday, May 10, 1933. These figures bring out the following facts:

We recognize that this Government is responsible for the care of its disabled employees who serve their Government at their own free will and receive wages for their work.

At the time of injury, Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts pointed out, if a Government employee is totally disabled, 66⅔ percent of his monthly pay is turned over to him as compensation, subject to a maximum compensation rate of $116.66 per month and a minimum rate of $58.33, in which case the injured person is entitled to compensation at the same rate as the regular monthly pay received when working. For partial disability 66⅔ percent of the loss in wage-earning capacity due to the disability is paid, providing the amount paid is not more than $116.66 per month.

Burial expenses not exceeding $200 are allowed. Compare this with the $75 allowed to veterans. And compare the rates of disability compensation allowed to Government employees with the $9 to $90 ratings established under the most recent Executive order for direct service-connected disabled veterans, the men who were sent to Europe to fight a war on foreign ground—under a law of conscription which violated the Constitution of this Government. (See speech of Daniel Webster, War of 1812–14.)

THE SHAME OF JULY 28, 1932

It is time that we make this country safe for the defenders of the flag. In recent years it has not even been safe for veterans to come to Washington and petition those in power for justice. The graves of Hushka and Carlson have become symbols to the veterans of their growing resentment against the Government which drafted them into war. The veterans who came to Washington in May of this year to present their grievances to the Government paused at the graves of Hushka and Carlson, their comrades who were killed in the battle between veterans and District police when the veterans were driven from their camp at Anacostia with fire and gas.

VETERANS' CONVENTION OF 1933

This year these men were advised not to bring their grievances to Washington. When this warning went out advising the veterans to stay away I welcomed them to Washington, and I will do so again. When men have grievances against those in power where shall they turn if not to Uncle Sam? These men came to Washington not with hostility in their hearts but with genuine grievances. They came to assemble together with their comrades from every State in the Union and from Alaska and the Philippines to petition their Congress and their President for redress of wrongs. They came to exercise the constitutional right of peaceful assemblage, and they were advised to stay away. I said then, and I say again, that the officials in Washington can learn more about conditions throughout the country today by listening to the men who are on the verge of destitution every day than they can from private caucuses behind closed doors.

On April 27, 1933, I filed a petition calling the adjustment service certificate bill, H.R. 1, before the House and discharging the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of this bill. During this session of Congress 50 Congressmen have signed that petition. It will remain here and be placed on the Speaker's desk again when the next session of the Seventy-third Congress opens, and all Congressmen who want this Government to keep its pledge with the veterans and pay them their bonus in cash will have an opportunity to sign that petition.

CAMP "CINDER LOT"

Before the present administration decided to reverse the policy of the Hoover administration toward the veterans who came to Washington hundreds of men pitched camp across the street from the old House Office Building, on "cinder lot." I had the pleasure of visiting the men there at 1 o'clock one morning. It was the night before they broke camp. There was no noisy demonstration. In fact, if I had not known the men were there I would never have noticed them. But as I walked onto the lot I stumbled against one of them, sleeping. I was amazed at the spectacle they presented—hundreds of soldiers, not so many years ago the glory and pride of the Nation, sleeping there on an empty cinder lot, unwelcome guests at the Nation's Capital.

Protection from the damp air and ground was necessary. The well-to-do veteran had two newspapers for blankets; one he placed on the ground and the other he used for a cover. The "commoner" had only one newspaper and used it to protect himself from the wet grass. Small campfires were burning and meager rations were being served to some of the men.

ONE ADMINISTRATION LEARNS FROM THE MISTAKES OF ANOTHER

The veterans had decided to come to Washington and exercise their right to assemble and present their grievances, whether they were advised to stay away or not. The fate of the Hoover administration was fresh in everyone's mind, and the present administration decided to reverse the policy of its predecessor. A camp was set up at Fort Hunt, Va. Free transportation was provided by Government busses running from Fort Hunt to Washington. Clean, comfortable quarters were provided to accommodate 10,000 men. There were 3,300 in all registered at the camp. There were orderly rows of tents, equipped with cots and blankets. A huge camp kitchen was set up, with a tennis court for a floor. Good, clean food was served, cooked on 40 field ranges in double rows. A large tent was provided in which the men held their meetings.

The right of peaceful assemblage and petition was recognized. The men were given temporary food, clothing, and shelter, but no adjusted compensation and no satisfactory answer of any kind to their petitions. Instead the majority of them were induced to enlist in the Emergency Conservation Corps at a dollar a day. This offer they accepted because they had no other means of obtaining the necessities of life.

THE GRIEVANCES OF THE VETERANS

The veterans who assembled in Washington in 1933 did more than clamor for bonus checks. These men feel that this Government has no right to place upon them the burden of maintaining the credit of the United States Government. They were willing to sacrifice their lives in time of need, but they are not willing to pay twice for a war which they know now was brought on by the very selfish interests who now seek to cut their pensions and compensations down to nothing. They know now that it was a commercial war. They know there is plenty of money in this country, and they want at least a portion of their share. Their loyalty has been proved. The policy of this Government, in refusing to pay the bonus and in ruthlessly slashing pensions and compensations, has made these millions of veterans restless. There is a growing feeling of resentment and suspicion arising among them. Militant groups of veterans have declared that they would never again vote for a Republican, and now they declare the Democrats are worse. The previous administration refused to give them their bonus, but it took nothing from them which they already had. The resentment expressed by the veterans in Washington this year is growing. It cannot be suppressed by new administrative regulations easing somewhat the hardships imposed by the Economy Act. It is growing and it will continue to grow.

THE FINAL PLEA

The veterans of America are making their final plea to this administration and to the Members of this Congress. If that plea is not heard, these veterans will not sit back and wait for the liberalization of Executive regulations. They have fought before, and they will fight again—not to make the world safe for democracy this time but to make America safe for the veterans, the farmers, the workers. These men know that the time has arrived for them to organize in powerful groups throughout the country. Gentlemen of this House do not realize that powerful organizations are springing up in this country to take the reins of Government from the two major parties. I have communicated with strong organizations of veterans, workers, and farmers throughout the country who are uniting and organizing, who realize that their battle is against a common foe—the mighty Money Trust—and who are going to demand economic and political justice before many more months have passed.

DEMANDS OF THE VETERANS

The veterans assembled here are presenting three demands. They are organizing to put those demands into effect.

First. Immediate cash payment of the adjusted compensation, or bonus.

Second. Repeal of the Economy Act.

Third. Immediate and real relief for the farmers and workers of America.

When these men returned from France they were left to shift for themselves. They could no longer be used for the protection of American capital abroad. Now the selfish interests who are responsible for this panic want to escape the day of reckoning which they have brought upon themselves. But they cannot escape it. These same interests who plunged us into the World War are now shouting economy. Taxes must be lowered! The Budget must be balanced! There was a time when they forgot about balancing the Budget. When they passed a law of conscription and sent these men abroad into a futile war to end war there was no thought then of balancing the Budget. We had to make the world safe for democracy. This is a war on want. This is no time to balance the Budget. It cannot be done with millions upon millions hungry—they and their families out of work. These millions have a Divine right to live. It is time to conscript the wealth of this Nation and make America safe for all her people, by no means forgetting our service men of all wars.

TOMMY

Rudyard Kipling

I went into a public-'ouse to get a pint o' beer,
The publican 'e up an' sez, "We serve no red-coats here."
The girls be'ind the bar they laughed an' giggled fit to die,
I outs into the street again an' to myself sez I:

O it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Tommy, go away";
But it's "Thank you, Mister Atkins", when the band begins to play—
The band begins to play, my boys, the band begins to play,
O it's "Thank you, Mister Atkins", when the band begins to play.

I went into a theater as sober as could be,
They gave a drunk civilian room, but 'adn't none for me;
They sent me to the gallery or round the music-'alls,
But when it comes to fightin', Lord! they'll shove me in the stalls!

For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Tommy, wait outside";
But it's "Special train for Atkins" when the trooper's on the tide—
The troopship's on the tide, my boys, the troopship's on the tide,
O it's "Special train for Atkins" when the trooper's on the tide.

Yes, makin' mock o' uniforms that guard you while you sleep
Is cheaper than them uniforms, an' they're starvation cheap;
An' hustlin' drunken sodgers when they're goin' large a bit
Is five times better business than paradin' in full kit.

Then it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Tommy, 'ow's yer soul?"
But it's "Thin red line of 'eroes" when the drums begin to roll—
The drums begin to roll, my boys, the drums begin to roll,
O it's "Thin red line of 'eroes" when the drums begin to roll.

We aren't no thin red 'eroes, nor we aren't no blackguards too,
But single men in barricks, most remarkable like you;
An' if sometimes our conduck isn't all your fancy paints,
Why, single men in barricks don't grow into plaster saints.

While it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Tommy, fall be'ind",
But it's "Please to walk in front, sir", when there's trouble in the wind—
There's trouble in the wind, my boys, there's trouble in the wind,
O it's "Please to walk in front, sir", when there's trouble in the wind.

You talk o' better food for us, an' schools, an' fires, an' all:
We'll wait for extry rations if you treat us rational.
Don't mess about the cook-room slops, but prove it to our face
The widow's uniform is not the soldier-man's disgrace.

For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Chuck him out, the brute!"
But it's "Saviour of 'is country" when the guns begin to shoot;
An' it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' anything you please;
An' Tommy ain't a bloomin' fool—you bet that Tommy sees!

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to discuss the latest legislative developments with reference to the veterans' legislation. I have already on divers occasions discussed orally from the floor this very important question. On May 10 I made what I think was the first speech made in the House calling the attention of the country to the failure of the President and his assistants to administer properly the economy law. Again on June 10, from the floor of the House, while supporting the Connally amendment, I spoke with all the earnestness of my nature against the arbitrary invasion of the rights of Spanish-American War and World War veterans by the President and his assistants.

The day after I made my first speech the President gave out a statement that he would liberalize the regulations under which he was threatening financial ruin to most of the veterans. I do not wish to give the impression that the President issued this statement because of my speech, but rather to show that while I was sensing the feeling of the veterans and the country on this subject the President and his advisers were not far behind me; and in order to anticipate these complaints he, pretended to grant them a favor which was in fact a mere gesture. The passage of the Economy Act was secured under most unusual times. I do not think that our country was ever in such a crisis as it was at that time except possibly when Abraham Lincoln took over the reins of government. The President requested economy and promised justice. He desired that all recipients of Government money reduce the amount they were receiving. This included Congressmen as well as veterans. The bill including these reductions was passed in accordance with his wishes. The President was given power to reduce the veterans' compensation, but the salary of the Government officials and employees was reduced by the law to a certain percentage. The President urged that he be granted this authority. Most Congressmen felt that at that time it might be best to give the President the power that he requested. No one felt that he would abuse this power. No one felt that he would immediately issue regulations that would affront the sense of justice and incite the indignation of any reasonable person. The President's forces crowded the bill through the House without even permitting time for the Membership to read it. Mr. BROWNING, seeking harmony, sought permission to amend it so that all veterans on the rolls would be reduced by 25 percent. I, with others, signified a willingness to assist in the passage of this amendment, but we were denied even a consideration. Our only remedy, then, lay in a motion to recommit the bill back to the committee. Ninety of us stood up in support of this motion, which was lost before the strong phalanx of Democratic votes, the House having a Democratic majority of nearly 3 to 1. If this motion to recommit had passed, this vexatious condition would not now be upon so many of these veterans. The bill was messaged over to the Senate immediately and was considered with some deliberation there, and an amendment suggested by Senator DILL was permitted. The amendment provided as follows:

Provided, That nothing contained in this title shall deny a pension to a Spanish-American War veteran past the age of 62 years entitled to a pension under existing law, but the President may reduce the rate of pension as he may deem proper.

The bill further provided a minimum pension of $6. No reasonable person with a desire to do justice would maintain that Congress meant that the pension to be allowed these elderly veterans should be the lowest rate that could possibly be allowed. Yet this was the amount allowed by the President in his regulations. When the President and his advisers were urging the enactment of this law and were promising to deal justly, subsequent events raised a doubt as to whether they were sincere in their motives. Their plan was not disclosed then, but it has been unmasked many times since then, and I propose to prove that they were not sincere. While I doubted the necessity of all this hurry, still I thought the President and his advisers were sincere. But when the President held that under the Dill amendment it was doing justice to the veterans over 62 years of age to cut them from $60 and $72 down to $6, then I knew we had been imposed upon. Then when the President, under the most severe pressure from veterans' organizations, agreed to regulation 12, which by fair interpretation carried much relief to the Spanish War veterans, and then permitted it to be nullified completely in administration, I knew that the President had a deep-seated purpose to cut the veterans' allowances far beyond his declared intention to "deal justly." Wrong and injustice will not prevail. They will not bring real economy. Any program that brings anguish and tears is not as economical as one that brings justice and contentment. Sensing the revulsion of sentiment that was bound to come from this unwarranted injustice to this great group of our citizens, I made bold to sound the alarm in my speech of May 10. The whip of the President cracking over the backs of the Democratic Members of the House and the Senate may drown the clamor of these veterans crying out for the justice they have a right to expect, but this will not be for long. The worm will turn. Justice will prevail. Right will be enthroned.

Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne,—
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the shadows, keeping watch above His own.

The President apparently had regard only to the amount that would be slashed and not to the distress occasioned by the slashes. He did not yield one material point until many Congressmen followed my lead in attacking his unmerciful course. Then he yielded begrudgingly, claiming that before he would yield the Congress would have to find some additional taxes to keep the Budget in balance. He and his advisers were hardly sincere when they made these statements, for under pressure they retreated and made material concessions amounting to about $100,000,000 and did not secure any additional tax legislation. They were determined to heed the behest of the Economy League, which wished to cut the veterans $460,000,000 and thereby save the Economy League and others of this class from paying income taxes in that amount.

I have no patience with the "claptrap" statements put out by those who seek to apologize for the President by saying that he surely did not know of the cruelties enacted by Lewis Douglas, the Director of the Budget, and General Hines, the Director of Veterans' Affairs. I have no argument in defense of those gentlemen, but I know that it is not in line with the truth to heap the blame upon them and relieve the President of all responsibility. No doubt the President was advised privately by practically every leading Democrat in the House and the Senate of these injustices and fought back any suggestion of change of the unjust regulations. A Senator in an address before the Senate represented that he had consulted with the President about this matter fully and that the President had authorized him to carry a message to the Senate setting out his position. This message was pitiful in its childishness and showed that the President did not know much about the subject, but showed further that he was abundantly satisfied with his knowledge and if there were any injustices in his regulations he was not admitting them and was not open to advice on the subject. He took the attitude of one capable of giving advice and not of one who was ready to receive advice.

When the contest grew hot and when the pressure got strong the President—not Douglas and Hines—issued a regulation raising the total amount to be paid totally disabled non-service-connected veterans from $20 to $30 per month. This was done after the famous promise not to raise pensions without raising taxes and that he "would fight it out all summer" before doing so. He did so and did so without securing any additional taxes and before the summer was over. As the fight grew hotter and hotter he gradually retreated. When the Senate passed the Connally amendment carrying a 25-percent reduction in all pensions it did so in order to keep the Senate from passing an amendment carrying a 15-percent cut. The vote was a tie and the tie was broken by Vice President Garner voting with those who were willing to vote for a 25-percent cut in order to prevent an equal number of Senators from passing a bill providing for only a 15-percent cut. Had the Connally amendment been voted upon promptly by the House it would have carried overwhelmingly, but the Democratic caucus appointed a committee which made many pilgrimages to the White House to persuade this "kind-hearted" gentleman to withdraw his regulations and permit more just regulations to be promulgated. No one who has heard the reports by those who attended these numerous conferences can conclude but that the President is the one who issued the regulations and that it was the duty of Douglas and Hines to put into printed regulation what the President ordered. The President ordered and Douglas and Hines carried out the orders. It must have been most humiliating for the members of this committee to pedal back and forth between the President and the Democratic Membership of the House in an effort to get the President to permit them to do what their consciences told them was right. Douglas and Hines did not crack the whip. The whip was wielded by the whipmaster himself, with the result that the Connally amendment was defeated by a few votes and another amendment substituted.

If that committee had been wise enough to have changed the Connally amendment so that nobody could have had any credit for its passage but the President himself, it would have passed easily. When the plan passed by the House was returned to the Senate, it was rejected and the substance of the Connally amendment with other favorable amendments were included in what is now known as the "Steiwer amendment." This amendment passed the Senate by a vote of 51 to 39 after one of the most brilliant debates in the history of the Senate. It was returned to the House amidst great excitement, and would have passed the House by an overwhelming vote, but the President's friends maneuvered an adjournment. The next day a caucus of Democrats was held and the lash was applied unmercifully. Many walked out rather than be humiliated, but many permitted their minds to be supplanted by the mind and will of the President. Many were the exhortations to stand by the Democratic Party and to save the President. Many stultified themselves in order to retain the graces of their leader. Justice and right went out of the window and expediency and patronage came in. The rights of the veterans were pawned for the smiles of the leader. The exchange permitted the "kind-hearted man" to continue to demand that before a Spanish War veteran 55 years of age could get a pension of $10 per month he must swear to a pauper's oath. Mr. Speaker, the price of the exchange was entirely too high! But the worst is yet to come. After the House with its 200 new Members had been whipped into line by the President and its leaders, the bill was then sent to a conference made up of Republicans and Democrats from the Senate and House, a majority of which conferees were Democrats. This conference recommended that the House plan be accepted in preference to the Senate plan, although all of the veterans' organizations in the Nation were demanding the contrary. They were willing to take this 25-percent cut and even more. But the Democratic conferees willfully threw away a chance to benefit the veterans and preferred to accede to the dictates of the President.

After another long and brilliant debate in the Senate there is witnessed a sorry spectacle of personal perfidy. Senators who on Wednesday night, while listening only to the still small voice of conscience, voted for the Steiwer amendment, on Thursday night at almost the same hour, in the same place and before the same audience, voted against identically the same thing that they had voted for only 24 hours previously. What caused the change? Was it the influence of Douglas and Hines? No! No! it was the influence of "the kind-hearted gentleman" who was demanding that in order for a Spanish War veteran with 50-percent disability to get a $10 pension he must swear to a pauper's oath. My friends, let not yourselves be deceived; the President is demanding that the veterans accept a reduction far out of proportion to their dues. Hundreds of thousands of veterans are put off the pension roll and onto the charity roll. Hundreds are put out of their hospital beds in order that boys from the reforestation camps may be put into them.

A great injustice has been done in the name of justice and under the direction of the President. Right will ultimately prevail over wrong. Justice will ultimately supplant injustice. But what will the wronged victim do while right is battling with wrong and justice is contending with injustice? What will the veteran do when his pension or compensation is cut off? I am afraid that none has accurately anticipated this. I did what I could to prevent this untoward situation. The Democratic Party and its leader brought this condition on, and the responsibility is theirs. Responsibility brought on by willfulness is heavier than responsibility that frequently comes in spite of one's best intentions. Let the veterans find hope in the fact that those who by pressure have restored to the pension appropriations many millions of dollars are yet anxious to continue the fight until adequate pensions are restored and until the bitterness and disappointments are again drawn from the veterans' hearts and until they again feel that our great Government will not turn its back on him who bore the brunt of the battle in the heat of the day.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the independent offices appropriation bill carries appropriations for the Executive offices and all independent bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, including the Veterans' Administration, not under the supervision of a Cabinet officer, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934. The bill recommends an appropriation of $631,802,546.

It is not my purpose to discuss any of the items of the bill other than those for the Veterans' Administration.

The report submitted shows in detail the amount recommended for each governmental activity, and the hearings explain in detail the purpose for which the amounts are to be expended by the several independent boards, offices, or commissions.

I want to discuss not only the appropriation recommended for the Veterans' Administration, which, as finally reported in the bill, aggregates $631,802,546, including the amount of $8,000,000 added for the expense of retaining regional offices in the field.

The committee allowed all the revised estimates of the Bureau of the Budget for the Veterans' Administration, and in addition added $8,000,000 referred to above for the regional offices.

There has been so much discussion throughout the country with reference to appropriations in behalf of the ex-service men that I want to explain briefly the reduction in the appropriation, how and why it was made, and my attitude toward legislation affecting the ex-service men of the country.

When the new administration assumed control on March 4, 1933, financial chaos was impending. Every financial institution was threatened. Business was paralyzed. Approximately 15,000,000 men and women were out of employment. Many thousands, if not millions, were being fed through private and public charity. A moratorium was proclaimed, and every bank in the country, both large and small, was temporarily closed. No one could safely predict what a day would bring forth. Strong men and women talked in whispers. Every business structure was insecure. Conditions were so extremely critical that Congress was immediately convened in extra session March 9, 1933. The eyes of the Nation were directed to the President. He had been elected by a tremendous majority. He received 472 electoral votes as against 59 for Mr. Hoover, and carried 42 of the 48 States. He received a total popular vote of 22,821,857 to 15,761,841 for Mr. Hoover. In Oklahoma he received 516,468 votes to 188,165 for Mr. Hoover.

President Roosevelt, in his first message to Congress dated March 10, 1933, emphasized the necessity of reducing Government expenditures and the balancing of the Budget as the first step toward economic recovery, and called attention to the fact that—

For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road toward bankruptcy.

For the fiscal year 1931 the deficit was $462,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1932 it was $2,472,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1933 it will probably exceed $1,200,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1934, based on the appropriation bills passed by the last Congress and the estimated revenues, the deficit will probably exceed $1,000,000,000 unless immediate action is taken.

Thus we shall have piled up an accumulated deficit of $5,000,000,000.

The President urged the very greatest necessity for economy. He stated:

We must move with a direct and resolute purpose now. The Members of the Congress and I are pledged to immediate economy.

The President further stated:

Provision for additional saving is essential, and therefore I am asking the Congress today for new legislation laying down broad principles for the granting of pensions and other veteran benefits, and giving to the Executive the authority to prescribe the administrative details.

Concluding the message, the President stated:

When a great danger threatens our basic security it is my duty to advise the Congress of the way to preserve it. In so doing I must be fair not only to the few but to the many. It is in this spirit that I appeal to you. If the Congress chooses to vest me with this responsibility, it will be exercised in a spirit of justice to all, of sympathy to those who are in need, and of maintaining inviolate the basic welfare of the United States.

As a result of this appeal through the special message of March 10, 1933, the so-called "Economy Act" was enacted by Congress.

In discussing the proposed legislation Mr. McDUFFIE, of Alabama, chairman of the committee reporting the bill, said:

This bill, if enacted, will not be an act on your part to take a dime from a single worthy ex-service man. You are simply placing the responsibility on a great man who is willing to assume it. Your vote for this bill simply shows your willingness and your desire to cooperate with him, believing, as I know you believe, that he meant what he said in his message when he said:

"If the Congress chooses to vest me with this responsibility, it will be exercised in a spirit of justice to all, of sympathy to those who are in need, and of maintaining inviolate the basic welfare of the United States."

* * * * * * *

It is true this bill grants a great deal of power, but this country is in a state of war—not against a foreign enemy but war against economic evils that demand some sacrifice on your part and mine. The time has come when each of us must sacrifice personal opinions and our own ideas for the common good.

In closing the argument for the bill Majority Leader BYRNS, of Tennessee, made the following statement:

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I have complete confidence in the absolute fairness of the President of the United States and am certain that he will not do any injustice to any class of citizens in this country.

The people by an overwhelming vote have vested the power of leadership in him. I want to appeal to my Democratic friends upon this side of the Chamber particularly and ask them: Are you going to deny to him today the power to discharge the solemn responsibilities which he has assumed and which he holds direct from the people? Are you going to tie his hands in the services he is attempting to perform for the people of this country?

We are facing a serious situation, as the gentleman from New York and others have said, a situation more serious, more critical than even existed in war times.

The people are looking to the President to restore confidence and to bring about a return of normal conditions. It would be unfair to him, it would be unfair to the people whom he is attempting to serve, if we today should deny to him the power that he asks to discharge this great responsibility.

Do not mistake it. This is his bill. It has come from his hand. It is an administration measure. When you vote against it you are voting to handicap the President of the United States in his effort to give the people relief. [Applause.]

We are told that the deficit which will occur in June will amount to over $1,200,000,000, and next year, in 1934, it will be over a billion dollars, making over $5,000,000,000 indebtedness that will occur during the period of 4 years.

My friends, something must be done to relieve your Treasury and to preserve the credit of the Nation. You can only do it by reducing the expenditures of this Government—something that President Roosevelt is seeking to do in this bill.

I hope that my Democratic friends upon this side of the aisle who were elected upon the same ticket with him, and who hold allegiance to the same party to which he belongs and of which he is leader, will not be less loyal to the President today than these gentlemen on the left side of the Chamber who have spoken in behalf of this bill. [Applause.]

I appeal to you in this great emergency to forget any differences you may have, any small or serious objection that you may have to this bill, and subordinate all in your effort to give the President this authority which he asks.

There are features of the bill to which I do not give my whole accord; but, my friends, in this great national emergency I am willing to surrender any differences that I may have, and will do so as quickly as I would if we were actually in a state of warfare. [Applause.]

This is not a time to look for defects. It is a time to get behind our great leader and to follow him and be guided by his judgment, rather than our own, in this critical period. The people are looking to him as their hope for relief, and they are not going to look with favor upon any action which will not uphold his hands. What will the country say if it shall go out to the country that the Congress of the United States is not standing behind the President in his effort? What will they say if it be said that this Congress has failed to give him the support that he has asked? Let us pass this bill by an overwhelming vote. [Applause.]

During the World War I voted for all legislation, much of it drastic, recommended as necessary to win the war, to care for the soldiers, and to bring back our flag in triumph. In this critical emergency when we have an economic war and are fighting a depression world-wide, I feel constrained to give President Roosevelt powers equal to those given President Wilson during the World War.

The bill, as had been requested by the President and prepared under his direction, gave him the authority to prescribe rules and regulations covering pensions and benefits to soldiers and their dependents, to reduce salaries of all Government officials and employees, and to abolish, transfer, or consolidate by Executive order bureaus, commissions, or other Government agencies. Congress gave the President the authority requested to meet the emergency.

The bill is divided into three titles. I shall first briefly examine titles II and III, because I want to discuss title I more at length.

Title II relates to all Government officials and employees, and provides that the President, under certain limitations, may fix their compensation. The salaries of Members of Congress and the allowance for their clerical assistance are reduced by 15 percent. In other words, the salaries of Members of Congress are reduced by $1,500 per year. The several States, counties, and municipalities, in the interest of economy, have in turn reduced the salaries of all employees, including teachers, and have reduced other expenses. Everyone, without exception, is required to make some financial sacrifice. Wages in every line of private employment have been greatly reduced. Millions cannot find employment at any wage.

Title III amends the 1933 Legislative Appropriation Act and authorizes the President, within 2 years, to make Executive orders in the interest of economy and efficiency, as provided in the act, abolishing, consolidating, or transferring bureaus, commissions, or other governmental agencies, provided that such Executive orders shall be submitted to the Congress while in session, and shall not become effective until after the expiration of 60 calendar days after such transmission, unless Congress shall by law provide for an earlier effective date of such Executive order or orders. Such orders are in course of preparation and when made will have the effect to further greatly reduce governmental expenditures. Some have been made and were transmitted to Congress.

Title I is entitled "Veterans" and provides the classes under regulations issued by the President and subject to limitations prescribed therein who may be paid pensions and receive domiciliary care where they are suffering from permanent disabilities, tuberculosis, and mental diseases, and for medical hospital treatment for diseases and injuries.

The rules and regulations prescribed for the President and promulgated by him were too drastic, and many cases were brought to the attention of Members of Congress, which showed that there were injustices and inequalities. The President subsequently amended his rules and regulations and to some extent liberalized them.

Congress sought to further correct the abuses in the law and the regulations. The Senate first adopted what is known as the "Connally amendment", which was the subject of conference between the House and the Senate conferees. The President seriously objected to certain provisions of the Connally amendment which limited the reduction in soldier benefits to a horizontal cut of 25 percent of the amount soldiers, including Spanish-American War and World War soldiers, were receiving on March 20, 1933, when the Economy Act was passed. He earnestly protested the retention on the rolls of the presumptive cases which without proof were presumed to be of service origin under the act of 1924, where the disability occurred prior to January 1, 1925, and insisted that these presumptive cases, of which there were 154,843, should be reviewed by disinterested boards set up for that purpose, with the burden of proof on the Government and giving the ex-service men the benefit of every reasonable doubt and charging the boards with the responsibility of fairly examining not only their files but any additional proof that may be submitted on behalf of ex-service men tending to show their disabilities were of service origin, and until October 31, 1933, all receiving disability compensation under the presumptive provision should continue to draw the same as theretofore, less 25 percent, or until their cases may have been adversely determined by one of these boards.

Second, he objected to payment of disability allowances to non-service-connected cases under the act of July 3, 1930, where the existing disability was not shown to be total and permanent.

Third, he insisted upon a reduction of Spanish American War pensions under the age of 62 years where the disability was not shown to be of service origin.

Fourth, he objected to hospital treatment for non-service-connected cases in excess of the use of the capacity of hospitals owned and operated by the Government and where it would necessitate additional expenses to hospitalize ex-soldiers for treatment of injuries received since their military service and where their disabilities were not of service origin.

The Steiwer-Cutting amendment was offered and adopted as a Senate substitute for the Connally amendment, which was intended to further liberalize and amend the regulations issued by the President with particular reference to Spanish-American War veterans who had not reached the age of 62 years.

The President insisted that his objections were so fundamental he made it known to leaders both of the House and the Senate and to the conferees that if the Steiwer-Cutting or the Connally amendment were added that he would veto the bill.

Anxious to secure legislation amending the Economy Act and liberalizing the rules and regulations promulgated by the President, the House conferees, after conferring with the President, insisted upon the House amendment which retained on the rolls on and after July 1, 1933, approximately 36,325 widows and dependents of ex-service men, provided boards to be set up to hear and pass upon all presumptive cases with the burden of proof on the Government to show that the disability was not of service origin, and to provide for a pension of Spanish-American War veterans over the age of 55 years who are in need and as much as 50 percent disabled without the necessity of showing that their disability is of service origin.

The purpose of the amended legislation except in those cases of ex-service men of the World War who are totally and permanently disabled and Spanish-American War veterans under 62 years of age is to grant a pension to the soldiers of these wars where their disability is of service origin.

The House amendment was strongly supported by many of the leading ex-service men who are Members of Congress, including Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, and Hon. GORDON BROWNING, of Tennessee, who were members of the special committee conferring with the President to secure the most liberal legislation possible for the benefit of soldiers of all wars. They, realizing that additional and further legislation could not be secured, strongly urged the adoption of the House amendment, which, together with the amended regulations issued by the President during the controversy, would increase the benefits to the soldiers in an estimated sum of from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000, which the soldiers would not have received without the House amendment, and if the Senate amendment were added and vetoed would leave the benefits to be received the same as those received under the regulations originally issued and amended under the act of March 20, 1933. The benefits will depend upon sympathetic administration and decisions of the boards.

The pensions of Civil War veterans were reduced 10 percent by the act of March 20, 1933, and they were not disturbed by the amended legislation. The grand total of disbursements for pensions on account of this war to June 30, 1932, was $7,600,321,525.34.

The objection of the Spanish-American War veterans was principally directed to those on the pension rolls under 62 years of age, whose pensions would be either cut off entirely or greatly reduced.

As to the Spanish-American War veterans, the discussion in the Senate was to the effect that on June 30, 1932, pensions were being paid to 196,541 at a cost of approximately $124,000,000 per annum. The number enlisted was given at 280,564, and that of these there were killed in action 498, died of wounds 202, died of disease 5,423, died by accident and other causes 349; total deaths, 6,472; wounded, but not mortally, 2,961.

At the close of the fiscal year 1932 compensation was being paid to 328,658 veterans of the World War for disabilities either directly or presumptively of service origin, and of these 154,843 were presumptive cases. The disbursements for this purpose were $181,900,493.14.

The disability-allowance cases, being those not of service origin under the act of July 3, 1930, on June 30, 1932, numbered 407,584, and for that fiscal year received $75,458,233. Of this class, those permanently and totally disabled will remain on the roll.

The total paid to the World War ex-service men for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, both service-presumptive and non-service-connected, was $264,998,613.76.

The total amount appropriated for and disbursed through the Veterans' Administration for all purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, including pensions, administrative purposes, hospitalization, and all other expenditures, aggregated $948,799,000.

No one has greater confidence in the wisdom or the patriotism of the President. I am sure of his deep sympathy for the soldiers of all wars; and if in the administration of the bill and the regulations promulgated under it he finds injustices have been done, he will continue to have the courage to correct them. Veterans of all wars may rest assured that he will give earnest consideration to representations made in their behalf by their several organizations. His leadership has challenged the admiration of the entire country and the world. He is a man with lofty purposes and high ideals.

No President has shown a more humane spirit or evidenced a keener interest in relieving the distressed people of our country.

Briefly reviewing the history of this legislation and my attitude toward it, permit me to say an effort was made during the last session of Congress to drastically reduce the compensation and benefits received by the ex-service men of the World War. These drastic reductions were not made for the reason that the hearings then being held but not completed disclosed that the Veterans' Administration was actively reviewing every case on its merits, whether for disability compensation or pension, which was pending before it, with a view of determining whether mistakes had been made in any case in allowing the claim, and whether the amount should be increased or decreased, or the claim disallowed. I insisted that each claim be reviewed on its merits.

Appreciating that the duties devolving upon the President were so great that he must of necessity charge other officials with the responsibility of preparing the rules and regulations which the bill provided, and knowing the attitude of those who may be charged with this responsibility, in caucus, I supported the Browning amendment to limit the reduction of benefits to ex-service men not to exceed 25 percent. The parliamentary procedure under which the bill was considered in the House would not permit the offering of such an amendment to the bill.

The Veterans' Administration claimed the authority under existing law to review all claims, but the work was not completed. A joint committee appointed to study the question had postponed its report beyond the adjournment of Congress March 4, 1933.

It had been urged in the press, on the stump, in private conversation, and in Congress, that some claims had been allowed which were without merit. I had no objection to permitting the Veterans' Administration in making an investigation of each claim pending before it with a view of correcting any mistake that had been made. I did not then and do not now favor striking the names of ex-service men from the rolls in groups, but think each case should be judged on its own merits. Where the name of an ex-service man is on the roll and disability compensation or pension has been allowed, the burden of proof should be on the Government to show that the claim is excessive or without merit at all.

The ex-service men joined the colors when the war resolution was passed on April 6, 1917. They upheld the fine traditions of our country. They are entitled to sympathetic consideration at the hands of a grateful nation. Every ex-service man who suffered a disability in line of duty and not the result of his own misconduct should receive compensation in proportion to the disability incurred, and in case of death his widow and dependents should be generously cared for by a grateful nation.

Now, as to that large class of claimants under the act of July 3, 1930, and who were granted pensions and generally referred to as non-service-connected, the fact is too frequently overlooked that many thousands of the ex-service men are now disabled and are unable to trace their disabilities to service origin. Upon discharge they were hastily examined and returned home. Soon after entering civil life many felt the strain, became disabled, and were treated by local physicians, without complete records being made, and later many of them broke under the strain.

In my judgment, the disabilities of literally thousands of these splendid men were of service origin, yet they were unable to present medical proof to the satisfaction of and as required by the Veterans' Administration.

Each of these cases should be sympathetically reexamined with the burden of proof on the Government. Lay testimony should be accepted, and if fairly reviewed, there should be no complaint upon the final decision.

As heretofore referred to, there are 154,843 presumptive cases on the rolls. Many of them are suffering from tuberculosis and mental diseases, and I do not believe as to them that Congress intended to repeal these presumptions.

Before any members of a group of this character are stricken from the rolls each individual case should be reexamined, with the burden of proof upon the Government to show that the ex-service man was not entitled to the compensation or pension received and the disability in fact was not of service origin.

Now as to hospitalization, two things should be taken into consideration. First, the splendid services which these ex-service men rendered the Nation, and, second, the depression that has impoverished a very large percentage of the population of our country, including, of course, the ex-service men.

I have always felt, first, that we owed a duty to the veterans to hospitalize the men who had suffered a disability in line of duty, and that to the extent of the capacity of our hospitals we should care for all ex-service men in need of hospitalization, with particular reference to those who are unable, because of financial difficulties, to secure proper hospitalization and treatment. If these men were willing to offer their lives upon the altar of their country and defend our flag, they should be cared for when ill and in financial distress and unable to care for themselves.

In this connection permit me to say that I favored the payment of the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates, first, because I did not feel that the ex-service men had been adequately compensated and the Government would have been only remitting the interest, and, second, the payment of the balance due would have been so widely distributed it would have greatly aided in relieving the depression.

With reference to regional offices: Until every case is reviewed and finally adjusted, regional offices should be maintained in each State accessible to the ex-service men where they can go and contact the officials of the Government, present their claims, be reexamined, and be personally advised as to what additional testimony, if any, is necessary to substantiate their claims.

In most cases the regional offices can and should be combined with the Government hospitals, and in this way they could be maintained with little additional expense. The ex-service men cannot complete their cases through correspondence with the Washington office, which would be necessary if the work of all the regional offices is concentrated here. It should be as much the duty of a Government official to assist the ex-service men in perfecting their claims as it is to protect the Government by reducing or disallowing claims which are not meritorious.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, under a computation made by the Veterans' Administration, it appears that as a result of the compromise veterans' legislation recently enacted by Congress and approved by the President $96,000,000 will be added to allowances for veterans and their dependents in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934.

Following is a tabulation of the increases in veteran payments required under the compromise, as shown by the latest official schedules for 1934:

Classification:	Increase
Disability compensation	$49,662,000
Death compensation	11,130,000
Disability allowances	3,967,000
Spanish (connected)	4,985,000
Spanish (nonservice)	15,157,000
Peace veterans	2,609,000
Hospitalization	8,500,000
Total increases	96,010,000

These are annual increases over what would have been paid under the original economy regulation. I desire to make a brief analysis of these increases, so the public may know what additional compensation each group of veterans will receive as a result of the recent legislative compromise.

First. Veterans of the Civil War and all prior wars received no increase under the compromise, as their pensions were not materially reduced by the Economy Act. Their total payments for 1934 are unchanged and will approximate $76,000,000.

Second. The allowance to so-called "peace veterans", those who were disabled in service rendered after the armistice, was increased from $5,600,000 to $8,281,000, an annual increase of $2,681,000. In addition the widows and other dependents of this group will draw $2,400,000.

Third. Under the compromise the hospitalization budget was raised from $77,273,000 to $85,773,000, an increase of $8,500,000. This increase in the amount allowed for hospitalization was due to relaxing and liberalizing the regulations under which ex-soldiers and sailors may qualify for domiciliary care.

Fourth. Spanish-American War veterans get an additional $20,000,000 as a result of the legislative compromise. This increase to Spanish-American War veterans is distributed as follows:

(a) Those who are pensioned for service-connected disabilities will get $5,000,000 more than they would have received under the economy regulations.

(b) Spanish-American War veterans who are drawing or will draw pensions for disabilities not contracted in the service will receive $15,147,000 more than they would have received under the economy regulations. In the aggregate, under the legislative compromise, the payments to Spanish-American War veterans and their dependents were increased from $40,000,000 to $60,000,000 annually.

Fifth. Under the compromise the payment to World War veterans who have disabilities incurred in the service and in line of duty will be increased from $68,610,000 to $118,275,000, an annual increase of $49,664,000. This increase will go to World War veterans whose disabilities have been found to be directly or presumptively incurred in the service.

Sixth. Under the compromise there will be an increase of $11,000,000 in payments for death compensation in cases where the death of the veteran is directly or presumptively due to battle injuries.

Seventh. In disability-allowance cases; that is, cases where payments are made to a veteran on account of disabilities in no way resulting from or connected with his military service, the total under the legislative compromise is increased from $6,173,000 to $10,145,000, an annual increase of $4,028,000 over what would have been paid under the economy regulations.

Now, while the compromise negotiated by the committee of which I am a member did not give the veterans all they demanded, nor all to which I think they are entitled, it does add $96,000,000 annually to their payments, and it seems to me that this is a worth-while sum, much of which would have been lost to the veterans if Congress had rejected this compromise. It would have been an act of supreme folly to reject this $96,000,000 because, forsooth, the veterans believed they were entitled to a much more liberal adjustment.

I am frank to say that we obtained for the veterans $96,000,000 more than I thought would ever be granted when our committee first conferred with the President. But, as we continued our conferences with him, he came to a realization that the cuts made in pensions and compensation allowances were entirely too drastic, and he manifested a liberal and sympathetic attitude toward the veterans at all times during our negotiations.

And may I say that we were dealing with an exceedingly controversial subject on which good and great men and women differ radically; and, like all other controversial and highly explosive questions, a settlement was only possible by a compromise and mutual concession. But this compromise does not foreclose either the veterans or the Government from having this perplexing question reopened and reconsidered at any subsequent session of Congress.

THE STRUCTURE AND PLANS OF THE FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Henry Morgenthau, Jr., on the structure and plans of the Farm Credit Administration delivered over the National Broadcasting Co.'s system on June 14, 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, broadcast from Station WMAL, Washington, D.C., over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network of stations, Wednesday evening, June 14, 1933:

The ANNOUNCER. An Executive order of President Roosevelt recently brought into existence an important new agency of the National Government known as the Farm Credit Administration, which takes over the duties and responsibilities of the Federal Farm Board, the Federal Farm Loan Board, and other agencies of the Government dealing with farm credits. The head of this new agency, Mr. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., has, on several other occasions, addressed the radio audience from this station as Chairman of the Federal Farm Board, and as Governor-designate of the Farm Credit Administration. Tonight, as Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, he is to speak on the Structure and Plans of the Farm Credit Administration. Governor Morgenthau.

Mr. MORGENTHAU. Your announcer has referred to other occasions on which I have made use of opportunities granted to me by the National Broadcasting Co. to explain the work committed to me by President Roosevelt. Immediately after the President had signed the Executive order bringing together the various farm-credit agencies of the Government, I used the radio to outline briefly the reasons for the Executive order and what it was planned to accomplish. Then after the passage of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act a few weeks ago, I undertook to explain how this act was to be administered and the opportunities for credit relief which it offered to farm debtors. Tonight I am able to tell you something a little more definite about how the whole problem of farm credits will be approached by the Farm Credit Administration in carrying out the plans advanced by the President when he issued his first consolidation order on March 27, 3 weeks after he had assumed office.

I am able to be thus definite since Congress has just passed a new act, the Farm Credit Act of 1933, which supplements the Executive order and sets up the machinery under which we are to operate.

Let me tell you first what the Farm Credit Administration is and what it is not. It is an agency for supervising loans made or to be made to farmers and farm organizations through instrumentalities set up for that purpose by Federal law. Its field is exclusively farm credit. It has nothing to do with loans on city and town homes and it has nothing to do with measures for the control of farm prices and farm surpluses. While as an organization it is new and it operates under a new name, it is not administering any new function of the Government. It has instead taken over and consolidated several agencies heretofore working in the same field. It is the successor to the Federal Farm Board, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the Crop Production Loan Office, and the feed- and seed-loan offices of the Department of Agriculture and to the Agricultural Credit Division of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which supervised the work of the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations.

The Federal Government has been making or supervising loans to farmers of three different kinds. These are:

First, long-time loans on the security of land mortgages.

Second, loans designed to be of comparatively short duration for operating purposes, to be repaid from the proceeds of current production.

Third, loans to cooperative-marketing organizations of farmers to permit them to market the crops of their members in an orderly and efficient way.

The Farm Credit Administration will continue to supervise loans in all three of these classes, but through somewhat different methods and machinery, and it is of these changes that I wish particularly to speak.

The first class of loans I have mentioned have heretofore been made through the Federal land banks, to whose stock the United States Government is now the largest subscriber. Similar loans have been made by joint-stock land banks, which are private institutions under Federal supervision, but by the terms of the new Farm Mortgage Act these banks are expressly forbidden to make any new loans and must therefore continue merely to liquidate their present holdings. The Federal land banks, however, of which there are 12, will continue to do business as they have heretofore except that the supervision of their affairs that has been exercised by the Federal Farm Loan Board is now exercised by the Farm Credit Administration.

The new Farm Mortgage Act very greatly enlarged the resources of the land banks for making new loans. They now hold more than a billion dollars' worth of farm mortgages and they were authorized to issue two billions in new farm-loan bonds, the interest on which is guaranteed by the United States Treasury. These bonds can be exchanged for farm mortgages or they may be sold and the proceeds used either to buy existing mortgages or to make new loans. Where they purchase mortgages for less than the amount due on them, the farmer-borrower has his debt reduced in that amount. For 5 years those whose mortgages are held by the Federal land banks need pay not more than 4½ percent interest and need not make any payments on the principal in that time. An additional fund of $200,000,000 has been provided for direct loans by which farmers may repurchase farms lost by foreclosure and refund present indebtedness.

The first-mortgage loans of the Federal land banks are made through a cooperative system of farm-loan associations, of which there are nearly 5,000. Each borrower subscribes 5 percent of his loan in stock of such an association. The new Farm Credit Act just passed further strengthens these organizations by removing, as to future loans, the liability for an additional 5 percent assessment in case of heavy defaults and authorizes the land banks themselves to share these losses. It also broadens the definition of a "farmer" so that many not now eligible who operate their farms through tenants may become borrowers.

It is in the two other classes of loans, however, that the act just passed by Congress makes its chief changes. First of these is in the field of production credit. This shorter-term credit heretofore has been supplied or supervised through three different agencies. All will continue to function, but an effort will be made to broaden and strengthen one of the three means of supplying this form of credit, with the hope that it will supplant eventually the other two.

The Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations and the Crop Production Loan Office now lend directly to farmers. The Intermediate Credit Banks rediscount loans made by other lending institutions, including cooperative credit associations of farmers. In the belief that the direct loan is a hazardous and demoralizing form of credit and that the control of credit conditions ought to be, so far as possible, in the farmer's own hands special provision has been made in the Farm Credit Act for giving encouragement to the cooperative method of borrowing.

Heretofore, credit associations of farmers could rediscount through the intermediate credit banks up to about five times their capital, but generally they had to supply all the initial capital themselves. The Farm Credit Act creates a division in the Farm Credit Administration for supplying capital to these associations and supervising their operations, and it makes available a fund of $120,000,000 for this purpose. The fund is to be administered by production credit corporations in each Federal land bank district. The governing authority over these corporations is to be the board of directors of the Federal land bank, which also governs the intermediate credit bank in each district. Provision is made for representation of the credit associations on the board of directors of the land bank.

The credit associations will be samilar to farm-loan associations. Each borrower will subscribe in capital stock 5 percent of his loan and this will be the limit of his liability for loans to his neighbors. The association and its loan committee will have power to pass on any new loans and will indorse the loans for rediscount by the intermediate credit bank. The intermediate credit banks, through the sale to investors of their debentures secured by the collateral pledged with them, have an ample source of capital for indefinite expansion of loans made under this system. The capital supplied by the Government through the production credit corporations will thus be multiplied.

The object of this plan is not merely to open larger sources of production credit to the farmer, but to decrease the cost to him and to give him greater control over it. The same principle is to be applied under the terms of the Farm Credit Act in decentralizing the activities heretofore carried on by the Federal Farm Board. A similar district corporation is to be set up for loans to cooperatives. It will be known in each district as the "Bank for Cooperatives", and it also will be governed by a board of directors identical with the board of the land bank. The cooperative borrowers also will be represented on this board of directors. A portion of the revolving fund of the Federal Farm Board will be made available to each district Bank for Cooperatives. These banks will make loans to cooperatives, either purchasing or selling cooperatives, whose field of operations is local and confined to the land-bank region.

Loans will continue to be made to cooperative farm organizations of national scope. These will be made by an organization to be known as the Central Bank for Cooperatives, which will be set up as a part of the Farm Credit Administration in Washington, D.C. Here again it is planned, instead of making further grants of Government funds, to permit the Central Bank for Cooperatives to rediscount the loans of the regional banks for cooperatives and to sell to investors debentures secured by collateral pledged by the cooperatives.

Substantial changes have been made by the Farm Credit Act in the Agricultural Marketing Act, which created the Federal Farm Board. The President's order abolished stabilization operations, which consisted of buying staple commodities and holding them off the market. These operations cost the Government more than $200,000,000. They have now come to an end. Provisions for crop insurance and loans for purely promotion purposes have been eliminated by the new act and loans to cooperatives have been put on a business basis by the requirement that the interest rate to be charged shall not be less than 3 percent nor more than 6 percent. Under the former wording of the Agricultural Marketing Act, it has been possible to make loans of Government money at a rate as low as one eighth of 1 percent, far less than the Government itself was paying for the money.

Carrying out the terms of the President's order and of the Farm Credit Act, which Congress has just passed, the Farm Credit Administration is being set up in five divisions. As Governor of the Farm Credit Administration I am responsible directly to the President. Under my authority will be five commissioners, each heading a division of the work. These are the Land Bank Division, supervising the land banks and the agents of the land bank commissioner making mortgage loans on farm land; the Intermediate Credit Division, supervising the 12 intermediate credit banks; the Cooperative Bank Division, supervising the central and regional banks for cooperatives, 1 in each of the 12 land-bank districts; the Production Credit Division, having supervision over the 12 production credit corporations, which will supervise and subscribe to the capital stock of production credit associations of farmers; and, finally, the Emergency Credit Division, which will continue, as long as may be found necessary, supervision over the two classes of emergency loans and their collection.

In each of the 12 districts all of these activities will eventually be housed in one location. In each district there will be a general agent of the Farm Credit Administration through whom contact will be made with all branches of the work. There will be an officer in charge of each activity, subject, in the case of the four permanent branches of the work, to the authority of the board of directors in the district.

The records of each of the activities in each district will be available to each one of the others. All applications, for all classes of loans, can be handled without delay by being passed to the proper division. All field agents will have information on all classes of loans and applications. The purpose will be to render prompt and effective service and to eliminate duplication and confusion.

There is one central motive behind the farm-credit legislation that has been enacted in these past 2 months and behind the operations of the Farm Credit Administration. It is to give the farmer a fair chance to meet his obligations and to get out of debt.

PROGRAM OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS

Mr. KRAMER. MEETING AND BANQUET OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGES OF THE UNITED STATES, THIRTY-SEVENTH PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION, HOTEL WILLARD, WASHINGTON, D.C., MARCH 3, 1933, AT 6:30 O'CLOCK

REMARKS OF MICHAEL FRANCIS DOYLE, OF PENNSYLVANIA, CHAIRMAN OF ELECTORAL COLLEGES COMMITTEE

Mr. DOYLE. The first meeting of the Electoral Colleges of the United States, being the Presidential and Vice Presidential electors chosen at the national election on November 8, 1932, will please come to order. We will ask the Right Reverend James A. Freeman to pronounce the invocation.

PRAYER BY THE RIGHT REVEREND JAMES E. FREEMAN, D.D., LL.D., BISHOP OF WASHINGTON

Almighty and most merciful Father, we praise Thy holy name that, through all the changed and changing circumstances of life, Thou hast made and preserved us a nation. In days of shadow, as in days of sunlight, Thy hand has led us. Under Thy directing care we have grown in strength and power. We pray Thee to continue to bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning, and pure manners; to save us from violence, discord, and confusion; from pride, arrogancy, and from every evil way. Deepen our sense of loyalty and devotion to Thee that, through obedience to Thy law, we may show forth Thy praise among the nations of the earth.

We remember before Thee those who in these troublous days have experienced privation and misfortune. Do Thou in Thy mercy ease their burdens and restore to them the blessings of health and happiness. To him who presently shall assume the weighty responsibilities of leadership in the Republic, do Thou vouchsafe wisdom, strength, and courage that he may so guide and direct the large concerns of the Nation that it may continue to fulfill those high and holy designs for which Thou hast created it. In the time of prosperity fill our hearts with thankfulness, and in the day of trouble suffer not our trust in Thee to fail. All of which we ask in the name of Him who for our sakes became poor that we, through His poverty, might be made rich, Thy Son, our Savior, Jesus Christ. Amen.

REMARKS OF MICHAEL FRANCIS DOYLE, EXECUTIVE CHAIRMAN ELECTORAL COLLEGES COMMITTEE

This occasion is indeed a historic one. For the first time since the adoption of the National Constitution by the convention in Philadelphia in 1787 the Presidential electors have met as a body. It is true that this meeting cannot be regarded as an official gathering. It is also true that the Presidential electors chosen by the people of the various States have never met together. This meeting, therefore, is unique in American history. The last national election was the thirty-seventh Presidential election. The old Constitution under which it was held still stands. Our country, however, has grown from the small stretch along the Atlantic coast, crossing a continent with its adjacent islands and with over 125,000,000 inhabitants. In power, in strength, in majesty, it is now the foremost of all nations which comprise the world today. The head of our Nation is chosen by the electoral colleges of the 48 States of the Union. The electors of these colleges are chosen by the people. You are the electors. You have met in the various capitals of your States, you have cast your ballots, and you have selected as the choice of the people as President of the United States to be inaugurated tomorrow Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York, and as Vice President John N. Garner, of Texas. Your ballots have been forwarded to the Congress of the United States and proclamation has been made of your choice by the Congress to the world. The man of your choice for the great office of President has enunciated his platform for a new deal for the American people. Tomorrow he will announce in his inaugural address the principles of his new administration. It is proper and fitting that you should meet here to participate in his inauguration. You, as the representatives of the people, chosen to select the President and Vice President, will find that Franklin D. Roosevelt will measure up to the high standards which the American people demand and that he will lead our Nation from its present period of distress once more to happiness and prosperity.

It is my pleasure to introduce as presiding officer of this occasion the pilot who guided our party through the campaign and who has achieved the greatest victory ever obtained by the Democratic Party in any national contest, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the new Postmaster General of the United States, and who is also an elector from the State of New York, the Honorable James A. Farley.

REMARKS OF CHAIRMAN JAMES A. FARLEY, MADE AT THE DINNER OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGES OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE WILLARD HOTEL ON THE NIGHT OF MARCH 3, 1933

Members of the electoral colleges, officially you have already performed the high function delegated to you by the majority of the voters in your respective States in the Presidential election of 1932. In conformity with the method provided by the Constitution of the United States and in execution of the will of the Democratic Party expressed in its last national convention, you have cast your electoral ballots for Franklin D. Roosevent for President of the United States and for John N. Garner for Vice President; your action has been canvassed and your choice for these highest offices in our country has been officially promulgated by the Congress of the United States. Tomorrow you will witness the fruition of your action in the inauguration of President Roosevelt and Vice President Garner. Officially you represent the most harmonious political sentiment of the country in more than a century.

Unofficially you now constitute a unique historic gathering, unprecedented in our political history. Although your official existence ended in January last when you cast your electoral ballots, you are now setting a happy and inspiring precedent by assembling in the National Capital to receive the honors and acclaim of your fellow citizens of the Democratic Party and those others who cooperated with it in the last election—the first general meeting of Presidential electors since the adoption of our Constitution.

The usual experience has been in both parties that when the Presidential electors have performed their official function they are soon forgotten by the general electorate. Your presence here as honored guests is additional testimony and assurance that under the incoming administration there are to be no forgotten men. I trust that the precedent established by this large gathering of Democratic Presidential electors, meeting as a body, may be repeated quadrennially for many years to come. I also express the hope and belief that at the next general assemblage of Democratic Presidential electors the sun of a real prosperity will be shining upon our country and that the great principles of our historic party will have taken such a firm hold upon the intelligence and sentiments of the American people that our party, which is most truly representative of all the people, will be indefinitely continued in power to guide the destinies of our country along the lines laid down by the founder of the Democratic Party: "Equal and exact justice to all; special privilege to none."

I greet you and felicitate you upon this history-making gathering.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is with special pleasure that we present to you as the main speaker of this evening one of the most famous orators, authors, and publicists, who is known and admired in every part of our country, Hon. Claude G. Bowers, of New York.

ADDRESS OF HON. CLAUDE G. BOWERS

The breach of promise suit against the outgoing regime has been tried in the court of public opinion, and you gentlemen of the electoral colleges have rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. It more nearly approaches a unanimous verdict than any since the days of James Monroe that ushered in the era of good feeling.

I understand that only the members of the electoral colleges who voted for the victor are here tonight, and that explains the congestion in the room. I once heard a man of ineffable wisdom and spotless virtue say that while he was a friend of untrammeled education he never would stand for anyone on the faculty of the electoral colleges but a Democrat. Well, there are scarcely enough of the other variety this year to create an academic breeze.

I doubt if ever there has been a faculty so united and harmonious as that of the electoral colleges of 1932; and this reflects accurately the determination of vast numbers of Americans of all political affiliations that, in government, there shall be a new deal, and equally, a square deal for every element within the State.

This is an historic occasion.

This is the first time since the formation of the electoral colleges almost a hundred and fifty years ago that their members have been summoned to a national conclave.

This is the first time that they who, under the Constitution, determine the victory have been invited to participate in the festival of the triumph.

This is the first time that they who bestow the scepter of authority have been permitted to follow the favored to his coronation by the people.

When the consummate statesmen of the Constitutional Convention were engaged in the framing of the fundamental law they pondered long upon the method for the choosing of a President.

They decided once to leave the choosing of the President to the Congress, and then they reversed themselves. It was proposed that the election be left to the governors of the various States, but this was rejected. It was suggested that the President be selected by the popular vote of the people, but this ran counter to the deep undercurrent of distrust of democracy which cropped out time and again during the deliberations of the convention.

Finally the electoral system was devised upon the theory that it is best to leave the choice to a comparatively small body of men chosen with a view to their special fitness.

It is interesting to observe that in every instance where the electoral colleges have failed in their function a Democratic idol has been the victim; but we can forgive you this in view of the rare unanimity with which this year you have raised to the seat of power the Democratic idol of the hour.

In the beginning it was provided that each elector should vote for two men, with the understanding that the one having the largest number of votes should be the President and his closest competitor should have the second place. Then in 1800 came the failure, which threatened for a time to destroy the Republic in its infancy.

Because of the consummate political leadership of Thomas Jefferson the Democrats that year not only were mobilized and organized but sternly disciplined to party regularity. A Democratic congressional caucus had nominated Jefferson for President and Aaron Burr for second place. But it turned out that the drillmasters and disciplinarians of the Jeffersonians had builded better—or worse—than they knew. For contrary to expectations and all precedents each Democratic elector voted the straight ticket of the party caucus, resulting in a tie, which threw the contest into the House.

Now, everyone understood that it was the purpose of the people to make Jefferson President; but, inspired by spite and hate, the Federalists entered into a conspiracy to elect Burr instead. Had that conspiracy succeeded, it would have meant the instant disruption of the Union. But it failed, because Alexander Hamilton rose above party spite and subordinating partisanship to patriotism made vehement protest against one of the most infamous conspiracies to set aside the will of the people in American history.

It was that incident which led to the adoption of the twelfth amendment, providing that thereafter each elector should specifically designate both his choice for the first and second place.

A quarter of a century came and went, and in 1824 another Democratic idol, Andrew Jackson, was a candidate for the Presidency. He had a magnificent plurality of the popular vote and of the electoral colleges. But with three statesmen of outstanding merit in the field against him he failed to receive the necessary majority. Again the contest was thrown into the House, again there was a combination against the choice of the people, and through this combination the will of the people was set aside.

But the effect was to put the fire of battle into the blood of the Jacksonians and set them on the march, regimented and munitioned, and they entered the next campaign with the most compact and powerful organization the Nation yet had known and swept on to victory; and the army that won the fight remained intact and constantly on guard through 8 years of magnificent achievement.

Another 50 years came and went before the election of 1876. We entered the campaign in that centennial year under the leadership of one of the noblest and purest patriots in all our history, Samuel J. Tilden.

He had a clear majority of the popular vote. He had a clear majority of the electoral colleges; but the rule of brutality and bayonets had been so thoroughly established during the period of reconstruction when the South was crucified upon the cross of hate by carpetbaggers and corruptionists that, under the thin disguise of legality, Tilden was robbed of enough electoral votes to deprive him of the Presidency.

But the shock and shame of that treason, together with the realization that a repetition would mean the end of the Republic, had a good effect; for under the pricking of the conscience and the bludgeoning of an outraged public sentiment the bayonets were removed from the throats of the southern people, who resumed their sovereignty as self-governing communities under the protection of a Constitution which for 12 long years had been used as a veritable doormat of the ignorant and the vile.

But, on the whole, Americans may well be proud of the functioning of their institutions through which, peaceably, we may pass from one governing regime to another. Thus a short time ago the issues were drawn, the debate was held, the verdict peaceably was rendered, the result is accepted by the defeated with dignity and good humor, and tomorrow a new regime goes into power with the best wishes of every patriot of every party in the land.

That is a tribute to the functioning of our institutions.

But there is another tribute that may well be paid tonight. For many months we have been in the valley of the shadows of the deepest depression we have ever known. Millions of industrious and self-respecting men have been subjected to humiliations that ought never be imposed on any man who asks for nothing more than the opportunity to earn his bread. There has been suffering and that torture of the spirit which often drives men to desperation and despair.

But through these many months, these millions have been patient and true to their faith in the capacity of our institutions to meet the economic issues upon the solution of which depends the restoration of prosperity. Not once has the spirit of the mob arisen to accentuate the difficulties of the times. All this we knew.

What we did not know was what the reaction of these suffering millions would be in the secrecy of the ballot box. The soil of human misery all through history has been receptive to the seed of subversive and revolutionary doctrines, and we have had men sowing the seed. Our cynics and scoffers have been garrulous in deriding the idea that our political and social systems can meet the needs of humanity.

And yet, despite the suffering and the propaganda, no political party hostile to our institutions made any gains, and the Communists polled a vote so insignificant that it scarcely figured in the reports of the election. Now all that means this—that Americans have determined to hold fast to the institutions that were built with the labor and cemented with the blood of the patriots of a century and a half. They turned, not to the red flag of upheaval, nor to the black flag of tyranny, but to the old flag, in the firm faith that just as it has fluttered over the victories of a hundred battlefields, so, in time, it shall lead us out of the depression.

All honor to the man without a job—he has been the premier patriot of these dark days.

But the attitude of these men calls for something more than praise, it calls for action to justify their faith. And that calls for the unification of men and women of all party affiliations in a determined effort to find the formula on which a renewed prosperity may be built.

In his first inaugural Jefferson thrilled the Nation with the exclamation:

"We are all Federalists; we are all republicans."

And by that he merely meant that we were all Americans.

And, as Americans, we all equally are interested in the revival of business, in the rehabilitation of industry, in the restitution to these jobless men of the jobs of which they have been deprived.

This is a time when men of all parties must stand shoulder to shoulder and march all one way—and that out of the valley and up the hill to the sunshine.

And at the head of the procession, and in command, beginning with tomorrow, will march the leader of the Nation's overwhelming choice.

I may, perhaps, be permitted to suggest some reasons for that choice:

No man in American history ever has waged a cleaner or a braver battle. He met the issues fearlessly; he diagnosed the Nation's diseases accurately; he prescribed remedies courageously where he had found them and promised to continue the search for remedies he had not yet found. Never once did demagogy stain his lips. Not once did he promise the performance of a miracle. He met his political opponents on the high ground of gentlemanly combat and never once did he strike below the belt. You may search his campaign pronouncements from the beginning to the end and you will look in vain for one solitary blunder. It means much to a nation in times like these to have a leader on whose taste and judgment we may rely.

But he did something more—he gave expression to a concept of government that rings true to the political philosophy of Jefferson, Jackson, and Woodrow Wilson. Here, clearly, was a progressive with his feet planted firmly on the bedrock of the Nation's fundamental faith.

And he did something more—he made it clear to all of us that under the intricate and complicated mechanism of our organized society all industries and elements are interdependent and no one can prosper if the others are in ruins.

It was he who reminded us that industry and finance cannot always wear silk if agriculture is reduced to rags.

Thus did he make a profound impression on the Nation by his vision and grasp of the situation and win the confidence of the people in the wisdom and integrity of his purpose.

And now, beginning with tomorrow, he is the Nation's leader—and you gentlemen of the electoral colleges have proclaimed him such.

When little more than 2 weeks ago a madman aimed a shot, not at him but at the organized society he now personifies, along with the horror among all decent men, was a deep feeling of thanksgiving that he had been spared, please God, for some noble purpose.

The courage and composure with which he faced a deadly danger, the instinct for the orderly processes of justice which even in the midst of the excitement bade him order the protection of the assailant from the fury of outraged men, the tenderness and sympathy with which he turned at once to the succor and the comforting of a friend have made a profound impression on the minds and hearts of the people. Courage, composure, fidelity to duty, loyalty to friendship—these are the qualities that already have endeared him to the people and brought home to political friend and foe alike the realization that now he is the Nation's leader and for 4 years at least the Nation's hope.

Now we cannot instantly restore prosperity by the waving of a magic wand. We were some years descending into the valley; we cannot hope to ascend the hill in a day. But under the leadership of a man who is steeped in the noblest traditions of the Republic, endowed with courage and capacity, with vision and penetration, and throughout his life has been inspired with a passionate desire to serve his country and mankind, we can, through our united efforts, not only lift ourselves from the depression but lay the foundation for a sounder, saner, and more permanent prosperity than we have ever known before.

May I not presume therefore to voice not only your prayer but that of all Americans: God save and strengthen Franklin D. Roosevelt in his battles for humanity and country.

Mr. FARLEY. We will now call upon the secretary of the minority of the United States Senate, Edwin A Halsey, and the Reading Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, Patrick J. Haltigan, to announce the returns of the electoral colleges of the States of the Union.

Resolved, By the Presidential electors of the United States of the thirty-seventh Presidential election:

Whereas it will be necessary to pass an act of Congress for the purpose of amending the existing laws to be in accord with the twentieth amendment to the Constitution; and

Whereas it is the belief that the votes of the several electoral colleges of the States should be delivered by electors chosen from each State in addition to the present means under the law; and

Whereas we believe that the Presidential electors should hereafter have an official part in the inaugural of the President and Vice President of the United States, and should assist in preparing the program for said inauguration: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed by the chairman of this meeting, which committee may be increased at the discretion of the chairman, for the purpose of assisting in the preparation of legislation to carry out the purpose and intent of this meeting as herein expressed, and appear before the proper committees of Congress to advocate the same.

Resolved further, That the said committee shall maintain its continuity and remain in existence until the organization of the Presidential electors of the next general election, and assist, if desired, in the organization of that body.

Resolved, That Michael Francis Doyle, of Pennsylvania, be made chairman of this committee.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

No. 2

Whereas the first meeting of the Presidential electors in Washington to participate in the inauguration of a President in the history of the country is about to be concluded; and

Whereas the loyal and earnest cooperation of the following committee has made this event one of the most outstanding of the inauguration: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the 331 electors assembled hereby express our sincerest thanks and appreciation to: Michael Francis Doyle, of Pennsylvania, who suggested the meeting and headed the committee which carried out the plans; H. Newlin Megill, of Maryland; John J. Doyle, Jr., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Miss Mary E. Lile, Tennessee; Miss Besse D. Howard, of Philadelphia; and Miss K. C. Blackburne, of New York, for our splendid welcome during the inauguration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Vice President John Nance Garner.

WILSON'S IDEALS NEEDED TODAY

(Address by Josephus Daniels at the exercises held under the auspices of the Presidential electors at the tomb of Woodrow Wilson, Washington Cathedral, Washington, D.C., on Sunday afternoon, Mar. 5, 1933)

Under this stone lies all that is mortal of Woodrow Wilson. It is dust. But there is more than dust here. There is the eternal life of an ideal. Not the man but the spirit that the man was has brought us here. We have come up to this hilltop and to this quiet chamber to capture again if we can something of his teaching, something of his courage and faith to guide us in a period of uncertain drifting and certain doubt. We come here hungry for some portion of the high vision of Woodrow Wilson.

Here in this room of shadow and quietness we may stand for a little while apart from the crisis that faces the world at the foot of this hill, and at the same time take new strength from the spirit of the man who in every crisis—and he met the greatest which shook the world—never hesitated to propose the way of solution nor in every period of distress to offer the remedy essential to restoration.

Does America stand today looking for the safe path to follow to regain the heights of the days of Woodrow Wilson? Do its people grope in darkness for a light for their feet? Do they yearn for confidence and a return to security? Do they look through a glass darkly for light? Do they come distracted from distracted councils? If so, here at the tomb of the greatest prophet of our times and the supreme optimist of our history, they can find the way by following in the footsteps of the noble war President, himself the greatest casualty of that conflict.

First of all we must rid ourselves of the notion that all the calamities that have befallen us have grown from the war in which he led us. Certainly it was a struggle, entered with consideration of its consequences, which took its toll of our best manhood and levied money burdens grievous to bear. But war had little to do with the debacle that has since broken our hopes and destroyed our prosperity. It was not America's consecrated use of the sword that brought us to the ills we bear today. It was the failure after the war to keep faith with the "indomitable spirit and ungrudging sacrifice of our incomparable soldiers" which lies at the bottom of our troubles.

When Mr. Wilson returned from Paris with the covenant of peace the Nation was weary of war and ready not only to put down the sword but also to be lulled into laying aside the high conscience with which the sword had been lifted. It was more pleasant to listen to the promises that if this country would refrain from alliance or association with other nations we could stand apart and reap unheard of material gain. This Midas touch to the American heart made us for a time oblivious "to the proud recollection that it was our precept and example which had in those early days of the never-to-be-forgotten November lifted the nations of the world to the lofty levels of vision and achievement upon which the great war for democracy and right was fought and won."

In the growth of this material spirit, he saw not only the immediate defeat of his own ideals. He looked forward like a prophet to the catastrophe it must certainly bring even upon the material-minded world. Ten years ago he wrote and pointed "The Road Away From Revolution", the road away from the economic collapse which now engulfs us. The world he said had been made safe from the assault upon democracy of an insolent and ignorant Hohenzollern, but democracy remained to be made safe from the insolent and ignorant capitalists who "seemed to regard the men whom they used as mere instruments of profit."

"The nature of men and of organized society", he said 10 years ago, "dictates the maintenance in every field of action of justice and of right dealing; and it is essential to efficacious thinking in this critical matter that we should not entertain a narrow or technical conception of justice. By justice the lawyer generally means the prompt, fair, and open application of impartial rules; but we call ours a Christian civilization, and a Christian conception of justice must be much higher. It must include sympathy and helpfulness and a willingness to forego self-interest in order to promote the welfare, happiness, and contentment of others and of the community as a whole. This is what our age is blindly feeling in its reaction against what it deems the too great selfishness of the capitalistic system."

We can look back today and see that here was prophecy and we can look back and see, too, that it was received by a world bent upon material gain with no more consideration than is usually accorded to prophets. The blind, the insolent, and ignorant selfishness which had succeeded the idealism of the war rushed on without hesitation to its own ruin.

Is it surprising that the great man who lies here should have cried on the eve of Armistice Day 1923, when he saw this dark future, that "the stimulating memories of that happy time of triumph are marred and embittered for us by the shameful fact that when the victory was won we turned our backs on our associates, refused to bear any responsible part in the administration of peace on the firm and permanent establishment of the results of war won at so fearful a cost of life and treasure, and withdrew into a sullen and selfish isolation which is deeply ignoble because manifestly dishonorable"?

He would not have been the Woodrow Wilson we honor if he had not cried out his indignation at this betrayal of the world. But his was not a spirit long to be fettered by bitterness and hopelessness. From them he came to a serene faith in the victory of his ideals. To the crowd of friends gathered on the same Armistice Day before his residence he said, "I am not one of those that have the least anxiety about the triumph of the principles I have stood for. That we shall prevail is as sure as that God reigns." That assurance gave him joy in his last days.

On the occasion of my last visit to my beloved chief I spoke my own bitterness that the American people had forgotten the sacred promises of 1917 and 1918. Mr. Wilson laid his good hand on my arm and said, "Do not trouble about the things we have fought for. They are sure to prevail. They are only delayed." Then, with the quaintness of expression which gave charm to all he said, he added, "And I will make this concession to Providence—it may come in a better way than we proposed."

He who saw so very clearly never lost his faith. He beheld as few men are ever forced to see his ideals torn down. He looked ahead along the dark road to revolution. Yet he never lost his faith. If we who gather here today to do him honor may find a little of his noble confidence, we can go back from the quietness of this tomb more able to serve our country and our countrymen. We who followed him when he led us into war can fight today for peace and security under the standards of justice and unselfishness which he never let fall. Today for all America and for all the world hope lies in the ideals of Woodrow Wilson, which were never more alive nor more needed than today.

OFFICE EQUIPMENT IN THE OLD HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I have sent to the desk.

House Resolution 196

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to deliver to the General Supply Committee such office equipment now in the old House Office Building as may be unnecessary, for the use of the Members remaining therein.

The resolution was agreed to.

WILLIAM A. HAWKINS

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, and ask for its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 195

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Mrs. William A. Hawkins, widow of William A. Hawkins, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to 6 months' compensation, and an additional amount not exceeding $250 to defray funeral expenses of the said William A. Hawkins.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD upon the independent offices appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal that the most of us could and would like to say by way of appreciation and applause of many men and their work as we have known them during this extraordinary session of the Congress.

Of course, there comes first in our minds the President. His extraordinary performances have made him the first man of the world. There is no living man who holds such a large share of world confidence and esteem as does the President at this hour. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, speaking, I am sure, for the entire Membership of this body, I want to mention him who has presided over this body during this session of the Congress, the Honorable HENRY T. RAINEY. His uniform courtesy and fairness to all has made him very much of a favorite with the House. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I desire to pay tribute to the minority of this House. They have, in the main, cooperated to the fullest with the majority in carrying out the President's recovery program. In this connection I should like to pay my compliments to the minority leader, Hon. BERTRAM SNELL. [Applause.] He has distinguished himself not only as one of the first men of the Congress but as one of the first men of the entire country.

I should like also, Mr. Speaker, to pay my respects to the leader of the majority, Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS. [Applause.] He has led by persuasion, by kindness; and as a result of the confidence that his colleagues have had in him, it has been easy for him to lead.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to mention the entire Membership of this body; particularly, Mr. Speaker, do I wish to make mention of this new Membership of this House. They have performed nobly and they have displayed a fine understanding of the meaning and purpose of their being here.

Then, Mr. Speaker, personally, I should like to mention the dean of this body, the sweetest, the gentlest, the finest man I know, the Honorable EDWARD POU, of the State of North Carolina. [Applause.]

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, it is the hope of all that when the individual Members of the House return to their homes they will find an appreciative constituency willing and ready to reward them for the arduous labor they have rendered in this extra session of the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, even at this early hour I do not want this session of Congress to adjourn without paying my respects to the majority for the kind and considerate attention they have given us during this session. I appreciate the fact that this has been a strenuous session of Congress. There have been some rather sharp tilts across the aisle, but the best part of it all is that it is simply a part of the day's work, and any feeling always dies with the setting sun. [Applause.]

We have tried to do our part in a manly, straightforward fashion. I think as a whole we have got along pretty well.

I especially want at this time to pay my personal respects to the beloved Speaker of the House [applause], and I especially want to compliment him for his presence tonight, because I know he wants to go to the college of his alma mater, Amherst, for the fiftieth reunion of his class. Whether the House knows it or not, I want to tell you that the college is honoring itself by honoring our Speaker, in giving him the degree of doctor of laws at this time. [Applause.]

I also want to pay my respects to the majority leader and the courtesy he has always shown me, and to you, my colleagues, who are about to depart for your homes for the vacation. I wish you a pleasant and successful summer and hope we shall all return in the fall refreshed and ready to attend to the people's business. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, we are closing the most momentous session of Congress that has ever been held in the history of our Government. It is unnecessary for me to pay tribute to that great Chief Executive who presides at the White House. Most of us have contributed by supporting him at this special session of Congress, by upholding his hands on every occasion. This Congress has stood by our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

This House should not adjourn until we pay our respects to our presiding officer, that distinguished gentleman from Illinois who has so impartially presided over the deliberations of our session and so fearlessly ruled in all our parliamentary procedure, the Honorable HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois. [Applause.] While his duties have been onerous as a presiding officer, one man on the floor of this House who has worked indefatigably, who has had the burden of this special session, is our beloved friend, whom everybody on both sides of the aisle loves, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOSEPH W. BYRNS]. [Applause.]

While the Republicans have rarely cooperated with us, yet there is one thing which I propose to state before the last CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is printed, and that is that I know the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has not at all times been in sympathy with the obstructive tactics of some of his followers on that side of the aisle, and I am glad to pay my personal tribute to the courtesy of the distinguished minority leader, who was my Chairman of the Committee on Rules for 8 years, the Honorable BERTRAND H. SNELL, of New York. [Applause.] His successor as chairman of that committee is the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, EDWARD W. POU, who in this session and during the last Congress has presided over the Rules Committee, of which I have been a member for 11 years. If any man here outside of our Speaker and outside of our distinguished majority leader has contributed more in this special session of the Seventy-third Congress to the accomplishment of the program of the President than any other, it is that distinguished dean of this House from North Carolina, Mr. EDWARD W. POU. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, one of the most unfortunate events that happened in this special session was that for a month or so one of the most brilliant men and great leaders of this House, one of the men on whom we depended, was unfortunately taken ill. We lost his services for about a month. Some of us had to attempt to pinch hit for him. We were without him for a time, but he came back to us, thank God, and he is now here with us—the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD]. [Applause.]

Something has been said about the new Members of this House. We all love our new Members. We are glad that they are with us. Our session today would not be complete without paying our respects to those new Members of this House who have come into this session. They have already become acclimated to the atmosphere of this legislative body.

Mr. Speaker, in this session of Congress we have made greater progress than was ever made by any party or any administration in any other Congress. We are proud of that record. We have stood loyally behind our great President, and when we finish tonight we shall have no apologies to make. We have accomplished our party program—every promise has been fulfilled, every pledge has been kept. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey, announcing that the legislature of that State had ratified the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States empowering the Congress to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from C. J. Rogers, Deputy Secretary of State of the State of Wyoming, submitting a correct copy of the minutes of the constitutional convention held at Casper, Wyo., on the 25th of May 1933, ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States repealing the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I cannot permit this session to adjourn sine die without expressing my heartfelt thanks and my very deep appreciation to every Member of the House on both sides of the aisle for the courtesy and kindness and consideration they have shown to me during this session. [Applause.] I appreciate the patience which the Members have shown toward me, and I want you to know that when we adjourn and each of you return to your home, you will carry with you not only my gratitude, but also my admiration and affection.

I wish to join in the tribute which has been paid to our distinguished Speaker. I never served under a more impartial or fairer presiding officer. I feel that I but express the sentiments of every Member of the House when I say that we wish for him a pleasant recess and that he may return to us in January with that full vigor of health that he now possesses. [Applause.]

I want also to express my appreciation to the minority leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], for the kindness and courtesy which he has shown me. [Applause.] We have worked together during this session with a splendid cooperation and interest in the great legislation which has been passed during these 3½ months during which we have been in session.

May I say I think we are all fortunate in being Members of this the Seventy-third Congress, for in the special session now closing I do not believe there has been in all the history of our country a Congress which has in such a short space of time enacted so many important constructive measures as have been passed by this Congress. We have passed 12 great major constructive measures, all planned and passed with the object of relieving our country from its present economic distress and restoring prosperity, which now, I verily believe, is on the way.

We have the satisfaction of knowing that the tide has turned and that, largely as the result of the legislation we have passed, the individual citizens may look forward with confidence in the future, so necessary to restore our country to that prosperity which it has heretofore enjoyed. Wheat now bringing nearly twice as much as it brought only a short while ago, cotton bringing to the growers nearly twice as much per pound as it was selling for a short while ago, and other products, gives promise to agriculture, which has so long been suffering from depression. It has been a remarkable Congress, a Congress which has followed with unfaltering and ungrudging confidence and loyalty the great leader in the White House, Franklin D. Roosevelt [applause], who enjoys the confidence of the people today in every section of our country to a greater extent, I believe, than any other man in many years. [Applause.]

Washington, when President, was known as the Father of his Country. Seventy-two years afterward Lincoln was its savior, and 72 years thereafter Franklin D. Roosevelt is its preserver from the economic ills which have beset us.

I again express to all of you my best wishes. When you return to your homes I trust you will be received as you should be received, with open arms, by your constituents, and that every one of you will be sent back to the next Congress as a result of the patriotic, loyal service you have rendered to your country during these trying months. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Since the new Members have been mentioned, I thought it would be in order that one of them say a word in regard to our leaders before this session of Congress closes. I spoke to the Speaker about it a day or two ago and explained to him what I wanted to say. He said he would give me all the time I wanted. I saw the floor leader and got permission from him. The last few days he has refused to allow Members to speak unless he knew what they were going to talk about.

I want especially to pay my respects to our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and to the Speaker of the House, Hon. Henry T. Rainey, and to our floor leader, the gentleman from Tennessee, Hon. Joseph Byrns.

I have not always agreed with these gentlemen, but it has not made much difference in most cases whether I agreed with them or not.

At least three things, I think, have contributed to the success of this Congress. The first of these has been the efforts our leaders have put forward. [Applause.] Do you remember the lines?—

The heights men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

[Applause.]

The second thing that has contributed to the success of this Congress has been the fact that our leaders have been prepared for their work.

For all thy days prepare, and meet them all alike;
When thou art the anvil, bear; when thou art the hammer, strike.

The third element of success is their desire to serve, their sincerity of purpose.

Review the lives of all the truly great and successful men that ever lived, and you will find that the pronounced, outstanding characteristics of their efforts were sincerity of purpose, an unselfish giving of their best services to the world. They gave generously of their best, and greatness and immortality were their reward. When the call of civilization comes for great men of this kind, the Divine law always provides them.

In closing I quote this short poem, taking this opportunity to show my appreciation of our leaders:

They would rather have a rosebud
As a tribute of today
Than to have the most cherished laurels
When they have passed away.
Then give to them a rosebud,
A rosebud, pink or red;
They would rather have just one today
Than ten thousand when they're dead.

[Applause.]

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following resignation:

JUNE 15, 1933.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker of the House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. RAINEY: I hereby tender my resignation as a Member of Congress from the Fifth Congressional District of Arkansas, to be effective at midnight June 16, 1933.

Very respectfully yours,

HEARTSILL RAGON.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure I speak what is in the heart and mind of every Member of this House when I express our regret that our colleague the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] is to cease to be a Member of this House.

I congratulate him upon the fact that he is to become a part of the great judiciary of the country. We know he is abundantly qualified for any position he may hold and that he will make a great and just judge, as he has made a splendid, faithful, able, and patriotic Representative.

We wish for him a long life and great prosperity. [Applause.]

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H.Con.Res. 24. Concurrent resolution providing that when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Friday, June 16, 1933, they stand adjourned sine die.

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 15, 1933.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Before the adjournment of the special session I want to convey to you and to the Members of the House of Representatives an expression of my thanks for making possible, on the broad average, a more sincere and whole-hearted cooperation between the legislative and the executive branches of the United States Government than has been witnessed by the American people in many a long year.

This spirit of teamwork has in most cases transcended party lines. It has taken cognizance of a crisis in the affairs of our Nation and of the world. It has grasped the need for a new approach to problems both new and old. It has proved that our form of government can rise to an emergency and can carry through a broad program in record time.

I am certain that the American people are appreciative of the work of this special session of the Seventy-third Congress.

Please let me add that the past few months have given to me very special pleasure in the renewal of old friendships and the forming of new friendships among the Members of the House of Representatives. To each and every one of you I send my best wishes for a well-deserved and happy holiday during the coming months.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

SHORT SELLING OF SECURITIES

PORTION OF A STATEMENT OF HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH, OF ILLINOIS, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 5, 1933

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, in view of what has come to light in the Senate investigation of J. P. Morgan & Co. and in the case of Charles A. Mitchell, former president of the National City Bank of New York, before the New York courts, I feel it is opportune to call the attention of the country to the fact that, notwithstanding the attacks and criticisms directed against me by certain financial writers because of my persistent efforts to put an end to the activities of unscrupulous investment bankers, which activities are condoned by and actually engaged in by officials of the New York Stock Exchange, my fight against stock-exchange irregularities and abuses, which I began in October 1929, was justified. I feel certain that if President Hoover, the officials of the stock exchanges, and the investment bankers, including J. P. Morgan & Co., had listened to my urgent appeals and requests the country would not have suffered as it suffered in the last 3 years.

I also wish at this time to issue a warning, in view of what is transpiring today, that, notwithstanding the facts that have been brought to light, the same ruthless, avaricious, and greedy forces are again at work pushing up the prices of stocks and bonds all out of proportion to the improvement in conditions. It appears to me that they are endeavoring to bring about another orgy of speculation and inflation for the expressed purpose of causing another debacle, in order to undo the work of this Congress and cast discredit upon the administration.

Though I am in a measure satisfied with what I have been able to accomplish, it does not even begin to approach the objective which I set out to attain. But I am confident, and once more I serve notice on all those guilty of manipulation, that I shall not be shackled in the next session of Congress and that I shall obtain approval for such a wide-sweeping investigation as will make it possible for us to secure legislation forever prohibiting the destructive and dishonorable practices prevalent on the exchanges.

I regret that neither time nor space permits me to insert in the RECORD all the telegrams and letters that I sent to President Hoover, J. P. Morgan & Co., and the New York Stock Exchange. I shall, however, insert a portion of my statement made before the Judiciary Committee of the House during the course of its investigation of stock-exchange practices, which I feel best sets forth my unceasing fight on the avaricious racketeers of Wall Street:

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I fully realize and appreciate the conditions which confront the members of this committee, as well as those of other committees, at this time. We are all going at full speed, trying to enact legislation to relieve the unfavorable and unbearable conditions that exist in the country today.

Therefore, I am going to try to be extremely brief, realizing, as I do, that the House meets at 11 o'clock today, and that the Rules Committee, of which I am a member, and which meets at 10:30 o'clock, has important matters to consider.

In view of my desire to familiarize the members of this committee with the facts concerning the transactions and practices on the stock exchanges, and in the hope that in the near future the members may be able to glance over some of the evidence, I am going to ask leave of this committee to permit me to embody in my statement a few extracts from editorials written by outstanding and uncontrolled financial writers——

Mr. MCKEOWN (interposing). Are those very long extracts that you wish to insert in the record, Judge Sabath?

Mr. SABATH. Well, many of them are long; but I will endeavor only to put in short extracts, because I myself have not time to arrange them as I should like to.

Mr. MCKEOWN. All right.

Mr. SABATH. I was hopeful that I would have about a day in which to present my facts to the committee and that I could have read some of these extracts and statements; but unfortunately, time will not permit it.

Mr. CONDON. Do these editorials refer specifically to your position in introducing these bills?

Mr. SABATH. I have many that do; but those that I wish to insert into the record are confined to a discussion of the practice of short selling and the abuses on the stock exchanges; some also show that the existing conditions at this time are not all due to short selling—which I concede—but that they are in great measure due to the manipulation by the "bulls" of 1928 and 1929 who created and caused the terrific, criminal inflation of stock-market prices during those years—the same individuals who are the "bears" of 1930, 1931, and 1932.

Mr. CONDON. Do these articles name some of these men or do they just refer to them as a class?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; several name some of these men. But I have up until now refrained from giving the names of men who have been charged with being outstanding "bears."

I have no direct evidence, because I have not examined their books; but I have received many communications charging some of our largest financial institutions and many of our outstanding men with the practice of short selling. But I never wish to attack anyone——

Mr. MCKEOWN (interposing). That material will be admitted. Let the record show that that is to be admitted.

Mr. Max Bruell, former stock-exchange member, has this to say in the November 8, 1931, issue of the New York American:

SAYS SHORT SALES NOT JUSTIFIED IN TIME OF DEPRESSION

"Short sales, perhaps economically justified in normal times, become a menace in periods of depression. The attempts of the New York Stock Exchange to restrict short selling are half-hearted. The only effective method, as practiced by foreign bourses, is to insist upon actual presentation of securities prior to their sale. This can be amplified by prohibiting the lending of securities. To facilitate selling of securities held abroad, a foreign central agency could be appointed. Upon receipt of cable advices confirming that the respective securities were duly delivered to the agency, selling orders could be executed.

"Due to public criticism, and in an endeavor of self-preservation, the New York Stock Exchange had adopted a number of necessitous reforms. The ultimate goal, to reduce the exchange to its normal functions, is as yet far from accomplishment. The governors of the exchange are attempting to popularize their institution. Speeches of the president, carefully prepared, are widely circulated. The machinery of the exchange has even been filmed. The film shows the course of an order from its inception to its settlement. The film, however, does not reveal that quite often customers' orders serve as protection for the private speculations of floor brokers and specialists. To do so with more or less impunity has been their time-worn privilege. The system is detrimental to the client and indefensible.

"As long as the exchange permits its members to act as brokers and as dealers, the assertion on the membership certificates:

MEANINGLESS PROMISE

"That the exchange has been formulated for the purpose of maintaining high standards of honor among its members and for promoting and inculcating just and equitable principles of trade is rather meaningless. It is a lame excuse that without the specialists no market in certain securities would be obtainable.

"The specialists make markets if they feel like it; they play safe.

"The controversy about specialists has cropped up very often, but no action has been taken. Should future Federal or State supervision remove the trading privileges of the specialists exchange seats would decidedly become less attractive. Specialists in active markets have rolled up fabulous incomes. Their profits were derived from the undue advantages held over the general public. The methods of practically victimizing clients in stop-loss orders, subscription rights, part-paid stocks, etc., are plentiful.

"The public lives in a delusion that listing a security on the exchange is an endorsement of its merit. This is utterly unwarranted. The listing committee of the exchange is primarily concerned about the assurance of an open and free market and does not verify the correctness of balance sheets as practiced on continental exchanges. The grossest overcapitalization of companies has not been checked by our exchanges.

PUBLIC EXPLOITATION

"Shall we permit such exploitation of the public to go on forever or shall we move for supervision to bring security issues in line with physical value? Must we continue to permit houses of issue to escape responsibility through the time-worn clause on prospectuses.

"This information, while obtained from reliable sources, is not guaranteed by us.

"Nation-wide extension of ticker facilities and brokerage branches was a mistake. Customers' men have only one function—to rake in commissions. According to recent regulations, they are required to have some experience but many of them would not pass an intelligence test. No charge is being made for market letters. One of our great economists states that they are supplied gratis because they are not worth more. The exchange firms ordinarily do not affix their signatures to opinions furnished; they prefer to let the economist assume responsibility.

"We should be less concerned about the investment value of 1,375 New York Stock Exchange seats than about the wisdom to engage in gambling with all odds against the public.

"If Congress and State will deal with some of the points outlined above, the return of confidence will be speeded."

Mr. B. C. Forbes, editor and publisher of Forbes, who was one of the first to see the disastrous effects of short selling, writes as follows in the November 1, 1931, issue of Forbes:

SHORT SELLING IS NOT TIMELY

"Those who try to send stock prices to perdition by selling them short should be honored as supreme patriots, as saviors of their country. That is the conclusion one almost reaches on listening to President Richard Whitney, of the New York Stock Exchange. Why such benefactors should have been forbidden to exercise their laudable operations for even 48 hours is hard to understand—but not quite so hard to understand as why they were again told to resume depressing quotations.

"It was, we are officially told, 'an emergency' which induced bridling the bears. Apparently 'emergency' conditions lasted only 2 days. You and I and a good many others have been under the painful—very painful—notion that emergency conditions have prevailed considerably longer than 48 hours. Ask the hundreds of thousands of depositors in banks which closed their doors if normal conditions have been restored. Ask millions of unemployed the same question. Ask, also, investors whose income has been stopped. Ask other investors who, on the recommendation of reputable bankers and others, purchased securities at 1929 prices and who have lately found themselves bankrupt.

"Mr. Whitney protested too much about the blessings conferred on the world by bears. A security market without short selling was pictured one moment as unthinkable, impossible. The next moment came the statement that the bond market has existed for generations without short selling. Yet which market has experienced the wildest inflation—the stock market, enjoying the wonderful 'stabilizing' miracles wrought by short sellers, or the bond market not enjoying short selling?

"I, for one, would have had more confidence in buying stocks during the depths of the debacle if aware that quotations could not be slaughtered at any moment by short sellers. What this country has mainly suffered from lately has been fear. Investors would have felt less apprehensive had they known bear-selling was banned. Mr. Whitney's own figures were meant to convey that the amount of short selling was a mere bagatelle. Yet he argued and argues that this mere bagatelle is of such infinite importance that the New York Stock Exchange authorities will court legislative action rather than comply with overwhelming public opinion.

"Admittedly, a wide-open market is ideal. But to permit short selling during a period of hysteria such as has shaken the financial foundations of this Nation is not ideal in face of mounting public hostility. Even the powerful New York Stock Exchange must, if it is to be allowed to function with a maximum of freedom, take cognizance of the public will."

And in the November 30, 1931, issue of the Chicago Herald and Examiner:

FORBES WAXES WROTH OVER BEAR MANEUVERS

"Good morning! Have you had your daily cry?

"That greeting is addressed mainly to those identified with Wall Street.

"The rest of the country is preserving its sanity and attending to business in a rational sort of way.

"But the Wall Street world daily conjures up new hob-goblins and runs frantically to cover. The bears never found it so easy to make money, never found it so easy to cause fright, never found it so easy to spread the idea that the bottom is about to fall out of everything.

"Thanks to the secrecy with which short selling is hedged about by the New York Stock Exchange governors, we are kept totally in the dark as to how much bear raiding is going on. The market has every appearance that the bears have been having a perfectly lovely time, with the sky the limit—or, perhaps one should say, hades the limit.

"Of course, did an 'emergency' exist, the stock exchange governors would halt the bears' picnic—perhaps for as long as 48 hours. You may remember that they did that once before. That was when stock quotations first reached the depths they again reached at the end of last week.

"But apparently there is no need whatsoever to ban short selling at this time—in the eyes of the exchange governors. In the eyes of a very large section of the public there is need for stopping short selling until stocks and bonds have reasonably recovered from their ultrapanic prices.

"Incidentally, bonds are distinctly lower than they were when the bears were last prohibited—for 48 hours—from carrying on what President Whitney, of the stock exchange, asks the public to believe are laudable, Nation-saving operations.

"Would it interest the stock exchange authorities were they to learn that not a few investors, although they recognize current quotations as extraordinarily low, refuse to make purchases of stocks under existing conditions, so long as bears are at liberty to knock down any stock they choose to bankruptcy prices?

"Of course, it may be that the so-called 'restrictions on short selling' have been enforced so rigidly that the public is all wrong in imagining that any short selling whatsoever has been going on. The stock exchange governors know the facts. The customers of the exchange are denied the facts.

"Maybe a few months or a few years from now the exchange authorities will graciously conclude to reveal the truth—after such information is totally worthless.

"The prospect is, however, that the public will call upon their legislative representatives to uncover the facts, not a few years from now but a few months from now. My conviction, based on rather intimate association with financial leaders, is that Wall Street hasn't the slightest conception of the ill-will borne it throughout the continent.

"If the stock exchange governors were more fully informed on this point, I rather think they would do more than they have yet done to stave off political action."

In the Chicago Evening American of February 9, 1932, Mr. R. P. Vanderpoel, financial editor and sincere proponent of the policy of laissez faire on the exchanges, makes this interesting and forceful statement in regard to short selling:

BEAR RAIDS—EXCHANGE MUST ACT—SNEERING TRAITORS—TRAMPLE ON THEM

"Repeatedly of late there have been evidences of deliberate efforts upon the part of organized bear cliques to depress security prices.

"As one of those who have steadfastly argued for the maintenance of a free and open market, and consequently against the elimination of short selling, I feel it a duty to express my opinion, and in the most forceful terms, against permitting any individual or any group to hammer stock prices down at this time.

"I believe in free speech, just as I do in a free market. Yet in war time there are certain restrictions on free speech. A man may not be a traitor to his country.

AIDING THE ENEMY

"We are passing through a period now just as critical as though we were engaged in a great war. It is just as essential that the devastating downward crash of prices—security and commodity—be arrested as it would be to halt the forward march of an alien enemy.

"Yet we are permitting men to spread propaganda just as seditious as anything that might be put out by an enemy. Not only that, but through the stock exchange we have allowed these traitors to train their guns on what appeared to be our vulnerable spots.

"If this condition continues much longer there can be but one end—closing of the stock exchange for self-protection by an outraged nation.

IT WILL NOT

"The United States Government has set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as a stupendous effort to check the great tide of deflation that has already resulted in so much suffering and which threatens economic collapse on a world-wide scale. The Government is putting $2,000,000,000 behind this movement.

"Every fresh onslaught on the stock market makes the work of this corporation just that much more difficult.

"Does anyone believe that the Government will stand idly by and permit a group of sneering, traitorous men 'play' with the stock market for their own personal aggrandizement, disregarding the general welfare of a nation?

"It cannot and it will not.

"This column has consistently defended honest short selling. Bear raids have always been condemned in the strongest language. Market manipulation of any kind has never been countenanced.

"What do we find at the moment?

"Unless our interpretation is totally wrong, we find a well-organized group of bears, men whose names have been bandied about from coast to coast, very carefully, very cleverly, putting out an increasing line of short stocks. We find the most bearish sort of propaganda emanating from these same bears and their paid agents.

"We find these men planning to profit through their short lines by uncovering specific weak situations and hammering at them in the hope of breaking them and thereby causing such a smash that they may cover their short commitments at a handsome profit.

MUST ACT QUICKLY

"Is this a fanciful picture?

"We do not believe that is it. Bankers, business men, members of the stock exchange themselves, tell us that it is not.

"If it is a true picture—even approximately true—the New York Stock Exchange must take drastic action quickly or an impatient citizenry will speak through its Congress in no uncertain terms.

CALL OF THE HOUR

"This is no time for trifling.

"The call of the hour is for men of strength, courage, and faith—men who will carry us forward, trampling as they go on the traitors and the cowards."

The following editorial appeared in the Chicago Daily Times on February 24, 1932:

"MEDICINE FOR 'SHORT SELLING' ISN'T STRONG ENOUGH

"The New York Stock Exchange has revised its rules on short selling of stocks, to be effective April 1. The action comes about 18 months too late. What's more, the new rules do not go far enough. Short selling may be restricted a little. In times like these it ought to be abolished. The President and Congress have set in motion many governmental activities, designed not only to stop the depression of values but actually to inflate them. Billions of dollars of public money are involved in the various schemes. The entire population of the country is expected to put its shoulder to the wheel and push for higher values, more business, more employment, and better times.

"But the short seller gambles that these objectives will not be accomplished. He is not an inflationist. He is a deflationist and a depressionist. He bets that things will go lower, not higher. He makes money out of destruction, not construction. He 'sells' a stock at a lower price than the current quotation with the purpose in mind that his 'sale' will depress the market even under the value at which he 'sells.' Then, if his hunch works, as it usually does, he buys it at the bottom price and delivers it to the buyer in his original sale, making a profit.

"But he sells something he does not own. To accommodate him in his gambling, his broker lends to the short seller stock that belongs to another customer which the broker is holding on a margin arrangement. The other customer doesn't even know that his stock is being used this way; often the other customer is the loser in value through the very transaction for which his stock has been put up as dummy merchandise.

"Under the new rules, as announced by President Richard Whitney of the New York Stock Exchange, the broker must secure the other customer's specific written consent to have his stock lent to a short seller. Even under this plan, the short seller is selling what he does not possess, another man's goods. The plan leaves room for manipulation and does not guarantee what the country needs * * * a ban on gambling against prosperity.

"The argument for short selling has been that it provides a 'cushion' for a sagging market, since whenever the bears sell they must later buy back. But the public feels that the need of the day is for prices which reflect, not the results of manipulation, but something close to the actual value of the securities bought. In a period like the present, when millions of families are destitute, due to lack of business and unemployment, short selling of securities means short selling of the United States and its people. It is gambling against their climb up the economic ladder. It is making money out of human misery.

"The stock-gambling fever was largely responsible for the depression in the United States. The 1928 and 1929 stock boom was due to stock gambling that was made possible by credit. The Federal Reserve System could have choked that credit in time to stop the gambling and prevent, or at least minimize the panic.

The Government's banking system did not take the necessary bold step then and stock prices took balloon ascensions. They are now deflated below actual values. Credit should be denied to those who gamble to keep them lower than they should be. All short selling should be stopped in the national emergency."

* * * * * * *

Now, in my desire to bring as many facts as I could to the attention of the committee, I dictated the following statement last night, which, with your permission, I herewith insert in the hearings:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, for over 2½ years I have pleaded for an opportunity to appear before the committee in behalf of my bills on short selling and show the destructiveness of this practice and its effect upon the social and economic conditions of the country. And now it is somewhat of a mixed pleasure to appear before you after the destruction which I prophesied has taken place because the President and the administration refused to act on my appeals.

"I shall not waste the time of the committee in dwelling at length on the abuses of 'bull' manipulation and practices in 1927, 1928, and 1929, though I wish to state here that I am fully cognizant of the part they played in paving the way for the greatest economic debacle in the history of our country. Our task at present, and it is a task incumbent upon us, is to deal immediately with the situation now before us—the practice of 'bear raiding' and short selling.

"Today I know that I am speaking for every legitimate agricultural, manufacturing, and business enterprise, as well as for the 20,000,000 men and women who have lost their life savings; for the hundreds of thousands of small business men and small manufacturers who have been wiped out; and for the millions of depositors and the thousands of widows and dependents who have been made penniless today by the greatest crime ever committed in our country: a crime that is responsible for throwing 8,000,000 people out of employment and, therefore, the cause of want and misery to millions of American homes. And lest I forget, a crime that is directly responsible for the death of 20,000 men of the Nation.

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in requesting favorable action on my bills, or any bill that the committee may see fit to report favorably to prohibit or restrict short selling, I wish to emphasize that I am not opposed to any legitimate transactions or to any orderly or free market of stocks and bonds. But I do disagree with the assertion that without short selling we would not and could not have a free and orderly market to sell. I am confident that the elimination of professional manipulation would aid the legitimate transactions and the orderliness of the market. Furthermore, I deny that by prohibiting short selling the stock exchange would be forced to close, as Mr. Whitney stated before this committee. I do believe that the volume of business on the stock exchanges would be reduced and that the profits of the brokers and gamblers would be minimized, but on the other hand, I believe that business in general would be stabilized and confidence restored.

"When I appealed in 1929 to the President, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the leaders of the administration, and the governors of the various exchanges to stop the practice of short selling, because the coming events were already casting their shadows and it appeared as though an economic crisis was fast approaching, I was assailed and ridiculed by the writers and economists controlled by Wall Street and by the majority of the brokers. Today, after 2 years and 4 months of patient but persistent effort, I am pleased to say that I have won over a great number of these people to the proposition that short selling is an unmitigated evil and should be prohibited.

"Within the last year Mr. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, has made three stirring speeches in defense of short selling, which have been broadcast throughout the entire Nation, and has had a half million copies of the same printed and distributed throughout the country. Even a superficial examination of these speeches, as well as those delivered before your committee by Profs. S. S. Huebner and Joseph Stagg Lawrence, will show that they have been carefully prepared; and in addition it is quite evident, from the speeches themselves and from the testimony presented by Mr. Whitney's counsel, that no expense has been spared to secure the best legal talent available to conduct this defense of short selling. But notwithstanding the ability of these men and their adroitness in handling an obviously unfavorable situation, they have failed, in my opinion, to convince any informed person, except stock-exchange officials, short sellers, and brokers that short selling is expedient or beneficial.

"On page 8 of the written statement which Mr. Whitney read before this committee, he states that 'if there had been no short selling of securities, I am confident that the stock exchange would have been forced to close many months ago.' Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I doubt very much whether the exchange would have closed if short selling had been prohibited, and I question Mr. Whitney's sincerity in making this statement; but oh, what a blessing it would have been for the Nation if the stock exchange had actually closed in 1928. Lives would have been saved; banks, factories, and shops would still be open; and above all, the people of the United States would not have been fleeced out of hundreds of millions of dollars during the years of 1928 and 1929, for there would have been no ballyhooed 'Hoover bull market' with its artificial rigging of stock prices, and there would not have been hundreds of new stock-market millionaires born at the expense of the working people. But please remember that the men who engineered this orgy of inflation, the 'bulls' of 1928 and 1929, have become the 'bears' of 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, and that only a small number of many have been directly responsible for these manipulations, first, on the 'bull' side, and, in the last few years, on the 'bear' side.

"Mr. Whitney and his scholarly aides have endeavored to show that the stock-exchange manipulations have little or no effect upon the trend of business and that stock-exchange prices are an effect rather than a cause. And in regard to the effect of short selling upon the trend of the market, Mr. Whitney reached the heights of eloquence by saying, 'that it does much to smooth the waves, but does not affect the tide.' And Professor Lawrence stated Wednesday, March 2, that the stock exchange does not influence business and that there is no definite correlation between stock-market prices and the trend of business, and showed that in 1927, 1928, and 1929, while business was on the down grade, the prices of stocks were going up to unprecedented heights. Now, if the stock prices on the exchanges at any time represented true value, and if they were the result solely of the law of supply and demand, I am certain that they would have followed the trend of business. The lack of correlation between stock prices and the trend of business during these years, as shown on the charts prepared by Professor Lawrence, was the result of criminal manipulation on the part of the professional gamblers interfering with the natural law of supply and demand. In this connection permit me to read an extract from a speech I delivered on the subject in 1929:

"'In keeping with this policy, ex-President Coolidge during his administration began an advertising campaign of prosperity, which Mr. Hoover followed, proclaiming that the resources of the United States were still untapped, that business conditions were showing improvement each year, and that savings were increasing. As stated in a New York World editorial:

"'"* * * After a sharp decline following a report of a huge increase in brokers' loans, Mr. Coolidge amazed even Wall Street itself by announcing that neither he nor Mr. Mellon saw any danger in the expansion of brokers' loans * * *."

"'This kind of propaganda continued even after it was pointed out that depression had set in in many lines and that stocks were selling at levels ridiculously out of proportion with their earnings. But notwithstanding this warning, many other similar statements were issued from time to time to imbue the public with the confidence that stocks would never react but would keep on climbing to greater heights in this so-called "Hoover era of higher prices."

"'The beautiful enticing picture painted by the administration forces, who would not listen to the warning voice of economists or the threat of rapidly rising brokers' loans, furnished a rife field for corporate promoters. New corporations were organized for exploiting purposes, old corporations split up their stocks, gave so-called "rights to purchase additional stock", and all the old tricks and many new ones were used. No trouble was encountered in listing these issues on the various old and hastily organized new exchanges. Interest rates increased. Country banks were lured into sending their cash to New York for use as "call loans." Corporations sent to the "call-loan market" not only their huge surpluses, which should have been distributed among stockholders, but also the moneys received by increases in capitalization, which had been obtained for development and expansion.

"'The people, impressed with the assurances of the administration, were easily taken in, and buying of all kinds of stocks reached new levels daily. Large corporate interests, with their capital stock increased by millions of shares, easily induced even their own employees, by means of alluring reports, to become "partners" in these great industries, and every conceivable scheme was resorted to in order to unload these stocks at artificially created prices on employees, their families, and the public. Then came the pyramid of pyramids—the investment trust—a new medium for obtaining millions upon millions of dollars from a misled and inflamed public.

"'Nearly everyone was in. Now, for the first time, the Federal Reserve Board served notice that brokers' loans were excessive and must be decreased. Rediscount rates were increased; interest rates soared; credits were curtailed and moneys gradually withdrawn.

"'Conditions were ripe, and the Wall Street pirates, the "shorts", were ready. They were not going to mold or construct but to hammer and pound to destruction. The first drastic decline was not enough. The conspirators continued unmercifully to throw upon the market thousands upon thousands of shares of stocks which they never owned with the sole purpose of destroying the market value of securities in order that they could repurchase them at their own prices and reap the richest harvest in the history of the Nation.'

"Yes; business started on the down grade in 1927, as Mr. Whitney and Professor Lawrence stated, because the people started to invest in stocks and bonds. The business men, the manufacturers, the professional men, in fact all classes of people, withdrew their savings from the banks and in many instances from the building-and-loan associations to buy securities, being encouraged in this by the leaders and financial prophets of the Nation. And what was the result? Just this. By the fall of 1929 most of the available cash had disappeared, because it had been ruthlessly and brazenly taken away from the people and out of circulation. The country, in fact, was drained dry of liquid money, and with this draining went the purchasing power of the country. Business and industry were left stranded, because the banks and the brokers demanded additional collateral and payments.

"I believe it is clear to any thinking person that the stock exchange has had a potent effect upon the existing conditions and that to a great degree it has been responsible for the crash and the panic from which the country is now suffering. But, lest it may appear to any person that this statement is entirely too subjective or unfair, I quote from a leading French periodical which surely expresses an objective point of view toward this matter:

"'The main theme of conversation these days in all civilized countries is: What happened in Wall Street? How is it possible that the richest country in the world should threaten the stability and integrity of the commercial and industrial life of two hemispheres? Who is responsible for this unheard of cataclysm?

"'For weeks already most disconsolate messages are coming from New York and each message is more disheartening than the previous one.

"'On October 20 it was stated that the spectacular crash of the stock market had ruined tens of thousands of small speculators and involved a depreciation of security values variously estimated at from ten to fifteen billion dollars. It was added that groups of leading financiers met to consider the situation, which affected every part of the United States.

"'On October 24 it was reported from New York that Wall Street experienced the greatest of all stock-market crashes, that 12,800,000 shares were sold within a few hours, that the supreme crash came with a vengeance and surpassed anything that the most gloomy had predicted. The estimated loss of values was given between five and ten billion dollars.

"'On October 28 a second and still greater break in the foremost American stock market took place; it was intimated that sales during the day totaled 9,200,000 shares and that billions of dollars were again dropped in quick time in spite of reports that heavy support by bankers was forthcoming.

"'On October 29 it was reported that the crash of the day before, characterized as the greatest in history, was no more the greatest, that 16,400,000 shares were sold involving losses of $60,000,000,000. It was stated that the stock-market crash wiped out more fortunes and made more paupers than the terrible slumps of 1907 and 1920.

"'All the great New York banks could do, however, was to mobilize their professional bankers. Mr. Charles Mitchell, of the National City Bank of New York, Mr. Francis H. Sisson, vice president of the Guaranty Trust Co., Mr. Alfred P. Sloan, president of the General Motors Corporation, have made bullish statements in which they reassured the world that they were "bigger bulls than ever" and that "recessions resulting from the action of the market will not be violent or of long duration."

"'The United States Government also thought it opportune to reassure the public. Its spokesman, Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, and an authority on economics, was directed by the President to assure the millions of anxious American listeners through wireless transmission regarding the crash on the stock market that "regardless of regrettable speculative uncertainties, the industrial and commercial structure of the Nation is sound."

"'But, up to the middle of November, there was no "comeback" in Wall Street. It is generally admitted that about 5,000,000 people have been speculating and that approximately $200,000,000,000 were lost; that is at an average of $40,000 each.

"'Now, how was it possible? Well, for the benefit of those who have not read the first issue of Paris-New York, we shall reprint in part what Grau-Wandmayer said in May last, in his article The Orgies in Wall Street:

"'"It is impossible to let pass in silence the gigantic rascalities of a gang of men, mostly international pirates, who are the dominating figures in that pandemonium called 'Wall Street' and who are on the best way not only to loot 120,000,000 Americans, but to defraud a whole world, to undermine the very foundations of the whole economic structure of all countries; who are debauching millions of honest men and women to the detriment of struggling nations and whose only object is to plunder and to steal.

"'"Aided and abetted by scurrilous politicians, Wall Street sharpers have coined a slogan that 'America is enjoying unusual prosperity', and under these false pretenses they have succeeded in causing an inflation of values, which is surpassing the most optimistic dreams of windbags and financial tipsters and the hopes of charlatans offering their shoddy financial wares.

"'"From 8,000,000 to 12,000,000 shares are being turned over daily on New York exchanges and over counters and the money required day by day for gambling purposes amounts to $10,000,000,000.

"'"Never in the history of any country has such a horde of men and women with little capital and financial experience been lured to the center of speculation, and never in the history of any country was gambling so boldly and officially encouraged as in the United States during the last few years."

"'The author of the above-mentioned article further cited serious authorities who claimed that the pretention of those who indirectly influenced the great public to gamble by constantly telling that the country is prospering as never before was untrue and misleading.

"'Said Grau-Wandmayer:

"'"A short time ago, no less an authority than the National Industrial Conference published the results of the investigation of 30 trained statisticians operating under the guidance of said National Industrial Conference, which shows that the 'prosperity' of the United States during last year was spotty in character and that there was a decidedly marked contrast between the extraordinary high level of financial activities in Wall Street and the lower volume of general business. It was stated in the report that available statistical data for December in January last do not indicate any marked change for better or worse in the general business situation which characterized the past year as a whole. Furthermore, complete statistical information made it clear that, so far as prevailing measurements of business go, 1928 was a year of less than normal growth in general business activities in the United States.

"'"The year was notable only for a few months of high activity in iron and steel, in automobiles and related industries, and in building construction.

"'"It is now being conceded that the 'prosperity' in the United States is only a paper prosperity with stock gamblers taking all the profits. The people as a whole are not only no better off than they were years before, but the middle classes are being pauperized through well-known process of inflation."

"'There cannot be the slightest doubt about it that the Wall Street disaster will ruin business in all parts of the world and that we may face prolonged hard times. The collapse was so titanic and far-reaching that its catastrophic results cannot yet be grasped.

"'In former market panics only relatively few persons were affected. Stock speculation in former times was confined to a small portion of population. At the time of the great deroute 17,000,000 people were registered as stockholders.

"'Now, what is the United States Congress going to do about it? * * * The trouble is that the majority of American legislators speculate at various times on various exchanges, and that the so-called "financial leaders" are fundamentally dishonest. All those bankers who tried to oppose or actually defied the action of the Federal Reserve bank which tried to discourage speculation have acted in bad faith. We wish to mention only the nefarious role played by the president of the National City Bank of New York, Mr. Charles Mitchell, who boldly denounced the restrictive action of the Federal Reserve bank tending to curb speculation.

"'The National City Bank of New York, that greatest bank in the country, is particularly unlucky in its selection of men to whose supposed integrity people are intrusting their money. It must be remembered that one of its former presidents was responsible for the fact that the American people have lost nearly a hundred million dollars in Russian securities; that his successor, Mr. Stillman, was involved in a tremendous personal scandal before the courts in New York; that the National City Bank's sugar speculations in Cuba resulted in almost ruining that country, so dependable on Wall Street. Now, it is its present first executive, formerly its first bond salesman, who tried to prevail on professional gamblers to defy all warning, to hold on, because his bank profited so enormously by lending money on exorbitant rates and also by inviting the banks of the world to divert the funds intrusted to them for legitimate purposes and to send those funds to the City Bank for speculative broker loans. The National City Bank had to close in 1923–24 about 40 branches in all parts of the world, because people distrusted that bank's management, and now the same bank is again penetrating foreign countries looking, as it seems, this time for foreign capital to support Wall Street speculators.

"'We regret that lack of space does not allow us to give to our American readers a short review of some of the foremost European papers regarding the New York Stock Market disaster. It would be interesting and instructive. These papers are mostly reserved in their utterances, but the gist of their comments is "Cave Americanem."'

"In 1929 the officials and directors of large corporations, being well aware that securities were selling far above their intrinsic value, began to sell 'against the box' to protect the gains made in the value of the stock they held—stock that had been gyrated to dizzy heights by 'wash' sales, false reports of fabulous earnings, pool manipulations, and misleading financial reports. Mr. Whitney naively disclaims any knowledge of such practices and asks for proof. I must state that my evidence is purely circumstantial, yet such factual evidence as exists—and make no mistake about it, gentlemen, it exists—is confined to the exchange members themselves. And how, I ask you, can one derive any knowledge of a corporation unless one has access to the records? These records are proof, and this explains Mr. Whitney's solicitude in preventing an examination of the exchange records.

"Professor Lawrence stated that he sympathized with the poor unfortunate short sellers; he gave us figures of the cost of short selling and endeavored to show us what the short seller contributes. That being the case, my bill will protect the short seller, and he should have no complaint. Professor Lawrence also pointed out that the unlisted stocks and the stocks not sold short suffered as great a deflation as those sold short. It is amusing for me to note what little respect these professors and New York lawyers have for the intelligence of the Members of this House. Do they not know that these unlisted stocks and bonds naturally follow the trend of the listed stocks and that bonds have suffered because many people in despair have been forced to sell their bonds and unlisted stocks rather than sacrifice the listed stock which they bought at the boom period with the encouragement of our financial and political prophets? Does Professor Lawrence feel that we do not know that the value of bank stocks is bound to be affected when billions upon billions of deposits have been withdrawn from the banks and from the legitimate business channels?

"In addition, he has stated that there are 10 'bulls' to 1 'bear.'

"Up to a year ago the percentage was much greater, but due to the publicity which the 'bears' have received the ratio on the 'bear' side has naturally increased. And this, I believe, is another important reason why short selling should be prohibited or restricted without delay.

"There are other and more urgent reasons why we should legislate in this regard before it is too late. Thousands of people in an attempt to recoup their losses have again been 'taken in' and deprived of their last penny. It is to protect those who have lost everything and are in despair and who will be tempted to take long chances in order to recover their losses that we must curb this vicious practice. And, above all, it is to prevent a recurrence of the cataclysm in which we now find ourselves; a cataclysm which robs a people of their finer qualities and in passing leaves them cinderlike—hard, scarred, and misshapen. The great mass of the American people will never forget the haunting memory of these years and will censure us if we do not act, and act quickly."

Although you may or may not agree with me that it is a fair statement, yet I do not believe it brings home to you gentlemen all of the facts that I should like to have you know. Therefore I shall just ramble along and give you an outline of my efforts to correct this evil.

Short selling, gentlemen, is not a new question with me. I have been opposing it for more than two decades. However, it was not until 1929, when conditions appeared timely for a gigantic social and economic upheaval, that I began to attack this practice in earnest. I have been through several panics and crises and was acquainted with the conditions leading up to them as well as the part played by the short sellers. Gentlemen, we look with horror upon the ghouls who slink about under the cover of darkness to rob the dead. Yet these men, under a cloak of respectability, move about spreading false rumors, preying upon the fears and shortcomings of men, and breaking down this confidence of the people in our industry, our institutions, and our Government. The ghouls rob the dead; these men rob the living of their life savings and the Nation of its lifeblood. And yet nothing is done about it. Some day posterity will look upon the stock-exchange manipulations and practices of 1928–32 as the greatest crime committed upon the people of the Nation, and will hold those who had the power to stop these practices responsible for the great catastrophe that has occurred.

You are undoubtedly aware of the fact that the wealth of the Nation, due to the manipulations in stocks, has been reduced by nearly $150,000,000,000; that the stocks which are listed on the New York Stock Exchange and other exchanges are worth only 20 cents on the dollar; and that although their former value was about $170,000,000,000, today it is about $32,000,000,000. And when we take into consideration that in this terrific crash over 20,000,000 of our people have been imposed upon and made nearly penniless, then you will agree with me, I know, that we have permitted conditions to exist which should have been prohibited long ago.

In November 1929, when I saw what was going on, I wired the President, asking him to stop this abuse. I also sent telegrams to the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the presidents of the stock exchanges.

And a few days afterward the officials of the New York Stock Exchange issued the so-called "questionnaire", requesting brokerage houses to make reports of the short sales. Of course, you know that the market immediately righted itself, and that it went along that way for 2 weeks until the officials saw fit to rescind the ruling; and then again the crash continued.

Mr. CONDON. What was that date? Will you put that in the record now?

Mr. SABATH. That was November 14. Now, may I insert here in the record, Mr. Chairman, my telegram to the President and to the board of governors of the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

CHICAGO, ILL., November 12, 1929.

His Excellency, HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D.C.:

Today's New York press dispatch states that the professionals are still selling short. I am satisfied that 99 percent of the American people feel that this outrageous destruction of the small investors has gone far enough and that immediate steps are needed to save the Nation from the disastrous conditions that are bound to follow. It is the consensus of opinion of well-informed men that you, Mr. President, should call upon the financiers of this Nation to stop profiteering and formulate and carry out a plan to save the Nation from dire calamity.

A. J. SABATH.

CHICAGO, ILL., November 12, 1929.

The BOARD OF GOVERNORS,
The New York Stock Exchange,
New York City, N.Y.:

Today's New York press dispatches state that short selling is increasing. In view of conditions I express the opinion of many well-informed men that the board, having power to stop all short selling, should do so immediately, since the existing dangerous conditions demand such a step and may be helpful and beneficial to the entire Nation. Failure of the board to act may bring about conditions the seriousness of which no one can foretell and for which the board will be held responsible.

A. J. SABATH.

* * * * * * *

At that time the officials claimed that they did not know of any short selling, but later on I will be able to show that the professional short selling began early in the fall of 1929, when all of the insiders, namely, the officials and directors of large corporations, who were aware of real conditions, were selling "against the box." There is no question that thousands upon thousands of shares were sold in this obviously unfair and unjust manner.

Now, to my mind the action of these officials and directors was not only unfair and unjust but criminal; it was like playing with the working people, who were asked to invest and did invest their funds, with loaded dice.

And they had the President and Mr. Mellon and others tell the people to come in and buy stocks—that stocks were cheap and would go higher; that is, while they themselves were selling—thus obtaining money from millions of American citizens under false pretenses. And I am satisfied that if these individuals were brought before any unbiased judge and this evidence submitted, the court would be obliged to find them guilty of a crime. Why, we convict people every day for obtaining a few hundred dollars on false pretenses. But here we have thousands of cases where the American people have been mulcted out of billions and billions of dollars, and no one has been convicted.

Now, the fact is, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that I have continued to harass the stock-exchange officials and Mr. Whitney with my telegrams and letters. And I have appealed to the President, and, in fact, everyone who I thought would help me stop this abuse, including the Postmaster General and the Attorney General. I ask leave at this time to insert these telegrams and letters in the record.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Those will be admitted in the record.

(The telegrams and letters referred to and subsequently submitted by Mr. SABATH are as follows:)

CHICAGO, ILL., December 26, 1929.

His Excellency HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States,
Washington, D.C.:

For the purpose of restoring confidence and stabilizing business, industrial leaders of the United States have pledged themselves to cooperate; but a small coterie of gamblers willfully and deliberately, through short-sale manipulations, are not only undoing your constructive efforts but are further demoralizing business and general conditions. The exchanges which have it in their power to stop this destruction by stopping the tremendous short selling are indifferent to your efforts and the welfare of the country. In order to bring about your aims, I feel you should demand cessation of these purely gambling ruinous activities of the destructive forces. The large number of genuine investors of this country who own more than 90 per cent of its securities outright can demand that their values are protected against vicious manipulation and that their peace of mind is protected so that they may continue their work unharassed.

A. J. SABATH.

CHICAGO, ILL., October 11, 1930.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS,
New York Stock Exchange,
New York, N.Y.

GENTLEMEN: A year ago, before the crash, I wired you that in the interests of the Nation all short selling should be discontinued. A few days later you issued a questionnaire to your members as to the loanings and borrowings of stock and market conditions improved. But within a few weeks you withdrew the questionnaire, with the result that another wave of short selling ensued, and is still continuing to the detriment of the entire country.

I have tried in every way by congressional action and through the administration to put a stop to the destructive practice of short selling but failed to obtain any cooperation at that time. You have permitted, sanctioned, and even approved of this infamous practice. Therefore I view with some degree of satisfaction the report in today's newspapers that you have declared war on the "bears." But instead of war, it is merely an apologetic request upon the organized destroyers of our stability, commerce, and business to be careful as their mass and collusive bear raiding.

This, to my mind, will not satisfy the American people. They now demand that not only the concentrated but all short selling cease, if not for all times, at least long enough to give business and industry a chance to recuperate from the Nation-wide depression and unemployment. I am convinced that this demand will not subside until this destructive practice ceases.

Neither you nor your shrewdest publicists can successfully deny or contradict the fact that these very manipulators in 1927–28 forced the prices of securities to unjustifiable heights and in the latter part of 1929 started the short-selling campaign, utilizing every conceivable rumor to aid them in their treasonable action which has brought about the greatest, most destructive financial tornado in the history of our land. A storm which wrecked hundreds of banks and financial institutions, closed thousands upon thousands of businesses, destroyed thousands of factories and plants, thereby forcing out of employment millions of our citizens, and causing untold want and misery.

But this is not all. The life earnings of from ten to twenty millions of citizens were swept away; the very lives of hundreds of men have been taken; thousands have been driven to insanity. All this should and could have been avoided if your exchange and similar institutions had the slightest interest in the country's welfare.

I again call upon you to stop immediately all short selling, if not for the country's sake then do it for your own, as failure on your part to act may eventually stop not only short selling but all gambling transactions on all the stock exchanges and boards of trade.

Very truly yours,

A. J. SABATH.

CHICAGO, ILL., October 16, 1930.

His Excellency HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: A year ago, before the crash, I called your attention to the approaching alarming conditions and advocated and pleaded for a cessation of the disastrous pool, short-selling practice.

Therefore I read with some satisfaction in today's press of a conference you held with the New York Stock Exchange officials regarding short selling and the investigation of stock-exchange transactions by the Department of Justice. The report indicates that they question the Government's power to stop this prosperity-destroying practice.

No one can successfully deny today that the stock crash, to which you alluded in your December message, was responsible for and aggravated the conditions that have brought about the wrecking of hundreds of banks and financial institutions, the closing of thousands upon thousands of businesses, the destruction of thousands of factories and plants, thereby forcing out of employment millions of our citizens and causing untold want and misery.

It is known to be a fact that the New York Stock Exchange can curb short selling by the issuance of an order that all loanings and borrowings of stocks cease. This will bring short selling to a minimum. If the stock exchanges have any interest in the welfare of the Nation and in the reestablishment of confidence, they will, if not for the country's sake, then for their own sake, issue immediately such an order without questioning the power of the Government to stop this nefarious practice.

This in a great measure will eliminate uncertainty and will have a tendency to reestablish confidence, which is so sadly needed, for the resumption of the legitimate business of the country. Please be assured that my activity against these destructive shorts is prompted only by a sincere desire to improve the deplorable conditions of the Nation.

Permit me to remain, respectfully,

A. J. SABATH.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 17, 1930.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SABATH: Your letter of October 16 has been received and will be brought to the attention of the President.

Sincerely yours,

LAWRENCE RICHEY,
Secretary to the President.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 10, 1931.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS,
New York Stock Exchange, New York, N.Y.:

Notwithstanding your questionnaire on borrowed stocks, the newspapers continue to call attention to the bear raids which are causing continuous uncertainty and fear and are making impossible reestablishment of confidence; therefore I again urge in the interests of the Nation as well as of your institution to stop all short selling, as the situation is serious and you should do your part to relieve conditions.

A. J. SABATH.

CHICAGO, ILL., September 23, 1931.

To His Excellency HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I again take the liberty of asking that the governmental facilities be prohibited to the unlawful and criminal activities on the part of the professional short sellers who, beyond any doubt, are responsible for the great panic. No evidence of my position is necessary other than the statement on short selling of Mr. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, made the day before yesterday:

"During the present emergency it would tend to bring about a condition of demoralization in which prices would not fairly reflect market values."

I feel that it has been clearly demonstrated that if short selling ceases confidence can and will be restored and business resumed. I repeat, the Government has the power to stop this unlawful—yes, criminal—gambling practice.

Yours very respectfully,

A. J. SABATH.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 25, 1931.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR MR. SABATH: Your letter of September 23 has been received, and I have placed it before the President. He has read it with interest.

Sincerely yours,

LAWRENCE RICHEY,
Secretary to the President.

CHICAGO, ILL., September 23, 1931.

Mr. RICHARD WHITNEY,
President New York Stock Exchange, New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. WHITNEY: I was ready to congratulate you on your splendid and straightforward statement regarding short selling made on last Monday but I read today that the order banning short selling has already been rescinded.

In view of what you yourself have said about the demoralizing effect of this practice, I cannot conceive of any reason for this rescinding order.

For 2 years I have appealed to your patriotism and good citizenship to stem the growing depression by using your efforts to stop the destructive practice of selling short. Your statement and the 2-day ban helped considerably, the market reacted favorably and saved the situation when Great Britain suspended the gold standard.

I believe that a continuance of the restriction of short selling will be a great factor in helping to reestablish confidence in the people and in the restoration of business, and I hope that you and the governors of the exchange will see your duty clear to again ask your members to refuse to accept short-sale orders, thereby helping the entire Nation.

It is within your power to do this, and by so doing you can forestall legislation that will go away beyond the prohibition of short selling.

Very truly yours,

A. J. SABATH.

CHICAGO, ILL., October 5, 1931.

Mr. RICHARD WHITNEY,
President of the New York Exchange,
New York City.

DEAR SIR: More than 2 years ago—even before the stock-market crash—I appealed, supplicated, and finally demanded that short selling, and particularly professional short selling, be stopped, feeling at the time that unscrupulous gamblers would take advantage of the then impending depression. I pointed out that in order to save the Nation from financial chaos and misery it was absolutely imperative to prevent, or at least restrict, short selling, for tremendous short selling was bound to affect not only stocks but bonds also, and thus impair the position of most of our banks, which held much of these securities as collateral.

These appeals I have reiterated on various occasions since then, but to all of my appeals you either have turned a deaf ear or have attempted to defend short selling as a necessary "brake" on "dangerous inflation." Yet during the period of extreme inflation, from 1925 to 1929, inclusive, short selling as a "brake" was of little or no consequence.

To be fair, I must concede that on November 12, 1929, or thereabouts, you did send out a questionnaire to the members of the exchange regarding the scope and extent of the short interest, though it is my recollection that the questionnaire, probably because it centered hostile attention on the large short sellers, had a very favorable effect on the market, which changed for the worse again almost as soon as the questionnaire was withdrawn. I must concede, also, that you did request, on the day preceding Britain's abolition of the gold standard, that short selling should cease temporarily; though the result was as I expected—the market reacted favorably, notwithstanding disquieting news from London. In both instances it was obvious to me that when short selling was prohibited the market seemed to adjust itself favorably.

In view of the alarming conditions, I feel it is imperative that short selling should cease immediately. The extreme inflation and the present deflation caused by professional short selling is responsible for the closing of 2,000 banks, has thrown more than 8,000,000 people out of employment, has sent thousands of business men into bankruptcy, and has brought misery and dissatisfaction to the entire Nation.

When I began my crusade against unmitigated "bear" operations 2 years ago, a majority of the financial publicists and economists, influenced by the avaricious professional short sellers, retarded my efforts. Today, however, not only enlightened economists and unsubserviant newspapers but that same apathetic group are beginning to realize the destruction that has been done. There is no question that the matter of the prohibition of short selling will be taken up in the next session of Congress.

Before Congress convenes, however, I am hoping that you will see the justice and righteousness of my position and restrict short selling of your own volition. Failure on your part to heed my warning to stop short selling may result in a demand to suspend all trading on the stock exchange until strict regulatory laws are enacted.

Very truly yours,

A. J. SABATH.

CHICAGO, ILL., December 1, 1931.

Mr. RICHARD WHITNEY,
President New York Stock Exchange,
New York City, N.Y.:

The current issue of Barron's states: "Meantime short selling has lost none of its vogue with the rank and file. The practice is general on all sides, so easy and so prompt have been the results." Wall Street tipster services disseminated by the vast majority of the brokerage houses throughout the United States in the interests of the shorts are endeavoring to create fear in the minds of the people against the approaching session of Congress; all with the deliberate intent to destroy whatever confidence there still remains. By immediately prohibiting short selling you can easily put an end to this vicious destructive propaganda and save the Nation, as well as your own institution, from complete demoralization. This action is absolutely necessary, inasmuch as your so-called "restrictive measures" have signally failed, as is stated by the best informed authorities on Wall Street.

A. J. SABATH.

Mr. SABATH. Thus it can be readily seen that I have done everything humanly possible to make the stock-exchange officials and the administration realize the destructiveness of short selling and the need for prohibiting it, at least, until conditions return to normal.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall try to bring home to your minds these vicious practices, as I view them, as well as I can; and I hope you will bear with me.

At the beginning all I received for my efforts in annoying them with those communications was condemnatory letters, mostly emanating from the offices of the brokers on Wall Street and LaSalle Street.

But finally Mr. Whitney realized that the people were beginning to take notice, and so in 1930 he began to defend his position. His first speech in defense of short selling was delivered in my city [Chicago] on Otober 10, 1930, just about a year after I started my crusade. He delivered the next one at the Hotel Astor on September 17, 1931; the third at Hartford, Conn., on October 16, 1931; and the last on December 15, 1931.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That was at Syracuse, was it not?

Mr. SABATH. That was at Syracuse. All of these speeches were broadcast over the radio, and every stockbroker was requested to listen in, and, in addition, every investment house received a special communication from Mr. Whitney informing it that copies of the speeches would be forthcoming and asking that it make a general distribution of these speeches to all customers and boardroom habitues.

Mr. CONDON. Of course, you do not condemn him for that, do you? He had a perfect right to make out his own case, did he not?

Mr. SABATH. No; I do not. But what I say is that he appeared here a few days ago, directly and indirectly defending the practice of short selling.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And doing more than that, Mr. SABATH; not only defending it, but justifying it and urging it as a necessity for the accomplishment of business.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; and he and the professors who have been sent down here by the stock exchange, notwithstanding the fact that they did not expressly say so——

Mr. CONDON (interposing). Well, Professor Lawrence did.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And so did the other gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; perhaps so. In response to my inquiry addressed to the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania as to whether or not Professor Huebner really represented the university, as he originally stated when he was here, and as I expected, I received the following letter from the dean:

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Philadelphia, February 20, 1932.

Mr. A. J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Congress of the United States,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SABATH: Your inquiry of the 19th instant has been received. As stated in the press, Prof. S. S. Huebner appeared before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives on behalf of the Stock Exchange of New York. He had not been delegated to speak for the university.

Sincerely yours,

EMORY R. JOHNSON.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, I think in fairness to Professor Huebner, Mr. SABATH, it should be made clear that he said he was of the faculty there; and I asked him if he was a consultant, and he said, yes; he was a consultant; and I asked him if the stock exchange has asked him to come here, and he said, yes. Is that not so?

Mr. CONDON. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Well, I was not present.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no doubt that he came here in a professional capacity.

Mr. SABATH. That is all right. I was not present when you asked him those questions.

Now, Mr. Whitney and these experts lay great stress upon the fact that this practice is permissible and that it is legal. I concede that where there is delivery some of the courts have held that it is legal. But in all instances where there is no intent of delivery the courts have criticized it and have declared it to be pure gambling. In this connection, I have several cases here which I wish to embody in the hearings, though I wish I had the time to read the severe criticisms made by some judges. I am embodying these cases, and there are three or four of them, merely to offset the statements which have been made that all courts have declared that short selling is legal and valid and that they have looked upon it with favor.

(The citation of cases reads as follows:)

"A short sale is not per se illegal as a gambling transaction: Boyle v. Henning (121 Fed. 376), Appleman v. Fisher (34 Md. 540), In re Taylor (192 Pa. 304).

"However, such a transaction is illegal if an actual sale is not contemplated and the real intent is to speculate in the rise and fall of prices: Riordon v. McCabe (341 Ill. 506), Hurd v. Taylor (181 N.Y. 231).

"The case of Riordon v. McCabe, supra, recently decided by the Illinois Supreme Court, would, in the light of the transactions held on the Chicago Board of Trade, make a great part of them mere gambling, being, in fact, bets and not contemplating the delivery of any property of any kind.

"Another important case on this subject decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (Clews v. Jamieson, 182 U.S. 461) reads in part as follows:

"'If, however, under the guise of a contract of sale the real intent and purpose of both parties is to speculate in the rise and fall of prices and the property is not to be delivered at the time fixed for delivery and one party is to pay the other the difference between the contract price and the market price, the whole transaction must be considered as a wager and invalid.'

"The reason for this rule is well stated by an early case (Melchert v. American Tel. Co., 11 Fed. 193) in one of the district courts of the United States:

"'Such a dealing amounts to a mere speculation upon the rise and fall of prices. It required no capital except the small sums demanded to put up margins and pay differences. It promotes no legitimate trade. Any impecunious gambler can engage in it with infinite detriment to the bona fide dealer. It enables mere adventurers at small risk to agitate the markets, stimulate and depress prices, and bring down financial ruin upon the heads of the unwary, * * *. Black Fridays are its legitimate progeny.'

"Other cases might be cited, all to the same effect. A case, Hurd v. Taylor (181 N.Y. 231), which may be said to be the leading case in that State, clearly holds that a so-called 'short sale' may be conducted on the exchange the same as any other sale; but there is this well-understood rule that is found in this case and every other case which approves the short sale, that there must be a delivery of the stock. If the delivery is not made and such is not in contemplation by the parties, then the transaction is a wager. If it is understood that the broker keeps the stock so purchased in his name and never places it in the name of the customer and deals with it as if it were his property and keeps the gains and losses in a set of books which are the final basis of settlement, and the parties do not have in mind to do anything other than pay in cash the difference at the end, which in truth describes thousands of accounts, then such dealings do not come within the approved rule of short selling of any court of any State, but are described in all the cases as gambling."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. SABATH, only yesterday our colleague from New York, Mr. OLIVER, put in the record a decision rendered by the Supreme Court of the State of New York in the latter part of February—after Mr. Whitney had testified before this committee—characterizing these practices as to short selling——

Mr. SABATH (interposing). I cannot see how any honest judge or court can rule that it is legal or valid. Why, any rational person knows that short selling is nothing but pure gambling.

Mr. OLIVER. Judge SABATH, would you prefer to have us ask you questions as you go along, or would you prefer to go ahead with your statement uninterrupted?

Mr. SABATH. Well, I am trying to answer their defense first.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I do not want to disturb you; you may proceed.

Mr. SABATH. And when I get through with that I shall be glad to answer questions.

You have heard them say so often that short selling acts as a "cushion." The trouble with us is that many Members of the House are so busily engaged with their manifold duties that they are misled about these things.

Mr. Whitney, able man that he undoubtedly is, must hold the members of this committee and the people of the Nation in contempt by submitting figures purporting to show that the total short interest at any one time was insignificant when compared with the total amount of shares outstanding and by expecting them to draw the only inference—that short selling is of no consequence. I believe he said that at the height of the panic the ratio between the amount of shares sold short and the total amount listed was about one eighth of 1 percent. But why Mr. Whitney has chosen to compare the numbers of shares sold short with the total amount is indeed difficult to understand. Certainly it would be more a manifestation of common sense to compare the total short sales with the floating supply, or, of infinitely greater value and import, the total short sales with the total long sales on any given day. It has been stated that the market was never short at any one time more than 4,000,000 shares and that this small amount could not possibly affect the movement of millions of shares. To reason thus is to betray a lack of knowledge of trading. It must be plain that no short sellers would be so foolish as to spread short over the entire list of securities, many of which are seldom traded in during the year. The truth is that "bull" and "bear" operations are concentrated on a few pivotal and volatile securities which are pushed up and down at will. The rest follow naturally enough.

Every short sale is made with the deliberate intent to destroy whatever commodity or stock that the short seller may sell. A short seller is not a producer. A short seller is a destructive individual; he is trying to destroy a thing that another man owns or produces. And I can hardly grasp the thought that we should have permitted such practices for so many years.

Mr. CONDON. May I ask you a question there?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. CONDON. In that connection, may not the reason for it be this, that the short seller is trying to get stocks back to a value which he considers is fair, rather than the inflated values that he finds those particular stocks have when he starts his operations? In other words, is he not using his judgment as to what should be the true value of the stock? That is a question that I should like to have you answer.

Mr. SABATH. No short seller ever has the interest of a particular commodity or stock in mind. His mind is occupied with the question, how much money can I make on that particular deal? His aim is to make money; do you understand?

Mr. CONDON. Yes; but——

Mr. SABATH (interposing). And he sells short, not to equalize the prices, not to adjust the conditions, but to make money.

Mr. CONDON. May I suggest that that is the motive of all men of business—to make money, and as much as they can?

Mr. SABATH. This is not business, but a destructive practice; because anyone, even a fool, can destroy; but it takes a man of ability to help to build, to construct.

Mr. CONDON. Well, what do you think of the men who build up to such inflated values that many fools rush in to try to get some of that "easy money"?

Mr. SABATH. Now you have asked me something that I am mighty pleased to answer. I have no excuse for, and am ready to condemn the men who willfully and deliberately inflated values of the stocks. But I believe you will find that they are the same men who today are selling short; that they were the "bulls" in 1928 and 1929; and that they are bankers and officers of corporations. They are men who stand high in our communities. They go to church on Sundays and give little donations here and there to the poor. They are the men who have accumulated millions upon millions of dollars at the expense of thousands of widows and dependents who today are homeless and penniless.

I say that these men who caused the criminal inflation and who are destroying today should be publicly censured and restricted in their activities; and I am trying, if that be possible, to restrict them in their infamous operations.

Mr. CONDON. And that, you say, includes short selling and also selling long on the market?

Mr. SABATH. All professional manipulation, gambling, and pool action.

Mr. CONDON. Then the operations of all kinds on the stock exchange ought to be forbidden?

Mr. SABATH. No. I am not opposed to legitimate sales; and there is no question that a great number of the sales made are legitimate. But is it necessary to sell a certain stock 10 times every month, or 3 times a day? Is it necessary to turn over the total stock issued by a company every 4 days—as was the case in the J. I. Case stock in 1931? That is gambling. I do not object to a legitimate stock exchange or market place; but do we need to have three or four or five million shares, or ten million shares, of stock sold in a day? That is a professional market.

I want a man who owns stock to have a chance and an opportunity to sell it at the market—not an artificial and criminally manipulated market but a legitimate market.

Now, I have something here that might interest you in connection with that; and I ask you whether you think it is necessary to sell millions of shares of stock every day to create a legitimate market?

I have here a statement from a gentleman named A. V. Shaw; he states:

"The entire common capitalization of a well-known company listed on the New York Stock Exchange was sold 94 times on the stock exchange in 2 years, in 1930 and 1931. The commissions alone on this turnover amounted to over $8,000,000, or more than the entire issue was worth at the close of 1931."

Now, do you think these were all legitimate sales? No one is gullible enough to believe that they were. This was a clear-cut case of gambling, nothing else but dishonest gambling; and that, gentlemen, is what I am trying to stop.

I will tell you why these gentlemen of the stock exchange are so much interested in maintaining a free and open market, as they choose to call it. It is not so much because they are interested in providing a ready market for securities, as Mr. Whitney would have you believe, but rather because they are interested in continuing the activity that such a market represents. A free and open market means activity, and activity means business in the form of commissions and loans. Do you know that in 1929 the brokers' commissions and interest charges on loans amounted to $959,000,000? That sum, I believe, speaks for itself, and no expression of solicitude for the customer by Mr. Whitney or the gentlemen sent here by the exchange can mitigate the importance and significance of these figures.

Mr. YATES. What year was that, Mr. SABATH?

Mr. SABATH. 1929. Now, permit me to insert here the number of shares listed, the market value of them, the percentages, and the cost of operation. These figures were not compiled by me, but by Mr. E. C. Riegel, of New York.

The statement referred to was subsequently submitted by Mr. SABATH and is as follows:

New York Stock Exchange record, 1929

Number of shares listed		942,492,072
Sales of shares		1,124,608,910
Market value of sales		$112,460,691,000
Brokers' loans (average constant)		$6,000,000,000
Commissions to brokers on stocks	$449,843,564
Commissions to brokers on bonds	7,550,790
United States and New York revenue charges	44,984,356
Interest charges (average 7.62 percent	457,200,000
Total brokers' charges to customers		$959,578,710
Dividend yield on all listed shares (average 3¼ percent)		$3,654,978,957
Brokers' charges on stocks (compared to market price)—percent		0.85
Ratio of brokers' charges to dividend income—percent		26.00
Net dividend return—percent		2.40

"The above figures are not absolute, but are approximately correct and reveal a picture the stock exchange does not care to have revealed. It shows tnat by pyramiding prices and cnarges the stockholders' income during the boom was reduced to the small percentage of 2.40, or about one third of what it is now during depression. Of course, the stockholder who did not 'trade' did not suffer from this shaving process. On the other hand, a man who ran a 'trading' account of about $1,000 per week, with a weekly turnover, paid 52 times 0.85 percent, or 44.20 percent of his capital. With this sort of capital bleeding it is obvious that listed stocks must sooner or later develop a list, and that from an income standpoint, if 'traded' in upon the exchange, are a very poor buy. What the scalping process of the exchange is worth to the members may be seen from the price of a membership, which in 1929 sold as high as $625,000. With 1,100 members at that time the 'bookie value' of the New York Stock Exchange was $687,500,000. Today, with prices down, dividends high, and 'trading' small, the racket is valued, according to a recent sale of a seat, at about 25 percent of the 1929 value. In other words, the more the stockholder gets for his money the less a seat on the exchange is worth and vice versa."

It is amusing to note how far some gentlemen will go in trying to defend short selling. If my memory serves me, there was Professor Huebner, who said, "Oh, yes; that will prevent a man who is away from his home and owns shares of stock from selling them."

Mr. Chairman, this is not a short sale. I do not object to such a sale. In this case the man owns the stock, and the stock exchange can easily adopt a rule stating that when a man is away from his place of business or is traveling he can have additional time to deliver such stock. You understand that, I hope. I do not propose to deprive a man so situated of an opportunity to sell, it matters not where he be.

Mr. Whitney and others assert that stock prices are the result pure and simple of the great economic law of supply and demand and that they are an expression rather than a cause of this depression. Permit me to say that I disagree with Mr. Whitney and his gentlemen. In theory the stock prices should reflect the law of supply and demand and should be an effect rather than a cause. Yet a cause they are, for the natural law applies only to a condition where there are no unnatural machinations to interrupt it. Would any person deny that "wash sales", pool operations, misleading financial reports, and the circulation of false statements interfere with the law of supply and demand? I hardly think so.

Mr. Chairman, there was nothing to prevent short selling in 1927, 1928, and 1929. Why did not short selling do then what is claimed for it now? The answer is simple. The individuals who really determine the trend of the market and who are now "bears" were then "bulls." They were no more interested in equalizing prices or stabilizing the market than they are now as "bears." Ask the small short sellers who in 1928 and early in 1929 sold short in the belief that stock prices were too high—which, in fact, they were, selling in many instances more than 5 to 10 times their value—what happened when they went against the trend of the market. You will find that nearly all of them were thoroughly beaten and cuffed around. Ask them whether their sad experiences have taught them anything. I am confident they will say, "Do not trade against the trend of the market", to put it more correctly, "Do not trade against the trend created by the big operators."

The exchange, says Mr. Whitney, regulates all possible wrongdoing. Of course, it is difficult to understand just exactly what Mr. Whitney means, for he has a delightful way of being ambiguous. Oh, I have no doubt that when there is an apparent irregularity on the part of some member or brokerage house, for example, when some widow is swindled out of her life savings, heroic measures are used to punish the offenders. However, when cases of irregularities or wrongdoing are not so apparent—and I should say that a majority of the irregularities are of this nature—little is heard of punishment meted out, if any at all. Take, for instance, this question of "bear raiding."

In his broadcasts and talk before the committee Mr. Whitney was profuse in his statements that the exchange, while opposed to any restriction on short selling, is doing everything in its power to prevent "bear raiding." Yet, during the course of his testimony before the committee, when he was asked how many individuals were punished by the exchange for "bear raiding" in the last 2 years, he made the startling statement that, although there had been many alleged instances of this practice, the committee on conduct could find no evidence of a single violation of the rules of the exchange in this regard, and therefore that no one had been punished.

Frankly, gentlemen, I am more interested in action than I am in profuse expressions of action. But I find it difficult to understand how it is, in the light of what has happened in the last 2 years, that this committee on conduct can find no evidence of this practice. Day after day editorialists and reputable financial writers inveigh against this vicious practice, and yet there is no "bear raiding." It is, of course, quite possible that there has been, and is, some measure of overstatement in these newspaper reports and editorials, but I am convinced that such information would not be published unless there was some basis in fact.

Mr. Whitney also stated that the exchange is extremely watchful in preventing corners, among other things. And in his speech, broadcast from Hartford, Conn., on October 16, 1931, he said, in reference to the ban that had been placed on short selling directly after Great Britain had gone off the gold standard, that "within two hours after short selling was forbidden, the governing committee found there was a real danger of technical corners and of crazy and dangerous price advances."

I must admit that I cannot follow his reasoning. I have a list of securities picked with reference to their volatility, and only in one instance has the oscillation been more than five points. If that constitutes a "crazy advance", I should like to know what the officials of the exchange thought of the advance in the stock of the Vanadium Corporation in 1929 when it was gyrated from $37 to $145. It appears quite evident to me that there was some form of irregularity here; that some group of individuals had cornered the floating supply and had pushed the stock up to the limit. The same may be said of the extraordinary movements of the stock of the Simmons Co. and the United Aircraft Co., not to mention a host of others. Yet I have no recollection of any investigation being held in regard to these apparent irregularities.

Short selling, said Mr. Whitney and Professors Huebner and Lawrence, is not the cause of the depression; the underlying cause is the forced liquidation. And as proof of their contention they submit figures showing that in the bond market, where short selling is practically nonexistent, the decline in the value of bonds has been almost as severe as that in the value of stocks. Now, no one, I believe, denies that liquidation was a factor in the bond market and that there was liquidation in the stock market and that, consequently, liquidation has a casual relationship to this depression. But what I deny is the thesis that it is the underlying cause of the depression.

It was the incessant and wanton destruction of security and commodity values by short selling that caused, and is prolonging, the depression. And it is the knowledge and the fear that security and commodity values can be knocked to perdition at will by the short sellers that deters people from investing. And it is this same fear that has caused the liquidation that Mr. Whitney so naively says is the cause of the depression. Prohibit short selling and thereby dispel the fear of huge losses, and liquidation, without question, will cease.

Now, I am forgetting—and this is the point I want to bring home to you gentlemen: I realize that they are trying hard to justify a condition. And I am going to put in the record that in September 1931 I again wired Mr. Whitney and made it clear to him that if the exchange did not stop short selling of its own volition Congress would force it to do so. In that wire I said:

"If not in the country's interest, in your own interest stop short selling, at least for the time being, so as to give the country a chance to revive."

And on the next day—or was it the same day?—Great Britain went off the gold standard. You remember that. Most of the stock exchanges closed. The New York Stock Exchange was about to close; but in the morning the governors met. Now, I know that they did not want to issue an order prohibiting short selling that day; but it was a question of closing the stock exchange for a few days or banning short selling. What did they do?

They put in an order prohibiting all short sales, in an effort to prevent the terrific crash which they expected would ensue from the unfavorable report that Great Britain had gone off the gold standard.

And what was the result? Instead of a crash there was a decided upward movement. I do not know how severe a crash there would have been if the exchange officials had not banned short selling, but there is every reason to believe that it would have been the worst in the history of the exchange. You see the effect, gentlemen, of the prohibition of this practice. A report is sent out, "No short selling", and instead of there being a crash the market reacts upward. And when the reaction is so pronounced, what do you think they do? Rescind the order. To protect the investors? Not at all. They are afraid that the prices will go to such heights that the short sellers will receive a deserved whipping. They rescind the order to protect the short sellers. The action of the stock-exchange officials makes it so clear that my position has been a correct one that it is not necessary for me to spend more time replying to their futile apologies for their action. They have convicted themselves by that very act, and they stand convicted before the country.

Mr. McKEOWN. Judge Sabath, how much more time do you want? We are compelled to go to the House early today.

Mr. SABATH. Let me say that I am grateful to you for this opportunity and that I will close shortly; and, inasmuch as I have been given the privilege of inserting some of these papers, I will not detain you much longer. I am inclined to think, gentlemen, that you are commencing to feel that I am right on this question.

Mr. SPARKS. Judge Sabath, I do not believe that you should assume that we are "commencing" to think that. I think that is an opinion some of the members may have had for some time.

Mr. YATES. I understand, Judge Sabath, that you are discussing the various justifications that have been introduced here; and one of the justifications which they have advanced was the stabilization of the market. And you made the point, as I understand you, that in 1927, 1928, and 1929, they had the power to stabilize and they did not stabilize.

Mr. SABATH. Why, of course—according to that theory they could have done that by selling short at that time. But it did not work that way; so it is obvious that their contention is not worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. McKEOWN. Well, is it not a matter of fact, Judge Sabath, that the shorts were out of the market at that time, and it went over the long side?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have tried to point out to you this fundamental fact: That all of the present-day "bears" were the "bulls" of 1928 and 1929, the same persons who forced the prices of stocks to such unreasonable heights; that they are men who are not interested in the effects of their activities so long as they accumulate money. They are a destructive force because they throw our economic system and therefore our social system out of adjustment.

Mr. McKEOWN. In other words, they take the side that they think they can make the most money out of at a given time?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; and of course they are on both sides at different times.

Mr. SPARKS. Perhaps this has been shown in some of the testimony given before the committee; but do you know what the proportion of short selling is, on an average, as compared with the long selling?

Mr. SABATH. That depends on the news they have for dissemination. If they have a chance to send out a lot of detrimental news which will affect the market, the short selling is much greater. I am of the opinion, from evidence that I have before me and information that I have received from the insiders, that more than 50 percent of the buying and selling is done by the professional traders; and most of this in the last 2 years has been short selling. The statistics that Mr. Whitney gave us cannot be taken into consideration, because a great number of short sales are covered during the same days, and these sales do not appear in the figures which he submits. Do you understand?

Mr. SPARKS. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. They liquidate. These shorts, as you no doubt know, do not take any chances. You know the "sure-thing" gambler does not take any chance; his reasoning is that no matter how small a profit, it is still a profit.

Mr. CONDON. You have not any evidence of that statement that the shorts do not take any chances, have you? Now, Mr. Whitney made a remark to the effect——

Mr. SABATH (interposing). That they are all "broke"?

Mr. CONDON (continuing). That very few of them come out of the market eventually with a profit.

Mr. SABATH. It is for that reason that I am going to ask early action, and I shall tell you why: The outside shorts—that is, those individuals not closely connected with the exchange or with corporations—have not made money; they have lost it, because they are naïve enough to believe that they can go in and compete with these professionals and that they can sell short and make money out of it. But it is only the inside fellows, the floor brokers, the professionals—and there are only a few of them who control the situation—that make money. Ninety or ninety-five percent of those who go into the market on the long or short side of the market eventually lose everything.

Mr. CONDON. It amounts to this: That the outside fellows, the little fellows, who are sometimes "bulls" and sometimes "bears", generally wind up by being "lambs"? [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. Yes; they are all "boobs." But in reply to Mr. Whitney's statement relative to all "bears" being "broke," permit me to insert the following statement written by Mr. Leslie Gould which appeared in the Chicago Evening American on February 25, 1932:

"If the 1932 bears stick to their announced intention, they may upset that old adage quoted by Whitney, that none of the big shorts in the old days died millionaires. * * *

"Since the 1929 market crash the bears have taken rolled-up paper profit of upward of $2,000,000,000, with half of it going to European plungers. In this country 10 bears, it is said, have piled up upward of $600,000,000.

"Here's about the way the $600,000,000 profits is divided:

No. 1 bear	$200,000,000
No. 2 bear	150,000,000
No. 3 bear	50,000,000
No. 4 bear	50,000,000
No. 5 bear	30,000,000
No. 6 bear	25,000,000
No. 7 bear	25,000,000
No. 8 bear	25,000,000
No. 9 bear	10,000,000

"Of the 10 above, 1—no. 9—died late last year. He had covered nearly all his short lines before his death, so he beat the game.

"The other nine are very much alive and kicking. They are the ones who have stepped out of the market for the time being. * * *

"The bears who have clambered to the sidelines are not bullish. * * * They believe there is real danger of legislative action against short selling, both in securities and commodities * * *."

Mr. SPARKS. Do you think there would be a persistency in short selling if these people lost about every time and not ever make a profit?

Mr. SABATH. They would not be there. [Laughter.] Because that is their business; they go there in the morning and watch for the "boobs" and the "lambs" to make their bets, and then they come in. They know what orders have come in during the night; who must sell; what the conditions are. They go over the reports—there are 7,000 shares of this or that stock that must be sold. Yes; they know that it must be sold by a bank, or by some fellow; and they will go in and start to sell in advance.

Mr. Whitney says that the short seller cannot sell for less than the last day's prices. Do you remember when he made that statement? And he also said that one cannot sell short for a figure less than the previous long sale. Now, in one breath he says that any restriction on short selling will interfere with the free and open market and in another admits that the exchange is voluntarily restricting the practice itself. But aside from this contradiction, Mr. Chairman, if short selling be proper, if it be helpful to the market, if it be beneficial to the country, why should the exchange pass such rules? There is only one answer: All of these rules have been passed with one purpose in mind—to forestall congressional regulation. And though they may present some difficulties to the small short seller to surmount, they do not deter the big "bear" operators in their activities.

Oh, yes! Mr. Whitney issued a statement saying that there will be a more stringent rule imposed by the exchange on the short sellers, and that from now on everyone will have to sign an order agreeing that his stock may be loaned. We are told that the order will go into effect April 1. Now, let us see: What is April 1? Is it not "April Fools' Day"? Well, I think that is just what this order is—a hoax to fool the people, to fool you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, and everyone, so that you will give up your efforts to legislate on this question.

But I wonder why that order was issued? I understand that a few days before the statement of that ruling appeared in the press, Mr. Whitney had a conference with the President, though this is not the only conference which the President has had in this regard; for right here I want to be fair and say that I also conferred with him on this question of short selling some time ago——

Mr. CONDON (interposing). How long ago?

Mr. SABATH. Nearly a year ago. Yes. And he criticized short selling——

Mr. CONDON (interposing). Did he say that publicly, or just in a letter to you?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, publicly; he criticized short selling in a letter that was published—this occurred about the time the press first carried reports that Russia had sold 7,000,000 bushels of wheat short.

Mr. CONDON. That particular statement of his referred only to short selling on the commodities exchange, did it not?

Mr. SABATH. I know; but it also showed, at least to some extent, his inclinations and that he was beginning to realize that short selling was an unmitigated evil.

And I warned him on that point. I told him what he could do to protect the interest of the American wheatgrower. It is to be regretted that he has not followed his original statement and helped me to bring about this legislation, as he has in other matters. This is not the only matter I had discussed with him and pleaded for. I pleaded for the Finance Corporation legislation; the broadening of the Federal Reserve Board's power of rediscount; and the creation of a home-loan banking system. He adopted these three, and I thought I had him with me on this also; but unfortunately, after a conference with a certain influential lawyer, the lawyer from the Chicago Board of Trade——

Mr. CONDON (interposing) Mr. Strawn?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Strawn, notwithstanding the fact that the United States Chamber of Commerce had gone on record against short selling, and that he was the chairman of it, he appeared before the President 3 or 4 months ago, and pointed out to him the necessity of short selling and probably convinced him to desist in his efforts to stop short selling.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Sabath, we will have to suspend now, as the House is in session.

Mr. SABATH. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this in conclusion: I have here resolutions and copies of resolutions from bankers' associations, from the United States Chamber of Commerce, and from the various farm organizations throughout the country. I have here statements from professors and economists who are not controlled by Wall Street. I have letters from hundreds of bankers and others who have suffered—men who were formerly members of the stock exchange—all appealing for relief and asking that we put an end to this practice. I hope, therefore, that favorable action will be taken.

Mr. Chairman, though I have been fighting this practice for nearly two years and a half and have introduced several measures to regulate it, I wish to say that I am not wedded to my bills. I am only interested in the elimination of this evil. We have a drafting bureau here, and we are paying a good, substantial salary to these gentlemen, and they are efficient. They can draw a bill that will be constitutional, and that will eliminate this evil.

I have been working on another bill, which, I believe, is constitutional, and which will be much broader in scope than either of my bills, or the "blue sky" bill. I hope that it will be sent to this committee shortly, and I hope you will give all these bills the consideration to which, I believe, they are entitled.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, for the courtesy you have extended to me.

Mr. MCKEOWN. We thank you very much, Judge Sabath, for your interesting and instructive statement. The subcommittee will now stand adjourned, subject to call of the chairman.

INCREASED TARIFFS WITH INSECURE REVENUE AND UNSATISFACTORY PROTECTION, OR TRADE QUOTAS WITH MORE REVENUE AND REAL PROTECTION

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, for the last century and more we have been struggling with our tariff policy. Whatever may be our theories as to the advisability of a tariff from the viewpoint of political economy; whatever may have been the party promises that have been made at one time or another, some form of trade barrier is here to stay, at least for such a time as to be beyond the cares of the present generation.

When military wars disappear trade wars will probably vanish, and when trade wars vanish a very fundamental cause of military conflicts will be destroyed. It would seem that our present problem is not to remove trade barriers, but to obtain that kind which is least harmful to our export trade and most beneficial to ourselves.

I submit that our time-tried method of regulating foreign commerce solely through the use of import duties has not produced the greatest benefit in the past, and with our developing national program promises to be absolutely harmful in the future, also it would seem that a better method of regulating foreign commerce is to accomplish directly and by legislative fiat the basic purpose which we have attempted to accomplish indirectly through tariff duties; that is, to establish a definite specific quota of imports compatible with domestic production.

The main trouble with our effort to limit imports through tariff duties has been that (1) domestic production has not received definite protection, (2) in times of stress when revenue has been needed it has always disappeared, (3) tariffs have been imposed by blocs with little consideration to need and practically none to national welfare, (4) our export trade has received no scientific attention, and has been greatly injured.

We are now apparently entering an era of industrial planning and controlled competition. At every step we are met by the specter of foreign trade competition capable of destroying the domestic industry to which these advanced measures are to be applied. A continuation of this policy will make a development of our industrial planning program almost impossible.

Let us look at the protection which domestic production receives under our present system of tariff duties. The ideal of our tariff laws has been either to "insure equal competition", a Democratic slogan, or to secure rates "equalizing foreign and domestic costs", a Republican shibboleth. Even in normal times the fact that there is no such thing in a country the size of the United States as a standard of domestic costs is apparent. To attempt to compute foreign costs with the varying conditions of transportation, and taking into consideration "absolute costs" and "relative costs" makes this problem wholly unsolvable when world commerce is in its normal course. In times of economic upheaval, with exchange rates rising and falling like a mountain range, with countries depreciating their currencies, with bankruptcies necessitating immense sales of commodities without regard to costs, tariff walls for all practical purposes, built for normal trade conditions and within the limits of reason, simply disappear, and our domestic producer finds himself leaning upon a broken reed. He has no cost figures on which he can reliably base his manufacturing program, and he has no stable market which he can rely upon supplying.

As a revenue measure our present tariff laws are a bitter disappointment in times of need. As a result of the prolonged high-tariff policy the amount of goods imported subject to tariff duties has been reduced to a very small item. The great bulk of our commerce enters our ports free of duty, and those other items on which the high-tariff duties are imposed are very prone to be the ones that will most quickly disappear when the people become pressed financially. Our present tariff base is decidedly too narrow to supply a stable revenue. It is satisfactory in times of prosperity when people with discriminating tastes are willing to buy the imported article at any cost, but it is unsatisfactory when those tastes have been dulled by a crash in the stock market.

It is not necessary to discuss before this Congress the fact that tariff duties are fixed to a greater degree from political influence than from any scientific basis of fact justifying the specific duty involved. This, of course, does not apply to those duties fixed by the Tariff Commission. Instances to illustrate this are too numerous to mention, but the recent oil tariffs will furnish a fair example. The oil industry was divided between those interests owning foreign wells, and those interests whose holdings were wholly domestic. The domestic wells were completely helpless in the face of foreign production. While we might reasonably oppose any tariff on any basic element of industry, such as coal, oil, copper, and so forth, in view of the fact that tariff protection had been granted to practically every other such commodity there was no good reason why American oil ought not receive protection. But the American owners of foreign wells had the political power to defeat this protection, and it was done, leaving many domestic producers to seek their solace in bankruptcy.

In one of our recent tariff bills a duty was imposed upon foreign wool, but high-grade long-staple cotton, which did not have the necessary political influence, was maintained on the free list. In our present tariff bill most of the prominent automobile manufacturers felt themselves perfectly competent to protect themselves in world markets and did not want protection, but the rates were imposed because of the effect on the public mind of leaving this large item out of the benefits which the public supposed tariff protection afforded. Groups that have no just basis for high protective rates unite with other groups in the same situation; trading support, and tariff schedules mount regardless of party platforms or Executive opposition. Presidents Cleveland, Taft, and Hoover all found themselves helpless before this pernicious evil.

Our present system has wholly neglected the welfare of our export trade. We see in the shop windows Japanese-manufactured electric-light bulbs. We go to a banquet and pick up the flag patriotically put in front of every diner's place and note on the pedestal "made in Japan", and we are at once convinced that American trade is being supplanted. The machinery and structural steel and shoes that have been sent to Japan that have been manufactured here at a very substantial profit are out of sight and beyond our ken. We are interested in imports because they come to our personal knowledge, but we know nothing about and have little interest in our export industry, which cannot thrive without imports.

President Hoover on April 15, 1929, said:

> In determining changes in our tariff we must not fail to take into account the broad interests of the country as a whole, and such interests include our trade relations with other countries. It is obviously unwise protection which sacrifices a greater amount of employment in exports to gain a lesser amount of employment from imports.

With our present duties based on political expediency, bloc manipulation, and emotional appeal, at no time is any effort made to supply data on which we can select and advance those industries which are effective, which produce greater profits, and which establish the American wage scale.

These are a few of the weaknesses which have already developed from supplying trade protection through the manipulation of import duties alone. The experience of this present extraordinary session of Congress, I submit, has disclosed other inherent weaknesses which must be removed if any progress is to be made in industrial recovery and reorganization in this country.

We passed an Agricultural Allotment Bill, and discovered that it was necessary not only to delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the questionable constitutional power to increase tariff rates disguised as taxes almost without limit on the products involved in the bill, but we also gave him power over competing products, such as rayon, oleomargarine, and so forth, over which the bill exercised no control. The 6-hour labor bill passed the Senate and was presented to the House. It there developed that to make such a law effective an absolute embargo on foreign manufacturers would be inevitable. In the industrial recovery law we conferred on the Executive embargo powers should he desire to use them. We are considering unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, controlled production, minimum wages, and so forth, and everywhere we are confronted by the ineffectiveness of trade protection based on tariff duties.

What to do about it? We cannot impose an embargo and crawl behind a Chinese wall. A country that contains 6 percent of the world's population, but produces 58 percent of the world's corn, 52 percent of its cotton, 34½ percent of its coal, 46½ percent of its copper, and has manufacturing capacity varying from 15 to 20 percent in excess of domestic consumption cannot impose an absolute embargo because by so doing it will also destroy our export trade, and we will have to produce at such a tremendously reduced efficiency that our whole social and industrial system will be turned back at least a century.

We speak hopefully of reciprocity treaties, but in the last 100 years, although we have made repeated efforts, we have never been able to negotiate a single reciprocity treaty with a real competitor. If the treaty affords an advantage to us the competitor will not agree, and if the treaty provisions are the reverse we have shown no disposition to act as Santa Claus. Our three reciprocity treaties to date have been with Canada, Hawaii, and Cuba, our neighbors and friends, not our commercial rivals.

In 1929 we declared war on the world with the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. The last report shows that as a result of that bill $1,220,000,000 of American capital has gone abroad to build branch factories, employing 330,000 foreign laborers. This does not include investments in single factory units of less than $50,000 and does not include independent investments not associated as branch units of American plants. Neither does it include those concerns who for reasons of their own refused to report their factory plant investments. The total of all this would be very much greater than the figure submitted.

The whole world has built around us retaliatory tariff walls from which we as a large creditor Nation must suffer. There is no prospect that these countries which are unfriendly to us and which are obtaining great trade advantages under the present tariff system will become suddenly magnanimous to the country which precipitated the whole trade conflict. Our salvation, if it comes, must be obtained as always in the past, through our own ingenuity and our own efforts.

As a preliminary step toward our own protection might it not at this time be advisable to use the same methods in the control of our import trade that we are contemplating for use in our domestic industrial recovery efforts; that is, to establish a definite import quota with a definite zone in which reasonable competition shall be allowed between foreign and domestic producers and with a broad base on which very much reduced tariff rates shall be levied, thereby supplying a more constant revenue.

A few days ago a resolution was introduced into this House directing the Ways and Means Committee to investigate the advisability of such a plan, it being House Resolution No. 179. The tentative plan proposed is that the Tariff Commission shall submit to the Ways and Means Committee an itemized statement of the amount of the domestic consumption of all articles imported into the United States together with the ratio of domestic production of each item and the total domestic consumption thereof.

The basic facts on which this report can be made are already prepared by the Tariff Commission in its "Economic Analysis of Foreign Trade", which report has not yet been given to the public, but is available to Members of Congress. In the resolution it is recommended that a definite quota limit be placed upon all imports into the United States, said quota representing the difference between the possible domestic production and domestic consumption plus 5 percent of the total domestic consumption. The tariff rates on the import quota permitted, except the 5 percent thereof, is to be fixed solely on a revenue basis; that is, to be fixed at such an amount as will produce the greatest revenue without any ideas of protection whatsoever, and shall include those commodities not produced in the United States at all as well as those which are produced in the United States.

It will be seen that this permitted quota, with the exception of the 5 percent referred to, shall be approximately on a free-trade basis. It is suggested that when the importation of any commodity reaches the last 5 percent of the quota the tariff duties on the first half thereof shall be 50 percent ad valorem at the port of entry, and that the last half shall be taxed 100 percent ad valorem. That when the entire quota, including the 5 percent, shall have been reached, an absolute embargo shall exist, and no further imports permitted. The percentage allowed for the competitive zone as well as the ad valorem duties thereon are purely estimates and will probably need amendment.

Briefly, this system will give the American producer absolute protection within his quota limits. It will furnish a zone constituting 5 percent of the domestic consumption, on which reasonable competition can be maintained between foreign and domestic goods. It will produce a relatively stable revenue on such a broad basis that the effect of economic upheavals will be reduced to a minimum.

By the simple process of observing over a period of years those products which have to rely on the embargo for their protection, those products which cannot compete with foreign producers, even with the 100-percent ad valorem duty, the ineffective, inefficient industries in the United States which are a burden to our whole industrial life, which tend to reduce wages, which handicap our effective and efficient industries in their effort to sell on the world market, can be gradually eliminated over a period of years by increasing the import quota. Capital invested in these industries can be reinvested in profitable ones, and the basis for scientific promotion of our export trade will be laid.

It is, of course, always possible to raise objections to any proposal, and immediately many could be suggested to this one; that is, the foreign producer, taking advantage of the low tariff rates on the permitted quota, could distribute the expense of the high ad valorem rates of the last 5 percent, and in a way nullify the beneficial effect of this competitive zone. However, unless such producer would engage in a dumping enterprise, there would be no inducement for him to sell this last 5 percent unless he were making a profit on that specific quantity, and if he were selling in the American market at a loss he would come under the provision of our antidumping laws. There would also be undoubtedly considerable confusion among the importing countries as to the allotment of the permitted quota, but that would not seem to be a problem which the American Customs Bureau would be called upon to consider. The ship bringing the importation within the quota would be the fortunate entry. If, however, this and many other small problems that might be suggested do furnish some opposition to the contemplated change, the objections are by no means as serious as those raised to our efforts to control the "rugged individualist" in his exercise of unrestricted competition, nor are any of these objections anything to be compared to the objections to our present protective system based upon import duties alone.

This system will be of uniform operation throughout the United States, and political corruption through which campaign contributions of specific industries seeking unfair protection will be removed, and we will have an opportunity at least to develop our own social and industrial legislation behind the protection afforded by the quota system in the way that our commercial and social leaders deem of best interest to the United States.

LOBSTER FISHERIES

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Speaker, I take the opportunity afforded under the privilege of extending my remarks to discuss the lobster fisheries of the United States in general and of the State of Maine in particular. First, let me present a few important basic facts.

(1) UNITED STATES PRODUCTION

The United States production of lobsters was 11,747,694 pounds in 1929, 13,916,042 pounds in 1930, and 12,460,749 pounds in 1931. The value of this production was $3,508,449 in 1929, $3,586,890 in 1930, and $3,010,820 in 1931. (Source: Fishery Industries of the United States.)

(2) 1931 UNITED STATES PRODUCTION BY GEOGRAPHICAL AREAS

The 1931 United States production by geographical areas shows that out of a total production of 12,460,749 pounds valued at $3,010,820, the State of Maine alone produced 7,166,310 pounds valued at $1,633,684. Maine alone produced 57.51 percent of the total 1931 United States production, which demonstrates Maine's special interest. The second largest producer was Massachusetts, with a production of 2,245,753 pounds valued at $627,198. The third largest producer was Rhode Island, producing 1,259,173 pounds at a value of $269,231. The fourth largest producer was New Jersey, producing 653,634 pounds at a value of $167,687. The fifth largest producer was Connecticut, producing 497,494 pounds at a value of $138,168. The sixth largest producer was New York, producing 483,846 pounds at a value of $121,887. The seventh largest producer was New Hampshire, producing 143,289 pounds at a value of $50,151. The eighth largest producer was Delaware, producing 11,250 pounds at a value of $2,814. (Source: Fishery Industries of the United States.)

(3) IMPORTS OF LOBSTERS

The imports of lobsters for consumption in the United States have increased annually since 1927, despite the marked reduction generally in international trade. Combining the importations of fresh and canned lobsters, we find that the imports have been as follows: 8,142,805 pounds in 1927; 8,143,673 pounds in 1928; 10,119,020 pounds in 1929; 11,176,386 pounds in 1930; 11,686,545 pounds in 1931; 13,001,420 pounds in 1932. The value of these imports were $2,677,062 in 1927; $2,275,322 in 1928; $3,168,257 in 1929; $2,890,896 in 1930; $2,991,477 in 1931; and $2,508,948 in 1932. (Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States.)

Imports of lobsters by countries of shipment for calendar year 1932 show that almost all imports of fresh and canned lobsters come from Canada. Canada supplied 10,928,761 of the 11,694,342 pounds of fresh lobsters, and 1,257,550 of the 1,307,078 pounds of canned lobsters, imported into the United States in 1932. (Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States.)

Imports almost equal total United States production. For 1930 the United States production was 13,916,042 pounds and the imports were 11,176,386 pounds; for 1931 the United States production was 12,460,749 pounds and the total imports were 11,686,545 pounds.

Imports are now increasing still further. The imports from Canada for the first 3 months of 1933 were 1,489,864 pounds, as compared to 1,064,578 for the same period in 1932. The total imports for the first quarter of 1933 were 1,936,149 pounds as compared to 1,712,155 pounds for the equivalent period in 1932 (Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce).

(4) SUMMARY OF FACTS

To summarize the statistical, authoritative, and unquestioned facts, we find that: First, Maine produced 57.51 percent of the total 1931 United States production; second, that imports now practically equal United States production; third, that imports have increased annually despite the depression that has reduced general international trade materially; and, fourth, that Canada supplies practically all of the imports.

(5) GENERAL SITUATION TODAY

My concern is primarily the condition of the Maine lobster fisherman, who is involved in one of the hardest struggles in the history of this fishery. Many of the fishermen and their families are actually destitute and on the verge of starvation (evidence, official report of Maine agent of Bureau of Fisheries, dated May 2, 1933). The catches have been small and the prevailing price of about 12 cents a pound (in some localities 10 cents and even 8 cents) does not begin to compensate them for their efforts. Unless the fishermen get relief, they will not be able to equip themselves with much-needed new gear. The buyers have been tiding them along year after year, and they, too, find themselves in no position to do so any longer.

The consensus of opinion of the leading fishermen and dealers is that the present plight is leading directly to certain ruin. With the Canadian lobsters pouring into our markets undeterred, this fate seems all the more inevitable. And the irony of it all is that Canada imposes a tariff on American lobsters! Quick and decisive action is necessary in order to alleviate the present deplorable condition. Under the existing circumstances our fishermen acknowledge their defeat and the futility of attempting to compete with the Canadian fishermen who are operating under the complete protection and assistance of their Government, besides being favored with an apparently inexhaustible supply from unexploited areas. Never before has the call been more urgent for a united and effective act on the part of our Government to rectify immediately the impending disaster.

The "new deal" was to care for "the forgotten man." If there ever was a "forgotten man", it is the Maine lobster fisherman. Knowing, as I do, the situation in which they find themselves; realizing that they must of necessity turn in their hour of distress to their Government, helpless as they are under present conditions, I dedicate myself to turn every stone to be of assistance to these Maine fishermen, than whom there are no finer group of people anywhere in any walk of life. I have a definite, specific plan in mind which I will develop later in detail. In order to help them, and the women and children who comprise their families, I ask the Congress of the United States to aid me in my endeavor to throw around them the assisting and protecting arm of the United States Government.

WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, in an address which he delivered Tuesday night, June 13, over a network of the National Broadcasting Co., and which was released for all newspapers, Congressman FISH, of New York, took it upon himself to castigate our delegates to the World Economic Conference.

In his attempt to treat a most important mission in a facetious manner, he very carelessly selected as a simile a great sporting event, which occurred on a New Year's Day a few years ago in the Rose Bowl, in Pasadena, Calif. In view of the importance of the Conference and in the light of his intimate contact with the sport he mentions, as the once-famed captain of the Harvard team, he might have described the incident with greater accuracy. To this end I wish to admonish him that the particular player who caught the ball and ran the wrong way did not run sufficiently far to make a touch-down for the other side, with which the gentleman from New York credits him. Fortunately, he was tackled outside the goal line by one of his own men. Many experts explained that this almost inexplicable run was due entirely to a kick in the head which the player received just prior to his remarkable reversal.

There is a close analogy in the present situation when we find certain partisan individuals kicking with rare gusto at the heads of our leaders in a desperate hope that they may succeed in upsetting their equilibrium and witness a repetition of this rare phenomenon, whereupon they would sit back in glee, and gloat "I told you so."

IN 60 HOURS OF GENERAL DEBATE THE HOUSE ENACTED PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S ENTIRE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—A REMARKABLE RECORD

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, for many years Congress has been severely criticized by the press and the people generally for taking up too much time in protracted debate and almost interminable discussion of the measures and legislation which have come before it. Some of this criticism has undoubtedly been justified, for in the past single bills have frequently been debated and orated upon for many months while the country has suffered for want of action instead of speech making.

I therefore desire to take this opportunity in the closing hours of our deliberations to point out to the Members of the House and to the country the exceptional and unprecedented record which has been made by the House of Representatives in this regard in this special session of Congress. We have passed more important, far-reaching legislation, and consumed less time in general debate in doing so, than any other Congress in the 150 years of our national history.

Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members of the House and the American people, I have compiled from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a list of the major bills which we have enacted into law and the hours of general debate devoted to each bill, which I will now read. It is probably the most remarkable record of expeditious action ever made by any law-making body in the history of the world.

General debate on major bills

	Passed	Debated
1. H.R. 1491. Emergency banking relief	Mar. 9	40 minutes.
2. H.R. 2820. Maintenance of Government's credit (economy).	Mar. 11	2 hours.
3. H.R. 3341. Permit and tax beer	Mar. 14	3 hours.
4. H.R. 3835. Emergency agricultural relief; farm mortgage relief; and currency issuance and regulation.	Mar. 22	5½ hours.
5. S. 598. Unemployment relief (reforestation)	Mar. 29	3 hours.
6. H.R. 4696. Federal emergency relief	Apr. 21	2 hours.
7. H.R. 5081. Muscle Shoals and Tennessee Valley development.	Apr. 25	6 hours.
8. H.R. 5240. Relief of small-home owners	Apr. 28	1½ hours.
9. H.R. 5480. Supervision of traffic in securities	May 5	5 hours.
10. H.R. 5755. Industrial recovery; public construction; and taxes.	May 26	6 hours.
11. S. 510. National employment system	June 1	3 hours.
12. S. 1580. Railroad reorganization and relief	June 5	3 hours.

Total, 40 hours and 40 minutes.

If we allow an additional 19 hours and 20 minutes consumed in debate on those bills which were also considered under the 5-minute rule, which would be a liberal allowance, there has been but 60 hours consumed in debate on the entire legislative program which has been written into law during this session, a truly remarkable record.

A BALANCED BUDGET VERSUS JUSTICE

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, at the very time that the American people, the American press, American statesmen, and leaders in every walk of life are vigorously protesting against the refusal of our allies to pay their war debt, America is repudiating her own just war debt. In the days when America's ideals, America's standards of justice and right, indeed America's very existence were threatened, those who are now called veterans offered as a token of their patriotism—not gold, not empty phrases, but life itself, in defense of that country and that Government which they loved and in which they had implicit faith. They fought for Americanism. They fought for the right to live, to work, and to be happy. They fought for family and home and jobs; they fought for fairness, for a "new deal" throughout the world.

The theory of American Government, it seems to me, implies a twofold obligation. First, in order that the Government may exist, it is necessary that "we, the people of the United States," bind ourselves together by law and loyalty to uphold and maintain the Government we have established. Second, in order to retain respect for law and to inspire loyalty, it is the duty of our Government, insofar as it is humanly possible, to—establish (and maintain) justice, insure domestic tranquillity, * * * promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty * * *.

In accordance with their inborn sense of duty, these veterans have in times of war offered the "last full measure of devotion." Today the hardships and sufferings of economic depression have fallen heavily on them and on the world. Today they are assailed by enforced idleness, by want, by hunger. Now that we have the opportunity of translating into action our pompous and oft-repeated expressions of gratitude and appreciation, now that we who were the defended are called upon to protect our defenders, we offer them—not justice, not the blessings of liberty, not a new deal—but a balanced Budget!

On the 20th of March there was approved the so-called "Economy Act." Its only justification was its title, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government." To maintain the credit of the Government, we were told, it was necessary to balance the Budget; and to balance the Budget some have been deluded that it was necessary to evict homeless and helpless veterans from hospitals and cast loose on the uncertainties of private charity widows and orphans and war-wrecked soldiers. All this in the name of a balanced Budget! And what is the Budget but an accountant's nightmare? If millions are needed for Government office buildings or for the printing of useless bulletins, who cares about a balanced Budget? If the international banker's bond falls due, who cares about the credit of the United States Government? Indeed, in the last analysis, the credit of the United States Government depends, not upon a column of figures, but upon columns of young men who are willing to fight and live and die for their country, and upon the ranks of American womanhood who nourish and inspire them. It is mockery to speak of balancing the Nation's Budget when the budgets of American families are woefully and cruelly unbalanced. It is brutal to attempt to guarantee the value of the currency in the pockets of the rich by obliterating the income of countless disabled veterans and their wives and children.

Those who have made a friendly gesture toward the veteran, while half-heartedly defending the compromise under consideration, have done so on the ground that this compromise is the "best thing Congress can get!" It is written in the Constitution, "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States", and yet we are now told that that very Congress must sit impotently here while the Executive department tells it what laws it can enact and how they shall be administered; that Congress must stand helplessly aside and watch the promise of the Government to its most precious and oftenest-tried constituents trampled under foot by a ruthless bureaucracy. Yes; this is "the best thing Congress can get", if it is content to abdicate its vested power and abolish by its own action the very function that called it into being. Compromise under any circumstances is another name for cowardice, and is especially repulsive when applied to those who earned the deathless gratitude of this country by offering their lives in its defense.

We are told that any proposal more just and fair to the veteran than this compromise will be vetoed by the President and that as a result we will be kept in session all summer. And this declaration, which I do not question, seems of sufficient importance to some to cause them to cast their votes in favor of a measure that would otherwise not be acceptable to them. That attitude is exactly the same as fearing to vote for a bill which there was a probability the Supreme Court would declare unconstitutional. I cannot reconcile my own sense of right and my own conscience with that attitude. Let us not forget that we are representatives of a people accustomed to being led by men of the caliber of him who said:

> I'll fight it out on this line if it takes all summer.

I have heard of fair-weather friends; but now we are witnessing the desertion of the "friends of the veteran" because of the imminence of sunny weather.

When the so-called "economy bill" was first introduced I stated that in my judgment it was bad legislation, and I voted against it and worked against it. My original position is now vindicated by those who then criticized me most severely. No sooner was it enacted than many of its most ardent supporters began clamoring for its modification and attempting to nullify its provisions. Every day that passes convinces me so much more that the so-called "economy bill" was a blundering injustice. And I believe that the compromise reached by the joint conference adds insult to injury. The whole theory of the bill is fallacious and contrary to the fundamental principles of the Democratic new deal. It is undeniable that any hope of recovery from the depression depends upon an increase in purchasing power, and that the purchasing power can only be increased by planned and unified action on the part of the Federal Government. And yet the effect of this legislation is to reduce the compensation and allowances of veterans to the vanishing point and curtail to a dangerous extent the salaries of Federal employees. That is like whipping the horse to make him get home before he gets tired. The Director of the Budget proposes in this legislation to increase the national income by reducing the income of the individual; to raise the standard of living by destroying the source of livelihood; to fight undernourishment with starvation; to maintain the credit of the Nation by repudiating the moral obligation of the Government to its veterans. That may be politics, but it most certainly is not statesmanship.

My vote in favor of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment will not be a vote against Franklin D. Roosevelt, who ran for the Presidency and was elected upon a platform that said:

> We advocate the full measure of justice and generosity for all war veterans who have suffered disability or disease caused by or resulting from actual service in time of war and for their dependents.

It will be a vote against the Bureau of the Budget which has proposed this "joker" in the new deal. It will be a vote of confidence in the wisdom and justice of the American Government. It will be a vote of gratitude to those who preserved inviolate that Government and the ideals of fairness and equity it represents.

VETERAN'S BENEFITS COMPROMISE

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, in looking back over the record on veterans' legislation for this session, I am content to say that I would not change a single vote I have cast. In fairness to those Members of Congress who voted for the so-called "economy bill", I think it should be said that they were surprised, yes, astonished at the drastic way it was planned to administer it. I felt at the time of its consideration that I could sense the result as inevitably cruel and shocking. I felt then, and feel now, that there is substantial merit in every large class of beneficiaries.

Our party platform declared for 25-percent reduction in the Federal Budget. The ex-service men were willing to make their proportionate contribution toward that saving to the taxpayers. When I offered in the Democratic caucus of the House on March 11 last a proposal to limit reductions on veterans' benefits to that figure a great majority of the Democratic Members accepted it, voted for it, but a few less than two thirds voted to bind on the provision, and it was lost through technicalities of parliamentary procedure. The "economy" bill was accepted on assurance that no injustice would be done. I knew injustice had to be done under such a program and opposed it to the end in the hope of defeating it.

But upon its passage any effort to vary the terms of the Economy Act has to have either the approval of the President and a majority of both Houses of Congress or two thirds of each House to reject a veto.

When H.R. 5389 was amended in the Senate by the inclusion of the Connally amendment the President let it be known that he would disapprove any measure containing its provisions. A special committee named by the House Democratic caucus then entered into direct negotiations with the President to obtain the best possible concessions from him in favor of the veterans. We had extensive and laborious conferences with him.

When the Economy Act went into force and the first regulations were issued over 700,000 disabled veterans and their dependents were eliminated from the Government rolls, and the service-connected who remained were cut approximately 50 percent of the amount they were then receiving.

We feel that we were partially responsible for the liberalization made by the Executive on June 6, which restored the directly service-connected cases to within 18 percent of their former rating. We succeeded in obtaining an extension of benefits in addition to this, which were embodied in the House proposal substituted for the Connally amendment. So we brought back to the House over and above the allowance effective when we opened negotiations for concessions more than $100,000,000 per year in additional benefits to disabled men and their dependents.

The Connally amendment did more for the Spanish War Veterans who have no service connection, than does the House proposal. But it is quite debatable whether the World War presumptives were included in it. It is certain that it did not include 36,000 widows and other dependents of deceased World War veterans who had been separated from the rolls by the Economy Act, and who are restored by the House provision with full pay.

When the plan reached by the President and our committee was sent to the Senate there was substituted for it the Steiwer amendment, which did not differ materially from the House provision, except that it restored the Spanish War men to the rolls with three fourths of their original pay. The provisions as to presumptive cases will amount to the same if administered with any regard to the language or intent of Congress.

The President announced positively through the majority leader of the Senate that he would veto the bill if the Steiwer amendment were left in it. The vote in the Senate was official notice that his veto would be sustained. As one who puts the cause of the disabled service man second to nothing in the way of legislative obligation, I was faced with the positive barrier of a sustained veto if I stood for the Steiwer amendment, or with further insistence on the House provisions we could certainly have by standing against the Senate. There was no assurance of liberalization beyond present regulations if the bill failed. Had we forced a Presidential veto by standing for the Steiwer amendment, as much as I would prefer it, we would have pushed back the cause of the disabled soldiers of all wars 10 or more years. I disagree with the President on some positions he takes which I feel will take away benefits from many worthy cases. I heartily agree with him that some unworthy cases should be purged from the rolls. But when I face a condition in which I must take part of something or all of nothing for those who are suffering, I do not hesitate to accept the former. That is why I begged my colleagues in the Democratic caucus yesterday to accept all we could get short of a veto. Without any criticism of those who stood out for the most benefits, for it was my desire to get them, I give it as my deliberate opinion that those who stood for the House provision voted for the maximum it was possible to obtain, and rendered an invaluable service to the disabled man's cause by averting an open breach with our great and popular President, with whom they were constrained to differ on one issue. It was not an action under threat of a veto. It was facing realities about which there could be no doubt. The President is firm in his convictions, and this Nation loves and trusts him. There will be other times. Congress will be back in January next. I have no doubt the injustices will be so apparent then that the President will request any power necessary to treat these men in a way commensurate with national gratitude for sacrifices made in our common cause.

I give you again what we feel has been accomplished over the Economy Act by the most recent effort:

The presumptives, who were all to be cut off July 1, are left on the rolls at three fourths of their present rating a sufficient time for them to have a hearing before an independent board to determine their rights to service connection, independent of clinical findings or medical opinion but in the light of all evidence offered, with every reasonable doubt resolved in favor of the veteran and the burden of proof on the Government to show he is not entitled to it.

The directly service connected are restored from drastically low cuts to within 18 percent of the amount they were receiving, with a limitation of 25-percent reduction on any case.

The limitation of 90 days' service is removed, as such a provision is unjustified if a service connection is shown. The 36,000 widows and orphans and other dependents of World War veterans are restored to full allowance from nothing.

All total and permanent cases not service connected are raised from $20 to $30 per month.

All service-connected Spanish War cases are raised to the amount allowed the same class of World War cases.

All Spanish War veterans over 62 are raised from $6 to $15 on age alone.

All Spanish War veterans between 55 and 62 who are 50 percent disabled and need it will receive not less than $15.

These additional benefits, as said before, amount to more than $100,000,000. So we feel our efforts have not been in vain. It is not all that is required to do full justice. I have a deep sympathy for Spanish War men who entered and served under a pension system then in existence which they thought they had a right to rely on, but who now find themselves called upon to show service connection, and their evidence destroyed or in the grave, and required to establish by proof a condition of poverty. I sympathize with the World War man who knows his trouble was brought on by his service, yet tried to fight his battle of life without the help of his Government, until all reasonable presumptions and time have run against him. He accepted the disability allowance provided and was content to waive the greater benefits of the service-connected class. It is a hard rule that says to him this $12 is being paid to him wrongfully, and he has been receiving money for no just claim. It is surprising how many of these disability-allowance claims are to men who from the early months after discharge have been trying to show service-connection, and their claim has been defeated because of the technical requirements of regulations.

The bitter fight waged in the past few days is a testimonial to the fact that the National Economy League does not control the Membership in Congress, and the service men have loyal friends on whom they can rely. I hope my buddies will not measure the friendship of Members by one vote. Some of their best friends voted for the "economy" bill, believing all worthy cases would be protected. Because of their loyalty in the past, and their disposition to right the wrongs as far as conditions would permit in the last few days, they should be judged by a record of years, and not by an isolated act done in the face of impending national collapse.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, in declaring my unalterable opposition to the bill now before the House, it is unnecessary for me to dwell at length upon the sins of commission or omission that are now in the similar Norris bill pending before the Senate and that were in the original Hill bill prior to the amendments adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs. As a prime example, however, of the pernicious features of these bills I shall mention the absence of any provision for the protection of labor employed in the enormous projects envisaged. By the original language of this bill and of the Norris bill the very face of a great part of the Nation could have been changed by labor employed without a specified minimum-wage scale, possibly working under conditions similar to those in Soviet Russia which have shocked the world. By amending section 3, however, the committee at least removed this danger by requiring wages to be paid at the prevailing rate, and in accordance with classification service, any questions to be determined by the Secretary of Labor.

I do not cite this in order to recommend the amended bill, but merely to indicate the general character of the legislation that is proposed to meet this long-standing national problem of Muscle Shoals. Other improvements were made in it, but it still remains inherently a dangerous measure. H.R. 5081 largely ignores or vitiates the purposes of section 124 of the National Defense Act, under whose authority Muscle Shoals was constructed, and by virtue of which the problem has heretofore been considered as one of national defense appropriate for action by the Committee on Military Affairs. This bill is not a national defense bill. It is, to a large measure, rather, a power bill, a basically new proposition contrasting with the Muscle Shoals bills referred to it in the past.

Under the filmy veil of the acknowledged governmental functions of navigation and flood control, we had masked provisions for placing the Federal Government in the power and fertilizer business, in competition with enterprises legitimately established by its private citizens. Undeniably there is not a single logical trace of connection between our Government and these industries, which circumstance and the authors of the bill have singled out as suitable objects for Government intervention. If we may do this at present merely to dispose of the Muscle Shoals problem, then we may expect our Government further to engage in commerce and industry to an extent that may represent a surrender of our individualistic system of government and an acceptance of the doctrines enunciated by Karl Marx in Das Kapital. The issue is clear cut beyond the possibility of equivocation.

This bill does, indeed, place the Government in two businesses, in addition to 41 others in which the Government has been found to be in competition with private enterprise, according to a report published in pursuance of a resolution of the Seventy-second Congress. But it does not place it in business in a businesslike manner. No testimony was heard by the committee as to the actual economic value of the proposed Government operations at Muscle Shoals. There is no mention of it in the majority report. To be sure, they amended subsection (k) of section 4 to provide that, with the exception of Cove Creek and Dam No. 3, future construction will be conditioned upon power market conditions and that they will not be undertaken except after satisfactory contracts have been made to provide for their self-liquidation. But the fact remains that neither the committee nor Congress has any adequate data concerning the actual economics of what it is proposed the Government shall do. All we know is the tragic experiences of other samples of Government operation in the past. And we know, too, as an unwritten law of government, that whenever optional authority is granted to an agency of the Government, that authority will be exercised to the limit, regardless of the merits of the option.

Let us look at section 28. The President is directed to recommend legislation in conformity with the following purposes:

(1) The maximum amount of flood control, (2) the maximum development of said Tennessee River and its tributaries for navigation purposes, (3) the maximum generation of electric power consistent with flood control and navigation, (4) the proper use of marginal lands, (5) the proper method of reforestation of all lands in said drainage basin suitable for reforestation, (6) the most practical method of improving agricultural conditions in the valleys of said drainage basin, and (7) the economic and social well-being of the people living in said river basin and all adjacent territories.

Here are proposals affecting several departments and bureaus of the Government. Yet not one word of testimony from officials or representatives of any of the departments or bureaus affected was delivered to the committee either in public or private hearings. How then can we vote on such a proposition merely because we like the sound of the phrases without knowing their meaning?

But most sinister of all, most concealed from accurate appraisal, most insidious, is section 27. Here, under the mask of a benevolent paternalism, hidden in grandiloquent verbiage, we may discover the visions of a program so vast and so vague—so costly without limit—that it is likely to increase the bonded indebtedness of the Nation by unthinkable billions of dollars, that it may ultimately impair the credit of the Government to a greater extent than might an unsuccessful major war. I cite, first, section 29:

That all appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act are hereby authorized.

Fantastic! I cite again, this time from section 15 of the Norris bill:

In connection with any future dam, steam plant, or other facility, to be used in whole or in part for the generation of hydroelectric power, the board, if directed to do so by the President of the United States, shall issue its bonds for the payment in part or in full of that part of said development that is allocated to the production of hydroelectric power.

Is this power or national defense?

Now, let us see what some of the provisions of the bill are as set forth in section 27:

To aid further the proper use, conservation, and development of the natural resources of the Tennessee Drainage Basin and of such adjoining territory as may be related or materially affected by the developments consequent to this act, and to provide for the general welfare of citizens of said areas the President is hereby authorized by such means or methods as he may deem proper within the limits of appropriations made therefor by Congress to make such surveys of and general plans for said Tennessee Basin and adjoining territory as may be useful to the Congress and to the several States in guiding and controlling the extent, sequence, and nature of development that may be equitably and economically advanced through the expenditure of public funds or through the guidance or control of public authority, all for the general purposes of fostering an orderly and proper physical, economic, and social development of said areas.

What can this language mean? It was not revealed to us in any of the hearings. The President has not declared himself as to how far a government may go in fostering the social development of people. But this bill already covers 6 to 10 States, depending upon the interpretation of the expression "adjoining territories." We have been hearing the figure of $1,000,000,000 as a conservative figure for the cost which the people of the entire country will have to bear. And how many other regions are there between our two coasts for which a like plan may be offered? How shall we know where to stop once we have spent our first billion on this vague but sweeping philanthropy? Would $5,000,000,000 be enough to pay for it? Would ten? These things we do not know, but if we pass this bill with this language in it we are merely saying that it does not matter, that a Garden of Eden will be made to bloom from coast to coast without embarrassment to our credit or the enslavement of posterity under a fearful yoke of debt.

Up to this point I have been calling the attention of the House to the more general features and implications of the bill and of the way in which it has been drafted and considered. All that I have said applies with equal or greater force to the Norris bill. Now I propose to show some of the specific factual problems and difficulties that may reasonably be expected to result from the passage of this bill despite the changes we introduced—the economic waste, the ruthless devaluation by congressional fiat of private property in hundreds of millions of dollars, the possible disruption of two industries vital to the national welfare, and disposition of a public investment in a manner most likely to entail ultimate loss to the taxpayer.

Now, as to the power provisions of the bill, section 11 authorizes the board to sell surplus power not used in its operations to States, counties, municipalities, corporations, partnerships, or individuals for periods not to exceed 20 years, giving preference to States, counties, municipalities, and cooperative nonprofit associations of citizens or farmers. Contracts with private individuals may be canceled upon 5 years' notice if necessary to supply the requirements of States, counties, and municipalities. Section 12 declares it the policy of the Government to sell all surplus power equitably among States, counties, and municipalities within transmission distance.

Obviously power could not be sold to towns 400 miles distant without the use of transmission lines. Section 13, therefore, provides that, failing satisfactory contracts for the distribution and resale of power, the board is authorized to construct or lease or authorize the construction of transmission lines within a maximum transmission distance of 400 miles, with the approval of the President and if economically justified and necessary. The sale to industry is declared to be only secondary and merely for the purpose of making possible, by increasing the volume of consumption, lower rates to domestic and rural consumers. It is further provided that any States, municipalities, counties, and cooperative nonprofit organizations that may build their own transmission lines and that propose to sell power without discrimination between consumers of the same class, the board may contract with them for a period not exceeding 30 years.

What do these sections mean? They mean that the Government is to engage in the power business for retail sale, regardless of the costs of producing and distributing that power, regardless of the prevailing market prices for power in the area, regardless of the existing surplus capacity of the existing facilities to the tune of 400,000 horsepower. It means that, willy-nilly, the taxpayer becomes party, at his own expense, to the possible destruction of private enterprice in which is invested some $400,000,000 in the six Southern States affected. To be sure the power industry is unpopular and suspect. Therefore it must be subjected to close supervision and regulation. But the 37,000 holders of preferred stock in these companies, most of them consumer customers, should not be the target of punitive legislation; nor should the thousands of bondholders in these States. Already, since it was announced that the Government would be launched into this socialistic adventure, the price of their holdings has declined rapidly. President Roosevelt himself expressed views in harmony with this viewpoint in a speech before the Conference of Governors at French Lick, Ind., in July 1931:

> State-owned or Federal-owned power sites can and should properly be developed by Government itself. When so developed, private capital should be given the first opportunity to transmit and distribute the power on the basis of the best service and the lowest rates to give a reasonable profit.

I cannot believe that the President has turned away from this just and unassailable attitude. Yet, where in this bill is any provision to protect the private companies? Why, if the bill is not a menace to them, have their securities dropped since the bill was first published? Because it threatens them, not with a new source of cheap power to sell, but with the complete destruction of their market, without which asset their entire physical property becomes nearly worthless.

Moreover, the prevailing power rates in the South have dropped, under public regulation, to a level far beneath the national average. They are now low and uniform, without discrimination against the rural consumer as against the urban centers. Why, then, invite States, counties, municipalities, and cooperative organizations to come to Muscle Shoals for this additional surplus of 400,000 horsepower that will probably be sold at a loss to the Government—to come, if they choose, with their own transmission lines?

Will the Muscle Shoals actually produce power more cheaply than do the privately operated systems? It is asserted that it will cut the cost in half. There has been presented to the Committee on Military Affairs an abundance of competent testimony to the effect that the project will be economically unsound if it is to serve an extended area. But let us read what Thomas A. Edison had to say about it in an interview with Samuel Crowther, published in the Saturday Evening Post:

> We shall steadily require more power; but a great deal more fuss is being made over hydroelectric power than its intrinsic value warrants. The first and best source of power is coal. The amount of coal available is not limitless, but for all practical purposes it is limitless. We can probably use coal at our present rate for a thousand years or so without any danger of exhausting our supply, and it is highly improbable that we really know our supply.
> Water power is a political issue, not a business one. It can never at the best mean very much to us, except as something to talk about. The monopolizing of water power is also just a political idea. The rates are fixed at any point by the cost of generating power from steam. A private monopoly which was foolish enough to put in high rates would only bankrupt itself, for no one would buy the power. There is far more danger in public monopoly than there is in private monopoly, for when the Government goes into business it can always shift its losses to the taxpayers. If it goes into the power business, it can pretend to sell cheap power and then cover up its losses.
> The Government never really goes into business, for it never makes ends meet. And that is the first requisite of business. It just mixes a little business with a lot of politics, and no one ever gets a chance to find out what is actually going on. I feel so strongly on the Government keeping out of business that if I had my way the post office would be privately managed by contract; all the Government should have is an efficient inspection bureau.

I shall not burden the House with the mass of statistics available with regard to the present surplus capacity of the privately operated fertilizer industry. It is sufficient to supply both our peace-time and maximum war-time needs. The industry as a whole has lost, since 1921, $300,000,000 to $350,000,000 owing to the collapse of prices and the excess of production over consumption. Why, then, should we give the coup de grâce to an industry which is fighting for its life, and which has usefully served us for decades in educating the farmer and advancing the science of soil efficiency? Here, again, we propose to destroy private initiative at the ultimate expense of the taxpayer.

In conclusion, let me quote the minority views on the present bill:

> It will be seen that the bill effectually conceals its real purposes and aims and commits the country to the expenditure of vast sums of money, the amount of which can only be imagined, and at a time when agriculture and industry are prostrate and our citizens staggering under the burden of governmental debts, even though this gigantic project will probably be financed by the sale of Government bonds—thereby adding to our large national debt.

COURTESIES EXTENDED BY THE SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Speaker, in these closing hours of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress I desire to express my appreciation of the many courtesies extended by our beloved Speaker, by the distinguished leaders of both sides of the House, and by the Members generally.

This has been a strenuous session not only for those of us who are serving our first term but for the seasoned Members as well.

When we convened on March 9 we were told by our President that an emergency existed; that a crisis was impending; that bankruptcy and insolvency faced the Nation. Since then we have enacted much emergency legislation to meet this situation. By an overwhelming majority we voted for a measure to maintain the credit of the United States Government. By that act we gave to the President the authority he desired when he said:

> If the Congress chooses to vest me with this responsibility, it will be exercised in a spirit of justice to all, sympathy to those who are in need, and of maintaining inviolate the basic welfare of the United States.

We have supported the President; we have labored earnestly and honestly; we have compromised differences, the paramount purpose being to relieve unemployment, aid agriculture, encourage industry, stabilize banking, eliminate waste and extravagance, and improve conditions generally. We have done what we thought was for the best interest of the entire Nation, and we can only hope that the laws passed at this session will prove wise and profitable. If mistakes have been made, they were of the head and not of the heart.

No doubt there are conditions in each and every measure enacted that some of us would have otherwise, but all legislation is a matter of compromise. I, for one, am not satisfied with the veterans' program. My personal feeling is that we cannot do too much for the disabled veteran, or for the widows and orphans of those who made the supreme sacrifice, and I am convinced that the regulations issued under the authority of the "Act to maintain the credit of the United States Government" are entirely too drastic, and that they are causing severe and unnecessary hardships to many of our service-connected disabled veterans.

We must treat our disabled veterans with fairness and consideration. We must not allow them to become charges upon local and State governments. Their relief is a Federal obligation. These men did not go to war and risk their lives and their health for any particular community, but for the whole United States; therefore, the cost of caring for them, when in distress, should be borne by all and distributed equably and equitably over all sections of this great land.

The apparent saving of some three hundred million dollars effected by these recent regulations is actually no saving at all. It is merely shifting the load from the main structure where it belongs to some of the weaker outbuildings that were not designed to carry it. It is transferring the burden from the Federal Government, where it does belong, to local communities, where it does not belong.

I believe I have more veterans in my district than are in any other congressional district of the United States. They come to southern California on account of the climatic conditions, hoping to regain their health. I am advised by the chairman of our board of county supervisors that the additional burden placed upon the taxpayers of San Diego County, due to the drastic regulations affecting disabled veterans, will be $1,920,000 per year, and this does not include provision which must be made for increased cost of operating our county medical institutions, due primarily to the laws of the use of the class A, United States naval hospital situated in San Diego, with its up-to-date equipment and adequate room to care for veteran patients.

Since Federal orders were issued that veterans would not be cared for at the naval hospital our county hospital load has increased on an average of 10 percent daily. I quote from a letter received from the chairman of the board of county supervisors as follows:

The denying of the use of the facilities of the naval hospital here is throwing a tremendous added burden upon the community and our county, together with the drastic slashing of monetary benefits which we are not prepared to meet. The limited facilities of the county hospital cannot begin to care for the veteran patients of this county, and the local naval hospital, with its adequate space and up-to-date equipment, must stand closed to the veteran, who, regardless of the seriousness of his condition, must comply with Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, and endeavor to gain admittance to a hospital 150 miles away.

I realize that economy in government is essential, and I am opposed to extravagance and waste in the administration of governmental affairs, whether it be local, State, or Federal, and I believe that many economies can be effected in the administration of veterans' affairs without materially or drastically reducing the benefits in worthy cases. Also, I am opposed to paying exorbitant pensions to those who suffered no injury or disability as a result of their war service, many of whom are employed at good salaries, some enjoying lucrative positions, and others provided for with adequate incomes.

On June 7 I introduced in the House H.R. 5966, which seeks to correct some of the many injustices arising from the passage of the "Act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", and, yet, effects a reasonable economy in veterans' benefits. This bill is in the form of a compromise, and provides that notwithstanding any of the provisions of the original act in no event shall World War service-connected disability compensation of any veteran, or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War, or the pension of any widow, or the dependents of such veterans, allowed prior to March 15, 1933, whether allowed upon direct service connection, a presumption of service connection, or otherwise, be reduced more than 20 percent of the rate being received prior to March 15.

I sincerely regret that the bill I introduced did not receive favorable action at this session, as I firmly believe that if enacted into law it would go a long way toward alleviating the havoc and mental anguish caused our service-connected disabled veterans, their widows, and their dependents by the orders and regulations emanating from the original bill. However, I submit to the superior judgment of my colleagues at all times.

I stated during the last campaign that if elected to Congress I would support the administration in all worth-while legislation having to do with the welfare of the Nation, regardless of which political party was in power, in an earnest and honest endeavor to hasten better times and bring about enduring prosperity. This I have endeavored to do consistently and conscientiously.

We will have an opportunity during the next 6 months to observe the workings of the most gigantic relief measures ever enacted by any Congress or any nation. I sincerely hope that much good will result, and that when we return to Congress in January the wheels of industry may be moving swiftly and the depressed condition of this country changed into one of happiness and full faith in the future. The outcome will be awaited by all with eager interest.

STATUS OF SUITS BROUGHT BY THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, in 1924 jurisdictional bills were enacted by Congress to permit the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma to bring suits against the Government of the United States in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, upon any claim which the tribes might have against the Government. By amendatory legislation the time within which suits might be filed was extended to June 30, 1930.

Before the expiration of this time there were filed on behalf of the Five Civilized Tribes by their attorneys, under contracts approved in accordance with the provisions of the several acts, the following cases:

CHEROKEE NATION

There have been filed on behalf of the Cherokee Nation nine suits, as follows:

1. Clifton Roll case: Cherokee Nation v. United States, in the Court of Claims, no. H-47, involving $436,803.36, with interest at 5 percent.

2. Too Late Baby case, no. J-8: This suit is to test the constitutionality of the act of April 26, 1906, under which a new roll of additional people was made and to whom allotments were given, and involves the sum of $8,915,160.20, with interest at 5 percent.

3. Freedmen case, no. K-17, involving the right of the Cherokee freedmen to land and money, the claim being for $10,638,559. The demurrer of the Government in this case was sustained, and a motion for rehearing has been filed and is pending in the Court of Claims.

4. Trust Fund, no. L-46: This claim is for $669,893.05, with interest at 5 percent to June 30, 1926, for money alleged to have been unlawfully paid out of trust funds of the Cherokees.

5. Suit no. L-174: (1) For the Eastern Cherokees and (2) for the Western Cherokees. The petition in this case contains two counts: (a) For and on behalf of the Eastern Cherokees, involving a restatement of interest amounting to $2,653,596.12; and (b) for the benefit of the Western Cherokees, involving a restatement of interest amounting to $362,687.01. Under the act of Congress of April 25, 1932, two additional suits were filed by the attorneys representing these two tribes.

6. Suit no. L-257: This claim is for shortage of land, and is for a balance of 575,082.23 acres of land described in the Cherokee patent of 1838, which has not been accounted for.

7. Suit no. L-266: This claim is for land embraced in the "outlet" and "promised", as stated in the first article of the treaty of 1846, or approximately 3,000,000 acres, which, at $1.25 per acre, would amount to $3,750,000.

8. Suit no. L-267: This suit has two counts: (1) Claim for money paid to intermarried whites, with interest from date of payment at 5 percent, $69,000; and (2) claim for money paid for intruder improvements, $250,000.

9. Suit no. L-268: General accounting petition challenging many items erroneously expended from tribal funds.

The following information, secured from Frank J. Boudinot, one of the attorneys for the Cherokee Nation, explains the status of the above-mentioned claims:

NO. H-47, THE CLIFTON ROLL CASE, SO-CALLED

This case was set for argument at the April 1933 call of the calendar. However, Mr. Frank K. Nebeker, attorney of record in that suit, found that certain facts, recorded or on file at the Muskogee office and not here, and deemed to be necessary to have, were not in evidence. Consequently, Mr. Nebeker secured postponement of the trial until this evidence might be obtained. This is in process of being done.

NO. J-8, THE TOO LATE BABY CASE, SO-CALLED

Government attorneys have demurred to the petition in this case. The demurrer is still pending, the understanding being that it will not be disposed of, not heard, until a motion for a rehearing on the demurrer, sustained by the court some time ago in the Freedman case (no. K-17), has been argued and decided.

NO. K-17, THE FREEDMAN CASE, SO-CALLED

The Government demurred to the petition in this case and the demurrer was sustained. A motion for a rehearing has been filed and briefed, but has not yet been argued before the court.

NO. L-46, AN ACCOUNTING CASE (TRUST FUNDS)

The Government's attorneys are not willing to proceed in this case until the General Accounting Office has filed its report. I have been advised by that Office that the report will be completed and filed by September 1, 1933.

NO. L-174, "EASTERN" AND "WESTERN" CHEROKEES, INTEREST CASE

Frank J. Boudinot is attorney of record in this case. I am now preparing request for findings of fact, without waiting for General Accounting Office report. Senator Owen and Mr. Houston B. Teehee, attorneys for the Eastern and Western Cherokees, have suits pending for these claims, under the act of April 25, 1932, nos. 42077 and 42078. I may state that these suits will undoubtedly be brought to trial and final disposition next fall.

The remaining suits filed will have to wait for the General Accounting Office report.

CREEK NATION

The attorneys for the Creek Nation employed under the provisions of the Jurisdictional Act, prior to June 30, 1930, instituted 15 suits involving large amounts of money, which have heretofore been reported in detail to the Creek Tribe at its various conventions.

Preparation has been made by E. J. Van Court and his associates for the trial of all of these cases, both as to law and fact, the claims have been carefully audited, and the attorneys representing the Creek Nation are prepared, as soon as the Government is ready, to submit all of these cases. Because of the large number of cases brought on behalf of the members of all of the Five Civilized Tribes, delays have been occasioned in securing reports from the Indian Bureau in a number of them. Reports have been made in some of the cases, others are in course of preparation, and it is hoped that reports will have been made in all of them during the coming fiscal year.

In the meantime a judgment has been rendered in the Court of Claims in behalf of the Creek Nation, in what is known as the "Boundary case", in the sum of $86,823.19. The time for appeal by the Government to the Supreme Court of the United States has not yet expired.

There have also been argued two other cases, no. H-510, the Creek accounting suit, and no. L-168, the Alabama Reservation case, and these two cases are under advisement by the court.

In these three cases, and in other cases, many of the questions of law have been argued and submitted to the court.

The long-delayed General Accounting Office report was filed last June 1932, which permitted the attorneys to try the case no. H-510.

SEMINOLE NATION

It is hoped that the accounting reports in the Seminole cases will be forthcoming in the near future, which will permit the attorneys for the Seminole Nation, E. J. Van Court and associates, to try several of their cases during the fall term, 1933, of the court.

The attorneys for each of the Five Civilized Tribes had, from the time of the enactment of the original jurisdictional acts in 1924 up to June 30, 1930, within which to make a complete and exhaustive investigation of all the records pertaining to the respective tribes, prepare the petitions, have accountants audit the claims, and prepare for trial. The attorneys for the Government insist that they must have time to recheck the records and to have their auditors go over them and examine each claim in order to properly represent the Government in these cases.

In addition to the suits brought on behalf of the Five Civilized Tribes, a large number of other suits have been brought on behalf of other Indian tribes, and the Indian Bureau contends that every effort is being made not to delay the Government's audit of these claims, and that they are being expedited as rapidly as possible.

I have been keeping in touch with the attorneys who represent the Five Civilized Tribes and have urged that the cases be expedited. All of the attorneys insist that the cases should be tried during the coming fiscal year, and that by June 30, 1934, all of them should have been tried in the Court of Claims.

I have secured all of the legislation recommended as necessary for the determination of these cases.

MARCH 31, 1932.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: I hand you herewith a copy of our brief on the Government's demurrer in the Cherokee Freedmen case which you have been good enough to freely and helpfully advise me about.

I regret to have had to make this brief so lengthy, but exceedingly important questions are involved, and I hope to get a decision by the court on this demurrer which will practically settle the case.

I took the liberty of quoting quite freely from one of your very able and excellent briefs filed for the Cherokees some years ago. I think your argument is as unanswerable now as it was then.

I wish to take advantage of this occasion to express the very deep appreciation of my associates, and particularly of myself, of the great and intelligent service you have so frequently rendered for and on behalf of our clients, the Cherokees. Speaking personally and from an extensive knowledge, I wish to say that the Cherokees and all of the Indians of our county have never had a more loyal and helpful friend in our Congress than you have proven yourself to be upon all occasions. You have been strong in your advocacy for justice and fair dealings with the Indians, and have always protested strongly against any injustice and wrongs which have been done the Indians, particularly the Cherokees and the other Indians of your State. I have a sense of personal gratitude to you for the services you have rendered my clients and take advantage of this occasion to express it.

Very sincerely yours, C. C. CALHOUN.

APRIL 12, 1932.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Representing the Cherokees, I have been in Washington continuously since you were first elected to Congress and desire not only to agree with the statements made by Mr. Calhoun but to further state in my own behalf that it has been through your efforts that we have been able to secure the enactment of legislation through which the claims of the Cherokees, in nine suits, are now pending in the Court of Claims, and to say that no one could have been more loyal or rendered at all times more effective service. You have secured for us all of the legislation required to present these claims to the court.

Yours very truly,

FRANK J. BOUDINOT.

When these cases shall have all been tried and final judgments rendered, any amounts found due the respective tribes will be certified to Congress for an appropriation and will be available for distribution per capita among those found by the court entitled to share the same.

It has been a long struggle, but all of these cases have been filed, and certainly we may express the confident hope that they will all be tried during the coming fiscal year ending June 30, 1934.

SAVINGS AND EXPENDITURES OF THE SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, at this time I feel that the people should be informed of the progress that has been made at Washington toward saving and spending money. I feel that these savings which should be counted are those that are sure to come. Those items where consolidations have been made, where an extra overhead will be superimposed, and where no saving will be made in all probability, I have left out.

Total savings

Veterans' Bureau	$292,000,000
Salary cuts	100,000,000
Army	20,000,000
Navy	10,000,000
Agricultural provisions of Executive order of June 10	6,000,000
	428,000,000

The Veterans' Bureau savings totaled $410,000,000 before the changes made by the Executive orders of June 6, 1933, and the amendment to the Economy Act contained in the independent offices appropriation bill. I do not count the $50,000,000 by which that bill reduces the annual appropriations to amortize the bonus certificates, because that is not a saving but a postponement.

I have not included the savings for the Post Office Department, because none of the basic changes necessary to save the $75,000,000 which has been estimated by the administration have been made, nor is there any prospect that any will be made. I have included the savings which can result from the Executive order of June 10. I have been very liberal in that and am certain that the procurement division means simply imposition of extra overhead.

The Veterans' Bureau figures I have shown above shows a slight difference, $8,000,000, from the figures which I have previously given. This is due to the fact that the clerks of the Appropriations Committee estimated the result of the Senate amendment on veterans as it was finally agreed to a little different than I estimated it on Saturday last.

As against these savings we have the following increases in expenditures:

1. The so-called "labor camps" set up under the "Sapling Act" by which it was proposed to people to work for $1 a day	$250,000,000.00
2. The Wagner-Costigan dole to States	500,000,000.00
3. The third deficiency bill	1,408,451.13
4. The fourth deficiency bill	3,613,079,167.74
	4,364,487,618.87

Of these items, every single one is an appropriation, except as hereinafter outlined.

Every single one is an increase over previous appropriations. The outstanding items included are:

For public works	$3,300,000,000
Farm-loan and home-loan banks	115,000,000
Bank-guaranty fund	150,000,000
Wagner-Costigan dole (is not directly an appropriation, but it is a loan not to be paid back by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, so that it amounts to the same thing as a gift charged against the Treasury)	500,000,000
The net result of these operations is	4,065,000,000

The item of $250,000,000 under the "Sapling Act" is being spent in a most riotous way. From one town in New Jersey three trains of Pullman cars went out to carry the boys to Idaho. Riding around in Pullmans, when the same money would relieve five times the distress in the cities, is ridiculous. Countless thousands of officers and supervisors of these people are included.

We have a total for expenditures of	$4,065,000,000
We have a total possible savings of	428,000,000
Net increase	3,637,000,000

In addition to this legislation there are authorizations for appropriations amounting to:

To start the Domestic Allotment Act in operation	$100,000,000
Provision which will add probably $60,000,000 to our interest charge to carry out the provisions of the Farm Mortgage Act	60,000,000
Like provision for Home Mortgage Act	60,000,000
Additional authorization for the Tennessee Valley Authority, alias Muscle Shoals	50,000,000
To subscribe for preferred stock in insurance companies to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation	50,000,000
For Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan money to closed banks, savings banks, and building-and-loan associations	300,000,000
Total authorizations	620,000,000

These figures must probably be added to what will be spent during the fiscal year 1934. The Treasury bonds outstanding increased since the 4th of March at the approximate rate of $400,000,000 per month. This rate probably will be increased and the Budget will be unbalanced beyond the wildest dreams.

THE "BAKER'S DOZEN" AT WORK

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, when the Members of the Seventy-third Congress came to Washington for the inauguration, they were unofficially informed that they would be called back about the 1st of April for an extraordinary session. Most of them threw a few shirts and collars in a suitcase and came to Washington for the inaugural ceremonies expecting to return home in a few days.

Many of us remember the emotional and mental attitude of the people when the announcement was made that Hobson sank the Merrimac in Santiago Harbor. We also remember the mingled feeling and the excitement that followed the sinking of the Lusitania during the World War. Those were crucial and dark hours in the Nation's history.

However, I dare say that those hours were not so dark as the hours following the 4th day of March 1933, when it was discovered that the financial structure of the Nation had been broadsided with 16-inch guns to such an intense degree that it was necessary for the President to declare the bank holiday to save not only the little depositors but the entire financial fabric of the Nation.

This was the first of the many creative and constructive measures of our new administration and of our leader, President Roosevelt. This measure was followed during the next 14 weeks by other measures enacted by a Congress that were inspired and prompted solely on the basis of conserving and saving our national resources and credit.

It was most encouraging to a young Congressman to hear an older Member of the House say that the Members of the Seventy-third Congress had more courage and showed more initiative, purposeful activity, and willingness to sacrifice their own personal interests that the Nation might be again restored to prosperity than any of the former sessions he had sat in during his 20 some years of service.

In the 14 weeks referred to Congress spread upon the statute books a "baker's dozen" of administrative measures that embodies initiative and creative activities of a greater magnitude than any other similar measures ever enacted by a Congress. The people made up their minds that the old, boss-ridden governmental procedure that had plunged them into the most bottomless pit of depression must be thrown overboard, and they immediately proceeded to do this. Their attitude and determination spoke the words of Lincoln: That the Government should be "of the people, by the people, and for the people." As a result, a new era in behalf of the common people sprung into existence beginning March 4.

The measures I refer to as the "baker's dozen" are as follows:

First. Wagner-Lewis emergency relief law.
Second. Muscle Shoals and Tennessee Valley Development Act.
Third. Supervision of traffic in securities law.
Fourth. Emergency banking relief law.
Fifth. Maintenance of Government's credit.
Sixth. Beer-wine revenue law.
Seventh. Emergency Agricultural Relief Act.
Eighth. Reforestation unemployment relief bill.
Ninth. Small Home Owners' Refinancing Act.
Tenth. Railroad reorganization and relief law.
Eleventh. Industrial recovery law.
Twelfth. Glass-Steagall banking bill.
Thirteenth. Independent Offices Appropriation Act.

As in substance expressed by the President, I do not expect all of these measures to work out 100 percent. The people do not expect them to work out 100 percent. We know that adjustments must be made as we go along in the application of the many set-ups in these measures. We know that discrepancies will creep in here and there. We know that when we come back to Congress in January 1934 that there will be a number of adjustments to be made relative to the social and economic application of different articles in these several laws or measures.

I was not wholly in accord with all the provisions and articles in all these 13 bills as enumerated above.

For instance, in the railroad reorganization and relief law, I personally would have inserted several different provisions. However, it was an omnibus measure; and with all but a few of the provisions acceptable to the majority in Congress, it was only fitting and constructive that I support the measure.

In the Glass-Steagall banking bill we find a number of provisions that did not exactly suit me—the wording and the set-up relative to branch banking and the article with reference to the insuring of bank deposits were not what I should like to have seen. But it was a great step forward, and the majority of the Members of Congress saw it that way. They saw that it was for the stabilizing of our banking system as well as for reestablishing the confidence of the people in our banking structure.

Again, in the independent offices appropriation bill, that portion which dealt with the pensions of war veterans did not suit me in many respects. I was one of the many to think that the clauses pertaining to the Spanish War veterans and the presumptive cases were not broad enough, and that the Spanish War veterans, particularly, should have greater financial assistance. But again, as you well know, it was an omnibus bill in nature, and embodied some 25 other major articles and sections, and upon its passage depended the working out of other major administrative measures which came under the administration program and carried with them the hope of putting millions of men back to work.

I join in attitude with most of the other Congressmen; that is, if these set-ups do not work out for the common good of all, we will have an opportunity after January 3, 1934, to adjust them. That is what 120,000,000 people virtually wanted us to do. We had our instructions from the masses to come to Washington and do something. One banker wrote me, "For God's sake, do something, even if it's the wrong thing. We have had everything wrong long enough, and you can make things no worse." The people of the Nation wanted action; the President of the United States gave them action; the Congress of the United States gave to the President the authority to steer the ship of state.

Contrary to some few newspaper headlines, Congress did not give away any of its power. Congress can take back at any time any of the powers it gave to the President or to any other group. Thanks to the great news agencies and builders of public sentiment that give this Congress credit for having the courage to think through measures, come to conclusions, and pass upon them in such fashion that would start the wheels of progress and put the farmer, the laborer, and the little business man back to work.

INDUSTRIAL LOANS—A MEANS OF PROVIDING EMPLOYMENT AND ACCELERATING ECONOMIC RECOVERY

Mr. WALDRON. Mr. Speaker, under the various economic-recovery proposals enacted, or about to be enacted, by the first session of the Seventy-third Congress, practically every class of citizen, except the manufacturer and the business man, may obtain loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or certain of the new agencies created by these acts. These borrowers include States and municipalities, corporations engaged in building public and semipublic projects of self-liquidating character, banks, building-and-loan associations, insurance companies, railroads, and others. Credits have been extended farmers and provision has been made to take up farm mortgages. Home owners will likewise be able to obtain mortgage relief, or funds to pay taxes, to make improvements on their properties, or to save their homes from sheriff's sales.

Industry, which is the basic creator of employment and the source from which most of our revenue to run the Government comes, has received no consideration in the matter of obtaining funds to rehabilitate itself. Unless our great industrial population is employed, it cannot consume the products of the farm in quantities sufficient to pay the farmer a fair price for his products, and the huge future obligations created in the effort to assist agriculture will be met only through the ability of industry to furnish employment and consume the growers' products.

Under the agricultural-relief plan, many of the products the industrial worker consumes are to be taxed for the benefit of the farmer who reduces the acreage of his crops in an effort to control and eliminate great surpluses and thus give him better prices for the food produced and a fair profit for his labor. The industrial-recovery plan proposes to regulate business in an effort to spread employment and assure adequate wages. In the belief of many this plan will also increase prices and the farmer, as well as the consumer in the cities, will have to pay more for the manufactured articles he uses. From these manufactured articles the Government derives revenue by way of excise taxes, and from the business profits and the wages of industry it receives other revenue through the income tax. The farmer pays little or no income tax to the United States Government.

These new and untried experiments in the field of Government control approach economic recovery with an outstanding major difference, namely, the farmer can borrow funds from a generous Government to plant, harvest, and market his product, but the manufacturer and business man cannot borrow one single penny from any governmental agency. This failure to place industry and agriculture on the same basis in respect of financial assistance may seriously retard the recovery program and break down sources of potential revenue sorely needed to meet the huge expenditures to be made.

In my own district and elsewhere throughout the United States reputable manufacturers and business men tell me that they could resume operation of their plants and provide employment for thousands of workers if credits could be obtained. Normal credit sources, they declare, have been closed during the past few years. Money is hard to get. The banks and investment houses are either unwilling or unable to extend new credit to the manufacturers, and in many instances have called existing loans. Insurance companies, private investors, and others have no mortgage-investment funds available, and the free flow into commerce and industry of more than $6,000,000,000 has been prevented by its impoundment in the more than 5,000 State and National banks which have remained closed or in the hands of conservators since the Presidential proclamation of March 4, 1933. Established and going concerns during this period have reorganized and rebudgeted to meet the competitive situation occasioned by the deflation of commodity prices, but the lack of working capital has reduced business to a hand-to-mouth basis, while stocks on hand have vanished. Many mills have closed their doors and labor has suffered unemployment. Business men throughout the country declare that if there were some governmental source through which they could obtain a reasonable amount of credit, they could resume the operation of their plants and furnish work for thousands of people. To place men and women upon a self-supporting basis and eliminate the unemployment doles which have been a burden to the various municipalities and States is a subject ardently to be desired and toward which we are all striving.

In an effort to provide the funds with which to assist industry to adjust itself, I have introduced three bills—H.R. 6095, H.R. 6114, and H.R. 6124.

H.R. 6095 proposes to amend section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, so as to permit "any person" doing business within the United States, upon such security as is acceptable to the Corporation, to obtain a loan in an amount which shall not exceed 80 percent of the assessed value or 60 percent of the appraised value—whichever is lower—of the real-estate holdings of such person at the time the loan or advance is made. The term "person" is defined to mean an individual, a trust or estate, a partnership, a corporation, an association, or a joint-stock company.

H.R. 6114 eliminates the 80 percent assessed value limitation provided for in H.R. 6095, and limits the amount that can be borrowed to an amount which does not exceed 60 percent of the appraised value of the real-estate holdings of the borrower.

H.R. 6124 attempts to reach the situation in another way. Under section 201 (d) of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act loans may be made to "institutions" organized under the laws of any State or in the United States and having resources adequate for their undertaking, for the purpose of enabling such institutions to finance the "carrying and orderly marketing of agricultural commodities and livestock products" in the United States. No unincorporated individual can borrow under these provisions for the very limited purposes set forth. H.R. 6124 removes the limitation restricting borrowers to those engaged in "carrying and marketing agricultural commodities and livestock", and empowers the Corporation to make loans or advances to bona fide individuals—as well as institutions—for the purpose of enabling them "to finance agriculture, commerce, and industry" upon such security and in such amounts as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act permits. This measure is much broader in its scope than the other bills, but will also furnish the relief sought.

In the belief that there would be a freer flow of capital into industry, or that some provision would be made to assist the manufacturer, I delayed bringing this matter to the attention of the House. No visible change has taken place in the general situation, however, and nothing is included in any of the administration's proposals to provide the manufacturer with this much-needed working capital. To open the doors of the Treasury to one of the two great groups of citizens—agriculture and industry—who are a part of these plans and to deny the same privilege to the other group—which group is the source of the revenue from which those funds are to be obtained—seems to me to be nothing short of economic disaster. Under such a policy the stronger concern will survive, but the weaker concern, even though long established and respected in the business world, will be compelled to close its doors and remain closed unless relief is furnished. I urge you, therefore, to plug up this one great loophole in the scheme for economic recovery lest it wreck the entire machinery.

In my opinion the passage of one of these measures will do more to furnish immediate employment for thousands of industrial workers than any other proposal. It will accelerate production and restore confidence to the manufacturer, the worker, and the consumer.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FIRST OR SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, now that the first or special session of the Seventy-third Congress has ended, I consider it proper to comment on its accomplishments. In the whole range of human history no Congress, Parliament, or other legislative body has ever accomplished so much in such a short space of time, and I think I am keeping within the truth when I say that no other Congress has ever placed on the statute books more liberal, progressive, forward-looking, and constructive legislation than the Congress that recently closed its sessions.

This Congress marked the beginning of a new era in our national history, the commencement of a new economic age, a period of transition from an old to a new order, from policies worn threadbare by time and experience to more practical formulas, more idealistic conceptions of the functions and purposes of government, more practical methods to establish social justice and make our Government the servant rather than the master of the people.

The following are some of the major accomplishments of the recent session of Congress under the superb leadership of President Roosevelt:

1. The Industrial Recovery Act.
2. The public-works program.
3. The modification of the Volstead law.
4. The resolution for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.
5. The emergency banking legislation.
6. The Farm Relief Act.
7. The Muscle Shoals-Tennessee Valley Authority.
8. The Wagner human relief appropriation.
9. The creation of national employment agencies.
10. The emergency railroad legislation.
11. The Farm Loan Mortgage Act.
12. The Home Loan Mortgage Act.
13. The Securities Regulation Act.
14. Banking and currency reform.
15. The revenue-producing proposals.
16. The reduction of postage rates.
17. The bill authorizing the President to reduce and consolidate Federal agencies.

As 1 of the 13 Representatives of the great State of Missouri in the lower House of Congress, I supported each and every one of these measures, and whatever influence I had was ungrudgingly exerted to sustain the President and put over his legislative program. My record is 100 percent in support of President Roosevelt and the policies of his administration. I do not mean to say that I approved each and every major or minor item in his legislative program, because, as I have heretofore stated, I have serious doubts as to the wisdom, constitutionality, and workability of some of his proposals. But as a whole no more progressive and benevolent program was ever submitted by an executive to any Parliament or Congress. The questionable provisions to which I have referred may be abandoned if it be found that they are unwise and unworkable without in any manner impairing the usefulness of the major activities established by this legislation.

Being in full accord with the President on most of his proposals, I was willing to subordinate my judgment to that of the President on the comparatively few questions where we were in disagreement, because the American people were looking to and depending on President Roosevelt to lead them out of the wilderness, and I did not feel that I should veto any part of his program. Each measure enacted by Congress at the request of the President was a necessary part of a comprehensive plan for lifting the depression, avoiding economic chaos, and restoring normal national life. Each bill was an important part of a legislative machine through the operation of which the return of prosperity is to be hastened and assured. The defeat of any one of the President's bills would have had the same effect as the removal from a machine of one or more of its important parts. No one measure provided relief for every vocational group, but relief was provided in the several acts for every occupation and for people in all the walks of life.

In supporting some of these measures I was helping the Democratic Party carry out its platform pledges. As a lifelong Democrat and one who has been honored by my party, I have never opposed the creed or platform declarations of the Democratic Party, and as long as I stay in public life I will never use my voice or vote to prevent our party from fulfilling its platform or preelection pledges.

I shall not attempt in this statement to explain the provisions of the 17 major laws enacted during the recent session of Congress, but I will say that the President's program has been adopted, and we are now making splendid headway in our war against depression and the forces of fear. We have clothed the President with adequate powers to meet every emergency and bring the country back to a condition of prosperity, contentment, and happiness. Under the wise and patriotic leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and with the cooperation and support of the American people without regard to their politics, we may with confidence expect a rehabilitation of our agricultural, industrial, financial, and commercial structures and a restoration of Nation-wide prosperity.

The following is a brief summation of the extraordinary powers conferred on the President to enable him to deal with the unprecedented economic conditions and emergencies. The President was given the power to allocate appropriations for public works; to reduce first-class mail rates; to alter tariffs, levy quotas, and establish embargoes, with the advice of the United States Tariff Commission; to regulate or prohibit the interstate shipment of oil produced in violation of State quota laws; to regulate and coordinate industrial production and banking and railroad operations; to develop and operate Muscle Shoals; to alter the gold content of the dollar; to remonetize silver; to suspend or alter, within limits, governmental contracts, including Federal salaries, pensions, and allotments, and air and ocean mail subsidies.

Under the Industrial Recovery Act, public-works measure, Agricultural Adjustment Act, Wagner Human Relief Act, emergency railroad legislation, Securities Regulation Act, and other major legislative measures, the President has been given exceedingly broad powers to meet this epoch-marking, history-making depression.

The record of the Democratic President and of the Democratic Congress will meet with almost universal public approval, and justifies the continued confidence of the American people in both the President and Congress. I shall always be proud of the fact that I was a Member of the first or special session of the Seventy-third Congress, which, under the wise leadership of President Roosevelt, rolled back the tide of depression, grappled with and overcame the forces of fear and disaster, and pointed the way to better and more prosperous days.

I desire to pay a deserved tribute to the Republican Members of Congress, who, in a fine spirit of cooperation, joined the Democratic majority in putting over the President's legislative program. The Republican minority gave cordial and patriotic support to practically all the measures recommended by President Roosevelt. Indeed it is a source of pride and satisfaction that both Democratic and Republican Members of Congress, realizing the gravity of the situation, for the time being forgot politics and partisanship and united in the prompt enactment of these emergency measures.

REVIEW OF THE LEGISLATION OF THE SPECIAL SESSION OF CONGRESS

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, true to its practice when in control of the Government but false to its preachments and professions when not in power, the Democratic Party, with its huge majorities in both Houses of Congress, in its mass production of legislation during this special session, has made 12 distinct raids on the Civil Service system, and otherwise, by threats and attempted emasculation of the Civil Service law has made the merit system a hollow mockery. These actual raids and these attempted inroads upon the Civil Service have created a sense of insecurity among faithful and efficient public servants, many thousands of whom are affiliated in their political principles with the Democratic Party, and have all but demoralized the public service. Under the plea of emergency many new agencies have been created necessitating the employment of thousands of employees who will be appointed as the spoils of Democratic victory and thus undermine the already weakened merit system.

The jobs newly created and placed outside the Civil Service law should be utilized to take care of efficient Government employees who will be furloughed as the result of the economy program of the Democratic administration, and arrangements made to transfer competent employees from bureaus that are to be abolished to the new agencies which are being set up.

The President has the authority under the Civil Service law to do these things and prevent injustice to worthy employees and disservice to the Government itself, but the deliberate and successful effort of the Democratic majorities in Congress to fill all new jobs with hungry Democrats by disregarding the merit system renders Executive interference doubtful, notwithstanding the President's alleged sympathy with the merit system.

A review of the legislation of this special session with its vast grants of power to the President and its enormous and bewildering appropriations shows, in respect to the Civil Service, a studied and an avowed purpose to capitulate to the hungry job seekers at the expense of the taxpayers and of the merit system.

When the emergency relief bill, otherwise known as the "dole bill", was under consideration in the House it contained originally the following provision:

> The administration may appoint and fix the compensation of such experts and, subject to the provisions of the Civil Service law, appoint and, in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, fix the compensation of such other officers and employees as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

For these purposes the bill made $350,000 available.

In Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] succeeded by an amendment in striking out the words:

> Subject to the provisions of the Civil Service laws, appoint and, in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

In the House a separate vote was taken on this amendment by the yeas and nays on the demand of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], a stanch friend of the merit system.

This vote resulted, yeas 215, nays 161; so the obnoxious amendment was agreed to. But be it said to their credit that 51 Democrats joined 110 Republicans in voting against the amendment, and not a single Republican voted for it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 21, 1933, pp. 2121, 2128.)

The Senate restored to the bill the language stricken out by the House and the bill went to conference. The conference committee, by exceeding its authority, again eliminated the provision and substituted for it the following:

> The Administrator may appoint and fix the compensation of such experts and their appointment may be made and compensation fixed without regard to the Civil Service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

The conferees discovered that to effect this purpose, it was not enough merely to strike out the original words, but to insert a positive provision to disregard the Civil Service laws. This provision would clearly have been subject to a point of order as exceeding the authority of the conferees had the conference report been considered in the usual way, but in their zeal for spoils the Democratic-controlled Rules Committee brought in a drastic rule waiving points of order, and this rule was adopted against the protesting votes of 27

Democrats and of the votes of Republican and Farmer-Labor Members. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 9, 1933, pp. 3085, 3089.)

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER] in his remarks on the drastic rule reported by him made this statement:

The only opposition will come from those who believe in the adherence to the Civil Service law in all legislation and that it should be applied to the personnel to be selected for the administration of this law. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 9, 1933, p. 3085.)

The vote shows that the only opposition came from Republican and Farmer-Labor Members "who believe in the adherence to the Civil Service law."

In vigorous defense of the Civil Service laws three Republicans stated their belief in adherence to the Civil Service laws and the time-honored position of the Republican Party in favor of the merit system. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] declared:

I have been an advocate of the Civil Service ever since I entered public life, and I do not like to see it torn down. (RECORD, May 9, 1933, p. 3087.)

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] said:

I hope the Democratic Party does not intend to stultify itself by taking this extreme method of getting a few patronage jobs. * * * I believe the American people believe in the Civil Service, and personally I do not believe that the President of the United States is in favor of what we are asked to do today. * * * I ask you to think seriously of what you are doing in striking down the Civil Service laws, which Democrats as well as Republicans have supported for many years. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 9, 1933, p. 3086.)

And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], in his usual forceful and logical way, reviewed the history of the pending proposition and its purpose to despoil the Civil Service, and reviewed also the history of the Civil Service law passed 50 years ago, the father of which was George H. Pendleton, a Democratic Senator from Ohio. Mr. LUCE read the first sentence of the Civil Service law, as follows:

The President is authorized to proscribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the Civil Service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect of age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter.

Mr. LUCE then made the following statement, which it would be well for Democratic spoilsmen to remember:

It was the speech of Senator Pendleton that did most to secure the passage of the law of which I have read the first sentence as it now stands. In its course he reminded the Senate that Jefferson on taking office in 1801 had established fidelity, capacity, and honesty as the tests. I know how unfashionable it is now to quote Thomas Jefferson. The gentlemen on my right have forsaken his doctrines, trodden on them, turned their backs on them, and now of Thomas Jefferson it may be said that on my right "there is none so poor to do him reverence." Ah, they worship now at the altar of Andrew Jackson, and it is idle for me to repeat these words of Jefferson to men who have forgotten even his existence.

Mr. Pendleton further said that—and here I venture to read in order that I may be correct—describing the condition to which the conduct of government had been brought by the belief of Jackson and the utterance of Marcy, "To the victors belong the spoils."

I do not say that the Civil Service of the Government is wholly bad. * * * But I do say that the Civil Service is inefficient; that it is expensive; that it is extravagant; that it is in many cases and in some senses corrupt. * * *

This whole system demoralizes everybody who is engaged in it. It demoralizes the clerks who are appointed. That is inevitable. It demoralizes those who make the appointment. That also is inevitable. And it demoralizes Senators and Representatives who, by the exercise of their powers as Senators and Representatives, exert pressure upon the appointing power.

Mark you, these words of a great Democrat, a man incorruptible and fearless, a champion of the welfare of the country:

I believe that the existing system which, for want of a better name, I call the "spoils system", must be killed or it will kill the Republic. I believe that it is impossible to maintain free institutions in the country upon any basis of that sort.

I believe the spoils system to be a great crime. I believe it to be fraught with danger. I believe that the highest duty of patriotism is to prevent the crime and avoid the danger.

And so, if you do not care to decide this question today upon the issue of whether you will trust your President, turn to these words, dwell upon them in your minds, let them appeal to your judgments, and to your conscience, and do not now, when first the opportunity squarely presents itself, say that it is your wish to return to that system which menaced the very life of the Republic itself. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 9, 1933, p. 3089.)

In connection with the Civilian Conservation Corps, created by the act of March 31, 1933, which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] referred to as the "sapling bill", it appears from information furnished the House by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] that 20,300 civilian employees at average pay of $140 per month had been appointed up to the end of May to supervise the forestation work of 274,375 registrants. This new army of civilian employees were appointed without regard to the Civil Service law, although the Reforestation Act did not so provide, as was the case in other emergency acts. Their employment, whether under Civil Service regulations or not, was discretionary with the administration, and in the absence of regulations, prescribed by the President, for their selection from eligible lists of the Civil Servce Commission they were, of course—20,300 of them—placed on the Government pay roll without regard to the Civil Service law.

The men enlisted in the Civilian Conservation Corps were not required to take the oath of enlistment, although operating under the direction of Army officers, and yet they receive more pay than the regularly enlisted men of the Army, and are not subject to the same discipline; and in case of death the widow of a man who serves in one of these temporary jobs in the woods would receive $45 per month under the compensation law while the widow of a soldier would receive, in most cases, less than half that amount.

The national employment system created by the act of June 6, 1933 (Public Law No. 30, 73d Cong.), replacing the old system under the Department of Labor, provides for employment agencies throughout the country to act in conjunction with like State agencies, requiring the services of a host of employees, all of whom are to be appointed and their salaries fixed, without regard to the Civil Service laws, as will be seen by the following provision of the act:

The Secretary of Labor is authorized, without regard to the Civil Service laws, to appoint and, without regard to the Classification Act of 1932, as amended, to fix the compensation of one or more assistant directors and such other officers, employees, and assistants, and to make such expenditures for personal services * * * as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

This will be good news for the hungry army of faithful partisans who already are clamoring for these jobs, but is it another blow at the merit system?

Another haven of refuge for the spoils hunter was provided in the Federal Emergency Relief Administration Act (Public Law No. 15, 73d Cong.), whereby a dole of $500,000,000 is to be given away to States and individuals. This act provides—

The Administrator may appoint and fix the compensation of such experts and their appointment may be made and compensation fixed without regard to Civil Service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and the Administrator may, in the same manner, appoint and fix the compensation of such other officers and employees as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The Tennessee Valley Authority Act (Public Law No. 17, 73d Cong.), better known as the "Muscle Shoals bill", sets up a "corporation" designated as "the board", composed of three members appointed by the President, and all other officials, agents, and employees are to be designated or selected by the board.

Following closely the language of other acts disregarding the Civil Service laws, it is provided in this act that—

The board shall without regard to the provisions of Civil Service laws applicable to officers and employees of the United States, appoint such managers, assistant managers, officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of its business, fix their compensation, * * * and provide a system of organization to fix responsibility and promote efficiency.

The last words "and promote efficiency" were doubtless added with a pang of conscience as a generous concession to the merit system. What a splendid opportunity is here afforded to acquire a trained, efficient personnel from the ranks of thousands of qualified Civil Service employees who have been and will be guillotined and those placed on indefinite furloughs by the various economy measures.

Even the act to help home owners from foreclosures of mortgages on their homes did not escape the attention of the marauding spoils hunter, for we find in the Home Owners' Loan Act (Public, No. 43, 73d Cong.) a broad, sweeping power to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, created by that act, to appoint at will its employees and to fix their salaries.

Here is the provision:

> The Corporation shall have power to select, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, or agents as shall be necessary for the performance of its duties under this act, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment or compensation of officers, employees, attorneys, or agents of the United States.

In other words, the Civil Service laws and the Classification Act are to be ignored and inapplicable and the door is thrown wide open to an insatiable horde of "victors" in question of the spoils of victory.

In conferring upon the Secretary of Agriculture absolute power over the destiny of farm operations, the authors of the Farm Relief Act, with all of its far-reaching provisions into an untrodden field of governmental experiment, did not overlook the little matter of jobs made necessary for the administration of its complex machinery.

In section 10 of that act (Public, No. 10, 73d Cong.) it would seem at first glance as though its sponsors really purposed to give the merit system some recognition when we read:

> The Secretary of Agriculture may appoint such officers and employees, subject to the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923 and acts amendatory thereof, and such experts as are necessary to execute the functions vested in him by this title.

But the Classification Act is one thing and the Civil Service laws are something else. The former is good enough for classification purposes after appointments are made, but when we come to the matter of making appointments we find this further provision—

> And the Secretary may make such appointments without regard to the Civil Service law or regulations.

Here again we run across our old Civil Service nemesis, those fatal words, "Without regard to the Civil Service laws."

How much of the huge sum of $100,000,000 appropriated for administrative expenses will be used for "classified" jobs without regard to the Civil Service laws remains to be seen.

Under the provisions of the same act the Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to appoint, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title * * * without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States.

The production credit corporations and the production credit associations created under the Farm Credit Act, as in the case of other farm-relief agencies, will select their personnel and administer the law "without regard to the Civil Service laws and regulations."

Still another agency created by the Securities Act (Public, No. 22, 73d Cong.), designated as the "Corporation of Foreign Security Holders", is authorized—

> To select, employ, and fix the compensation of officers, directors, members of committees, employees, attorneys, and agents of the Corporation without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers or employees of the United States.

Perhaps of all the instrumentalities created by Congress involving difficulty in administration and requiring the greatest number of civilian employees is that of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.).

One has only to read this act without attempting to understand its intricacies to see the possibility of an addition to the Federal pay roll of thousands of officers and employees "without regard to Civil Service laws." Not only does this law provide for outright new appointments but it reaches out and embraces such State and local officers and employees as may be found necessary and add them to Uncle Sam's roster with such pay as may be prescribed. What a grand opportunity this affords to dump upon the Federal pay roll untold numbers of State, county, and city employees and thus relieve local governments of that burden; and incidentally it will follow as a matter of course that care will be exercised by Mr. Farley, the lord high executioner and dispenser of patronage de luxe, to see that only those drafted for this service have the proper password, "come across", from local Democratic political chieftains. There is more than one way, it seems, to meet that deficit in the Democratic campaign chest.

The power to appoint is vested in the President, but he is authorized to delegate this power, which he will no doubt do.

The law has the same provision as in others herein quoted—that is, the authority "to appoint, without regard to the Civil Service laws, such officers and employees as he may find necessary"—but it goes still further and provides for the appointment of—> such State and local officers and employees as he may find necessary; to prescribe their authorities, duties, responsibilities, and tenure; and without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the compensation of any officers and employees so appointed.

Encouraged by these wholesale assaults upon the merit system another and even greater inroad was attempted and was partially successful in the closing days of the session.

Without the consideration its importance deserved a bill was passed in another body lifting at least 5,000 positions from the Civil Service system and placing them in the patronage bag. This bill (S. 1869) reads as follows:

> That notwithstanding any other provisions of law after this act becomes effective, all appointments to office in the executive branch of the Government of the United States at a rate of compensation in excess of $5,000 per annum shall be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to appointments by the President of persons as secretaries or clerks in his service.

As originally introduced and reported from the committee the bill required Presidential appointment and confirmation by the Senate of all positions paying more than $3,500. Left in this form the bill would have covered thousands of men and women in technical and administrative fields, experts in their lines of work, and made them the prey of politics. This was so clearly unjust and destructive of good service that the bill was amended before its hasty passage so as to effect only positions paying more than $5,000.

This bill came to the House on the eve of final adjournment and was referred to the Committee on the Civil Service, where all true friends of the merit system hope it will repose indefinitely.

As further indicating a determined purpose to render the Civil Service laws ineffective and to flout the merit system a bill was reported favorably from the Committee on Civil Service in another body on June 13, 1933, but was not reached for consideration. This bill speaks for itself in the following language:

> That after the date this act takes effect the Civil Service laws shall not be construed to apply to any office or position in the Government covered into the classified Civil Service by Executive order, or any officer or employee of the Government appointed to the classified Civil Service without examination after March 4, 1929, and prior to the date this act takes effect.
> SEC. 2. After the date this act takes effect the Civil Service laws shall not be construed to permit the covering into the classified Civil Service of any office or position not included therein, or the appointment to the classified Civil Service of any person without examination, unless the Congress shall specifically so provide: Provided, That in all cases where employees not officials have heretofore been covered into the Civil Service by Executive order, such employees may be allowed to stand a special competitive Civil Service examination for the places they now hold.

Another blow at the merit system was the "involuntary retirement" provision in the independent offices appropriation bill.

The measure itself appears to be guileless—

Says a commentary—

It purports to extend a privilege to employees who are dismissed after 30 years or more of service. But the possibility that this measure might be used as a means of reducing Civil Service personnel makes thousands of faithful servants of the Government uneasy over their jobs.

When the plan of eliminating employees who have been in the service for 30 years or more was first submitted to Congress by the Budget Bureau it provided for compulsory retirement. Under that arrangement 22,000 Government workers would have been arbitrarily dismissed. Congress refused to sanction a measure so drastic. The original plan underwent considerable modification in both the House and the Senate, but as finally approved it permits the President to withdraw much of the protection which now surrounds employees who have devoted most of their lives to Government service.

The law merely gives Federal workers who are involuntarily separated from the service after 30 years a right to retirement pay. But this opens the way for dismissals on a grand scale among employees in this class. Government workers are rated on their efficiency, length of service, dependability, material status, and military service. The President may, by Executive order, eliminate length of service as a factor in employees' ratings, thereby destroying the seniority advantage they have built up over many years.

That it would be an injustice to oust middle-aged employees from their jobs because they have served 30 years is apparent to every one. Many capable specialists, administrators, and division chiefs may thus be forced out through the caprice of a department head. Employees who have served the Government for long periods in a nonpartisan spirit under the promise of security in their positions may suddenly be displaced for political reasons, and they would be denied any appeal to higher authority.

This prospect is extremely discouraging to men and women who plan to enter the Government service as their life's work, as well as to those whose careers may be thus terminated. The Government would be under a handicap in securing efficient and impartial service. If advantage should be taken of the opportunity Congress has given to emasculate the safeguards of the Civil Service, the morale of the Federal personnel will be seriously impaired.

Since the passage of the Civil Service Law, 50 years ago, every President has exercised his authority under it to extend the merit system by covering into the Civil Service through Executive order various classes of employees, temporary appointees primarily who demonstrated their fitness by experience and whose services were required by the Government. Doubtless this practice, in rare instances, may have been abused in both Democratic and Republican administrations for partisan purposes, but in the main and in large degree the Government service has been benefited and the merit system extended and strengthened.

During the World War thousands of additional employees were required, and it is a well-known fact that President Wilson covered many of them into the Civil Service, where they are to this day. Appointees, many of them in so-called "key" positions, appointed during the Wilson administration, were undisturbed in their positions during the subsequent Republican administrations.

It has been said upon the floor of the House recently that positions at the disposal of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were filled without regard to the Civil Service laws and that they were filled by the appointment of Republicans. The first part of this statement is true, but the latter part is absolutely contrary to the facts. It is well known that President Hoover appointed a prominent Democrat, former Senator Atlee Pomerene, as chairman of the Corporation, in order to avoid the appearance of partisanship; and the subordinate employees of the Corporation in all of its various ramifications were selected for their qualifications. The truth is that, according to the best obtainable information, as many appointees in that service were Democrats as there were Republicans.

It is a fair statement that by and large, throughout the life of the Civil Service law for a half century, the Republican Party, in practice as well as in promise, as a party, with individual exceptions, has been the friend of the merit system; and that, by and large, in the main, the Democratic Party, as a party, with individual exceptions, has been the party of spoils and the foe of the merit system.

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], an able leader of the Democratic Party in the House, reflected the views of his party associates, with some exceptions, when he frankly admitted in an outburst of partisan zeal on the 22d of last March his antipathy for the merit system. His remarks warmed the cockles of his Democratic colleagues' hearts, as evidenced by their vociferous applause.

After saying that he would vote to abolish the whole system the gentleman from Alabama, in true Jacksonian style, exclaimed:

I may say I do hope and pray, adopting somewhat the spirit of old Andrew Jackson on these propositions of rewarding the faithful, inasmuch as we have so many faithful and so many deserving, that we will not be limited in some of the new offices that are to be filled to merely the crumbs that fall from the table, but that we may have some of the loaves and fishes, and that the rights and interests of really deserving Democrats will not be forgotten. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 22, 1933, p. 736.)

It is no wonder, in view of the raids on the merit system by the Democratic Party, with its tremendous majorities in Congress, that the National Civil Service Reform League should come to life and make a vigorous protest in its annual report.

Not since Grover Cleveland's administration—

Says the league's report—

has the merit system had to face a serious challenge to its existence as it faces now upon the latest change of administration.

And the report goes on to say, referring to the numerous new agencies created:

The new administration has turned its back upon the only method of safeguarding these new agencies from maladministration. Without a single exception, these new agencies thus created have been thrown open to the political spoilsmen to do with as they see fit. The excuse given when objection had been made to exemption from the Civil Service tests has been that these agencies are a part of the emergency program and that they may be temporary in character. A more specious excuse could not be devised to hoodwink the public. * * * It would be tragic if the recovery program were to be defeated or impeded by the clamor for spoils of office.

And now comes the crowning infamy against the merit system, the capstone to the monument of Democratic depredations, a frontal attack upon the Library of Congress, an institution above all others upon which the spoilsman has not dared heretofore to lay his unholy hands. One of the distinguishing features of that great Library, to which is attributable its marvelous efficiency, is its absolute freedom and separation from partisan politics. Its well-trained corps of experts and attendants are men and women who have been specially trained for library work, and now to disrupt that force, which has been built up through years of painstaking care, and make a shambles of it to satisfy the desire of politicians in quest of prey would be nothing short of a crime.

And yet it is seriously proposed to do this very thing. An account of this atrocious undertaking is given in an Associated Press dispatch, from which the following is quoted:

DEMOCRATS UNITING TO GET G.O.P. JOBS—HOUSE MEMBERS DISSATISFIED WITH FARLEY'S POLICY IN HANDLING PATRONAGE

Democratic House Members, dissatisfied with the way Postmaster General Farley is passing out patronage, have organized a special committee to find jobs for Democrats which are now being held by Republicans.

The committee was created by the Democratic National Congressional Committee. Representative MCCLINTIC, of Oklahoma, was named chairman. He said yesterday that Members of the House were so harassed by job seekers that, having failed to get the administration to take on Democrats, they had decided to try to find some jobs for their constituents.

The committee first turned its study to the 800 places in the Library of Congress, where the pay roll amounts to $773,360 annually and salaries run from $1,200 to $6,000 a year. These employees are not under the Civil Service and may be filled by Presidential appointment.

"There are about 800 employees in the Library of Congress," MCCLINTIC said. "The best check-up we can make is that about 40 or 50 are Democrats. Most of the others are Republicans and nearly all of them have been appointed in the past 12 years. At least 50 percent were appointed during the Hoover administration.

"We have tried to find out about these people holding these good jobs, but they won't give up all the information we want."

McCLINTIC said a check-up showed that most of them came from Illinois, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and that about 50 were foreigners.

McCLINTIC wrote a letter to his Democratic colleagues saying:

"The special committee appointed by the congressional committee to make a study for the purpose of bringing about more efficiency has endeavored to secure all the information available concerning employees in the Congressional Library who are employed from your State.

"It has been difficult to obtain detailed information concerning the identity of each person, and we are going to suggest that you call your delegation together and submit this list for identification.

"After you have done so, if you are desirous of supplementing any of the persons listed, it is our suggestion that you have the delegation present endorsements favorable to the persons you would like to have appointed and file the same with the Honorable James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, with the request that such persons as you have in mind be named to fill such vacancies.

"The committee also suggests that it would be advisable to contact the Democratic Senators from your State for the purpose of finding out whether any of those on this list have the kind of status that will entitle them to retain their present position."

The committee requested that the Members recommend "only such persons who are well qualified from an educational standpoint" for the positions. It added there was no desire to impair the efficiency of the institution.

"The committee further desires to say that the States are not equally represented in the present apportionment," the letter said, "and if some arrangement can be made to give additional employees to States that are not properly represented it will be a pleasure on our part to cooperate in the best manner possible."

McCLINTIC said many Members of the House were "almost afraid to go home, because they haven't been able to get any jobs for deserving Democrats in their districts."

He said there were many Republicans still on the Federal pay roll, that should be replaced as quickly as possible, and that his committee would cooperate with Farley in expediting the changes.

Is the Library of Congress, one of the greatest libraries in the world, to be dismantled in its personnel to appease the appetite of hungry office mongers and to furnish a spoils holiday for faithful partisans? By all means this great temple, which exemplifies the wisdom and practical results of the merit system, should not be defiled.

FINANCIAL INTERESTS SHOULD NOT DICTATE FOREIGN POLICY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if the history of the relations between this country and Russia is known to every American citizen. It may not be considered amiss, therefore, if I dwell for a few moments on our past relations with that strange and interesting country. To do so it will be necessary for me to go back to the late eighties and the early nineties of the last century, when the United States was turning the corner and becoming rich and powerful. At that time a man named Jacob Schiff came to this country as the agent of certain foreign money lenders. His mission was to get control of American railroads. This man was a Jew. He was the son of a rabbi. He was born in one of the Rothschilds' houses in Frankfort, Germany. He was a small fellow with a pleasant face and, if I remember correctly, his eyes were blue. At an early age he set out from Frankfort to seek his fortune and went to Hamburg, Germany. At Hamburg he entered the Warburg banking establishment. The Warburgs of Hamburg are bankers of long standing, with branches in Amsterdam and Sweden. After Schiff had served his time with them, he went to London and worked with their London correspondents. He was also connected with the firm of Samuel Montagu & Co., the London gold merchants. When he came to this country, he was well equipped to do business as an international money changer. He knew how to be polite, he could write a smooth letter, and he always pretended to be a man of holiness and a philanthropist.

Sometime before Schiff's arrival there was a firm of Jewish peddlers or merchants in Lafayette, Ind., by the name of Kuhn & Loeb. I think they were there about 1850. Probably they made money out of the new settlers who passed through Indiana on their way to the Northwest. This firm of Jews had finally moved to New York and had set themselves up as private bankers and had grown rich. Jacob Schiff married Teresa Loeb and became the head of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. Schiff made a great deal of money here for himself and for the Jewish money lenders of London. He began to give orders to Presidents almost as a matter of course. He appears to have been a man who would stop at nothing to gain his own ends. I do not blame him for being a Jew. I blame him for being a trouble maker.

Russia had a powerful enemy in this man, Jacob Schiff. The people of the United States were taught to believe that this enmity of his was caused by wrongs done to Russian Jews. I look elsewhere for the motives which animated him.

In the 1890's Schiff was the agent in this country of Ernest Cassell and other London money lenders. These money lenders were looking forward to a war between England and Russia and were making preparations for propaganda designed to support England in the United States. This country was then a debtor nation, paying a high yearly tribute to Schiff and his principals. Schiff accordingly took it upon himself to create a prejudice in the United States against Russia. He did this by presenting the supposed wrongs of the Russian Jews to the American public. Unpleasant tales began to appear in print. School children in this country were told that Jewish children were crippled for life by Russian soldiers wielding the knout. By unfair means a wedge was driven between Russia and the United States.

One of Schiff's schemes was a sort of wholesale importation of Russian Jews into the United States. He drew up divers and sundry regulations for the temporary transplantation of these Jewish emigrants. He would not, he said, have them enter this country through the port of New York, because they might like New York too well to leave it for the outposts he had selected for them. He said it would be best to have them come in at New Orleans and to have them stay there 2 weeks, "so that they could pick up a few words of English and get a little money" before setting off for what he called the "American hinterland." How they were to get the money he did not say.

Aided by Schiff and his associates, many Russian Jews came to this country about that time and were naturalized here. A number of these naturalized Jews then returned to Russia. Upon their return to that country, they immediately claimed exemption there from the regulations of domicile imposed on Jews; that is, they claimed the right to live on purely Russian soil because they were American citizens, or "Yankee" Jews. Disorders occurred and were exploited in the American press. Riots and bombings and assassinations, for which somebody furnished money, took place. The perpetrators of these outrages appear to have been shielded by powerful financial interests. While this was going on in Russia, a shameless campaign of lying was conducted here, and large sums of money were spent to make the general American public believe that the Jews in Russia were a simple and guileless folk ground down by the Russians and needing the protection of the great benefactor of all the world—Uncle Sam. In other words, we were deceived. We were so deceived that we allowed them to come in here and to take the bread out of the mouths of our own American citizens.

I come now to the time when war was declared between Russia and Japan. This was brought about by a skillful use of Japan so that England would not have to fight Russia in India. It was cheaper and more convenient for England to have Japan fight Russia than to do it herself. As was to be expected, Schiff and his London associates financed Japan. They drew immense quantities of money out of the United States for that purpose. The background for the loans they floated in this country had been skillfully prepared. The "sob stuff", of which Schiff was a master, had sunk into the hearts of sympathetic Americans. The loans were a great success. Millions of American dollars were sent to Japan by Schiff and his London associates. England's stranglehold on India was made secure. Russia was prevented from entering the Khyber Pass and falling on India from the northwest. Japan at the same time was built up and became a great world power, and as such is now facing us in the Pacific. All this was accomplished by control of the organs of American publicity, releases to the effect that Russian Jews and "Yankee" Jews were being persecuted in Russia, and by the selling of Japanese war bonds to American citizens.

While the Russo-Japanese War was in progress President Theodore Roosevelt offered to act as peacemaker, and a conference between representatives of the belligerents was arranged to take place at Portsmouth, N.H.

When the Portsmouth Conference took place, Jacob Schiff attended it and used such influence as he had with Theodore Roosevelt to win favors for Japan at the expense of Russia. His main object, then as always, was humiliation of Russians, whose only crime was that they were Russians and not Jews. He endeavored to humiliate the Russians, but Count Witte, the Russian plenipotentiary, did not allow him to succeed in this attempt. Schiff's power and the power of his organized propaganda were well understood by Count Witte, however. Consequently he was not surprised when President Roosevelt, who was often deceived, twice asked him to have Russia treat Russian Jews who had become naturalized in the United States and who had thereafter returned to live in Russia with special consideration; that is, not as Jews but as Americans. Witte carried home a letter from Roosevelt embodying this plea.

Mr. Speaker, the restrictions upon Jews in Russia at that time may or may not have been onerous. But onerous or not, before the Russians had time to change them, Schiff had the 80-year-old treaty of friendship and good will between Russia and the United States denounced. Speaking of this matter, Count Witte says in his autobiography:

The Russians lost the friendship of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that those people—the real Russians—ever lost the true friendship of the American people. They were done away with to suit the ambitions of those who intend to be the financial masters of the world, and some of us were deceived into thinking that in some mysterious way they, themselves, were to blame. The chasm that suddenly opened between ourselves and our old friends and well-wishers in Russia was a chasm created by Schiff the vindictive in his inhuman greed, and he created it in the name of the Jewish religion.

Mr. Speaker, it was a mistake for the United States to permit the integrity of its foreign policy to be jeopardized or affected adversely by such religious, racial, and financial meddling as that practiced upon us by Schiff and his London associates. The United States should manage its foreign affairs with more distinction than that which is implied in the picture of Jacob Schiff shaking his fist at the White House and muttering threats against William Howard Taft, then President of the United States, a man who was excessively distinguished in his chosen field and who represented the integrity and the patriotic Americanism of every generation of New Englanders from the first of Massachusetts Bay Colony to his own, and represented them well.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States should not permit financial interests or any other special interests to dictate the foreign policy of the United States Government. But in this connection history is now repeating itself. You have heard, no doubt, of the so-called persecution of Jews in Germany.

Mr. Speaker, there is no real persecution of Jews in Germany. Hitler and the Warburgs, the Mendelssohns and the Rothschilds, appear to be on the best of terms. There is no real persecution of the Jews in Germany, but there has been a pretended persecution of them because there are 200,000 unwanted Communistic Jews in Germany, largely Galician Jews who entered Germany after the World War, and Germany is very anxious to get rid of those particular Communistic Jews. The Germans wish to preserve the purity of their own blond racial stock. They are willing to keep rich Jews like Max Warburg and Franz Mendelssohns, whose families have lived in Germany so long that they have acquired some German national characteristics. But the Germans are not willing to keep the Galician Jews, the upstarts. So a great show is put on, largely by German Jews themselves, in the hope that Uncle Sam will prove himself to be as foolish as he was before and that we will allow those Galician and Communistic Jews to come in here. That is why Miss Perkins has been placed in charge of the Department of Labor. She is there to lower the immigration bars. It is thought that, being a woman, she may disarm criticism. She is an old hand with the international Jewish bankers. If she were not, she would not be here in a Jewish-controlled administration.

When the so-called "anti-Semitic campaign" designed for American consumption was launched in Germany, France was alarmed because she feared the Galician Jews might be dumped on French soil. French newspapers published articles concerning the menace, but now that France has been shown that the purpose of the anti-Semitic campaign is to dump the 200,000 communistic Jews on the United States she is worried no longer. "Ah", she says, "l'Oncle Sam, he is to be the goat. Very good."

Mr. Speaker, I regard it as a pity that there are Americans who love to fawn upon the money Jews and to flatter them. Some of these unfortunates are under obligations to Jewish money changers and dare not cross them. On June 6, 1933, there was a meeting in the city of Washington at which the following resolution was adopted:

America has been greatly enriched through generations past by men and women of high quality who have come to our shores as a result of persecution in their own lands. Our country is known throughout the world as the haven of those who suffer from wrong and injustices, and who seek an opportunity for freedom not afforded in their own land. The present is another critical time, and there are many victims of religious and racial persecution in Germany who, because of superior attainments and qualities of fine citizenship, would make valuable additions to our Commonwealth. We, therefore, ask the Government temporarily to relax the immigration barriers in favor of such persons and urge the passage of such measures as will effect this result.

Mr. Speaker, the time for such tactics has gone by. We would be very foolish to allow Germany to dump her unwanted Jewish population on the United States. If the money Jews are as noble as they advertise themselves to be, let them advocate the payment of the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates. Let them ease the burdens of the consumptive Jewish boys who are hauling heavy carts of fur and other material around the garment center of New York. Let them see that the long-suffering Jewish school teachers receive the salaries which are due to them but which are now in arrears. That would be better than to bring 200,000 Jewish Communists in here for political purposes.

Mr. Speaker, Jacob Schiff flourished like the green bay tree during the World War, but there are passages in his life which show his hysterical despair when the Allies sent their representatives here to obtain a loan. He endeavored to have Lord Reading, formerly Rufus Isaacs, prevent any part of it from going to Russia, although at the time Russia had a very large army of soldiers in the marshes, including thousands of Jewish soldiers, fighting the battle of the Allies on short rations and with insufficient supplies. He was willing to join in the loan, but he wished to have Russia and Russian Jews excluded from the benefits of it. Upon that occasion he was torn between a desire for profit and his professional hatred of Russia, and he cried out to his fellow directors in Kuhn, Loeb & Co. that he ought not to be placed in such a position. And then I believe he said they could do as they liked about it.

In the end it was one of the European Warburgs, a relative of Schiff's, who went to Brest-Litovsk to negotiate the separate peace—a peace which was deeply resented by a large number of loyal Russian Jews—a peace which was followed shortly afterward by the Third Internationale, one of the purposes of which is the destruction of constitutional government in the United States and the establishment here of the same form of government as that which now prevails in Russia. The rights of the sovereign States in the United States are being steadily undermined for that sinister purpose. How far down into the bottomless pit of communism the United States has been dragged by the Roosevelt administration under the smoke screen of an emergency is shown by a comparison of the program of the Third Internationale and the Roosevelt communistic measures forced into law here during this special session of Congress under threats to deprive Democratic Congressmen of patronage and influence, or, as the President is said to have expressed it to a London correspondent, a determination on his part to keep every Republican officeholder in office until he got what he wanted from the Democratic Congress. Among the tasks set before the communistic party in the United States, as shown in Russia U.S.S.R., a Complete Handbook, edited by the scholar, P. Malevsky-Malevitch, and published by Payson in New York this year, I find the following:

Transfer to the state of all gold reserves, valuables, securities, deposits, etc.; the centralization of all banking operations and the subordination of all the nationalized banks to a central state bank—

And so forth.

You have witnessed the unlawful seizure by Franklin D. Roosevelt of gold reserves and other values belonging to the people of the United States, the destruction of banks, the attempted whitewashing of the Federal Reserve Board and Federal Reserve banks, the corruption of which he admitted in his campaign harangues; and you may have noticed that what was confiscated is not in the hands of the present constitutional Government but in the hands of the international bankers who are the nucleus of the new government Roosevelt is seeking to establish here. Roosevelt's actions are not in accordance with the Constitution of the United States. They are in accordance with the plans of the Third International.

At one time Trotzky was a favorite with Jacob Schiff. During the war Trotzky edited Novy Mir and conducted mass meetings in New York. When he left the United States to return to Russia, he is said upon good authority to have traveled on Schiff's money and under Schiff's protection. He was captured by the British at Halifax and immediately, on advice from a highly placed personage, set free. Shortly after his arrival in Russia he was informed that he had a credit in Sweden at the Swedish branch of the bank owned by Max Warburg, of Hamburg. This credit helped to finance the seizure of the Russian revolution by the international Jewish bankers. It assisted them in subverting it to their own ends. At the present time the Soviet Union is in debt.

From the date of Trotzky's return to Russia the course of Russian history has, indeed, been greatly affected by the operations of international bankers. They have acted through German and English institutions and have kept Russian in bondage to Germany and both Germany and Russia in bondage to themselves. Their relatives in Germany have drawn immense sums of money from the United States and have in turn financed their agents in Russia at a handsome profit.

The Soviet Government has been given United States Treasury funds by the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks acting through the Chase Bank and the Guaranty Trust Co. and other banks in New York City. England, no less than Germany, has drawn money from us through the Federal Reserve banks and has re-lent it at high rates of interest to the Soviet Government or has used it to finance her sales to Soviet Russia and her engineering works within the Russian boundaries. The Dnieperstroy Dam was built with funds unlawfully taken from the United States Treasury by the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. Speaker, our workingmen have been told that Russia is the best country in the world today for a workingman to live in. They have been made to regret that they cannot go to Russia to work on one of the great enterprises being carried on by the Soviet Government from which American workingmen are excluded. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the Russians have a right to set up any form of government that pleases them and suits their needs. But for some reason, whether due to some defect in the Soviet form of government or to some other cause, Russia has not been able to maintain its present form of government otherwise than at the expense of countries in which there is greater freedom for individuals and in which the property rights of citizens have been respected and preserved. Open up the books of Amtorg, the trading organization of the Soviet Government in New York, and of Gostorg, the general office of the Soviet trade organization, and of the State Bank of the Union of Socialistic Soviet Republics, and you will be staggered to see how much American money has been taken from the United States Treasury for the benefit of Russia. Find out what business has been transacted for the State Bank of Soviet Russia by its correspondent, the Chase Bank of New York; by Lloyd's Bank of London; by Kleinwort Sons & Co. of London, whose correspondents are the principal New York banks; by Glyn Mills & Co. of London and their American agents, that is, the International Acceptance Bank of New York, the Guaranty Trust of New York, the Central Hanover Bank of New York, the Chemical Bank & Trust Co., H. Clews & Co., Kidder Peabody & Co., Winslow Lanier & Co., and Lee, Higginson & Co., the promoters of Swedish Match. Find out how much United States money has passed through the Bank for Russian Trade of London and through the Midland Bank, Ltd.

If the extent of these transactions were known to the American workingman and if he could see that the raw material, the United States dollars, in those transactions came out of his own pocket and the pockets of his fellow citizens, he would understand that Russia is not a good place for a workingman unless other workingmen in other countries are forced to pay tribute to its needs. Russia owes the United States a large sum of money. If we had what Russia owes us today, the veterans of the United States would not need to fear the first of July 1933 when they are to be despoiled of their pension rights and privileges. Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to a reduction in the pensions that were lawfully conferred upon the United States veterans of all wars, their widows and dependents. I am in favor of the immediate payment of the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates. If the United States can carry Germany and Soviet Russia and John Bull on its back, it can pay its veterans. If it can lend $50,000,000 to sovietized China and furnish material for the manufacture of high explosives, it can pay its veterans.

Mr. Speaker, an immense amount of United States money has been used abroad in preparations for war and in the acquisition and the manufacture of war supplies. Germany is said to be part owner of a large poison-gas factory at Troitsk on Russian soil. China is almost completely sovietized, and in the Asiatic interior huge stocks of munitions are said to be stored awaiting the day when the war lords of the United States will ship United States troops to Asia. Mr. Speaker, the United States should look before it leaps into another war, especially a war in Asia. It should decide whether it is worth while to join hands with Russia and China in a war against Japan. For myself, I say and I have said it often that the United States should remember George Washington's advice. It should mind its own business and stay at home. It should not permit the Jewish international bankers to drive it into another war so that they and their Gentile fronts and sycophants by way of Louis McHenry Howe, the graftmaster, may reap rich profits on everything an army needs from toilet kits to airplanes, submarines, tanks, gas masks, poison gas, ammunition, bayonets, guns, and other paraphernalia and instruments of destruction.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS AND THE AMERICAN CONSULS WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO IMMIGRATION VISAS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the general leave for extension of remarks granted Members at the close of the session, I desire to submit the following:

I wish to call attention to the attitude of the State Department toward Congress in connection with the Executive order of President Hoover and the interpretation of that order by American consuls abroad, in the granting of immigration visas. The State Department has virtually slapped Congress in the face by its attitude during the last few years. I repeat that this Executive order issued by President Hoover and the orders promulgated by the Department of State thereafter is an absolute slap in the face of Congress.

We have adopted a statute which says that there shall be admitted into this country, under all the proper safeguards relative to contract labor, relative to becoming public charges, 150,000 or so immigrants every year.

The conclusion, to my mind, is inescapable, when the State Department undertakes to reduce that quota by 92 percent—not by 10 percent, not by 15 percent, not by 25 percent, but by 92 percent—that they are flouting the will of Congress. Ten or 15 percent might be excusable, but 92 percent cannot be accepted with complacency. That cut is absolutely unlawful and unwarranted under any condition. It is tantamount to almost total exclusion.

I can give you any number of cases within my own experience, in my own office, where the American consuls have been laws unto themselves. The courts have held that we cannot reach out and by certiorari, mandamus, or any other proceeding make them change their wills or judgments in these cases, and they know it and they have acted unreasonably. The State Department's attitude has been such as to give undue emphasis to the Executive order about economic conditions prevailing in this country. The State Department has construed that order to mean absolute exclusion, nonimmigration. And as to the actions of the Department relative to the "public-charge" provisions, I am concerned and alarmed about the undue emphasis given to the Executive order of President Hoover. Had the order been personally construed, I would not complain. But the Department has used the order as an instrument of utter exclusion in 92 percent of all the cases. That is outrageous and unpardonable and must stop. If we could pass a resolution, some sort of a resolution, which would "crack some of these consuls across the knuckles", we would be getting relief, and we need relief. I do not mean to disparage our consuls generally. Most of them are fine men. Perhaps they have acted under instructions from home. If so, we must "crack on the knuckles" some of our State Department officials here in Washington.

I have been asked whether or not the President could not "crack" the Department, or the State Department could not "crack" the consular officers in the various parts of the world and force them to correct the evil conditions. This could be done. The State Department can and should do the "cracking." This expression is a figurative one for discipline or punishment with admonition to sin no more. We could call the Department to task, and it in turn could admonish the consuls not to give undue emphasis to this Presidential proclamation, not to be cruel and oppressive or unreasonable in its application; but then in many cases the consuls would again arbitrarily refuse visas to persons who would not really become public charges—persons who have had as much, taking the combined resources of the immigrant on the other side of the water and what they have had here, as $2,500. It is ridiculous to refuse visas to those with that much money. They would never become public charges. That is a lot of money these days. Some of these excluded immigrants have had more than some Congressmen can claim to their credit. And they have been denied admission into this country. That is what I mean when I say undue emphasis was laid upon the Executive order.

Furthermore, there is no warrant in the statute for the order issued by President Hoover. We pride ourselves on being a Government of law and not of men, but Mr. Hoover made it a Government of men when he issued that order.

Now the Immigration Act is not flexible; it is an inflexible statute. The Secretary of Labor for years has been pleading with you to give him some flexible power, some discretionary power, for example, which would enable him not to deport in cases where there would be an undue hardship. Congress has always denied that right, has always refused to give him that discretion, has always refused to consider the statute flexible; yet we have the State Department saying that the law is flexible, that it can be bent in any way they wish, because of the construction that they wish to place upon the "public-charge" provisions.

Of course, it is true that there must be some distinction between the interpretation given with reference to this public-charge clause in a time of plenty and prosperity and that given when the economic conditions of the country are what they are today with 12,000,000 idle people walking the streets. But, nevertheless, I say that the State Department has twisted the provisions of the statute entirely out of their original purpose; and, while it is true the Department must give color to their construction of the statutes by pointing to the present economic conditions obtaining in this country, I maintain that the Department has not raised its finger to hold in curb, to hold within certain limitations, reasonable limitations, the American consuls abroad. They have been laws unto themselves, and in innumerable cases that have come under my ken and that have come under the ken of the city Members particularly they have been more vigilant, they have been unduly vigilant, they have been unjustly vigilant, of the rights of American workmen in that regard. They have gone to extremes. Instead of weighing the evidence carefully, they have just excluded. It could not be otherwise when they excluded 92 percent. That number is startling.

It may be said that I am inconsistent when I admit that the State Department has a right to construe the law according to the exigencies of any situation that may arise; that a law has to be construed according to the intention of the lawmakers; and if the State Department has a right to interpret it in one way at one time and in another way at another time, we are inconsistent. But this seems to me to be a situation where the rule of reason should operate, just as the Supreme Court adopted a rule of reason in the Anti-trust cases. In a way, by taking this position, we do go right out of court; but I say when you cut the number down to 92 percent, you cut it down unreasonably. It only takes 8 percent more, and then what have you? You have total exclusion—by Congress? No! By the State Department.

How can we go about changing this interpretation and administration of the law? We can do this: We can suggest to the President the rescinding of the order. Every provision of the order is objectionable. The President has no right to issue such an order. The same may be said as to the order issued by Secretary Doak, where that Secretary of Labor said that after a certain date all aliens entering into this country shall be fingerprinted. Now, we who are the older Members of this Congress have set our faces against a proposition of that character and Congress refused to adopt a provision that all aliens shall be fingerprinted or registered. Congress many times refused to pass such a law, yet the Secretary of Labor went out of his way to issue that kind of an order. Thus the Secretary did what Congress forbade. That is what I am inveighing against—these orders issued by executives, whether they be the Secretary of Labor, the President, or the head of a bureau. They have got to stop. The Congress has acted; the Congress has given its word in these matters, and Congress has said that 150,000 aliens should be admitted, and Congress has said that the provisions relative to contract labor and public charges shall be respected, and all I want is that the consuls shall respect them. They do not need any acceleration in their vigilance by Executive orders of this character. I say this: I say rescind that order and you will get what you want, and everyone will be satisfied.

The President has the right to rescind that order, even without a suggestion from Congress. I think the mere adoption of a resolution by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization would be sufficient, and I believe that would be the desirable thing to do; it would be the diplomatic way to do it and, I think, would win our point.

I think the committee would be doing a great service also in the matter of what is happening in Germany at the present time. This, to my mind, would be a very gentle protest; it would give no offense to the German Government—none whatsoever. And I might say, in passing, that Secretary Hull and his immediate staff in a very temperate, fair, and statesmanlike manner have handled admirably the situation which has developed relative to the Jewish question in Germany. His ministrations are healing and will bring a cure, I am sure. Time will vindicate his attitude.

I am not one of those who want to indulge in any intemperate, wild, vituperate, and revengeful remarks against any nation, but what is happening in Germany today is such as to force the entire humanity of the world to take heed and bow its head in shame for Germany. Certainly there is a carnival of hate, an orgy of unreasonable and unreasoning persecution going on at the present time in Germany. The Jews there undoubtedly live in a poisoned atmosphere. We can and ought to succor them if they be eligible for immigration into this country, and we should not be unduly harsh and unreasonable with them on the question of the "public-charge" matter and this unlawful Executive order. We all know that we have always given relief to the persecuted and tempest-tossed. You have but to refer to your history to find copious examples in that regard. Roger Williams founded a colony for those persecuted for their religion. I remember well the words of Washington, written to a very distinguished group of citizens of the Portugese synagogue of Newport, wherein he said he rejoiced that the children of the stock of Abraham can now live in safety under their own vine and fig tree, and there shall be none to make them afraid. Indeed, what is happening in Germany today makes all who happen to be of the stock of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob afraid. Let us remember here and now these words of Washington. Let these hunted and baited Jews live here under their own vine and fig tree unafraid.

If you go to the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor, at the base thereof you will find a very splendid tablet upon which is engraved "The New Colossus." I will just read you one or two lines of the sonnet, "The New Colossus", by Emma Lazarus. America through Liberty is supposed to be speaking and says—

Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses, yearning to breathe free;
* * * send these, the homeless, tempest-tost, to me.
I lift my lamp beside the golden door.

The suggested resolution, in a very temperate way, in a very dignified way, would be a solemn and effective protest to Germany; on the other hand, it would be giving a modicum of relief to some of the children and the aged parents of those who are afflicted now in Germany and who are indeed sorely distraught, who are "tempest-tost" and "homeless" and whose only fault is that they are of the faith in which was born the author of Christianity.

THE VITALLY IMPORTANT INTERESTS OF ALL AMERICANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege unanimously accorded by the House to extend my remarks, I want to say that all the people of the United States are vitally affected by every important transaction that occurs in the Nation's Capital.

Until recently the Washington Post has been in the McLean family for two generations. On June 1 it was sold under a receivership at public auction for $825,000 bid by a lawyer, who refused to disclose the name of the real buyer, its publisher, Edward McLean, having been removed by court order. His estranged wife, Mrs. Evalyn Walsh McLean, made bids up to $600,000, in a strenuous effort to save their newspaper heritage for her two fine boys—the third generation in the McLean-Post lineage. But this struggling mother was ground between the upper and neither millstone of avarice and greed for press power, and her efforts were in vain, for against her on one side was shrewd legal talent representing William Randolph Hearst bidding $800,000, and on her other side was this secret, unnamed dark horse, whose wealth was apparently unlimited, who ran the bidding up successfully to $825,000, taking from her sons their coveted heritage.

With him, in a few years, it will be forgotten that Edward McLean once took to Albert B. Fall $100,000 in greenbacks in a little black satchel. But the parenthood of the world will never forget the mother's love that prompted Evalyn Walsh McLean to spend $100,000 of her own money in trying to find the little baby of Colonel and Mrs. Charles Augustus Lindbergh. So the sympathy of mothers and fathers was with this losing mother in her fight for her boys.

Not until June 12, after the court had approved and confirmed the sale, did this secret buyer come out of hiding and let his identity be known. Then in a center, top, double-column announcement on the front page Eugene Meyer heralded the fact that the Post had been bought for him, that he "is the sole stockholder", that he acted "entirely on my own behalf", and that he had incorporated it for $1,250,000, and would conduct it as an independent paper.

Just what is the purpose of Mr. Eugene Meyer in paying $825,000 for the Washington Post? He has been on the public pay roll of the Government since 1917 handling billions of dollars. He was first adviser nonferrous metals, Advisory Commission of Council of National Defense, and later held the same position with the War Industries Board; was a member of the National Committee on War Savings, and then a director of the War Finance Corporation, becoming managing director; was a member of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and 2 years later became Federal Farm Loan Commissioner; was appointed by President Hoover as Governor of the Federal Reserve Board on September 16, 1930, and also chairman of the board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and not until President Franklin D. Roosevelt had taken over the affairs of this Nation did Eugene Meyer leave his Government positions to become publisher of a newspaper.

All of us remember the unconscionably large salaries of $20,000, $25,000, $30,000, $40,000, $50,000, and even $75,000 that Eugene Meyer permitted to be paid under his regime and the waste and extravagance that existed in his organizations. On April 4, 1933, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY], a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, stated from this floor that during the past 3 or 4 years he had seen the management of the Treasury and of the Federal Reserve Board conducted in a way that was undoubtedly destructive to the best interests of the people of this Nation; and he was applauded for saying it. Then he said that he regarded the present Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Eugene Meyer, as the most detrimental influence to the recovery of this country that it is possible for you to find in all the bounds of this fair land; and again the House applauded him. Then he predicted that unless President Roosevelt discarded Eugene Meyer we would go down in disrepute, just as the Hoover administration did; and again the House applauded. And shortly thereafter Mr. Eugene Meyer separated himself from Government service.

Then on May 23, 1933, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], who for years during Republican regime was Chairman of the great Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives, arose on the floor and on his own responsibility filed impeachment charges against Eugene Meyer and others, which, on motion duly passed, were referred to and are now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, and among numerous others Mr. Eugene Meyer and associates were charged with having defrauded the Government of the United States and the people out of billions of dollars and with causing losses amounting to billions of dollars to the depositors of closed banks.

So, with the above confronting him, Mr. Eugene Meyer, now a private citizen, as a secret, unnamed buyer, paid at a public auction $825,000 for the Washington Post. Just what was his purpose? He says "to run an independent newspaper." If the charges made against him by Congressman BUSBY and Congressman MCFADDEN are true, that is the way he ran our Government business—independent, when it should have been for the public. When, after secretly bidding $825,000 for the Post at auction on June 1, and then after getting such purchase confirmed by the court on June 12, he announced on the front page of his Washington Post the next morning that he "acted entirely on his own behalf", it may make the public wonder just what they may expect from it.

Immediately Publisher Eugene Meyer's Washington Post began to attack the administration. He attacked the President. He attacked the Congress. He attacked me personally. He prophesies that should President Roosevelt propose a reorganization of the municipal government with one man at the head of it, House Members will contend that some citizen of the States be appointed, and that this would embarrass the President because of his Hawaiian Island program. Then his Post asserts that the District will have many violent enemies and few defenders who are more than lukewarm, and that undoubtedly the House, "led by such tirading enemies of the District as Representative THOMAS L. BLANTON (Democrat), of Texas", will want to rewrite the measure to suit themselves. He refers to the enemies of the District as "the Blantons." He even uses the following Attack of the Blantons as a subheadline. And under it he refers to such distinguished, outstanding patriots as Congressman CLARENCE CANNON, of Missouri; JOHN TABER, of New York; JAMES P. BUCHANAN, of Texas (Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations); CARL MAPES, of Michigan; and JAMES FREAR, of Wisconsin, as "enemies of the District", and says that they are determined to impose heavier and heavier taxes on District residents and to restrict their liberty of expenditure, when in truth and in fact he knows full well that through the efforts of these gentlemen he attacked the tax rate for the people of Washington was reduced this coming year from $1.70 to $1.50 per $100, which is the lowest tax rate in the whole United States for any city of comparable size. And he knows that Washington people pay only $8.75 per year per family for the best water in the world; that they pay only $1 per year to register and get license tags for their automobiles, whether they are Fords or Rolls-Royces; that the tax on gasoline here is only 3 cents per gallon, when it is 7 cents in Tennessee; that no additional school or other taxes are paid in Washington notwithstanding the 85,000 school children have the finest schools, the most commodious playgrounds, and the best advantages, and are furnished all of their schoolbooks free, as the tax rate of $1.50 on the $100 covers all taxes paid in Washington, D.C., with an exemption of $1,000 allowed on household furniture. And to try to curry favor with them, Publisher Eugene Meyer has his Post list two Senators by name as dependable friends, whose people back home do not have half of the advantages enjoyed here in Washington, but who pay several times the taxes Washington people pay.

Is not Publisher Eugene Meyer thinking about his own pocketbook? Remember when he bought the Post he said he acted "entirely on his own behalf." Is not he now acting on his own behalf when he thinks that Congress is going to make him pay a tax rate of $1.50 on the $100, and he does not want to pay such tax on his new $825,000 investment here, and he thinks that by attacking some Congressmen and praising some Senators he may be able to reduce the tax rate below $1.50 on the $100, when publishers in other comparable cities are paying as high as $4.70 on the $100?

Then because a Mr. George Reynolds registered at the Pennsylvania Hotel and bought a bottle of rot-gut whisky and was arrested and taken to police station no. 1, where shortly after 5 p.m., he gave his name as that of a prominent Democratic official, though giving an age that was not that of such official and giving an address that was not that of such official, which would clearly indicate him to be an impostor, such police lieutenant at no. 1 station received from such man the $15 collateral required for release, which entitled him to immediate release, but nevertheless held such party locked up from 5 p.m., until 2 a.m., so that a night reporter for the Washington Post could carry the story in front-page headlines in the 1:30 a.m. edition, it looked very much like a frame-up between a newspaper and a police station, especially when the wife, the son, and the office employees of said official all notified said newspaper that such official was in New York and not in Washington.

Just what does Mr. Eugene Meyer hope to profit by running that kind of a newspaper? He may sell that kind of news to the night clubs and running such a newspaper may be profitable in money to him, just as was the way he ran the Federal Reserve banks and other Government business. Fortune Magazine once stated that he started out on his own and has made his money since he was 25 years of age. He ought to remember that it does not pay to commercialize "the souls of men." And every policeman in any way responsible for taking that $15 collateral from the arrested man who registered at the Pennsylvania Hotel as George Reynolds and then kept him locked up for 9 hours thereafter, until an early edition of the Washington Post carrying such scandal was being sold on the streets, ought to be kicked out, lock, stock, and barrel, off of the Metropolitan police force.

Mr. Eugene Meyer is a member of the Metropolitan Club, the Cosmos Club, the Congressional Club, the Racquet Club, the National Press Club, and the Washington Golf and Country Club here in Washington, and also a member of the following clubs in New York, to wit: The Players Club, the Lotos Club, and the Grolier Club. He really does not have time to properly run a newspaper if he attends any of his clubs regularly.

If I would vote to spend all of the millions of dollars out of the Federal Treasury that the Eugene Meyers want expended, and would vote to make the 120,000,000 Americans living in the States pay all of the civic expenses here and the taxes in Washington so as to relieve the Eugene Meyers from paying any taxes on their $825,000 investments in Washington, the Eugene Meyers would gladly give me a several-column write-up, with pictures and everything, on the front page of their Washington newspapers every day. But the newspapers of the Eugene Meyers do not eulogize public officials for doing their duty and protecting the interest of all the people. They eulogize only such Congressmen and Senators as servilely vote big Treasury hand-outs to Washington people at the expense of all the taxpayers of the United States.

As we are to go to our homes until next January, I want to say a word of praise for the three splendid officials who faithfully serve us daily here on the House floor, and who are to remain here hard at work with their many cares, burdens, and responsibilities hanging heavily upon their shoulders every day, every week, and every month between now and next January.

Our able, efficient, and popular Clerk of the House, Hon. South Trimble, of Kentucky, while a farmer by occupation, was twice elected to the Kentucky House of Representatives, and served as speaker of the house during the last year of his second term. He served as a Member of this House of Representatives in the Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth, and Fifty-ninth Congresses. He was the Democratic nominee for lieutenant governor of Kentucky in 1907. He was elected and served as Clerk of this House of Representatives for the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses. And when the Democrats resumed control of the House he was reelected and has served as Clerk of the House in the Seventy-second and this Seventy-third Congress. He is universally well liked and is most accommodating and obliging to every Member.

Our capable and always dependable Sergeant at Arms of the House, Hon. Kenneth Romney, of Montana, has been serving the House of Representatives continuously for the past 19 years. During the time Hon. Champ Clark was Speaker of the House Kenneth Romney was the Assistant Sergeant at Arms. During the 12 years the Republicans were in power Romney served as cashier in the Sergeant at Arms' office. As soon as the Democrats regained control of the House in the Seventy-second Congress, Kenneth Romney was elected Sergeant at Arms, and was reelected for the Seventy-third Congress. No official employed in the Capitol is more courteous, more obliging, more painstaking to serve, or more dependable than is Kenneth Romney. Many Members who know him personally have deep affection for him. Numerous Members fraternize with him socially, and no man in the Capitol has more friends. Kenneth Romney is well educated, with training in the University of the State of Washington and in the George Washington University here. He has a splendid young son who has just reached the age of 21. Kenneth Romney has been the official tally clerk in the last three Democratic National Conventions, and is a loyal, patriotic party Democrat.

Hon. Joseph J. Sinnott, of Virginia, is our always-dependable Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, and is one of the best-known party Democrats in Washington. During the years Champ Clark was Speaker Joe Sinnott served as Doorkeeper of the House. On the many occasions during the war Congress that it was necessary to assemble both Houses in joint session to hear President Woodrow Wilson deliver his famous messages to Congress, and on the occasions when all high officials, foreign and domestic, would be present, it was Joe Sinnott who with so much dignity and efficiency formally announced them all as in line of seniority they appeared at the door. Joe Sinnott has been doorkeeper of several Democratic National Conventions and has rendered many courtesies to numerous Members. As Doorkeeper of the House, he has under his jurisdiction and personal control many scores of employees, and he is kept busy every month in the entire year. He is a fine official, a good friend, and a loyal Democrat.

THE VINDICATION (?) OF C. E. MITCHELL, FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL CITY BANK

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, during the last few years more than 200 small bankers have been convicted or plead guilty and many more have been indicted and will be sent to the penitentiary or the jails for illegal acts.

Today's newspapers, in enlarged headlines, herald the distressing and poignant information that Charles E. Mitchell, erstwhile head of the National City Bank, has been acquitted. I am surprised that the jury did not award Mr. Mitchell a medal for his "uprightness" and "honesty" and zeal in "protecting" the investing and depositing public.

No wonder the people of the United States are commencing to lose confidence in their judicial system and how justice is being administered.

From the statements of Senator GLASS on the floor of the Senate, and many other responsible and well-informed authorities, Mr. Mitchell, one-time head of the National City Bank, in conjunction with the House of Morgan, the Chase National, and a few other large banking institutions, brought about the existing deplorable conditions in the United States, which have caused the closing of about 6,000 banks and are responsible for the losses and the plight of many of the smaller bankers who have been imposed upon by this atrocious, flagitious, heinous Wall Street interlocking combination. These small bankers, in some cases of improper or limited experience, relied upon the selfish and criminal recommendations of the big bankers in connection with the sale and buying of millions of worthless bonds and stocks that have been shamefully unloaded, and thereby rendered these small banks insolvent. Consequently these small bankers are being sent daily to the penitentiary while the arch conspirators, potential felons, one and all, headed by Mr. Mitchell and his unique kind, are being made free, perhaps in the due course of time, again to plague the business world.

Although I do not desire to attempt to defend some of the small bankers who have crassly become a prey to these dishonest manipulations, nevertheless my sympathies are with most of those who unwittingly, ignorantly erred through machination of that nefarious coterie of investment bankers headed by Mr. Mitchell and such like who brought about the downfall of so many small banks. Therefore I am very much pleased to read in the press of today that Attorney General Cummings, able foe of wrongdoers, is determined to prosecute and bring to justice not only the little fellows, many of whom have simply been unfortunate, but will persistently and zealously go after those actually responsible.

Something must be done, and done soon, before the masses of the people of this country lose all respect for the courts of the land. Gradually the feeling is growing that there is one kind of justice for the rich and another for the poor. The acquittal of Charles E. Mitchell will tend to increase that suspicion.

The acquittal came as a great surprise to nearly everyone that had been following the case. The newspaper accounts of the testimony tended to create the impression in the public mind that a strong case had been set up by the Government against Mitchell.

The charge was that this banker tried to defraud the Government of income taxes in 1929 and 1930 through fake sales of stock and through failure to report receipt of income from the National City Co.'s management fund. It was alleged that the sale of stock to his wife was a racket by which he could appear to sell the stock but actually keep it. This charge seemed to have been fully proven by the following facts: No transfer tax stamps were affixed. No notice was given to J. P. Morgan & Co. that he had sold the stock which they held as collateral for his loan. His wife paid no cash whatever for the stock, nor did she receive delivery of the stock.

Therefore, it is little wonder that millions of people view the acquittal of this money king as a miscarriage of justice.

One thing is self-evident to me, and that is that Congress at the very next session must tighten up the laws if we have not sufficiently done so in the session just closed, to make this kind of juggling hereafter and forever impossible.

AN ANALYSIS AND DISCUSSION OF SOME OF THE MAJOR MEASURES PASSED BY THE SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, INCLUDING THE SUBMISSION OF THE AMENDMENT TO THE STATES FOR THE REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, leave having been granted to extend my remarks, I desire to place in the Record a letter written by me to Hon. W. E. W. Yerby, of Greensboro, Ala., in reply to a letter from him requesting a statement from me relative to the major measures passed by the Seventy-third Congress, and making special inquiry as to the submission of the amendment to the States for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. Yerby has served several terms as a Member of our State legislature and has for many years been the owner and editor of one of the outstanding weekly papers of the State and a lifelong prohibitionist.

Since his letter typifies inquiries received from other constituents and he has requested that my reply be made public, I here insert in the RECORD my letter, in which I have briefly analyzed and discussed some of the major measures passed by Congress, including the repeal amendment.

Hon. W. E. W. YERBY,
Editor Greensboro Watchman,
Greensboro, Ala.

DEAR MR. YERBY: I am grateful for your letter of recent date, and it is a pleasure to comply with your request for a statement of the achievements of President Roosevelt's administration during the few months our party has had control of the National Government. It is a record of which we, as Jeffersonian Democrats, have every right to be proud, and one to the larger fulfillment of which we can dedicate ourselves with confidence.

Our Democratic platform, adopted at Chicago, carried these words:

"We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when intrusted with power."

Never has any party moved as swiftly to keep such a covenant with the people who voted it in power. Our major pledges have been translated into law; the President now is moving to carry them into action:

To establish control over all industry, with the view to fixing minimum wages and maximum hours of work, regulating production, and otherwise to promote, encourage, and require fair competition;

To set up a system of Government licenses for business, if necessary to require conformance to the above;

To initiate and direct, through a Federal director of public works, a $3,300,000,000 public-works program as a further Government contribution to reemployment—of which sum more than $12,000,000 has already been allocated for immediate expenditure in Alabama;

To direct, through a Federal Director of Relief, expenditure of $500,000,000 supplied by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for relief of destitution;

To invoke the Presidential powers of the World War to regulate transactions in credit, currency, gold, and silver, even to embargo gold or foreign exchange; to fix restrictions on the banking business of the Federal Reserve System irrespective of the Federal Reserve Board;

To extend direct price relief to agriculture to raise the growers' prices of cotton, wheat, and other basic commodities. (The President's plan will be presented to the farmers of Alabama at once, and my earnest hope is that they will willingly cooperate);

To provide for refinancing loans on farms and on homes in cities and towns, definite information as to the details of which is available through State and county agents in Alabama;

To reduce Federal expenditures looking to a balanced Budget;

To reduce by Executive order the salaries of all Government employees by an amount not to exceed 15 percent upon the finding of commensurate reduction in cost of living;

To transfer, eliminate, consolidate, or rearrange bureaus in the executive branch of the Government in the interest of public economy;

To repeal by Executive proclamation certain new taxes voted in the Industrial Recovery Act upon showing of restoration of business or in event of repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

To publish heretofore secret income-tax returns to the extent the President may deem in the public interest, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe;

To inflate the currency either by requiring open-market operations in Federal securities, devaluing the gold dollar by not more than 50 percent, issuing United States notes up to $3,000,000,000, or accepting up to $200,000,000 in silver in payment of the allied war debts;

To employ more than 250,000 unemployed men in reforestation operations, as a still further Government contribution to reemployment;

To appoint a coordinator of railroads to effect economies among the carriers and improve the service to the public;

To appoint a Tennessee Valley Authority to develop natural resources of Tennessee River Basin, including completion of Muscle Shoals project, for which $50,000,000 has already been appropriated and allocated;

The Glass-Steagall bill to prevent banks from employing deposits of the public in speculation and to separate them from affiliates dealing in securities, for stricter supervision of banking, and to set up a corporation to insure bank deposits.

It is my purpose during the summer to visit the counties of my district and discuss such parts of this important legislation as may be of immediate interest to my constituents.

You ask me specifically about repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

President Roosevelt, as a true Jeffersonian, dedicated himself and the Democratic Party to accomplish repeal when he said in his speech of acceptance at Chicago:

"This convention wants repeal. Your candidate wants repeal. And I am confident that the United States of America wants repeal."

During the campaign Mr. Roosevelt devoted his major addresses to specific issues one at a time. His first formal speech was devoted to repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Not content with that, however, he reiterated his stand in several subsequent addresses in different parts of the country. He set his feet squarely on the Jeffersonian principle of State rights and there he has stood and called the Democratic Party to stand with him.

That I propose to do, and it pleases me that you take the same position.

I am confident Alabama can and will do no less.

President Roosevelt has linked repeal of the eighteenth amendment with the whole of his economic, reconstruction, and prosperity program in such a way as to render it impossible now for any true supporter of the President to tear them apart. It is inconsistent to back the President on his great industrial and public-works program, while refusing to accept his plan to finance the necessary bond issue through taxation. The temporary taxes which Congress voted are to remain only until repeal shall have been accomplished.

In urging that the States repeal the eighteenth amendment at the earliest possible date, the administration in Washington has sought merely to confirm the party platform on which a triumphant Democracy rode into office last November promising a better day for America. The Democratic platform declared not merely for the submission of a repeal resolution by the Congress but for actual repeal. That cannot be accomplished until 36 States have ratified the repealing resolution.

It is a dual purpose, therefore, which President Roosevelt has in mind and for which he has engaged the full strength of his administration. The first was to make good on the party pledge. The second is to enable him to carry forward his reconstruction program with a balanced system of Federal revenues.

Anyone moderately familiar with the situation prevailing today respecting national prohibition cannot help but realize that repeal of the eighteenth amendment is inevitable. As State after State has registered its sentiments, the size of the popular majorities for repeal have mounted beyond the expectations even of the most ardent repealists.

Since you ask permission to publish my reply, I trust it will not be thought inappropriate to interject this brief personal reference:

As you and other friends at home know, I am a total abstainer from all forms of alcoholic beverages and, recognizing the value of prohibition, have endeavored in my private and public life to foster a public sentiment for the observance and enforcement of our State and National prohibition laws.

I voted to submit the eighteenth amendment to the determination of the voters of the several States, and after its submission favored ratification by our State. It was my confident hope that it would grow in public favor and that its resultant benefits to the spiritual, social, and economic life of our people would insure for it widespread and national support.

Frankness forces me to say that my hope of such national support has not been realized, but, on the contrary, a widespread national sentiment against the retention of the eighteenth amendment has steadily grown and for some time prior to June 1932 it had become so pronounced as to be reflected in resolutions strongly urging repeal, adopted by many representative national organizations, including the American Legion, the American Federation of Labor, and the American Bar Association.

The repeal plank in the platform of our party at its last national convention was responsive to this sentiment so dominant throughout the Nation. I respectfully submit that it harmonizes with the Jeffersonian doctrine of State rights and with the basic fundamental of democracy that ours is a Government of, for, and by the people.

Now, in conclusion I wish to appeal to the people of my district to give full and hearty support to our party and its great President on July 18 next, just as they did in November last. I concede the absolute sincerity and honesty of conviction of those prohibition friends whose views may not be in accord with those herein expressed by me, but it is my firm conviction, after a careful survey of all the facts, that the cause of temperance will be substantially advanced by returning to the sovereign States the control of the liquor traffic within their own boundaries and guaranteeing full Federal aid to prevent the importation of alcoholic beverages into any State contrary to its laws, as the pending amendment does. My belief is that all States will immediately pass strict regulatory measures and restrictions where liquors are permitted to be sold and that eventually many States now without any enforcement or regulatory statutes whatever will return to the prohibition fold with a strong sustaining public opinion for the strict enforcement of State laws.

The representatives from Alabama, in both House and Senate, favored the submission of the pending repeal amendment, and, without consulting them, I venture to assert that none of them will say to his constituents that it is wise or advisable to longer retain the eighteenth amendment in the Federal Constitution.

It has been said that those who favor repeal seek a return of saloons. This may be true of some, but I am sure it is not true of many. Certainly no one will claim that the many prohibitionists of Alabama who will vote for repeal favor the return of saloons, but, on the contrary, I am confident they stand ready to oppose any such effort.

The repeal of the eighteenth amendment will leave unimpaired Alabama's prohibition laws and will simply clothe the people of Alabama with full power to solve the problem as may to them be deemed best, and in their own way. There can be no return of saloons in our State unless our people so decide. I do not fear such a development and I am willing to trust the sovereign voters of the State to safeguard us against the evils of the liquor traffic, and I personally favor the retention of our present prohibition laws.

Alabama, I respectfully submit, should no longer insist on retaining the eighteenth amendment in the Constitution, contrary to the undisputed and undeniable attitude of the American people. To do so can only serve to arouse intense bitterness and dissensions that may seriously hamper the effectiveness of the support and cooperation which, I believe, our people earnestly desire to extend to our President in this critical hour of our country's history. The greatest asset to recovery from our economic ills is to continue our implicit confidence and faith in the integrity and high purposes of our President.

With kind personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

W. B. OLIVER.

THE HAWLEY-SMOOT TARIFF ACT MATERIALLY CONTRIBUTED TO THE IMPOVERISHMENT OF AMERICAN AGRICULTURE BY DESTROYING THE FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC MARKETS FOR OUR SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, when the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was pending, I repeatedly protested against its excessive and unconscionable rates, and contended that its enactment would provoke other nations and cause them to enact retaliatory tariff laws which would destroy the foreign market for the products of our farms, factories, mills, and mines. I pointed out that the productivity of the American people had increased so tremendously that we must have a foreign market to absorb our surplus products, otherwise we would be compelled to market our commodities far below the cost of production, which would inevitably end in the impoverishment of our people.

When the high priests of the Republican Party were railroading the Hawley-Smoot bill through the House, I presented official statistics showing the magnitude and value of our foreign trade. I showed that without a foreign market for our surplus agricultural and industrial products the American farmers and American manufacturers would be compelled to reduce production below a profitable level, which would mean a nonutilization of our tremendous resources and halt our hitherto resistless march toward financial and economic world power.

I told my Republican friends that we had no copyright, patent, or monopoly on high tariff laws and that other nations could very easily retaliate and impose such high tariffs against our products that we would no longer be able to ship them abroad, which would mean a very substantial impairment of our national income and national wealth. But in violation of their platform pledges and disregard of the campaign promises of Mr. Hoover, the Republican Party proceeded to enact the highest tariff schedules in the history of our Nation.

Although the Republican leaders and Members of Congress eloquently argued that the passage of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill would not irritate other nations or provoke them to enact retaliatory tariff legislation, nevertheless in a few months after the passage of the Hawley-Smoot bill more than 40 great nations had raised their tariff schedules and made their tariffs against American products so high that the foreign market for our surplus commodities was not only made unprofitable but practically destroyed. Republican leaders in and out of Congress boldly asserted that within 60 or 90 days after the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Law good times would return and we would be flooded with prosperity. Everyone, including these Republican leaders, now knows, how empty, idle, and worthless those prophesies were.

The Hawley-Smoot tariff bill not only destroyed our foreign market for products of our farms, factories, and mills but it contributed materially to the impoverishment of practically every vocational group, including the manufacturers. Under the pernicious influence of this legislation the market price of farm commodities fell to the lowest level in history, our railroad systems were paralyzed, our factories idle, commerce at a standstill, business unprofitable, and the myriad millions of our citizenry either in or on the brink of the bottomless pit of disaster.

When the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was pending, more than 1,000 outstanding economists connected with practically every one of our great universities protested against the high tariff rates and appealed to Mr. Hoover to veto the measure. These men were not politicians but economists and profound students of government, and most of them were Republicans. But the scholarship of America counted for nothing when the industrial lords were clamoring for increased bounties.

Far-seeing business men warned President Hoover against this bill, which they said would destroy our foreign market and ultimately destroy our domestic industries. In answer to the argument that the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill would revive industry and cure unemployment Henry Ford said:

> I say it will have precisely the reverse effect. It will stultify business and industry and increase unemployment. When you prevent your customers from purchasing your goods, you are absolutely throwing men out of work. I know something about employment, and I say that this tariff reduces the number of American jobs.

Ever since the Hawley-Smoot bill was enacted practically all great foreign nations have raised their tariff walls so high that American farm and industrial products are practically excluded from these foreign markets, where they had previously sold at a profit to the American agriculturist. For instance, the tariff on wheat in most of the European countries will average $1 per bushel, or four times the farm price of wheat in the United States during the lowest stage of the Hoover depression.

The French Parliament is now considering a radical price-fixing wheat bill, an essential feature of which establishes the minimum price of wheat at 115 francs a metric quintal, which at the present exchange rate is approximately $1.54 per bushel, as a quintal contains 3⅔ bushels. The mimimum price of 115 francs a quintal is to increase 1 franc per quintal on the first of each month until and including June 1934, by which time the price will have reached 125 francs a quintal, or $1.73 a bushel, at the current rate of exchange. The funds to sustain this price-fixing program are to be provided by a progressive tax on grinding. To supplement the agricultural-credit fund already accumulated, amounting to 200,000,000 francs, the bill provides for an additional 400,000,000 francs, or a total of approximately $28,000,000, to insure the operation of the plan, including the subsidy to exporters.

As a direct and inescapable result of this legislation no wheat will be imported into France for at least a year, as without an embargo against foreign wheat France could not maintain the domestic price of wheat at more than double the level of the world price. For some time there have been no importations of wheat into France because foreign wheat cannot leap the French tariff wall already so high as to be prohibitive, and for the further reason that there is a law in France requiring the use of 100 percent domestic wheat in flour.

The French Government is trying to reach the same objective as that for which President Roosevelt is striving, namely, the stabilization of the price of wheat on a higher level, although conditions differ greatly in the two countries. The French Government is taking this stabilization step as a result of long study and agitation, and because of the heavy crop last year from which there is a large carry-over.

When the price of wheat in France began to decline as a result of last year's heavy production, on complaint of the farmers the Government first paid a bonus to those who withheld their surplus wheat from the market, and then encouraged the use of wheat in making alcohol, but these measures were unavailing to prevent a sharp decline in prices, and the indications that this year's crop will be large caused a further sagging of the market.

At the present time the official price of wheat in France is about $1.14 a bushel, which does not return to the French peasant the cost of production. It is quite evident that the French Government has embarked on this price-stabilization program determined to maintain wheat prices on a level that will yield the growers a fair profit over and above production costs.

The bill which will undoubtedly be enacted will have the following effects:

First. Foreign wheat imports into France would be prohibited.

Second. A bonus of approximately a dollar a bushel on wheat is granted to French exporters, which anywhere in the world will permit French wheat to undersell wheat from any other country.

Third. The bill fixes the legal price of wheat in France at 115 francs a quintal, which at the fluctuating rates of exchange will be from $1.33 to $1.54 per bushel. The bill provides that anyone selling or buying wheat under the fixed price is liable to prosecution, and anyone holding as much as 33 bushels of wheat flour must declare whether it is domestic or foreign. The bill also contains drastic regulations on crops and sowings.

The action of France in closing her markets to our agricultural products is not different from that of other European nations that have been irritated and outraged by our high tariff laws and who are giving us "a dose of our own medicine" in the form of retaliatory tariff laws.

I am wondering if the American farmers know that for several years the price of wheat has been by law artificially fixed and maintained with a reasonable degree of success in several European nations. I am not ignorant of the so-called "inexorable law of supply and demand", under the cover of which many plausible fallacies and much false propaganda flourish. While recognizing the law of supply and demand, I nevertheless assert what is a self-evident truth, that in the United States and in every one of the States there are numerous laws which directly or indirectly neutralize, and at times render impotent and ineffective, the much misunderstood law of supply and demand.

Our entire industrial structure is built on a system of high tariff laws that tremendously weakens and often destroys the law of supply and demand. We have statutes that set at naught the law of supply and demand with reference to railroad passenger and freight rates. We have laws that destroy the law of supply and demand with reference to telephone, electric lights, gas, and water rates. We have numerous statutes that protect public-utility companies from the law of supply and demand. The law of supply and demand is quite elastic, is easily manipulated, and often entirely neutralized by Federal and State statutes. It is a garment that special privilege puts on and off at pleasure. For instance, the Interstate Commerce Commission and all public-service boards and commissions are created for the express purpose of neutralizing, artificially controlling, and often for the purpose of destroying the so-called "ruthless law of supply and demand."

I am wondering how long the American farmers will continue to be hewers of wood and drawers of water; how long they will tolerate a tariff system that destroys the market for their surplus products, reduces their purchasing power to the vanishing point, and which is relentlessly driving them to a state of peasantry. Industry has always been the favorite and spoiled child of Uncle Sam. Agriculture has produced a larger proportion of our national wealth than has come from any other vocational group, but by legislative favoritism, special-privilege laws, and class legislation other occupations have been unjustly favored and enriched, while agriculture has been denied equal opportunity with industry and has been driven from the council table around which the political and economic policies of the Nation are formulated.

Before the farmer can come into his own the market price of his commodities must be stabilized on a higher level, so as to yield him not only the cost of production but a fair profit over and above production costs. His purchasing power must be very substantially increased, and the spread between what he gets for his commodities and the price he pays for his supplies must be materially reduced so the farmer may be able to balance his budget and live in the comfort to which he is entitled by reason of his unremitting industry and contribution to our social order, civic progress, and the stabilization of our civilization. Moreover, the farmer's mortgages must be refinanced over a long term of years, and at a low rate of interest, and his National, State, and local taxes must be radically reduced. Unless these objectives can be obtained the future of the American farmer is without hope.

The Democratic Party for 150 years has been the aggressive and consistent friend of agriculture, and when the present Democratic national administration was inaugurated probably the most important of the many outstanding policies of the administration were those having for their object the immediate and permanent rehabilitation of agriculture. I am convinced that under the leadership of the Democratic Party Roosevelt will revitalize this great basic industry and restore it to its rightful place among the profitable occupations. If agriculture is reduced to a state of peasantry, our scheme of government will fail and our civilization perish.

THE EXTRA SESSION OF THE SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, when President Roosevelt called into extra session the Seventy-third Congress the citizens of the United States were experiencing the most serious situation that had ever confronted any nation. Our banks were practically all closed; industry had reached its lowest ebb, and there were more people out of employment than ever before. It was absolutely necessary that something be done at once or this Nation might have undergone such a change as to have produced a Hitler or a Mussolini, in order to break the strangle hold that big business had obtained because of special favors received at the hands of administrations in the past.

President Roosevelt submitted a program which consisted of farm relief, reforestation, emergency gold control, Tennessee Valley development, reorganization of railroads, emergency bank control—including guaranty of deposits, home-mortgage refinancing, public works, and industrial control, and the reorganization of various bureaus of the Government to bring about economy. Never before in the past has legislation been enacted into law so fast. In other words, something had to be done immediately or there would have been a financial collapse such as would have paralyzed industry and had a disastrous effect on every citizen. I am proud to have had a small part in cooperating with our beloved President and feel that he is entitled to the congratulations of every citizen in the Nation.

During my tenure in office never at any time has a deaf ear been turned to any veteran of any war, but, on the other hand, I have sponsored the cause of every individual who has this status, and no one can truthfully say that any act of mine has been detrimental to the wishes of those who volunteered or were taken into the service for the purpose of defending our country.

Recently my attention has been called to an affidavit made by a man by the name of William M. Siegers, who resides at Amarillo, Tex., and who claims to have had an interview with me. This affidavit originated at Clinton, Okla. It appears to be a deliberate frame-up on the part of those who have opposed me in the past. It will probably be circulated by someone who is an enemy of the ex-service men. The statements contained in the same cannot be corroborated by any other person in the United States or in any letter that was ever written from my office, and this attempt on the part of designing politicians only goes to show what cheap efforts will be taken by individuals when they go outside of the State to get someone to make an affidavit who admits that he was gassed, and if such is the case his mind was probably affected to the extent that he could be used as a cat's-paw for others and be made to sign a statement that is absolutely false. In fact, I do not have any recollection of ever talking to any such person, and no one in my office even remembers him.

There are thousands of ex-service men, fathers and mothers, widows and orphans, who have been directly interested in benefits which have been secured for them by me who will resent any such method that may be used by those who are responsible for this act, and all I ask is that the records speak for themselves.

I am grateful to the fine citizenship of the Seventh Congressional District for the loyal way they have cooperated with me in the past. I am proud of the confidence that has been bestowed upon me by my colleagues in Congress, and I am highly gratified that it has been my pleasure to stand with our great President, whose record will always mark him as a humanitarian of the highest order.

THE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—THE MOST MOMENTOUS AND UNUSUAL PEACE TIME SESSION IN THE HISTORY OF ALL CONGRESSES

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the special session of the Seventy-third Congress came to a close in the early morning hours of June 16. Never before in history had one short session of Congress accomplished more—never had a legislative body been faced with more momentous problems to untangle, and never had a Congress more splendidly met their duty to their country, their President, and their people. The far-reaching effect of the major measures enacted at this session cannot be realized for many months, but there can be no question of the statement that the lives and fortunes of every individual in this Nation will be touched and the course of many changed.

In the short space of 3½ months it enacted 12 major constructive measures and passed legislation which enabled the President, by bringing about economies in governmental expenditures, to balance the Budget for the first time in several years. It was indeed a remarkable feat to so quickly wipe out the deficit which has occurred for the past 3 years and which aggregated over $5,000,000,000. All of these laws were recommended by the great leader in the White House and passed by Congress with the object of restoring the purchasing power of the people, reviving industry, business, and agriculture, and putting the millions of unemployed back to work and giving relief to those who needed it.

It was manifest that a return to prosperity could not be brought about by the old methods—a "new deal" was necessary, and the President so declared in his preelection campaign. When Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated President on March 4 a national bank holiday had been declared in many States of the Union. In fact, nearly every bank had either closed its doors or was on the verge of doing so. Business and industry was at its lowest ebb since the beginning of the economic depression. Agriculture was in the depths of despair. Millions of idle men and women were walking the streets in increasing numbers looking for jobs. The people had lost confidence in the ability of their Government to bring about a recovery. Economic chaos threatened the country to a more alarming extent than in the darkest days of the preceding years. The Government seemed powerless to relieve the situation. A "new deal" was not only required but a leader of courage and quick decision was needed to put it into effect and to inspire that confidence in the people which was essential to recovery. Such a leader appeared in President Roosevelt. His short inaugural address was an inspiration and served as a clarion call to the people of all parties to rally together and shake off the depression which was holding our country in its grasp. In that address he declared:

So, first of all, let me assert my firm belief that the only thing we have to fear is fear itself—nameless, unreasoning, unjustified terror which paralyzes needed effort to convert retreat into advance. In every dark hour of our national life a leadership of frankness and vigor has met with that understanding and support of the people themselves which is essential to victory. I am convinced that you will again give that support to leadership in these critical days.

The American people responded immediately. Hope and courage replaced despair and fear. There was an instant rebirth of confidence and the Nation turned its eyes toward their new leader in whom they placed their faith. Congress was at once called into extra session and recommendations for changes in our banking laws were made and enacted into law, giving relief in the existing national emergency in banking. Within a few days all sound banks were reopened and the "unreasoning" fear of a bank debacle was dissipated by prompt and courageous action.

This was followed by other recommendations looking to the relief of the country, all of which were enacted into law. I dare say that there is no other instance in history where a President has made so many recommendations and all of them so quickly enacted without one single exception.

And I would not fail to pay tribute to the fine spirit of cooperation of the Republican minority which joined the Democratic majority in placing the stamp of approval on nearly all of these measures. I wish to give the full meed of praise to every Member of Congress who joined in the support of the President in his effort to relieve conditions which were in many respects even worse than those of war times.

Commenting the other day on the work of the special session of the Seventy-third Congress and of the achievements of the Roosevelt administration up to that time, a prominent Washington newspaper writer, in a leading independent daily said that—

A check at the end of the first phase of the Roosevelt administration reveals that most of the major Democratic Party platform pledges have been started on the way to fulfillment.

This—

is one of the most exceptional feats in modern politics. First, because of the rapid-fire speed with which it has been done and, second, because it is a real novelty to have such a thing happen at all, since politicians generally have regarded platforms as being made to run on and not to stand on.

The writer went on to show that a "check on the fate of Democratic platform pledges adopted a year ago at the Chicago convention" shows action has been taken toward execution of promises in the following:

First. Government economy.
Second. Balancing the Budget.
Third. Reduction of tariffs by negotiation.
Fourth. Unemployment relief and reemployment.
Fifth. Farm and mortgage relief.
Sixth. Water-power development in the public interest.
Seventh. Securities control.
Eighth. Correction of banking weaknesses.
Ninth. Pursuance of a foreign policy which would include a pledge to consult with other nations in carrying out the Kellogg Anti-war Pact.
Tenth. Repeal of prohibition and modification of the Volstead Act.

Although the administration was only 100 days old, it was remarked that of all the pledges made by the Democratic Party in its national platform adopted at Chicago, action had not as yet been taken with respect to but two—regulation of holding companies, interstate utility rates, and commodity and stock exchanges for one, and the strengthening of the Corrupt Practices Act for the other.

Truly this is a remarkable record. It is therefore with a feeling of pride in my party, pride in its chosen leader, President Roosevelt, pride in its majority in this Congress, that I bring into review for consideration the events and the accomplishments of the administration of President Roosevelt and of the Democratic majority in the special session of the Seventy-third Congress.

I truly hope that this country will never again be faced with a situation so grave as that with which it was confronted when the present Democratic administration came into complete control of the Government with the inauguration of President Roosevelt on March 4 last. The events of the last several weeks preceding that inauguration are too fresh in your memories to be recalled here; the picture of the distress, the doubts, and the fears and dangers which then existed are too vivid ever to be forgotten.

Never in the peace-time history of the American Republic did the Nation face a situation so grave, and I doubt if it is any exaggeration to say that not even in any war emergency which we as a people have ever faced was there a time when the peril to our institutions and to our well-being was as great. More than 10,000,000 of men and women were, through no fault of their own, out of employment, and no work was to be found anywhere. Industry was paralyzed, credit was destroyed, agriculture was at the very brink of bankruptcy, and millions of citizens, on the farms, in the villages, and towns and in the cities, were threatened with the loss of everything they had saved through a lifetime of toil and struggle. As I have said, banks were failing at such a rapid rate that in a score of States bank holidays had been declared. Money had either gone into hiding or was locked up in bank vaults, credit had been destroyed, and in many communities the old-fashioned custom of trade and barter of a century and a half ago had been revived in order that people might obtain the bare necessities of bodily comfort—food, clothing, and fuel.

This was the situation when President Roosevelt assumed the guidance of our national destiny at noon on that fateful 4th day of March. A nation, indeed the whole world, stood by to listen to his inaugural address, to hear what of comfort or of hope he could hold out to a stricken people in their hour of peril.

I have referred to the promises which were contained in the Democratic Party's platform of 1932. It was the shortest, clearest, and most unequivocal declaration of principles and pledges ever written by the national convention of any great political party. Although the Democratic administration is as yet only 100 days old, practically every pledge of that platform has been kept, and the country now knows that there is at least one party which believes that pledges are sacred and must be kept.

As that platform was short and to the point, so was the inaugural address of the President brief and specific. It fell upon the ear of a waiting world as a message of hope. None who heard his ringing pledge to service could fail to be cheered. It was clear that as in the days of Jackson and Wilson, another great crisis had developed another great leader; that a firm hand, a great mind, and a devoted heart were united in the person of the man who had come into the most powerful and the most important position in all the world.

President Roosevelt's first Executive order, effective on Monday, March 6, the first working day of the new administration, declared a banking holiday to meet the financial crisis which had settled upon the country, sweeping thousands of banks into insolvency and wiping out the savings of millions of depositors and stockholders. This order was intended to stop the runs on banking institutions and to save those which were yet solvent. He at the same time declared an embargo on gold exports for the period of the bank holiday.

Not only did these orders accomplish the purpose for which they were intended but they did far more. They did much to restore public confidence. They stopped runs on the banks, so that when the period of the banking holiday had expired every bank that was solvent was enabled to reopen and confidence in it was reestablished.

On the same day on which he declared the banking holiday the President issued a call for Congress to meet in special session on March 9. When this body had convened, with its large Democratic majorities in both Senate and House, the President sent to it, and it enacted that day, the first of the series of legislative enactments which have restored public confidence, have started the wheels of industry revolving again, have stimulated trade, started commodity prices upward, and have, in short, caused confidence to displace doubt, hope to succeed despair, and have set at work constructive instead of destructive forces, until today the American people are again facing the future with courage, with pride, and with confidence.

In quick succession the President transmitted to Congress recommendations for the enactment of the various measures which have subsequently been passed and are now law, such as the Economy Act, the Farm Credits Act, bills for the relief of the unemployed and for reemployment, the Railroad Act, and other measures, all units in a great planned program of reconstruction and rehabilitation, which I shall enumerate in somewhat more detail a little further along.

No darker picture ever met the view of the American people than that upon which they were compelled to look during the closing days of the last administration With what relief, with what new hope and confidence, we view the altered picture of today. Let me give you just a few facts and figures. We all know, and have long known, that agriculture is the basic industry of our country. If it is prosperous, other industry prospers and the people are busy and happy. The farmer cannot be prosperous until he obtains a decent return for his labor. That he cannot obtain until he is paid a price for his products which will give him a fair margin above his cost of production. Although the Roosevelt administration is only 100 days old, and the Democratic Party's reconstruction program is not yet entirely in operation, there has been a sharp upward curve in the price of farm products, and there is reason to believe that on this year's crops the American farmer will realize a profit for the first time in many, many years. Increases in the price of wheat and cotton, two of our greatest staples, furnish evidence of the truth of what I have said.

On March 3 last hard winter wheat sold at Kansas City for as little as 44.4 cents per bushel. On June 10 last the same wheat sold on the same market for 73.4 cents per bushel, an increase of 66 percent.

On March 3 last the average price of spot middling cotton on nine principal exchanges in the United States was 6.06 cents, while on June 10 last it sold on the same exchanges at an average price of 9.13 cents per pound, an increase of 3.07 cents per pound, or of 50 percent. The figures I have quoted are from the Department of Agriculture.

It has been said that under present conditions the American farmer can be prosperous and happy with dollar wheat and 10-cent cotton. Dollar wheat is in sight and 10-cent cotton is almost at hand.

Increased prices, which make for increased values, are being quoted on every hand, and, with few exceptions, these increases are finding their way in part into the pockets of the workingman. Where during the last 3 or 4 years reduced wages and vanishing dividends have been the rule, we now see daily in the public press announcements of workers returning to the mills, of increases in wages, and it is no longer too much to expect that the day of regular and substantial dividends for the investor is not remotely in the future.

That there is confidence that such a day will soon again be at hand we may see in the rising value of securities listed on the country's trading exchanges.

The average value of stock securities listed on the New York exchange rose from 52 to 92 between March 4 and June 10.

The average value of bonds listed on the same exchange rose between the same dates from 74 to 84½.

Between those same dates the level of commodity prices on the produce exchanges rose from 85 points to 120, an increase of 35 points, or more than 40 percent.

Also the return of confidence in the country's financial institutions is reflected in the average price of the stocks of banks and trust companies listed on the New York counter market, that increase having approximated 50 percent between March 4 and June 10.

Certainly these figures reflect a restoration of confidence, the dawn of hope in the future of our country and the return of prosperity to its people. Certainly, too, it reflects the faith of the people in a Democratic administration which, in this short time, has achieved this record, unsurpassed in the entire history of the country.

Let me now call your attention item by item to the series of legislative achievements of the present administration and of the special session of the Democratic Seventy-third Congress which go to make up this marvelous record.

INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY AND PUBLIC WORKS

The purposes of this act are, as defined by President Roosevelt: (1) To obtain wide reemployment; (2) to shorten the working week; (3) to pay decent wages for the shorter week; (4) to prevent unfair competition; and (5) to prevent disastrous overproduction.

This act repeals for 1 year those sections of the antitrust laws which forbid trade agreements, looking to the stabilization of wages, of prices, and of working conditions. It establishes a Federal license system to enforce agreements against recalcitrant units, and empowers the President to regulate production and stabilize industry.

The purpose underlying this act is to have industry regulate itself, through trade associations which industry will set up, the Government to deal with each industry through the association organized within itself. To some extent the antitrust laws are suspended, but price fixing is prohibited, although industry may control production. In short, it is, in the language of the President, "A great cooperative movement throughout all industry" to bring about wide reemployment, a shorter working week, with decent wages, the prevention of unfair competition and of disastrous overproduction.

This measure, which the President preferred to define as a "partnership with industry" rather than the control of industry, provides for a bond issue of $3,300,000,000 to be retired at the rate of $220,000,000 annually. It is estimated that this program will put at least 3,000,000 men back to work at a time when the need for employment is greatest.

Proceeds of the bonds to be sold under authority of the Recovery Act may be expended for highway construction, public buildings, conservation and development of natural resources, the utilization and purification of water, development of water power, transmission of electrical energy, for river and harbor improvements where they are found to be justified, for low-cost housing and slum-clearing projects—in short, for any public or semipublic enterprise found to be constructive and worthy and which the President may approve. Among other things, the bill provides for the expenditure of $400,000,000 for highway construction.

For the protection of labor it is provided that in the various States contracts involving the expenditure of funds obtained from the Federal Treasury shall contain provisions establishing rates of wages to be predetermined by the proper State authorities; that this protection shall be accorded both skilled and unskilled labor; and that in the invitation for bids on such contracts the rates of wages shall be stated so as to be included in the contract biddings.

Operations of the Industrial Recovery Act are limited to 2 years, but may be terminated sooner if the emergency passes.

UNEMPLOYMENT

The first attack on the unemployment problem came before the Roosevelt administration had been in power 3 weeks. On March 21, the President sent to Congress the reforestation bill, which was promptly enacted by Congress, and under which 250,000 young men are being put to work at reforestation camps. Subsequently, the President issued an order under which 25,000 eligible young men from the ranks of former service men are to be included in the reforestation army, known as the "Civilian Conservation Corps." Members of this corps receive $30 per month, with food, shelter, clothing, and medical attendance, with certain provision for pay increases for those most meritorious.

As they are drawn largely from the towns and cities, employment of these men in a valuable work relieves such communities of their support at a time when there is a very heavy strain upon the resources of the various charitable agencies, both private and public. A fund of $200,000,000 to meet the expense of the reforestation work was obtained out of an unexpended balance in the Treasury appropriated for public works, and thus this reforestation program does not require additional taxation.

In addition, the Congress passed an act authorizing outright grants of $500,000,000 to the respective States, the money to be expended by the States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment.

Also, the Congress passed the Wagner unemployment agency bill, providing for the establishment of Federal employment agencies in industrial communities in cooperation with the States and authorizing appropriations therefor until 1938. This act was passed during the last administration, but was vetoed by President Hoover.

AGRICULTURE

Enactment of emergency legislation under which the President has set up the Farm Credit Administration. By Executive order the President had consolidated the activities of the Federal Farm Board and the various other boards and bureaus set up by preceding administrations in their futile efforts to deal with the farm crisis and save the agricultural industry from bankruptcy.

Under this legislation authority is conferred upon the President to expand credits, stimulate the price of farm products, increase the currency in circulation, and take such other steps as the Chief Executive and his advisers may deem necessary to restore agriculture to a basis of prosperity and end the orgy of bankruptcies which have swept away the homes and other property of literally millions of farm families. The sum of $200,000,000 is provided for additional farm credits, and even more far-reaching in its effect will be the authorization of the issuance of $2,000,000,000 in bonds with which farm mortgages may be refinanced at the low interest rate to the farm owner of 4½ percent. Thus the farmer who has been burdened under mortgage interest rates of 6 and 7 percent, and sometimes even higher rates, will be able to refinance his mortgage at 4½ percent and is given 15 years during which to amortize the mortgage. Under the authority conferred upon the President the duties of the various existing agencies, such as the Federal Farm Board, the Farm Loan Board of the Treasury Department, the Crop Loan Bureau of the Department of Agriculture, the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation, and others were transferred, and all authority to deal with the farm-credit problem centralized in the Farm Credit Administration.

In the program of farm legislation Congress provided for the establishment and maintenance of such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities as it is hoped will reestablish prices paid to farmers so that their agricultural commodities will have a purchasing power equivalent to that which they enjoyed before the war. Authority is given to the Secretary of Agriculture to bring about reduced production to increase farm commodity prices and to negotiate marketing agreements with processors and handlers of agricultural commodities to accomplish the purposes of the legislation.

MUSCLE SHOALS

After more than 12 years of enormous waste under Republican administrations, during which time many millions of dollars worth of water power has gone over the great Muscle Shoals Dam with neither the Government nor the American public receiving any benefits therefrom, the Congress, under the leadership of President Roosevelt and Senator Norris, passed the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. Under this act a board of three members has been appointed to put the great Muscle Shoals property and Tennessee River to work for the people. By the development of Muscle Shoals and the construction of the Cove Creek Dam, not only will agriculture be served but flood control in the Tennessee and Mississippi Valleys will be furthered, navigation will be encouraged, and power developed and conserved. It will open additional avenues for a large number of workers and lead to the industrial development of a section of our country rivaling the Ruhr Basin of Germany in its richness.

In addition, this great property, whose development was begun by another Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson, will be kept in the control of the people in stand-by condition for use in case of war emergency. It will produce fertilizer to the end that the farmer's fertilizer bill will be reduced; and it will mark a long forward step in flood control, thereby helping to remove from the lives of thousands of citizens and of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property the annual menace from the recurring floods which in the past have claimed an enormous toll in human life and property damage. It will also open the Tennessee River to navigation the year round and contribute enormously to the development of the immensely valuable natural resources in the Tennessee River Basin. Moreover, development of water power at Muscle Shoals will set up a yardstick for the determination of fair and reasonable rates for electric energy, bringing cheaper power to consumers throughout the entire country, and mark the dawn of a new day of electrification, rural as well as urban. This development will contribute materially to the accomplishment of the great Nation-wide program of conservation for which the Democratic Party has long stood, to the end that the country's vast natural resources may be saved to the people rather than be conferred as special privileges upon monopolistic selfish interests for the serving of special ends at the expense of the people.

MONEY AND BANKING

Enactment of emergency banking legislation, passed March 9—the first day of the special session of Congress—under which approximately 14,500 banks were reopened after the bank-panic holiday. Control over currency passed to the President under the inflation sections of the Farm Act; the gold clause was outlawed in public and private contracts and the President authorized to fix gold and silver coinage ratio. The Glass-Steagall banking bill passed in the closing days of the session has been declared the greatest piece of banking legislation since the passage of the Federal Reserve Act in the first administration of President Wilson. This legislation amends the Federal Reserve Act by empowering the Federal Reserve Board to suspend banks from the use of credit facilities of the Federal Reserve banks for the speculative carrying of or trading in securities, or other purposes not consistent with the maintenance of sound credit conditions; it makes Morris plan and other industrial loan banks eligible for membership in the Federal Reserve System; it provides for the divorcement of member banks from security affiliates to prevent speculation with depositors' money; it makes provision for the prompt liquidation of closed banks, for the relief of depositors, and sets up a corporation to insure bank deposits within certain limitations in order to safeguard the depositors and prevent further such terrific losses as have occurred to depositors during recent years through the failure of many thousands of banking institutions. A Democratic Congress in the administration of Woodrow Wilson enacted the Federal Reserve Act, admitted by all classes to be one of the most constructive banking measures passed for over half a century. The recent session under the leadership of President Roosevelt enacted the Glass-Steagall banking bill, which I have said is declared to be the greatest piece of banking legislation since the passage of the Federal Reserve Act. This is a complete answer to the challenge which has been so continuously made that the Democratic Party cannot be safely entrusted with the business affairs of the Nation.

SECURITIES ACT

This act provides for Federal supervision, through the Federal Trade Commission, of interstate traffic in investment securities, and is designed to protect the American public against further flotation of securities of doubtful value, the sale of which in recent years has cost the public many billions of dollars. The act requires that the fullest possible information concerning security issues it is proposed to market shall be filed under oath with the Federal Trade Commission, so that the prospective investor may have accurate and reliable knowledge of the business and properties on which the securities are based. Severe penalties are imposed for failure to comply with the provisions of this act.

HOME MORTGAGES

Under the bill for the relief of home owners, persons whose homes are threatened with mortgage foreclosure may on homes with an assessed valuation up to $20,000 refinance their mortgages at an interest rate of 5 percent, and may have 15 years in which to pay off the mortgage. Through this legislation it is expected that not only will millions of families be able to save their homes, but that a more considerate policy on the part of private mortgage holders will be forced.

ECONOMY

As a result of the passage of the Economy Act and through the reorganization of the various departments and bureaus of the Government, to eliminate waste, duplication of effort, and to abolish unnecessary Federal activities, it is estimated that the cost of the Federal Government will be reduced $1,000,000,000 during the next fiscal year. This is about 25 percent of the total cost of the Federal Government and therefore is in strict fulfillment of the pledge contained in the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago last year to reduce the cost of the National Government by one fourth.

Government salaries have been reduced by 15 percent, and as a result all the economies which have been provided for, and with the additional revenue expected to be brought into the Treasury, it is expected that the Federal Budget will be substantially balanced during the next fiscal year, thus contributing to the restoration of public confidence and to economic recovery. At the last session of the Seventy-second Congress appropriations made for the ordinary operations of the Government for the fiscal year 1934 amounted to $4,358,879,635.98, which was $1,323,188,585.97 less than the appropriations made at the previous session, which amounted to $5,682,068,221.95. For this reduction a Democratic appropriations committee and a Democratic House can justly claim the chief credit. Included in the total appropriations made at the closing session of the Seventy-second Congress were amounts appropriated for the District of Columbia for 1934, viz: $36,291,647 and $1,003,314,981, which was carried for independent offices for the same fiscal year. These two bills failed of passage and were reenacted at this special session with a saving of $377,428,248. In the District of Columbia appropriation bill enacted at this special session $30,375,834 was carried, thereby effecting a saving of $5,915,813. The reenacted independent offices bill carried $631,802,546, a saving of $371,512,435.

In fact, since the Democratic Party organized the House at the beginning of the Seventy-second Congress, including that Congress and the special session, there has been a total reduction of appropriations for the ordinary operations of the Government amounting to $2,840,470,452.91.

REVENUES

The Industrial Recovery Act provides for $227,000,000 of new revenues. Of this $62,000,000 will be derived from the increase of one half cent on gasoline and $165,000,000 from changes in the income- and profits-tax sections of the Revenue Act of 1932, which includes a tax of 5 percent on stock dividends, estimated to yield $70,000,000. These amendments also transfer the power tax from the consumer to the producer. The tax on beer is estimated to yield a sum of not less than $125,000,000 to possibly $200,000,000 annually.

Congress has amended the Revenue Act of 1932 in two respects to prevent the escape of wealthy classes from the payment of income taxes, as was disclosed by the Senate committee's investigation into the J. P. Morgan partnership. Under the 1932 Revenue Act, private bankers were exempt from the provisions of that act with respect to deductions for short-term losses. This exemption has been removed and private bankers are now treated in this respect exactly like any private individual or corporation. The other amendment provides that no part of a loss disallowed to a partnership, because of the fact that it is sustained in connection with transactions in stocks and bonds covering a period of 2 years or less, shall be allowed as a deduction to an individual member of the partnership. These two amendments are expected to bring a good many millions of dollars in taxes, heretofore evaded, or avoided, into the Federal Treasury.

PROHIBITION

In keeping with the pledge made by the Democratic Party in its 1932 platform, this Congress modified the Volstead Act to permit the manufacture and sale of beer (in such States as legalize such manufacture and sale) having an alcoholic content of not to exceed 3.2. This is expected to bring revenue into the Federal Treasury of from $125,000,000 to $200,000,000 a year.

RAILROADS

The Railroad Act provides for railroad combinations and coordination, to link the systems together, enable them to use one another's terminals and like facilities, and to jointly adjust schedules and bring about savings to investors and lower rates to the shippers. Labor is protected against the loss of jobs. The office of coordinator is established; that officer to enforce the economies and adjustments contemplated in the act, with three regional assistant coordinators provided for.

TARIFF

In the Industrial Recovery Act, the President is authorized to adjust tariffs and impose embargoes to meet damaging foreign competition made possible through depreciated currencies.

EXTRAORDINARY MEASURES

Through the series of measures passed during the closing session of Congress vast extraordinary powers have been vested in the President to empower him to deal with the critical economic situation. He has been given the power to alter the gold content of the dollar; to remonetize silver; to suspend or alter, within limits, governmental contracts, including Federal salaries, pensions, and allotments, air and ocean mail subsidies; to regulate and coordinate industrial production and banking and railroad operations; to develop and operate Muscle Shoals; to allocate appropriations for public works; to reduce the first-class mail rates; to alter tariffs, levy quotas, and establish embargoes, with the advice of the United States Tariff Commission, and to regulate or prohibit the interstate shipment of oil produced in violation of State quota laws. This delegation of power was conferred to meet an acute emergency and is limited to a period of not more than 2 years.

In this remarkable achievement it has been necessary for everyone to make sacrifices as their share toward victory in the war being waged against depression. That these sacrifices will be cheerfully made I have no doubt, for the patriotic spirit of the Americans today is characteristic of that which they evidenced when war clouds enveloped our country.

This record abundantly justifies the continued confidence of the American people in a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress, in which every Member has played a necessary and important part.

When the weary Members of the Congress returned to their homes I am sure they met on every hand evidences of the confidence of the home people and received commendation from them for the service which they had rendered their districts, their State, and their Nation during the momentous session which has just come to an end.

May I say in conclusion that everyone should exhibit a spirit of optimism and confidence in the future which is justified by the present trend of events, and those who may seek, for any reason whatever, to lessen this spirit of optimism and confidence are not serving the best interests of their country.

LEGISLATIVE RECORD OF SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, availing himself of his constitutional powers, President Roosevelt called an extraordinary session of the newly elected Seventy-third Congress to assemble March 9 this year. An even 100 days elapsed from the date of its assemblage to the date of its adjournment, June 16.

It was in every sense of the word an extraordinary session of Congress. No legislative body in the history of the United States ever wrought such profound changes in the laws and the Constitution.

It appropriated more money, levied more and heavier new taxes, and authorized a larger bond issuance, calling for heavier annual interest charges, than any other Congress in the history of the United States, with the single exception of the Congress in session during the World War.

In those 100 days the extraordinary session of the Democratic Congress appropriated, in round numbers, $4,400,000,000.

It continued in force the new special taxes the last Democratic Congress levied, amounting to $400,000,000. When those taxes were levied a year ago, the Democratic Congress characterized them as temporary, and the law provided they would expire as of June 30 this year. But this new Congress continued those taxes and added $220,000,000 more new taxes, making $620,000,000 additional new taxes to be paid by the American people during the coming fiscal year.

This Congress authorized the issuance of $8,560,000,000 in new Government bonds or securities. The Government disavows responsibility for the payment of the principal of $4,000,000,000 of this amount. This disavowal is carried in the acts of Congress which authorized their issuance. The Government does, however, agree to pay the interest. Of the remaining $4,500,000,000 the Government promises payment of interest and the redemption of the principal in whatever we may be using for money at the time the principal and interest become due. Assuming that these bonds may be floated at the same rate of interest as the most recent issue was floated, namely 2⅞ percent, this enormous bond issue will increase the annual interest charges of the Government in the sum of $244,662,500. With the issuance of these bonds, our interest-bearing public debt will exceed by $5,000,000,000 the peak of our public debt during the World War.

In view of this, what of the pledge of the Democratic Party to reduce expenditures of the Federal Government 25 percent and balance the Budget? It has gone to the realm of forgotten things; just another one of those Democratic campaign promises.

Instead of reducing the Federal expenditures 25 percent, the Democratic administration in 100 days more than doubled them.

When this Congress assembled it found the short session of the Seventy-second Congress, which closed March 4, had passed all but two of the regular appropriation bills providing funds to run the Government for the fiscal year beginning July 1 next. All the special session had to do to carry out the program of a 25 percent reduction in public expenditures was to pass the two appropriation bills which the previous Congress had not acted upon and start its program of economy. It did pass the two appropriation bills, carrying a total of $662,000,000. With the passage of these the work of providing funds for the regular expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year beginning next July was completed. But instead of setting about to save 25 percent of the appropriations made, this special session of Congress started on a spending spree. It passed additional appropriation bills carrying a total of $3,708,000,000, to take care of new agencies, new activities, new machinery demanded by the Democratic administration and created by the special session of the Democratic Congress. (See table A, at close of remarks.) One appropriation bill alone, passed on the last day of the special session of Congress, carried appropriations for these new activities in the sum of $3,608,915,000—which is $600,000,000 more than the entire cost of running the Government for the last fiscal year, not including the interest on the public debt and the sinking fund.

The Federal Budget has not been balanced. It is more out of balance than at any time in the history of the United States, with the single exception of 1 year during the World War.

There has been a persistent attempt upon the part of this administration to make the public believe the Budget has been balanced. It is doing this through the device of keeping two sets of books. One set is known as the "ordinary Budget." The other set is known as the "extraordinary Budget." The "ordinary Budget" consists purely of operating expenses. The "extraordinary Budget" consists of major expenditures, labeled "Emergency" or "Capital investments."

To illustrate: The average citizen, running his household in this manner, would charge up against his salary or wages his incidental day-by-day household expenses, such as food, clothing, gas, light, and fuel, and call it his "ordinary budget." But if he had doctor or hospital bills or some other unforeseen expense, he would label it "emergency" and put it in his "extraordinary budget." If he desired to purchase a motor car or household furniture or repair his property, he would borrow the money, charge it to "capital investment" and place it in his "extraordinary budget."

If, at the end of the year he had been able to meet his incidental expenses out of his salary or wages, he would claim that he had balanced his budget. He would take no account, insofar as his budget was concerned, of the money he had borrowed to buy his motor car or furniture or to repair his property.

That is a delightful way of fooling oneself until the day of reckoning is at hand. But the time comes quickly when the householder who runs his financial affairs in this manner appears in the bankruptcy court. The obligations which he has incurred must be paid, regardless of whether he classifies them as "ordinary" or "extraordinary."

So it is with this Government. Tricky bookkeeping, devised to conceal from the public the real financial condition of the Government, may succeed in its purpose for a brief time, but it does not pay off the debts. It does not stop the drain on the public credit. It does not stop the increase in interest charges. It does not halt the upward march of Federal taxes.

Heretofore there has been no deception regarding our Federal expenditures. Since the organization of this Government, under both parties, our methods of handling the public's money have been subject to no concealment. For example, appropriations for Federal aid in public highway construction were carried in the regular appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture, because the Public Highway Bureau is an integral part of the Agricultural Department, and the Secretary of Agriculture is held responsible for its administration and for the proper expenditure of the Federal funds for public highway work. In like manner, and for like reasons, the public buildings appropriations appeared in the routine budget of the Treasury Department, new Navy construction was properly included in the regular appropriation bill for the Navy, and reclamation appropriations appeared in the routine appropriation bill of the Department of the Interior, and so on. By this method the people knew what their Government was costing them. If at the end of the year there was a deficit, they at least knew where and how that deficit had been created.

Under the "new deal" the Federal expenditures for public highway construction, public buildings, naval construction, reclamation, and other like expenditures are no longer found in the budgets of those departments that spend the money.

They are kept in another set of books. They are classified as "capital investments", and when the Budget is to be balanced these expenditures are completely ignored.

But bookkeeping or no bookkeeping, the $400,000,000 appropriation for public highway construction made by the special session of Congress just closed must be paid by the taxpayers. So, too, must the $247,000,000 of new construction for the Navy and the $50,000,000 authorized for work in reclamation, irrigation, and drainage projects, and the billions of dollars that are to be expended by the Treasury Department for public buildings. You cannot escape the sheriff and the debtors' court by the mental process of capitalizing your debts and calling them investments.

Had the Republican administration adopted this trick of Budget balancing by keeping two sets of books, the deficit of $903,000,000 for the fiscal year of 1931, which the Democrats in Congress characterized as "stupendous" and "staggering", would have been transformed into a handsome surplus of $360,000,000, and the Democratic Party would have been deprived of one of its principal campaign issues. The Republican administration spent the money and kept the account in only one set of books, which are always open to the public. It attempted no deception in order to lull the people into a false sense of financial security. That was old fashioned, according to economic standards set up by this administration. But it may be said in justification of those old-fashioned Republican methods that history records the unvarying story that double bookkeeping and juggled budgets have been the favorite tools of short-sighted politicians since the beginning of organized government—devices to deceive the taxpayers that inevitably resulted in bankrupt governments and economic and political uprisings.

The system of double bookkeeping has been carried by this administration into the matter of issuing Government bonds, which increases our interest-bearing public debt. The special session of Congress authorized the increase of our interest-bearing public debt by the stupendous sum of $8,560,000,000. As stated previously, the Government does not undertake to redeem $4,000,000,000 of these new bonds authorized by the acts refinancing farm and home mortgages, although it does guarantee the interest. The National Recovery Act made necessary the issuance of $3,300,000,000 of Government bonds in order to provide the money appropriated to carry out the provisions of that act. In addition to the above, the special session of Congress authorized the expenditure of $1,210,000,000 to carry out other activities inaugurated by this Democratic administration and directed that the money be obtained from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is financially merely the alter ego of the United States Treasury. It borrows no money anywhere except of the United States Treasury. The United States Treasury is its only creditor. Every time the Congress authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans or advance money to any project and authorizes it to increase its outstanding obligations in that amount, insofar as the taxpayers of this country are concerned and insofar as the credit of the United States Government is concerned, it is merely issuing an order for the United States Treasury to increase our outstanding interest-bearing public debt by just that amount and turn the money over to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which, in the capacity of a middleman, passes it on as directed by the act of Congress.

Not only has this administration more than doubled the Federal expenditure, but it has prostituted the public service by stipulating in the legislation creating new activities and setting up new machinery that the Federal employees needed in those operations shall be political spoilsmen. Some conception may be had of the extent of this vast army of political spoilsmen now advancing on Washington when the Department of Agriculture estimates it will take 200,000 individuals to carry out the provisions of the domestic allotment law alone.

During its 100 days of existence, the Democratic Congress legally repudiated the gold standard, an act that was not found necessary during the dark days of the Civil War or during the period of financial stress during the World War. By reason of that action the United States Government, for the first time in its history, deliberately dishonored its pledges to those who had bought Government securities. This act of outright repudiation has set an example to other nations owing us money which is already bearing us costly fruit. It will operate to our financial loss and our national humiliation for generations to come.

As a corollary to this action, the Congress branded as a statutory criminal anyone who had accumulated savings out of his wages or income and held them in the form of what has been legal-tender money since this Government was first established 150 years ago.

This Congress put the Government directly into Federal ownership and operation of public utilities, and took a long, long step toward establishing Government ownership and operation of railroads and other transportation systems. It did this in the face of the miserable failure of Government operation of the railroads during the last Democratic administration.

This Congress set up the most elaborate system of bureaucratic dictation that has been known to the civilized world outside of Russia, and in some respects equal to that of Russia. This was done in the provisions of the Domestic Farm Allotment Act and the National Recovery Act. Under the provisions of those laws, Federal officials are empowered to put a Federal agent on every farm and in the office of every factory for the express purpose of dictating to agricultural and industrial producers conditions under which they must run their private affairs and imposing penalties of the law for disregard of bureaucratic orders.

In repudiation not only of the Democratic platform of 1932 but the Democratic platforms of the last half century, this Congress repealed the antitrust laws.

In some instances, in direct violation of the United States Constitution and in practically all instances in violation of the traditions and practices of this Republic, extending over a period of 150 years, this Congress gave to the President of the United States more power than was given to Lincoln to save the Nation or to Wilson to win the World War. It empowered him—

To increase or decrease the wages of every Government employee;

To close all the banks, or any bank, State or National, to keep them closed for any period he directs, and to fix the terms of their reopening;

To outlaw the possession by any individual, firm, or corporation of gold or gold certificates, to compel such legal tender to be delivered to the Government in exchange for whatever kind of money the Government chose to offer;

To impose taxes of unspecified amounts upon manufacturers and processors handling seven major farm products and, if necessary, competitive products;

To distribute the money thus raised as a bounty or bonus to certain agricultural producers;

To fix within certain broad limits pensions and compensation to be paid to veterans of the various wars and their dependents;

To require industries, or groups of industries, to adopt codes of practice within their industries affecting wages, maximum hours, working conditions, prices, restriction of output, and combinations;

To reject or modify such codes and to dictate substitute codes and compel industries to accept them, under penalty of being deprived of the right to continue in business, in addition to being subject to fine;

To expend in his discretion all or any part of $3,000,000,000 in the construction of public works of whatever character he dictates and in whatever locality he selects, or to use the money in loans to cities and States for that purpose;

To expend up to $250,000,000 in maintenance of reforestation conservation work camps;

To impose operating conditions on the railroads of the United States;

To reorganize and consolidate executive agencies of the Government; to reallocate them or to abolish them altogether, forcing into idleness an untold number of employees of the agencies and activities so abolished;

To raise or lower postal rates, which gives him punitive power over the public press;

To cancel or annul existing air and ocean mail contracts;

To make public the income-tax returns of individuals in his discretion;

To compel the Federal Reserve banks to purchase up to $3,000,000,000 in Government securities, in order to sustain the market in Government bonds;

To start the printing presses and issue $3,000,000,000 in greenbacks; and

To debase the gold content of the dollar down to 50 percent of its present value.

This may not be a complete list of the powers the Congress delegated to the President, but it certainly is a formidable one, even though it may be incomplete.

In delegating those powers to the President, as well as in acting upon other measures, the Congress, insofar as the House of Representatives is concerned, has been a legislative but not a deliberative body. There never has been such a travesty upon representative government as the procedure of the House of Representatives in the extraordinary session of the Seventy-third Congress. Bills were written in the executive departments of the Government, sent to the House, and ordered passed as written.

In some cases, bills have been passed before they were printed, before any copies were available even for the leaders of the House or members of the committees sponsoring them, without anyone's knowing what they contained. Those bills were passed under special rules which made of the House of Representatives merely a rubber stamp to furnish the necessary legality to the desires of the executive branch of the Government. Those rules permitted no amendments to be offered to the bills in question. But the rules were not intended to be partisan. They were not directed at the Republican minority. They were merely intended to prevent freedom of action upon the part of the House of Representatives. In point of fact, their real purpose was to prevent the Democratic majority from getting out of control and refusing to take orders from the White House. Upon one or two occasions, these rules were invoked to force through bills which the Democratic caucus had refused to support.

All this was done upon the ground that dire emergencies existed, which could not be handled except by a highly centralized authority. Haste was represented as being the essential need of the hour.

With some of the legislation the Republican minority is in sympathy. To some of it, it is vigorously and unalterably opposed upon the ground that it violates every sound economic principle as well as the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and is subversive of the institutions of this Republic. Against such legislation the Republican minority has registered its protest. Under the Democratic rules which have governed the pracedure of the House, it could do nothing more.

With much of the legislation the Republican minority heartily agrees with the President that it is purely "an experiment." No time was permitted for careful analysis of or sober second thought upon that legislation. As Prof. Raymond Moley, Assistant Secretary of State and probably the closest adviser of the President, stated in a public article during the time Congress was in session:

> We are conscious of the danger that there is so little time to think.

In the opinion of the Republican minority much of the legislation of this session furnishes conclusive proof the danger referred to by Professor Moley was very real.

Rather than to take time to deliberate the mass of legislation thrust upon it by the executive departments with peremptory orders to pass it without hesitation or modification, rather than live up to the solemn duty of a body elected to reflect the will of the people and embody their wishes in the statutes of the land, this Congress has permitted itself to be driven in panicky haste to affixing its approval to the most revolutionary and far-reaching legislation ever enacted by any American Congress.

One thing, however, admits of no controversy. This Congress has dealt generously—even prodigally—with the Nation's Chief Executive. With some minor exceptions he obtained everything for which he asked—even to our adjournment. The record of the Republican minority in this Congress bears out the statement that we resorted to no captious criticism. We attempted no petty partisan obstruction. Even where we violently disagreed with the proposals before us, we registered our disagreement in a dignified and parliamentary manner, without bickering or vilification.

This extraordinary session is closing, leaving with the President unprecedented power and unparalleled funds to work out the salvation of the American people according to his own theories and strategy.

As upright American citizens whose first concern is for the welfare of their fellow countrymen and the integrity of their Nation's institutions, we all hope these experiments will prove equal to the hopes of the President who proposed them. As President Hayes stated in his inaugural address:

> He serves his party best who serves his country best.

The Republican minority of this House still subscribes to that sentiment.

Whether or not the measures enacted by this Congress fulfill the hopes of those proposing them is a question which time only will determine. If they prove successful, their very success is the vindication of their wisdom. But if they fail, let it be said that they failed because they were economically unsound rather than because they were unwisely administered. The President asked for the legislation and he asked for the power to be used as a public trust, and it was in such a spirit his requests were granted. The people of this country at least have the right to demand that he use this power in the same spirit it was granted and not as a political opportunity or a partisan weapon. Great as is the power now centered in the Chief Executive, still greater is his solemn responsibility to see to it that power is not prostituted or misused. The opportunities offered in much of the legislation enacted invite the building up of a corruptible and corrupting political machine, capable of intolerable abuses and immense scandals. Already there are evidences that certain interests and individuals are preparing to take advantage of just such opportunities. The American people will not demand that the President bring about an economic millennium through the powers vested in him and the laws enacted at his request, but they do expect and have a right to demand that if he fails in his high purpose that he return those powers untainted by political corruption or partisan favoritism. They had better remain unused than to be abused.

In closing, may I venture the opinion that whatever mistakes have been committed by this Congress have been committed because of the persistent demand that we sacrifice calm judgment and due deliberation in order to make haste. And may I recall the admonition of President Lincoln in his first inaugural address, when, at a time practically all factions and all parties were clamoring for action, action, action, he stated:

> Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time. If there be an object to hurry any of you in hot haste to take a step which you would never take deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time; but no good object can be frustrated by taking time.

NOTE.—The independent offices and District of Columbia appropriations were the two regular appropriation bills left over from the short session of Congress, which adjourned March 4 last. The third deficiency appropriation consisted almost wholly of providing funds to pay court judgments and claims against the Government. The miscellaneous items of the Fourth Deficiency Act were to pay claims and judgments against the Government, provide for the George Rogers Clarke Sesquicentennial Commission, pay the expenses of the delegation of the United States at the London Economic Conference, and pay expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the United States Senate. All the rest of the appropriations under the Fourth Deficiency Act were to finance projects and activities inaugurated by this administration. They totaled $3,608,915,000, to which must be added the $100,000,000 appropriated by the Agricultural Adjustment Act for administrative expenses in carrying out the provisions of that act. This makes a grand total of $3,708,915,000 that this special session of Congress appropriated over and above the routine expenses necessary to run the Government for the next fiscal year.

Part of the item of $3,300,000,000 in the Fourth Deficiency Act is "earmarked" under the provisions of the act. Four hundred million dollars is set aside for Federal aid in public-highway construction. Not less than $50,000,000 is set aside for consideration of public highways in national parks, forests, and Indian reservations.
